* The following is related of this ſaint, which I ſhall tranſcribe in the old engliſh ſtyle: Michael appered to another byſhop, and badde hym go to an hyll toppe unto the mount of Gardell, and there as he founde a bull teyed, he ſholde make a chyrche in the worſhyp of God and ſaynt Mychaell. Than were there two roches (rocks) of ſtone on eyther ſide, that the werke might not up. Than ſaynt Mychaell appered to a man that hyght Haymo, and badde hym go and put awaye the roche and drede no thynge. So this man went thyder and ſette to his ſhoulders, and badde the roche goo utter in the name of God and ſaynt Mychaell, and ſo the hylles wente utter as moche as neded to the werke.

Jacobus de Viragine has recorded, that when a great multitude were going to the church on his mount (for twice a day, as we are told, the ſea that encompaſſes this mount gives the people a paſſage) it happen'd that a big-belly'd woman who was near her time went along with them; and behold the ſea return'd with a mighty force, and all the company in a fright fled to the ſhore again, the woman with child excepted, who was overtaken by the waves of the ſea; but Michael the arch-angel preſerv'd her unhurt, ſo that ſhe brought forth her child in the middle of the ſea, and taking her child in her arms there gave it ſuck; and the ſea making way for her, ſhe rejoicing brought her babe to land.

† The Feaſt of the guardian Angels was eſtabliſh'd, or rather rendred general, by pope Paul V. at the ſollicitation of Ferdinand of Auſtria, afterwards emperor.

‡ We are told that this ſaint and his two companions refuſing to ſacrifice to the heathen gods, they were all beheaded in one and the ſame moment, whoſe tongues, after their heads were cut off, did ſtill confeſs the Lord. And to declare the merits of the martyr Denis, after he was beheaded, he ſtood upon his feet; and taking up his head in his own hands, carried it to the place where it is now buried.

† At the feaſt of all ſaints, the pope aſſiſts at the ſolemn office in the apoſtolical palace: a cardinal biſhop ſings maſs in it, and a ſtudent of the German college preaches

* In Rome a picture is ſhewn which was ſaid to be begun by St. Luke, and finiſh'd miraculouſly by an angel; or, according to others, St. Luke preparing to draw it, and praying to God that he might draw his ſon exactly, when he roſe he found the picture finiſh'd.

† In the ſeventh century, Boniface IV. conſecrated the Pantheon at Rome in honour of the bleſſed virgin, and all ſaints, which, upwards of ſix centuries before, had been dedicated to Jupiter, and all the Gods, by Agrippa. This conſecration of the Pantheon by Boniface IV. was a preparation to the feſtival of all ſaints: he eſtabliſhed it at Rome, after the dedication of this temple. In the beginning of the ninth century, Gregory IV. ordain'd that it ſhould be generally receiv'd in all parts of Chriſtendom, and ſolemniz'd on the 1ſt of November; whereas before it us'd to be ſolemniz'd the 12th of May.

preaches the ſermon there. Feaſt at S. Bibiana's, and at the Rotunda. At veſpers the pope aſſiſts at the ſolemn office which is ſung for the dead. St. Cæſarius; feaſt in his church.

2. Commemoration of the dead; the pope aſſiſts ſolemnly at maſs in the apoſtolical palace; the cardinal grand penitentiary ſings maſs. Feaſt at St. Gregory's on mount Cælius, and at the fraternity of the Dead, and that of the Vote, and of the Agonizing, which laſts the octave.

When the pope aſſiſts at veſpers, and at the matins of the dead, he is cloth'd in purple, having on his head a cowl turn'd in * ſuch a manner, that the fur with which it is lin'd, covers part of his face, and is ſo adjuſted, that it ſticks out like two horns: In this trim he goes to the chapel, with the croſs carried before him, and followed by the cardinals as uſual.

The officiating prieſt, whether the pope be preſent or not, is dreſs'd in ornaments ſuitable to all the maſſes, this excepted, which are black, when he neither puts on his ſandals nor his gloves †. After the ending of the maſs, the pope himſelf pronounces the abſolution. Whilſt the choir begins the Libera, his holineſs puts on a ſcarlet chaſuble, and a ſhroud is, in his preſence, laid upon the ſteps of the pontifical throne. At the pronouncing of the libera, two acolyths in ſurplices go up to the pope, the former with the thurible and the navicula; the latter with the holy water, and the ſprinkler. The chief cardinal prieſt preſents the navicula to his holineſs: At the beginning of the Kyrie Eleiſon, the pope gets up, and takes off his miter; and at the concluſion of it he turns about towards the altar, and begins to ſay the Lord's prayer audibly, and continuing it with a low voice, the chief cardinal prieſt gives the ſprinkler to his holineſs, who ſprinkles the ſhroud thrice with it. This being done, the cardinal preſents the pope with the thurible, who incenſes the ſhroud with it thrice; whereupon the two acolyths withdraw, and the ceremony concludes with a prayer: after which the pope ſays the Requiem, and the choir requieſcant in pace.

‡ On ſome occaſions, after the veſpers of the dead, a kind of bed of ſtate is rais'd in the middle of the church, having four tapers at leaſt on the four ſides. In the midſt of the ſhroud muſt be a ſilken croſs, embroidered with purple and red.

(*) The Romans uſed to commemorate the dead in the month of February, when it was cuſtomary for them to eat and carouſe. This the antient fathers reproach'd them with, as repugnant to religion and good manners: However, this part of the abuſe was introduced among the chriſtians of the primitive church, ſince we find in the hiſtory of thoſe ages, that (†) ſeveral ſuperſtitious chriſtians uſed to pray and drink upon the graves of the martyrs, purely from a principle of religion. Ovid in his Faſt. book ii. aſcribes the inſtitution of this feſtival to Æneas. The Romans alſo made oblations for ſouls departed, when they lighted (‡) tapers on their graves: They uſed to implore the Gods in their favour, or offer up () vows for the repoſe and comfort of their ſouls, who, if we are to believe Ovid, one day took the pains to come out of their graves, when they ran up and down the city and country to implore implore the aſſiſtance of the living; asking them the reaſon why the appointed anniverſaries were diſcontinued. This negligence, ſays he, was owing to the troubles and confuſion of the civil wars; the †† ſouls departed made heavy complaints about it; dreadful howlings were heard for ſeveral nights together; every one was terrified with the ſight of his anceſtors in the figures of skeletons; fathers appear'd to their children, husbands to their wives, when they beſought them to offer up prayers and ſacrifices: whereupon they immediately reviv'd the anniverſaries, upon which the ſouls departed made no farther excurſions. But to return to our commemoration of the dead. It owes its riſe to principles which are much more juſtly founded than thoſe of the antient heathens: the wants and neceſſities of deceas'd chriſtians have undoubtedly a quite different foundation than thoſe of idolaters. Be this as it will without taking notice in this place of a numberleſs multitude of idle tales concerning ſpirits, or making any compariſon between the heathen and chriſtian dead, it is certain, that our commemoration did not become general in the church, till Odilon, abbot of Clugny, had eſtabliſhed it in his dioceſe for the ſecond of November, at the end of the tenth century; not but the primitive chriſtians uſed to pray in a certain manner for ſouls departed, but no general commemoration had been yet ordain'd like that of the ſecond of November; which is due to the piety of St. Odilon, or rather, if we are to believe the old legends, to the charity of a traveller who return'd from Sicily. We are told that this man, terrified at the flames which mount Ætna belch'd out, imagin'd it to be purgatory: he even fancy'd that he had heard the cries and groanings of the ſouls departed; which ſtruck him ſo prodigiouſly, that he went and acquainted St. Odilon with it, who thereupon inſtituted a ſolemn day for the conſolation of the ſouls departed, throughout the whole extent of his dioceſe.

I have a ſecret to reveal to thee, if thou wilt ſwear to conceal it. Valerian making an oath as ſhe deſir'd, I have, ſays Cecilia, an angel a lover of mine, who keeps my body with the moſt ſtrict jealouſy; if he ſhould in the leaſt perceive that thou toucheſt me with polluted love, his fury will immediately be ſtirr'd up againſt thee, and the flower of thy youth will be deſtroy'd: but if he finds that thou loveſt me with a ſincere and immaculate love, and preſerveſt my virginity whole and untouch'd, he then will love thee as well as my ſelf, and will expreſs his favour to thee. Valerian replied, If thou wouldſt have me give credit to thy words, ſhew me the angel; and if I find that he is really an angel of God, I will do as thou ſay'ſt; but if thou loveſt any man better than me, I will ſlay both him and thee with my ſword. So perſuading him to become a chriſtian, and be baptiz'd, ſhe ſhew'd him the angel.

The firſt ſunday in Advent, ſtation at S. Maria Maggiore's: the pope aſſiſts ſolemnly at the office in the apoſtolical palace; a biſhop aſſiſtant ſings maſs; the procurator-general of the Jacobins preaches the ſermon: after maſs the pope carries the hoſt in proceſſion to the chapel Paulina, where it is expos'd for forty hours.

The ſeaſon of Advent has a myſterious ſenſe; it repreſents to us that which preceded the incarnation of the Meſſias, and the hopes which the fathers in the old teſtament had conceived of his coming to redeem man; for which reaſon Advent is conſidered as a ſeaſon intermix'd with joy and ſorrow. Agreeable to this notion, * the Gloria in excelſis is not ſaid in Advent, nor the Te Deum at mattins. The miniſters of the altar don't put on the dalmatica, it being a habit ſuited to joy. In like manner it was formerly a cuſtom to faſt in Advent, which is ſtill obſerved in convents. During this whole ſeaſon the pope always goes to chapel on foot.

The three other ſundays in Advent the pope alſo aſſiſts ſolemnly at maſs in the pontifical chapel, and an aſſiſtant biſhop ſings maſs: the ſecond ſunday the procurator-general of the conventual minor minims, preaches the ſermon; the third a cardinal-prieſt ſings maſs, and the procurator-general of the Auſtin-fryars preaches the ſermon.

This ſunday muſt be celebrated with tokens of joy, becauſe the accompliſhment of the propheſies is at hand. Accordingly the altar is adorn'd with greater magnificence than on ‡ common days, and is embeliſh'd with flowers, images, and the relicks of ſaints: the miniſters reſume the dalmatica. Writers of an enthuſiaſtick caſt, obſerve ſeveral ceremonies; but they are proper to prieſts only.

The fourth ſunday in Advent, the procurator-general of the Carmelites preaches the ſermon.

† This ſaint is invok'd in dangers, eſpecially at ſea. The legend informs us, that certain mariners being in great danger by a ſudden ſtorm that aroſe at ſea, they began to cry out, O Nicholas, the ſervant of God! if theſe things be true which we have heard concerning thee, now ſuccour us; that ſo being delivered from this danger, we may render thanks to God and thee. While they were ſpeaking one appear'd, and ſaid to them, behold I am here, for you called me; and immediately began to help them in ordering their ſails, cables, and other tackling: and a little after the ſea ceas'd its roaring, and the tempeſt was heard no more. The mariners when they came to ſhore, preſently enquir'd where Nicholas was, and hearing he was in the church, they went into it; and what is wonderful, knew him immediately without any one's pointing him out, tho they had never ſeen him before: and falling proſtrate at his feet, they paid their thanks to him, and related in what manner he had delivered them from impending death.

Then the magicians and ſoothſayers tried their skill upon her, but all in vain. After this they brought many yoke of oxen; but all their united force could not move her one ſtep.

‡ Some interpreters of myſteries aſcribe the inſtitution of the maſs of midnight to St. Teleſphorus, who ſat in the pontifical chair about the middle of the ſecond century: but the learned reject the decrees which ſome impute to this pope and his predeceſſors. Cardinal Bona alſo rejects the opinion which aſcribes to St. Teleſphorus the inſtitution thereof, and thinks that it was not celebrated annually, at ſtated times, till the pontificate of Julius I. Gregory the great mentions this maſs ſomewhere in his writings.

One privilege of the church of St. Mark at Venice, is to ſay the midnight-maſs at ſix in the evening. "This office, ſays S. Didier, in his account of the city and republick of Venice, begins at "24 a-clock, (according to the way of computing time in Italy) and two hours after maſs is ſung, "with four choirs, with the utmoſt ſolemnity, and a great concourſe of people. The BLESSING of the SWORD, and of the HAT fix'd on its point.

Annually before the office of Chriſtmas is begun, the eve before that feſtival, the holy father bleſſes a ſword, the hilt whereof is gold, and enrich'd with precious ſtones, wrought in the form † of a dove, with the ſcabbard and belt enrich'd in like manner, and the ‡ ducal hat fix'd on the point of it. This hat is made of purple-colour'd (*) ſilk, furr'd with ermin, and ſurrounded with a hat-band, made in the form of a crown adorn'd with jewels. Theſe his holineſs ſends to ſome potentate, for whom he has a peculiar affection, or to a great general, who may have merited ſuch a diſtinction for his bravery exerted againſt the enemies of chriſtianity. His holineſs when he performs this ceremony of the bleſſing, clothes himſelf with the albe, the (†) amict, and the ſtole, before he puts on the red cope, which he wears on the night of Chriſtmas-day. A clerk of the chamber preſents to him the ſword, and the hat fix'd on the point of it; who, after having pronounced the bleſſing, ſprinkles and incenſes them both with holy water. This being done, the pope goes to his chapel, preceded by the ſame clerk of the chamber, who walks with the ſword and the hat before the pontifical croſs. If the perſon for whom theſe preſents are deſign'd happens to be at Rome, he muſt receive them from the pope's hands, obſerving to kiſs his hand and his foot. His holineſs declares to him that the ſword denotes the power of our Saviour, and the victory which he has gain'd over the devil: but he does not forget to add, that it alſo denotes the temporal power which Chriſt has devolv'd upon his vicar. 'Tis, adds he, in giving the ſword which has received the benediction to the perſon who is to gird himſelf with it for the defence of the holy apoſtolical ſee; " 'Tis by this ſword that we declare you the defender of this power, " and of the (‡) pontifical ſovereignty; the protector of the holy ſee againſt the ene- " mies of the faith, and the bulwark of the church. ‡‡ May your arm, by the virtue " of this ſword, triumph over the enemies of the holy ſee, and of the name of Chriſt " Jeſus: May the Holy Ghoſt, repreſented by the dove, deſcend on your head, and " protect you againſt thoſe for whom God prepares his  judgments, before the holy " Romiſh church, and the holy ſee apoſtolick, &c." Such is the formula appointed by Sixtus IV. for this ceremony.

Sometimes the perſon to whom the pope preſents the conſecrated ſword is invited to read one of the leſſons of the office; in which caſe a clerk of the chamber girds him with the ſword over the ſurplice, clothes him with a white chaſuble, and puts the hat upon his head. After this the maſter of the ceremonies conducts him to the ſteps of his holineſs's throne, where he ſalutes the altar; and the pope, after having return'd the conſecrated hat to the maſter of the ceremonies, draws the conſecrated ſword out of the ſcabbard, touches the ground with the point of the ſword, waves it thrice aloft; and after having brought it back gently above the left arm, puts it again into the ſcabbard. This ceremony being ended, he goes to the desk and ſings the fifth leſſon of the office, having firſt received the pope's bleſſing. This chaunting being ended, he goes and kiſſes his holineſs's foot, which being done, his ſacerdotal veſtments are taken off, and the hat is again fix'd on the point of the ſword, which a gentleman holds with the point upwards till the office is ended. If the perſon for whom the ſword had been conſecrated, ſhould not be preſent at Rome, or is not able to read, the Romiſh ceremonial ordains, that a clerk of the chamber muſt put on the ſurplice, and ſing at the desk in his ſtead; and that afterwards both of them ſhall go and kiſs his holineſs's foot.

‡ The perſon to whom the ſword has been preſented, is conducted back to his houſe in pomp, by the nobility of the court of Rome. The ſword is carried before him held aloft, with the hat fix'd on the point of it.

Pope Pius II. ſent the hat and ſword to Lewis XI. * with four Latin verſes engraved on the blade of it, by which his holineſs exhorted him to revenge the blood of the Greeks, and to deſtroy the Ottoman empire. The aboveſaid pope ſent ſuch another ſword to Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy.

" The popes, ſays Aymon, in his picture of the court of Rome, ground this cuſtom " in that it is ſaid in the ſecond book of the Macchabees, c. 5. that Judas the Macchabee, going to fight Nicanor, general of the army of Antiochus, ſaw in a dream the " high prieſt Onias praying to God for the Jewiſh people, and the prophet Jeremiah " preſenting him with a ſword, and ſaying theſe words; receive Judas this holy " ſword, which is given thee by the Lord to deſtroy the enemies of Iſrael."

As we have taken notice of the fifth leſſon, which is ſung in the office of midnight by the perſon who receives the conſecrated ſword, it may not be improper to preſent the reader with the order of the leſſons of this office. † Before the pontificate of Paul II. the clerk of the ceremonies uſed to ſing the firſt leſſon, an acolyth the ſecond, an auditor the third, the youngeſt of the cardinal prieſts the fourth, the perſon who received the conſecrated ſword the fifth, or a clerk of the chamber in his ſtead. An apoſtolical ſub-deacon uſed to ſing the ſixth, an aſſiſtant-deacon on the left hand the ſeventh; the aſſiſtant-deacon on the right hand the eighth, and the pope the ninth: However, pope Paul II. changed that order, and regulated it as follows, viz. that an acolyth ſhould ſing the firſt leſſon, an auditor the ſecond, a ſub-deacon the third, the youngeſt of the cardinal-prieſts the fourth, the perſon who received the conſecrated ſword the fifth, a cardinal-prieſt the ſixth; but made no alteration with regard to the three laſt. Sixtus IV. ordain'd that all theſe leſſons ſhould be ſung by cardinals, and alſo that in caſe the emperor ſhould happen to be at this office of midnight, his imperial majeſty ſhould read the ſeventh leſſon. On this occaſion two deacons aſſiſtant to the pope, uſed to wait upon the emperor in his place, whilſt the laſt pſalm of the third nocturnum, or night-ſervice, was ſinging. Theſe two cardinals uſed to clothe his imperial majeſty with a ſurplice, gird him with the conſecrated ſword, put on him the white chaſuble, which was cloſe over the right ſhoulder, and open over the breaſt, breaſt, like that of a biſhop. As for the conſecrated hat, it was given to an eſquire, for the dignity of a duke being much inferior to that of an emperor, his imperial majeſty would have demean'd himſelf too much in wearing a ducal hat. The emperor being thus clothed in ſacerdotal veſtments, was conducted to his holineſs's feet by two cardinal-deacons, when he pay'd him the accuſtomed homage, and afterwards drew the ſword in the manner above-mentioned; after which he went up to the desk, where he receiv'd the apoſtolical benediction, and either ſung or read the leſſon. This being ended, his imperial majeſty uſed to go and kiſs the feet of the holy father, when the two cardinal-aſſiſtants brought him back to his place, and took off his ſacerdotal veſtments. This ceremony was obſerved when Frederick IV. was at Rome, at the maſs of Chriſtmas, in 1468. under the pontificate of Paul II. Hiſtory does not relate that any * other emperor was at Rome at that ſeaſon: And as for Frederick IV. thoſe who are acquainted with the hiſtory of Germany, know that this prince was fitter for a prieſt than an emperor.

† Polydore Virgil has told us a remarkable ſtory how God miraculouſly aveng'd St. Thomas of his enemies. St. Thomas being reputed king Henry's enemy, began to be ſo deſpiſed and hated by the common people, that coming to a town call'd Strode, the inhabitants thereof, in order to put an affront on the holy father, had the impudence to cut off the horſe's tail on which he rode: but hereby they brought a perpetual reproach upon themſelves; for afterwards it ſo fell out by divine permiſſion, that the whole poſterity of thoſe men who committed the fact, were born with tails like brute beaſts; whence the proverb of Kentiſh long-tails.

We find alſo in the Feſtivale, that a bird being taught to ſpeak, and to ſay St. Thomas, happening one day to ſit out of its cage, a ſpar-hawk ſeiz'd on it, and was going to give it a fatal gripe; but the bird crying out St. Thomas, the ſpar hawk fell down dead.——The inference drawn from it is admirable: If St. Thomas heard the bird of his grete grace, moch more will he here a chriſten man or woman, that cry to him for help and ſuccor.

'Tis ſaid in an old leger-book of Canterbury church, that the zeal of the people for this ſaint was ſo great, that there being three altars erected therein, one dedicated to Chriſt, another to the virgin Mary, and a third to Thomas; one year the offerings at St. Thomas's ſhrine amounted to 954 l. 6 s. 3 d. when thoſe of the bleſſed Virgin came only to 4 l. 1 s. 8 d. and to Chriſt nothing at all.

'Tis related, Gononi Chronicon, &c. that St. Thomas had, from his youth, vow'd his chaſtity to the bleſſed virgin: and being on a time among ſome of his companions, (before he was archbiſhop) he heard them boaſting of their miſtreſſes, and the rich preſents they had received from them. Thomas told them they vapour'd fooliſhly, for he had a miſtreſs that far excell'd them all; and that ſhe had beſtowed ſuch a preſent on him, the like whereof they had never ſeen. All this he intended in a ſpiritual ſenſe: but they being very urgent with him to ſhew it them, he ran to the church, and pray'd the bleſſed virgin to pardon the preſumptuous words he had ſpoken of her; when immediately ſhe appear'd to him in a viſion, and encouraging him ſaid, that he did well to cry up the excellency of his miſtreſs: upon which ſhe gave him a very fine little box, and opening it he ſaw ſomething of a purple colour, and taking it out, beheld a wonderful fine ſacerdotal garment.

The above-mention'd pope alſo has granted a plenary indulgence for ten years, every time that any perſon ſhall viſit the churches, after having confeſs'd and communicated: He alſo grants forty years indulgence to thoſe, who after having confeſs'd themſelves, and received the bleſſed ſacrament, go to church to pray for peace; for concord between the princes of chriſtendom; and for the wants and neceſſities of the church.

THE SACRAMENTS of the CHURCH.

I. Of BAPTISM.

THE church acknowledges ſeven ſacraments, which number, according to the catechiſm of the council of Trent, is eſtabliſh'd by the ſcriptures, by the tradition of the fathers, and the authority of councils. 'Tis ſaid that there ought to be no more nor no leſs than that number; and the reaſon given for it, and which we are told is ſufficiently convincing, is the relation there is between the natural and ſpiritual life. "Seven things, "ſays the ſame catechiſm, are naturally neceſſary to man: his birth; growth; "nouriſhment; the uſe of medicines to reſtore him to his health when de- "cay'd; the recovering his ſtrength when it has been weakned by any infirmity; "magiſtrates who may be inveſted with authority to govern him; and laſtly, law- "ful procreation, by which he may perpetuate himſelf in ſome meaſure, and pre- "ſerve the human ſpecies. All theſe particulars are found in the life which the ſoul "receives of God by the Sacraments. By baptiſm we are born again in Chriſt; by "confirmation we increaſe in grace; by the ſacraments our ſouls are nouriſh'd and "ſuſtain'd; by repentance we recover the health which we had loſt by the wounds "which ſin had made in our ſouls. Extreme unction waſhes away the remaining "impurities of ſin, and recruits the ſtrength which our ſouls had loſt. By the ſacra- "ment of orders, the miniſters of the church receive the power of adminiſtring pub- "lickly the ſacraments to the people, and of exerciſing all the reſt of the ſacred func- "tions of the miniſtry. Every one knows the end of marriage. Notwithſtanding, "continues this catechiſm, that each ſacrament comprehends in it ſelf a divine and "admirable virtue, they yet are not all equally neceſſary, nor equal in dignity ——.

" Three of them, altho not equally neceſſary, are nevertheleſs more ſo than the " other four. Thus baptiſm is abſolutely neceſſary; ſo is repentance to thoſe who " have fallen into mortal ſin. That of the bleſſed ſacrament ſurpaſſes all the other " ſacraments in excellency, and is no leſs neceſſary than baptiſm."

Theſe ſacraments are accompanied with ſeveral ſolemn and publick ceremonies, which the * church has thought fit to heighten them with, notwithſtanding they are not an eſſential part of them, ſince they can ſubſiſt without them; however it would be a ſin to omit them, unleſs in caſes of neceſſity. Hence it is that the council of Trent has pronounced anathema againſt thoſe who ſay that the miniſters of the ſacraments may, without ſin, deſpiſe, or omit intirely at pleaſure, the ſeveral ceremonies received in the church; or that it is in the power of every rector to change them, or inſtitute new ones. We are aſſur'd, " that theſe † ceremonies give us a " more diſtinct idea, and as it were ſet before our eyes the effects which reſult from " theſe ſacraments; and make holineſs imprint it ſelf more ſtrongly in the minds of " the faithful. They raiſe the minds of ſuch as obſerve them religiouſly, to the " contemplation of the moſt exalted things." In a word, we are aſſured that they excite and increaſe in us a ſpirit of charity.

" The ſacrament of † baptiſm is defined to be, a ſacrament inſtituted by our Sa- " viour to waſh away original ſin, and all thoſe we may have committed; to com- " municate to mankind the ſpiritual regeneration and the grace of Chriſt Jeſus; and " to unite them to him as the living members to their head."

Antiently there was no ſtated time or age for baptiſm; it was uſual to baptize on any day, in infancy, or a more advanced age, and very often at the point of death. As for the water employ'd in baptiſm, 'tis manifeſt that the apoſtles and their diſciples uſed to baptize their Neophytes, or new converts, with the firſt water that came in their way, whereof we have an undoubted teſtimony in the ſcripture. This ſimplicity has inſenſibly given way to practices, accompanied with numberleſs precautions, formulas, &c. to which the neceſſity of the times; the abuſes it was proper to prevent or repreſs; the order neceſſary to be obſerv'd in the church, the authority of the prieſts, and even devotion it ſelf may have equally contributed. The ſimplicity of the water of rivers ſcarce ſuited any but the primitive times; afterwards water was conſecrated, and to make the ſacrament ſtill more ſolemn, it was added, " that ‡ ſuch water, if poſſible, " muſt be made uſe of in baptizing, as had been conſecrated on caſter or whitſon-eve " of the ſame year; which muſt be carefully kept in a very clean veſſel employ'd for " that purpoſe." 'Tis true the ſame ritual adds, " that in caſe the water which was " conſecrated for baptiſm, ſhould be ſo far ſpent, that there was not enough re- " maining to ſerve till caſter or whitſon-eve, it may be mix'd with unconſecrated water, " provided it be leſs in quantity than that which is conſecrated."

The uſe of Baptiſterium's is not of modern date, nor is it ſo antient, as thoſe would make us believe who give credit to the ‖ pretended writings of St. Denis the Areopagite, and the conſtitutions of St. Clement.  Bede takes notice of certain Engliſhmen who were baptized in the Rhine: and the ſame author, who flouriſhed in the beginning of the ſeventh century, ſays farther, that they had no opportunity of building either baptiſteriums or chapels, in the infancy of the churches of thoſe countries. 'Tis manifeſt by the Romiſh martyrology, that in the time of pope Marcellus, the chriſtians uſed to have baptiſteriums in their houſes: under the reign of Conſtantine the great, ſome were erected in the ſuburbs, and even cities, as is manifeſt from the teſtimony of cotemporary writers. 'Tis pretended that in France, the the uſe of baptiſteriums in churches began in the reign of Clovis I. and that a little after the council held at Lerida, prohibited the having any out of the churches; however, Gregory the great relates, that they had already been introduced in them in his time. We may preſume they were appointed to be ſet up in churches, at the ſame period that the baptiſm of chriſtians was fix'd to the age of infancy, to prevent the danger that might happen to new-born children, from their being too much expos'd to the open air. Then fonts were ſet up in every pariſh, all rectors having an equal right to baptize, as being miniſters of the church; for it is pretended that in the infancy of the church, biſhops only were inveſted with that power. There are two ways of celebrating baptiſm; by immerſion or ablution; the latter is now uſed, and is perform'd by pouring water on the child's head.

After the biſhop, the rector, the curate, or any other prieſt appointed by the biſhop, may lawfully adminiſter baptiſm: * formerly the monks were intirely excluded from this rite; † both monks and nuns are prohibited from preſenting any children to be baptized. In caſes of urgent neceſſity a layman may adminiſter this ſacrament, as alſo women, who in certain caſes are preferr'd to men; and this is when ‡ a child muſt be baptized before it is intirely come out of its mother's womb; upon which it may be proper to make the following obſervations. Some part of its body muſt appear before it can be baptized, and 'tis baptized on that part; on its head if that appear firſt, in which caſe the rituals ſay that 'tis not neceſſary to re-baptize the child; but if only a foot, or hand appears, or ſome other part of the body, which, by its motion, gives ſome tokens of life, it muſt be baptized on that part, upon condition however that it be re-baptized || after it comes out of the womb. A child that is ſtill-born, after having been baptized in this manner, may without any ſcruple, be buried in conſecrated ground.

A monſter, or creature that has not the human form, muſt not be baptized; if it be doubted whether it be a human creature, it is baptized conditionally, thus, If thou art a man, I baptize thee, &c. If the monſter has more than one head or breaſt, it is taken for granted, that 'tis more than one creature; on which occaſion each of the perſons is baptized ſeparately. We meet with ſeveral particulars on this head in the rituals.

The godfathers and godmothers " repreſent the †† church which offers the child " to Chriſt to baptize and give it a new birth, as our Saviour gives it him by the " prieſt. They pronounce their confeſſion of faith in the child's name, in which " they anſwer and promiſe that he ſhall acquit himſelf faithfully of the ſeveral obli- " gations to which he is engag'd by his baptiſm."

The catholick church does not admit for godfathers or godmothers, either hereticks, infidels, excommunicated perſons, or known ſinners, who lead infamous lives; or ſuch as are not in their ſenſes, or are unacquainted with the firſt principles of religion, ſuppoſing them known for ſuch; nor children, or perſons under fourteen years of age. 'Tis certain that all in the circumſtances above-mention'd, are unable to perform the things requir'd of the church. The rituals add, that as ſpiritual alliance is contracted between the godfather and his goddaughter, or between the godmother and her godſon, they are not allow'd to marry together, nor even the godfather with his godſon's mother, nor the godmother with her godſon's father. The rituals add farther, that an alliance is contracted between the perſon who baptizes and the perſon baptized; as if a layman ſhould baptize a female child in a caſe of neceſſity, he is not allow'd to marry either her or her mother. Antiently it was cuſtomary mary to write in a kind of † regiſter, the names of ſuch as were candidates for baptiſm. As to the godfathers, to whom a ‡ name was given which denoted the duty whereof they were to acquit themſelves towards thoſe who were to be baptized, it is certainly of great antiquity in the church. In thoſe times adult perſons had ſponſors as well as children, as is now obſerved in the baptizing of an infidel.

The cuſtom likewiſe of giving a name to the perſon baptized is alſo of great antiquity; but we are not very certain that 'tis founded on the ſpiritual regeneration in Chriſt Jeſus. This reaſon may perhaps be good with regard to the baptiſm of grown perſons; but as for that of children, the ſame cuſtom was obſerved by the * Greeks and Romans, who uſed to name their children a little after they were born.

It would be needleſs to take notice of the ſeveral particulars which the prieſt who is to baptize the child, muſt do, before he performs that ceremony; in what manner he muſt addreſs himſelf to heaven, waſh his hands, put on the ſurplice, take the purple ſtola; and how, thus clothed and attended by his clerks, he walks towards the church, at the door of which thoſe who bring the child muſt wait for him. Here follows the moſt eſſential part of the ceremony: he firſt aſks the godfather and godmother what child they preſent to the church? whether or no they are its true godfather and godmother? if they are reſolved to live and die in the true catholick and apoſtolick faith? and, what name they intend to give it? All profane names, as thoſe of the heathens and their gods, muſt be rejected; nevertheleſs thoſe of Hercules, Hannibal, Achilles, Urania, Diana, &c. are common enough, but thoſe of the old teſtament are much leſs ſo: but the proteſtants, who are very little ſcrupulous on this head, never reject them; and to ſpeak the truth, are not the ſaints of the jewiſh as much ſo as thoſe of the chriſtian church, whoſe names only are order'd to be choſen? A prieſt is authorized to change the name of a child who had been baptized, †† Abraham, Iſaac, or Jacob, by a proteſtant miniſter. After the uſual queſtions have been aſked, the prieſt makes an exhortation to the godfather and godmother, with regard to the devotion which ought to accompany that act. The exhortation being ended, the prieſt continues the ceremony, and calling the child by the name that is to be given it, aſks it as follows: what doſt thou demand of the church? To which the godfather anſwers, faith. The prieſt adds, what is the fruit of faith? The godfather anſwers, eternal life. The prieſt goes on, if you are deſirous of obtaining eternal life, keep God's commandments; thou ſhalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, &c. After which he ſhall breathe three times upon the child's face, but ſhall obſerve not to let the child breathe upon him; and at the ſame time ſhall ſay, come out of this child thou evil ſpirit, and make room for the Holy Ghoſt. This being done, he ſhall, with the thumb of his right hand, make a croſs on his own forehead, and afterwards on the child's breaſt, pronouncing theſe words, receive the ſign of the croſs on thy forehead, and in thine heart, &c. Whereupon he takes off his cap, repeats a ſhort prayer, and laying his hand gently on the child's head, prays for him a ſecond time. This ſecond prayer being ended, the prieſt bleſſes the ſalt in caſe it was not bleſs'd before; which being done, he takes a little of it, puts it into the child's mouth, pronouncing theſe words, receive the ſalt of wiſdom; he repeats a third prayer, after which he puts on his cap, and exorciſes the prince of darkneſs; commands him to come forth out of him who is going to be baptized, &c. and at the end of the exorciſm he again makes the ſign of the croſs on the child's forehead, and puts his hand on its head, which is follow'd by another prayer.

* This ceremony was perform'd the ſeventh day among the Greeks; nevertheleſs the Athenians never uſed to name the child till the tenth day after its birth, when it was cuſtomary to have an entertainment, as among us at chriſtnings. In the time of the emperor Antoninus the philoſopher, children uſed to be named three days after their birth, agreeable to that emperor's order; whereas before, the Romans uſed to perform this ceremony on the eighth day when it was a girl, and the ninth when a male child; and theſe days were call'd luſtrici dies.

After this fourth prayer the prieſt lays the end of the ſtola on the child, and taking hold of his ſwadling clothes by one corner, he brings it into the church; the godfather and godmother enter in at the ſame time, and repeat with the prieſt, the apoſtles creed and the Lord's prayer, as they advance towards the font. Being come to the font, the prieſt exorciſes the devil once again, and after the exorciſm takes the ſaliva from his mouth, with the thumb of his right-hand; and with this ſaliva rubs the child's ears and noſtrils, and as he touches his right ear, repeats a Hebrew word, which ſignifies do thou open. Theſe words our Saviour ſaid to the man who was born deaf and dumb: we are therefore to ſuppoſe that the child who is going to be baptized is as yet deaf and dumb. Laſtly, they pull off its ſwadling clothes, or ſtrip it below its ſhoulders; during which the prieſt prepares the holy oils, &c.

The godfather either takes, or ſtrips, the child in the manner above-mention'd, and holds it directly over the font; when the * godmother takes it by the feet, obſerving to turn it towards the eaſt: whereupon the prieſt aſks the child, whether he renounces the devil and all his works, the pomps, &c? The godfather anſwers in the affirmative. Antiently this † renunciation uſed to be made without the church. The prieſt anoints the child between the ſhoulders in the form of a croſs, and after puts off his ſtola, and puts on a clean one; when the child is again queſtion'd with reſpect to his belief, to which the godfather makes ſuitable anſwers in his name. Theſe long preliminaries being ended, the prieſt takes ſome of the conſecrated water, part of which he pours thrice on the child's head in the form of a croſs, and as he pours it ſays, I baptize, &c. taking care to call upon one of the perſons in the Trinity every time he pours it on. This being done, he anoints the top of the child's head with the chriſma in form of a croſs; ‡ puts a piece of white linen upon his head, to repreſent the white garment mention'd in ſcripture; he puts into the child's hand, or rather into that of the godfather, a lighted taper, the ſignification of which is eaſily known. Such are the ceremonies of baptiſm, which the prieſt concludes with an exhortation; but if the child's life is in danger, theſe ceremonies are omitted, but upon condition that they ſhall be obſerv'd in caſe he recovers his health; but if he has all the ſymptoms of death upon him, ſo that it would be to no purpoſe to wait for the prieſt, then the midwife baptizes the child in the manner repreſented in the plate; nor muſt the midwife forget this precaution, the moment the child is born.

Adult perſons muſt, if poſſible, be baptized by the biſhop himſelf; but it is better to defer it till eaſter or whitſon-eve, which are the days appointed for baptiſm by the antient church. The prieſt who baptizes, and the candidate for baptiſm, muſt both be faſting. There is but very little difference between the ceremony of the baptiſm of catechumens and that of children. The prieſt ſigns the catechumen ſeveral times with the ſign of the croſs; firſt on the forehead, which implies that he muſt take upon himſelf the croſs of Chriſt; on the ears, in order that he may open them to the divine precepts; on the eyes, that he may ſee the heavenly light; on the noſtrils, that he may ſmell the fragrant odour of Chriſt; on the mouth, that he may utter the words of life; on the breaſt, that he may believe; on the ſhoulders, to the end that he may bear the yoke of the Lord. All the preceding ſigns of the croſs are confirm'd by three, which he makes over the whole perſon of the catechumen.

* The Ritual of Alet has it thus, but in the plate the godmother holds the child by the middle.

The godfather and godmother carry the catechumen to the font, after he has been introduced, exorciſed, interrogated, his ears and noſtrils rubb'd with ſaliva before he is admitted to baptiſm, and been anointed in the form of a croſs with the oil of the catechumens. The catechumen muſt put off part of his clothes, to denote the putting off of ſin.

Here follow ſome remarks borrow'd from Miſſon, * which alſo relate to the baptiſm of the catechumens. "The ceremony of the baptiſm of the Jews, and "other infidels, is celebrated at Rome in the church of St. John of Lateran, where "we are told Conſtantine the great was baptized. We ſaw ſix Turks baptized there; "they were dreſs'd in white damaſk clothes, with a cloke, a lawn band, and a ſilver croſs "hanging at their necks. A cardinal, accompanied with the prebends of St. John's "of Lateran, being come thither, the ceremony of conſecrating the water was firſt "perform'd; which being done, the proſelytes being preſented by their godfathers, "advanced forward one by one, declaring their deſire of being admitted to baptiſm. "Then they lean'd on the font, when the cardinal baptized them, and named them, "pouring water on their hands with a large ſilver ſpoon: this being done, they each "took a lighted taper, and were confirm'd in a chapel of the ſame baptiſte-"rium; after which they went and heard maſs in the church of St. John of "Lateran."

The ceremonies of baptiſm are founded on ſeveral antient cuſtoms, ſome where-of were practis'd in the apoſtolick ages. One of theſe laſt is the confeſſion of faith before baptiſm, whereof we have ſome inſtances in the new teſtament. That of touching the ears and noſtrils with ſaliva is of more modern date, we nevertheleſs meet with it in the works of St. Ambroſe. Exorciſm is founded on ſome paſſages in which our Saviour ſays to his diſciples, that they ſhall caſt out devils in his name: and this was practis'd in St. Chryſoſtom's time. The lighted taper which is returned to the hands of the catechumen, is perhaps of later inſtitution; but 'tis not ſo of the ſigns of the croſs. And as for the baptiſmal unctions, if they had no other proof than the conſtitutions of the pſeudo St. Clement, and the ſpurious writings aſcribed to St. Denis the Areopagite, their antiquity would be very much ſuſpected.

Sprinkling in baptiſm was not known in the firſt age of the church, when immer-ſion only was uſed; and 'tis ſaid that it continued till St. Gregory's time. The white veſtment given to the catechumens is much more antient than this pope; this the catechumens uſed to wear for ſeven days immediately following their baptiſm, and laid it aſide the eighth. We are told that theſe ſeven days denoted the ſeven gifts which the Holy Ghoſt communicates in baptiſm.

II. CON-

* Vide his voyage to Italy, Vol. 2. edition of 1702. We ſhall here add the ſingular circumſtances which are obſerv'd at chriſtnings by the Venetians: When a father has a child to be chriſtned, he firſt goes and invites the godfathers; the meaneſt plebeian has three at leaſt, the wealthy have twenty, and ſometimes above an hundred. The goſſips all croud to church together, among whom the father chuſes one to name the child. No entertainment is made after the ceremony, as in moſt other countries, but four ſugar loaves are generally ſent to each goſſip. The goſſips range themſelves in a ſemi-circular form from the church door to the font; and at the chriſtning of a tradeſman's child, they give the child from one to another, till it is gone quite round. The child is dreſs'd up like a doll in ſwathes made of ſilk, fine lace, &c. The manner in which the child is carried to church, and brought back from thence, is alſo particular; a man carries the babe on a velvet cuſhion, who is dreſs'd in very neat ſwadling clothes, but has nothing over him, his head and ſhoulders are quite bare.

CEREMONIE de la CONFIRMATION.

B. Picart. de.

Autre Maniere de CONFIRMER.

II. CONFIRMATION.

Some think the origin of the ſacrament of confirmation is found in the eighth chapter of the Acts of the apoſtles; || the biſhop only is allow'd to confirm; it ought to be done on Whitſon-day, becauſe the Holy Ghoſt then deſcended on the apoſtles. Seven years is the ſtated age for confirmation, however they are ſometimes confirm'd before, and frequently after that age; but this is left to the biſhop. The perſon to be confirm'd has a godfather and godmother appointed him, as in baptiſm. We ſhall not take notice of the ornaments, and preparations neceſſary for confirmation, but proceed to the ceremony it ſelf.

The candidate for confirmation † muſt, if poſſible, be faſting, and conſequently receive this ſacrament in the morning, becauſe it was at that time of the day the Holy Ghoſt deſcended on the apoſtles. The biſhop, before he begins the confirmation, falls to his private devotions, waſhes his hands, puts on the white ornaments; after which he turns himſelf about to the candidates, who ſtand in the ſame order as at baptiſm, viz. the boys on the right, and the girls on the left. He next repeats a prayer, which being done he ſits down, when the candidates kneel before him in the manner deſcribed in the ſecond compartment. If the candidates for confirmation are very numerous, the biſhop ſtands up, and the candidates ſtand on the ſteps of the chancel of the altar, ‡ and muſt be ſupported under the arm by their godfathers, particularly children; for as to adult perſons, their godfathers only put one of their feet forward, and the candidates alſo, to ſupport themſelves by it as it were. The biſhop enquires the name of each candidate, and has them regiſtred, after which he dips the thumb of his right hand into the chriſma, and therewith makes the ſign of the croſs upon their foreheads, and at the ſame time gives a gentle blow on the cheek to the perſon confirm'd, ſaying at the ſame time, peace be with you. Immediately after the forehead of the perſon confirm'd is bound with a ſlip of linen about the breadth of two fingers; when the biſhop ſays to him,  I confirm you by †† the chriſma of ſalvation, in the name of the Father, &c. the ceremony ends with the bleſſing of the perſons confirm'd, which is done by the biſhop who makes the ſign of the croſs upon them. All the ceremonies above-mention'd are exactly exhibited in the two compartments.

The little blow which the biſhop gives the perſon confirm'd, on the cheek, denotes to him, that the ſuffering for ‡‡ Chriſt Jeſus is the ſum of chriſtian perfection; but it may rather be ſaid, that 'tis a mark of the ſpiritual enfranchiſement; for the antient Romans, from whom this cuſtom was certainly borrow'd, uſed to manumiſe their ſlaves, by giving them a box on the ear, probably, to denote that that was the laſt time they would be uſed as ſlaves. The chriſma is laid on the forehead, || || this being the ſeat of boldneſs, fear, ſhame, &c. Such explications as theſe are fit only for the pulpit; but who can be ſo blind as not to perceive the ſalutary reflections they make in the mind? By the laying the chriſma on the forehead, we are taught that we are to defend the croſs of our Lord with boldneſs and courage; that we muſt dread offending him; tremble continually for fear leſt we ſhould be wanting in the duties of religion; not be aſham'd of bearing the croſs of Chriſt; or if we will bluſh, or be aſham'd, that it ſhall be for the ſins and diſorders of mankind. The godfather's ſupporting the candidate, denotes that thoſe who have not yet been confirm'd, are weak in chriſtianity.

III. SACRAMENT of the EUCHARIST.

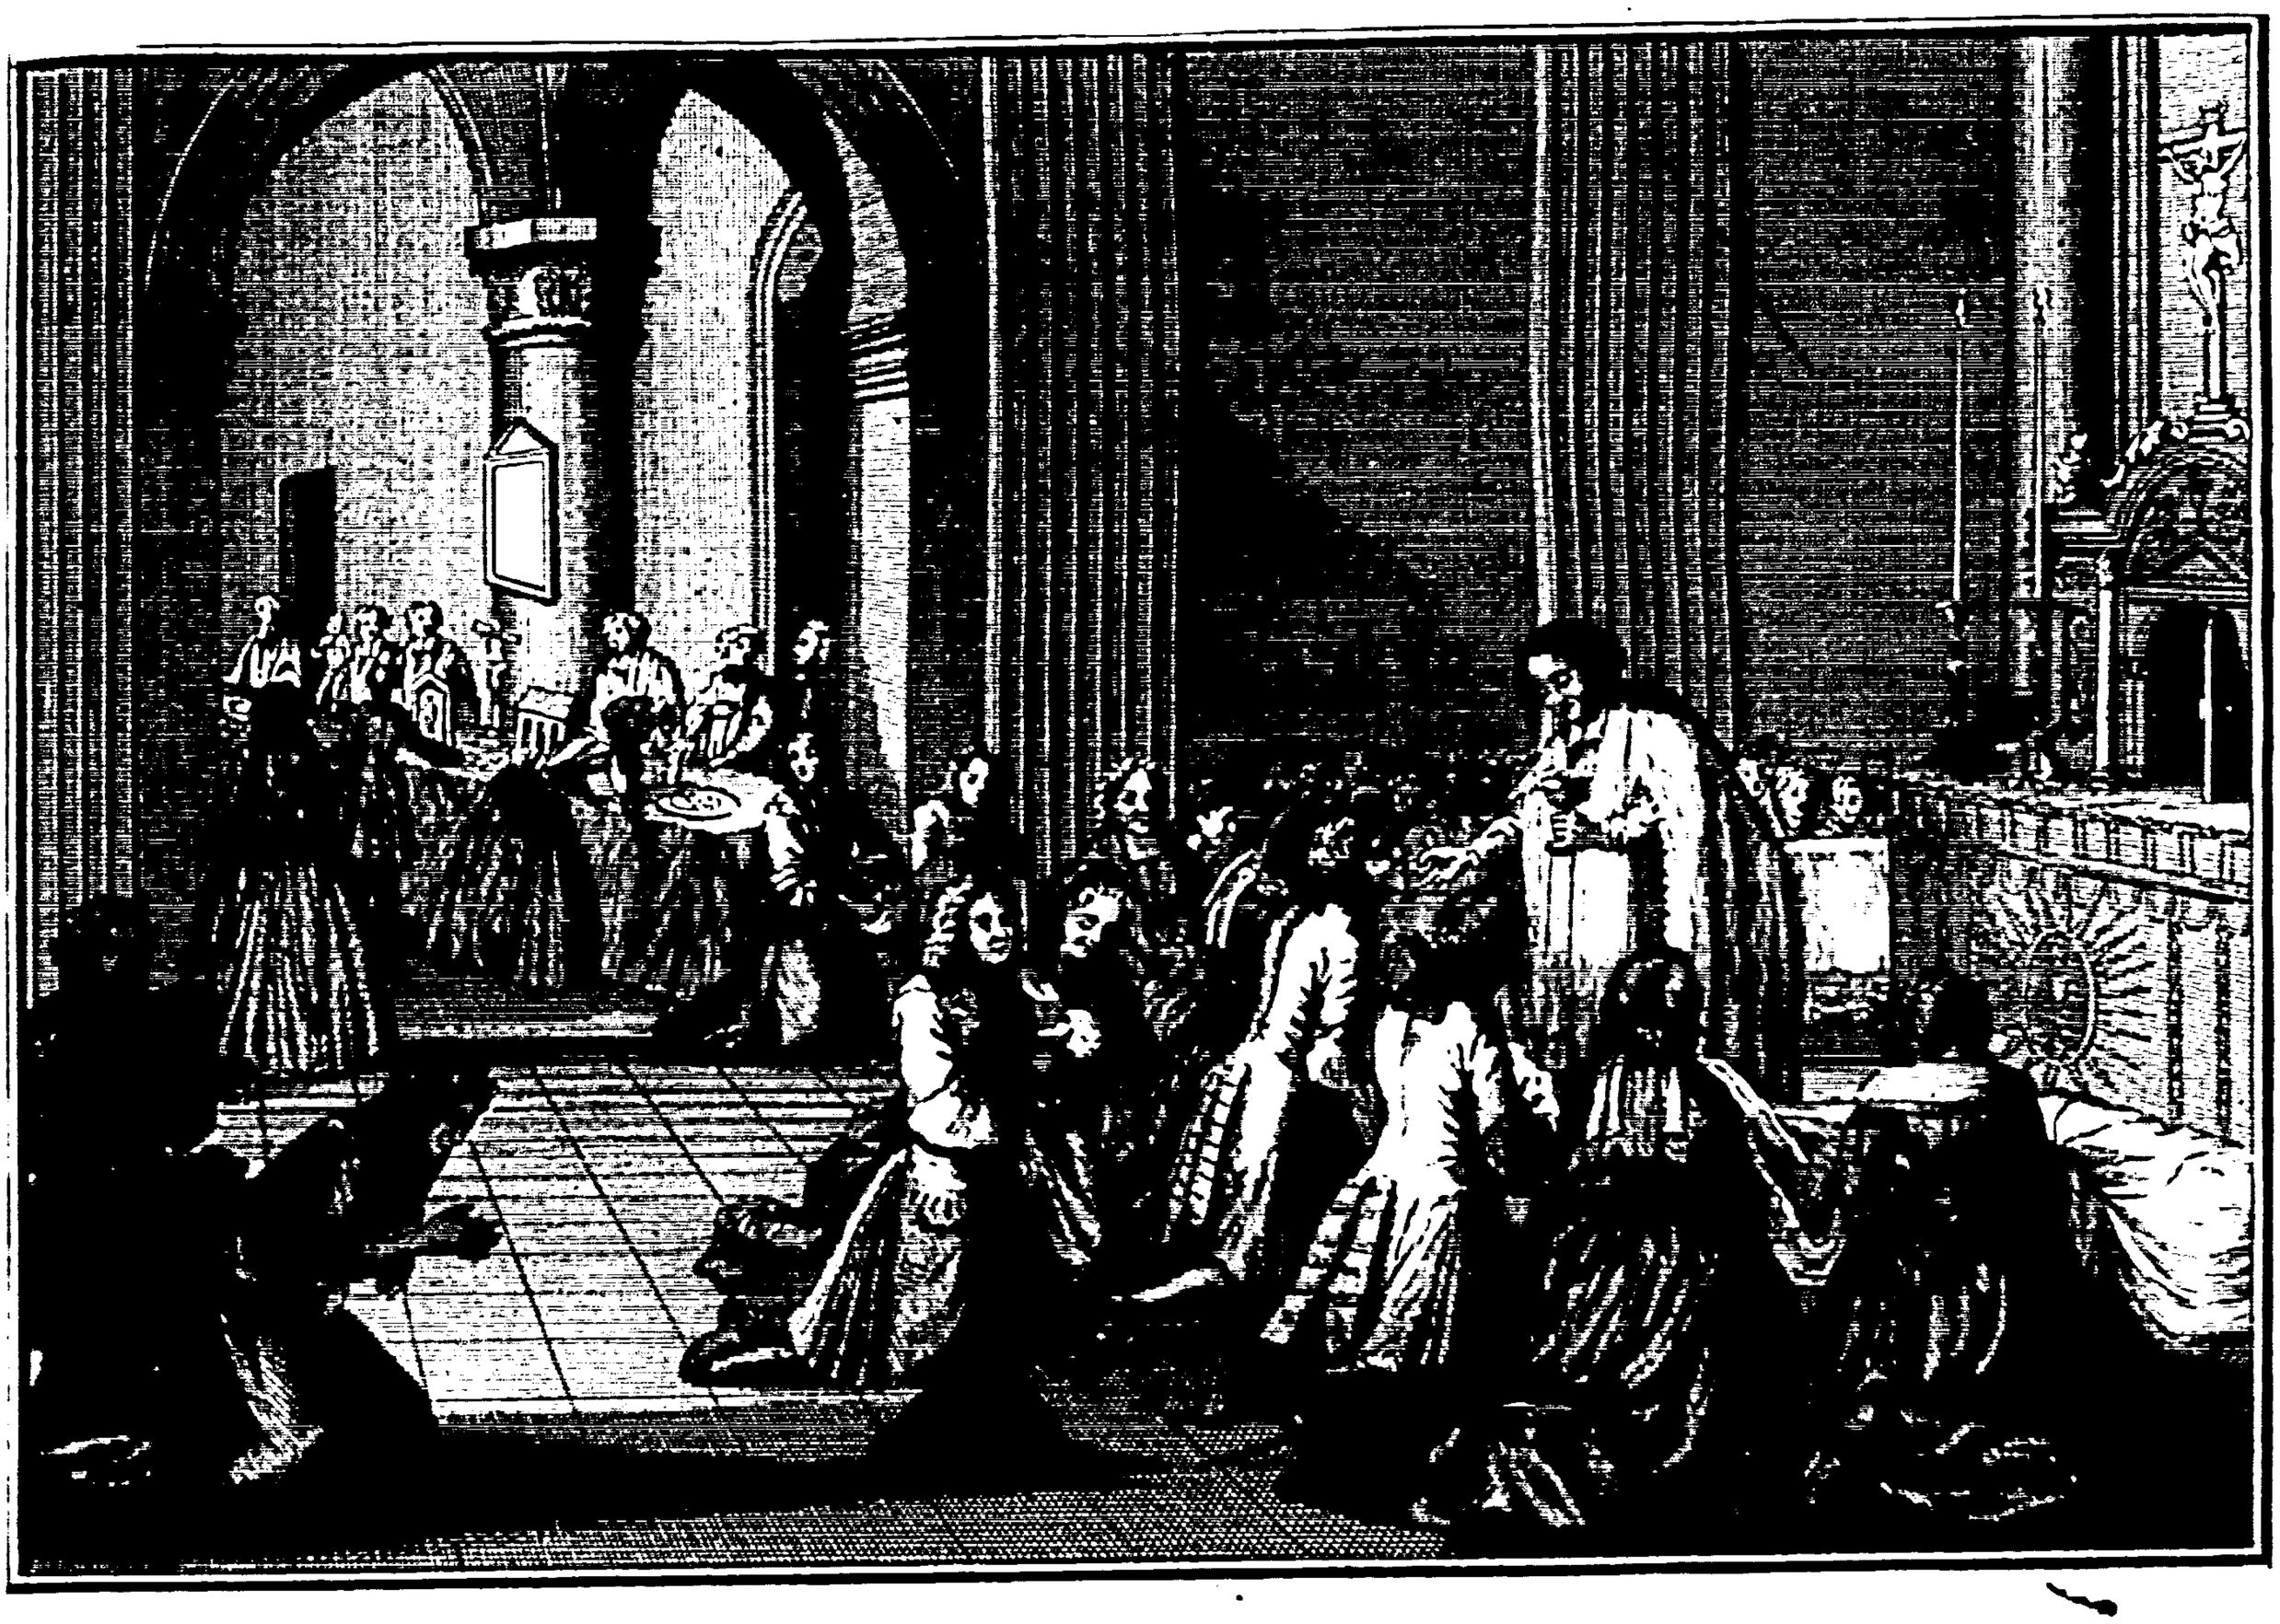
Antiently all catechumens, immediately after their baptiſm, were admitted to the communion, agreeable to the order of the ſacraments; for baptiſm repreſents regeneration; confirmation, ſtrength or rather the ſpiritual vigor of chriſtians; and the euchariſt, their ſpiritual nouriſhment. 'Tis not our buſineſs to give an explication of this ſacrament in this place, nor to enter into a controverſy upon that head; for we confine our ſelves to the bare deſcription of them. The prieſt only is impower'd to conſecrate the hoſt, and the reſt of the miniſters of the church are allowed * only to prepare the things neceſſary for this ſacrament; ‡ he alſo has the privilege of communicating under both kinds, whereas the laity communicate only under one; and we are told that this cuſtom was introduced, in order to put a ſtop to certain accidents, which degraded the dignity of the ſacrament. One of theſe was, the overgrown whiſkers and † beards of ſome who received, which, as they ſometimes reach'd into the cup wherein the blood of our Lord was contain'd, might by that means make ſome good chriſtians ſick at the ſtomach. || A proteſtant writer dates the time of the taking away the cup from the people, in the middle of the thirteenth century; but he tells us, "that this decree was not received without ſome "ſtruggle, inſomuch that ſeveral churches long retain'd the receiving under both kinds, "as abſolutely neceſſary. However, in order to ſatisfy —— the people, a cuſtom was "introduced of giving them water to rinſe their mouths ———. And indeed the "taking the cup from the laity was not fully enjoin'd till a decree of the council of "Conſtance was made for that purpoſe in 1414." at leaſt it then had the force of a law. We ſhall only make this tranſient remark, that the church ſeems to have a power of either changing or leſſening the ſigns of a ſacrament, provided no prejudice incurs thereby to faith, or the eſſence of the ſacrament is not leſſen'd. Were we always obliged to follow the literal ſenſe, the ſacraments would not be the only things in which we ſhould deviate from the written injunctions of the holy ſcriptures.

Every man is obliged to communicate at leaſt every chriſtmas, eaſter, whitſon-tide, and twelfth-tide, the day of vocation among the heathens; but every good chriſtian muſt, beſides the ſeaſons above-mention'd, receive on corpus Chriſti day, all-ſaints, the aſſumption of the bleſſed virgin, the feſtival of the patron, and the anniverſary of his baptiſm. They muſt receive faſting, and be dreſs'd in ſuch a manner as beſt ſuits the chriſtian ſimplicity: ſuch zealots as are converſant in the polite world, and are ſtudious to heighten all their acts of devotion with grace and delicacy, know how to ſet off the modeſty, which muſt always accompany a communicant, with an agreeable and eaſy air. The firſt of the two  compartments, are infinitely more expreſſive than any thing we can ſay on this head.



The

* Alet's Ritual.

‡ This practice was confirm'd by a decree of the council of Conſtance, as we find in Mr. l'Enfant's hiſtory thereof——. Notwithſtanding that in the primitive times, the ſacrament of the euchariſt was receiv'd by the faithful under both kinds; nevertheleſs to avoid certain accidents of dangerous conſequence, one might in like manner, and much more juſtly, introduce this cuſtom, which accordingly has been introduced, viz. that the ſacrament ſhould be received under both kinds by the officiating prieſts; and under one kind, viz. the bread, by the laity. The above-mention'd hiſtorian relates two of theſe accidents, viz. the firſt, for fear leſt the blood ſhould happen to be ſpilt; the other, that of unbelief, becauſe it might otherwiſe be thought that our Saviour could not be whole and entire, in the bread, as he really is. Laſtly, a miracle, of the truth whereof we have the teſtimony of Alexander de Hale's, confirm'd in theſe latter ages, the neceſſity of receiving under one kind.

La COMMUNION.

B. Picart. de.

Le VIATIQUE.

The prieſts who preſent themſelves to the communion, receive immediately after the deacon and ſub-deacon, before any other perſon; and theſe muſt have a white ſtola over the ſurplice. The miniſters who ſerve at the altar, are dreſs'd in the habits of their reſpective orders, when they communicate; but the acolyths and other clerks receive in their ſurplices. After this the officiating prieſt goes up to the rails in order to adminiſter the ſacrament to the laity; obſerving to begin by the perſon who ſtands firſt on the epiſtle ſide, and makes the ſign of the croſs with the hoſt on the perſon that is to receive; and the prieſt obſerves not to take his hand away, till ſuch time as the hoſt is intirely in the mouth of the perſon receiving. We ſhall not take notice either of the prayers, or ſeveral other particulars, mention'd in the Rituals; the reader will have a more lively image of the communion by viewing the plate.

If in adminiſtering, a hoſt, or wafer, or the ſmalleſt bit of it, ſhould happen to fall on the ground, it muſt be taken up in the moſt reſpectful manner *; the place on which it fell muſt be cover'd, for fear of treading upon the leaſt particle of it: they muſt afterwards ſcrape the floor, and † throw the ſhavings into the ſacriſty, and waſh the place very clean: if it ſhould happen to fall upon the napkin, or the veil, &c. ſuch part of it muſt be waſh'd, and the water thrown into the ſacriſty; if on the ‡ veſtments of the officiating prieſt, the part muſt be obſerv'd, and afterwards waſh'd. If any little worms or maggots ſhould be found in the pyx, ſays the Italian explicator of myſteries, breeding in the wafers; or if any pieces of wafers ſhould happen to be muſty; in a word, if there be found the leaſt filth in any part of it, the whole muſt be burnt, and the aſhes thereof thrown into the pool or pond.

If ever ſo little a bit of the hoſt ſhould happen to fall within the parlour, a nun ſhall take it up and lay it on the paten, or on a piece of very clean white paper, when ſhe ſhall give it to the officiating prieſt thro' the grate. The place where it fell ſhall be taken notice of, in order that it may not be trod upon. After the communion is ended, the nuns ſhall ſcrape it with the utmoſt care, and even lick it, and turn the ſhavings into the pool or pond.

After the aſſembly have received the communion from the hands of the prieſt, they go away, but obſerve as they go to paſs before the tables which are ſet one againſt the other end-ways, as we ſee in the plate repreſenting the communion. On the tables ſeveral ſilver baſons are ſet fill'd with various ſorts of relicks, and theſe the prieſt preſents the communicants to kiſs, which being done, they throw a piece of ſilver into the baſon.

Now we are upon this ceremony we cannot omit mentioning the offering and conſecrated bread. We have already taken ſome notice of the former, and ſhall now quote the Ritual of Alet, a work juſtly eſteem'd by ſuch as are judges. "This "offering was invented to ſhew that we join in communion with the body of Jeſus "Chriſt and the Church——; for which reaſon thoſe who go to the offering are "preſented with the pax to kiſs; —— but in proceſs of time the bread, which was "before offer'd as a token of this communion, was changed into money." The Ritual

* Piſcara Praxis Cerem. † Idem, and Alet's Ritual. ‡ Piſcara Praxis Cerem.

Ritual aſcribes three reaſons for this change, whereof the principal is, that this money goes towards the prieſt's ſubſiſtence.

Good chriſtians are enjoin'd to preſent ſomething to God at maſs, " for which " reaſon the people muſt be excited to go to the offering, as being a ceremony found-" ed on apoſtolical tradition" ——. However, the church excludes from it all catechumens; ſuch as are in a ſtate of penitence; all excommunicated perſons, and thoſe who are forbid the church.

" The offering is made after the goſpel, and the apoſtles creed, while the offertory " is ſung —: for this purpoſe the officiating prieſt goes down to the loweſt ſteps of the " altar,— with the deacon and ſub-deacon; after which they all three go together " to the door of the rail, when the deacon placing himſelf to the right-hand of the " officiating prieſt, preſents him with the pax or inſtrument of peace, or with a cru-" cifix in thoſe places where it is uſed. Each man comes forward according to his " rank; firſt the greateſt perſons of diſtinction, and laſtly the common people: " and in order to avoid confuſion they advance on the goſpel ſide; after having ſalu-" ted the altar and the prieſt, they kiſs the pax, when they throw their offerings in-" to the baſon, and at laſt return back on the goſpel ſide."

The conſecrated bread.

We are told in the Ritual above-mention'd, " that the church uſed to conſecrate " bread from time immemorial, in the ſame manner as ſhe has bleſſed all things " that are fitting for the nouriſhment and other uſes of mankind; and we may affirm " that this cuſtom owes its riſe to apoſtolical tradition." It muſt indeed be own'd that ſome paſſages in the new teſtament mention communion, and the breaking of bread: " but, continues the ſame ritual, we don't find that bread, as now conſecrated in the " church in order to be diſtributed among the communicants, is of ſo great antiqui-" ty; or that the fathers of the church make any mention of it. The word Eulogy, " employ'd by them, does not ſignify conſecrated bread in particular, but all kinds " of preſents which chriſtians uſed to make one another, as a teſtimony of their love " and friendſhip, altho theſe preſents were not conſecrated." Cardinal * Bona obſerves that Eulogy was a kind of communion; and indeed antiently the prieſt, after maſs was ended, uſed to diſtribute what remain'd of the conſecrated bread to thoſe who had not an opportunity of communicating, or had neglected to prepare themſelves for it: however, theſe Eulogies were never given but to ſuch only as were intitled to receive; but they were not given either to catechumens or impenitent ſinners. Theſe Eulogies or ſcraps of conſecrated bread were to be eat in the church. In fine, cardinal Bona is of opinion, that it owes its inſtitution to the frequent communion of chriſtians in the firſt ages of the church. Afterwards a cuſtom inſenſibly took place of preſenting it alſo to thoſe who had communicated, and this is the origin of conſecrated bread, which for that reaſon was call'd the † vicar of the communion. Cardinal Bona is likewiſe of opinion, that the fathers of the ſecond century were not acquainted with theſe Eulogies. Biſhop Alet tells us in his ritual, that in the primitive church the euchariſt often went by the name of Eulogy, and that 'tis in this ſenſe we muſt take that word, when mention'd in a canon of the council of Laodicea, held a little before that of Nice. This canon forbids the ſending of holy things, i. e. according to that biſhop, the euchariſt, as the eulogies in other pariſhes.

When conſecrated bread is eaten in the ſpirit of the church, i. e. in a ſpirit of union and charity, ‡ " it waſhes out all venial ſins by the religious affections or im-" pulſes it excites in thoſe who eat of it; it may even have the power, by the virtue " of the prayers of the church, to caſt out devils, and heal bodily diſeaſes."

The patiſh prieſt performs the ceremony of conſecrating this bread on all ſundays and high feſtivals in the year. Such inhabitants of a pariſh as are of diſtinction, and at the head of a family, or even the ladies, preſent themſelves in their turns; and this is call'd returning the conſecrated bread. This bread is ſtuck full of tapers, and preſented with great ſolemnity, as we ſee it in the plate under that of the ceremony of giving the aſhes. The ceremony of offering the bread being ended, the prieſt gives the perſon who offer'd it, the paten to kiſs, who at the ſame time preſents his oblation. Theſe are the moſt remarkable circumſtances in the manner of offering this bread. As to the manner of conſecrating it, 'tis as follows: * the prieſt having ſaid the offertory, a clerk takes the bread from the perſon who preſents it, and gives it to the ſub-deacon if there be one preſent, in order to have it conſecrated by the prieſt, who being in a ſtanding poſture before the altar and uncover'd, repeats a prayer, at the ſame time making a ✠ over the bread, and afterwards ſprinkles it with holy water. After this an acolyth cuts it into ſeveral pieces of equal bigneſs, and diſtributes it among the pariſhioners; which is done after the communion. It is not lawful to ſell conſecrated bread, for which reaſon no more muſt be conſecrated than what is juſt ſufficient for the diſtributions, and if there be any overplus it muſt be given to the poor.

The bleſſed ſacrament is adminiſtred as a viaticum or proviſion for a journey, to thoſe whoſe life is in danger. The ſick perſon muſt receive it faſting, provided he can do it with ſafety; but if he is not able to receive, it muſt not be carried to him. * Alet's Ritual.

‡ We find the following in an old homily: There was an earl of Venice call'd Syr Ambright, that loved the ſacrament of the awter paſſing well, and did it all the worſhyp and reverence that he might, ſo when he lay ſick and ſhould die, he might not receive the ſacrament for caſtyng; then was he ſorry, and made dole; and then he let make clean his right ſyde, and to cover it with a fayr clothe of ſendall, and layd God's body therein, and ſayd thus to the hoſt: "Lord thou knoweſt "that I love thee with all my heart, and would fayne receive thee with my mouth and I durſt, and "becauſe I may not, I lay thee on the place that is next to my heart, and ſo I ſhew thee all the love "of my heart that I can or may; wherefore I beſeech thee good Lord, have mercy on me." And even therewith in the ſight of all the people that were about him, his ſyde opened, and the hoſt went there into his ſyde, and then it cloſed again, and ſo anon after he dyed. Feſtival. in die corp. Chriſti, f. 52.

The curious incident following is alſo related in the above-cited homily: In Devonſhyre beſyde Exbridge was a woman that lay ſick and was nye deed, and ſent after a holy perſon about midnight, to have her ryghts. Than this man in all haſte he might aroſe, and went to the church, and took Goddes body in a boxe of ivory, and put it into his boſome, and went forth toward this woman. And as he wente through the foreſt in a fayre mede that was his next waye, it happed that his box fell out of his boſome to the ground, and he wente forth and wyſt it not, and came to this woman, and herde her confeſſion. And then he asked her yf ſhe would be houſeled? and ſhe ſaid, ye ſyr. Then he put his hande into his boſom and ſought the box, and whan he found it not, he was full ſorry and ſad, and ſayd, dame, I will go after Goddes body, and come agayne anone to you, and ſo he wente forth ſore wepynge for his ſymplenes. And ſo as he came to a wylowe tree, he made thereof a rodde, and ſtryped himſelf naked, and bette hymſelf ſo that the blode ranne downe by his ſyde, and ſayde thus to hymſelf: "O thou ſymple man, why haſte thou loſt thy Lord God, thy maker, thy fourmer and "creatour?" and when he had thus bette hymſelfe, he dyd on his clothes and went forth, and than he was ware of a pyller of fire that laſted from erth to heven, and he was all aſtonyed thereof, yet he bleſſyd him and wente to it; and there lay the ſacrament fallen out of the boxe into the graſſe, and the pyller ſhone as bryght as the ſunne, and it laſted from Goddes body to heven; and all the beeſtes of the foreſt were come aboute Goddes body, and ſtode in compaſſe round about it, and all kneeled given him, and afterwards ſome liquid; but the hoſt muſt not be dipped in any liquor, upon pretence that the ſick perſon will be the better able to ſwallow it.

In caſe the ſick perſon throws up the wafer, and that the pieces of it plainly appear, they muſt be put into a clean veſſel, and carried to the church, and there depoſited in ſome holy and decent place ‖, till ſuch times as they are chang'd, after which they ſhall be caſt into the * Sacrarium; but if the pieces are not to be diſtinguiſh'd, what he has vomited up muſt be wip'd with pieces of tow, or ſome ſuch thing, and theſe muſt afterwards be burnt, and the aſhes thrown into the Sacrary. The prieſt muſt take care not to give thoſe the Viaticum who are troubled with a continual coughing, or are not able to ſwallow or conſume the hoſt, for fear of any accident unſuitable to the dignity of the ſacrament.

Whenever the Viaticum is to be carried to any place, care muſt be taken to make the chamber in which the ſick perſon lies very clean, and alſo all thoſe parts of the houſe through which the hoſt is to paſs; and they muſt likewiſe be ſtrewed with flowers and odoriferous herbs. The hoſt muſt be laid on a table very neatly cover'd, on which two candle-ſticks, with two lighted tapers in them, ſhall be ſet; as alſo a drinking-glaſs, a veſſel full of wine or water to purify or waſh the fingers, and a white cloth to lay before the ſick perſon. In caſe the Viaticum be carried in publick, as is the cuſtom in Romiſh countries, the rector gives notice to his pariſhioners by the ringing of a bell, to prepare to accompany the bleſſed ſacrament with tapers and torches; to ſupport the canopy, or give ſome other exterior marks of their devotion and reſpect. Being aſſembled, the prieſt waſhes his hands, as is uſual in the celebration of any myſteries, and ſuch ceremonies as are perform'd by him in bleſſing, conſecrating, &c. He puts on the ſurplice, the ſtole, the chaſuble, and goes up to the altar, either accompanied or followed by other prieſts or clerks, when he falls upon his knees, repeats a private prayer; and afterwards riſing up, puts a white ſcarf about his neck, ſpreads the corporal on the altar, opens the tabernacle; kneels down a ſecond time upon his taking the pyx, which he lays upon the corporal; kneels a third time when he uncovers it; and after having view'd the hoſts, covers it with its little canopy, and takes it by both his hands which are cover'd, with the ends of the ſcarf that is about his neck. He then ſets himſelf under the canopy, and a clerk, with a lighted lanthorn in his hand, walks before, and two other clerks, the one holding the holy water, the corporals, and the purificatories, or pieces of linen-cloth with which the chalice is wip'd; and the other the ritual, the † little bell, which follow immediately after. Next come thoſe who carry the torches; and afterwards the prieſt, walking under the canopy, and carrying the hoſt rais'd as high as his breaſt. If the clergy carry the Viaticum to a conſiderable diſtance, kneeled on 4 knees ſave one black horſe that kneled but one knee. Than ſayd he, yf thou beeſt ony beeſt that may ſpeke, I charge thee in Goddes name here preſent in fourme of breed, tell me why thou kneleſt but on one knee. Then ſayd he, I am a fende of hell, and wyll not kneele and I might; but I am made agenſt my will; for it is wryten that every knelynge of heven and of erthe ſhall be to the worſhyp of the Lord God. Why art thou lyke a hors? and he ſayd, to make the people to ſtele me, and at ſuche a town was one hanged for me, and at ſuche a towne another. Than ſayd the holy perſone, I commaunde thee by Goddes fleſhe and his blode, that thou go into wylderneſſe, and be there as thou ſhalt never dyſeaſe, (i. e. afflict) cryſten man more. And then this man went forthe to the woman and dyd her ryghtes, by the which ſhe was ſaved and went to everlaſtynge ſalvatyon. To the whiche he brynge us, our blyſſed Savyour Jheſus.

* The Sacrary, ſo often mention'd, is a kind of ſhallow well, narrow at top; and it muſt be lock'd up, in order that nothing profane may enter into it. In it are thrown ſuch pieces of the hoſt as may have been polluted by any accident; the aſhes of ſuch pieces of tow as may have been employ'd in the ſacred unction; old oils; old holy-water, conſecrated at Eaſter, or on Sundays; the water with which the biſhop or prieſt had waſh'd their hands, &c.

† We are told that Gregory IX. inſtituted the little bell.

ſtance, the hoſt muſt be laid in a little ſilver box, enclos'd in a ſtuff-purſe: he muſt hang the purſe at his neck, and fix it on to his breaſt, in order to keep the hoſt from ſhaking, or falling to the ground.

The prieſt, at his coming into the ſick man's apartment, ſhall bid peace to the houſe, and go towards the table, when he ſhall ſpread the corporal upon it, in order to ſet the pyx thereon. This being done, he, and every perſon preſent, worſhip the hoſt: he then ſprinkles the ſick perſon, and alſo the room; during which anthems are repeated, verſes taken out of the pſalms, and prayers ſuitable to the occaſion. After this he uncovers the pyx, takes up a wafer with the thumb and fore-finger of his right-hand, obſerving to hold it a little aloft over the chalice; and taking the pyx with his left-hand, he turns about, and advances forward towards the ſick man, in order to adminiſter the ſacrament to him.

The communion being ended, the prieſt lays the pyx upon the table again, obſerving to kneel at the ſame time; and afterwards rubs his fingers with which he took up the hoſt againſt the brims of the chalice, to the end that if any little piece of the wafer ſhould happen to ſtick to them, he may ſhake it into the cup. He afterwards ſhuts the pyx, and covers it with a little veil, kneeling at the ſame time; then he waſhes the two fingers with which he had handled the hoſt with wine and water, which is preſented him by thoſe of the houſe.

This act of devotion concludes with prayers and exhortations. If any wafers are left in the pyx, the prieſt, after having bleſs'd the ſick perſon, returns back to the church, attended with the ſame perſons who had accompanied him to the ſick man's houſe. Being come into the church, he pronounces the indulgences granted by the ſovereign pontiffs and the biſhop, and gives them his bleſſing: but in caſe there are no more wafers in the pyx, the prieſt returns back without any formality, after having repeated the prayers us'd after the communion of the ſick. If the ſick perſon is juſt expiring, the † prieſt omits all the prayers, &c. gives him the Viaticum, and repeats two or three words only.

The prieſt to whom the Viaticum is given, muſt have a ſurplice on, and over it a white ſtole, diſpoſed croſs-wiſe over his breaſt.

We have already obſerv'd the uſe which the primitive chriſtians made of the bleſſed ſacrament at the approach of death; therefore no ſect among the chriſtians can diſpute the antiquity of the Viaticum.

If the prieſt is obliged to carry the Viaticum to any perſon infected with the plague, he muſt go within nine or ten paces of the houſe, taking care to ſtand in ſuch a manner that the wind may be on his back. Being come hither, he ſhall incloſe the conſecrated wafer in a common one, and after having wrapt up the whole in a ſheet of white paper, ſhall lay it on the ground at a reaſonable diſtance from the place infected, and cover it with a ſtone, in order to ſecure it from the wind, rain, &c. This being done, the prieſt ſhall draw back, and the ſick perſon or his attendant ſhall come and take up the wafers, the prieſt having firſt pointed out to him the conſecrated hoſt. The prieſt ſhall ſay the prayers, and perform the uſual ceremonies, after the communion has been adminiſtred to the perſon infected.

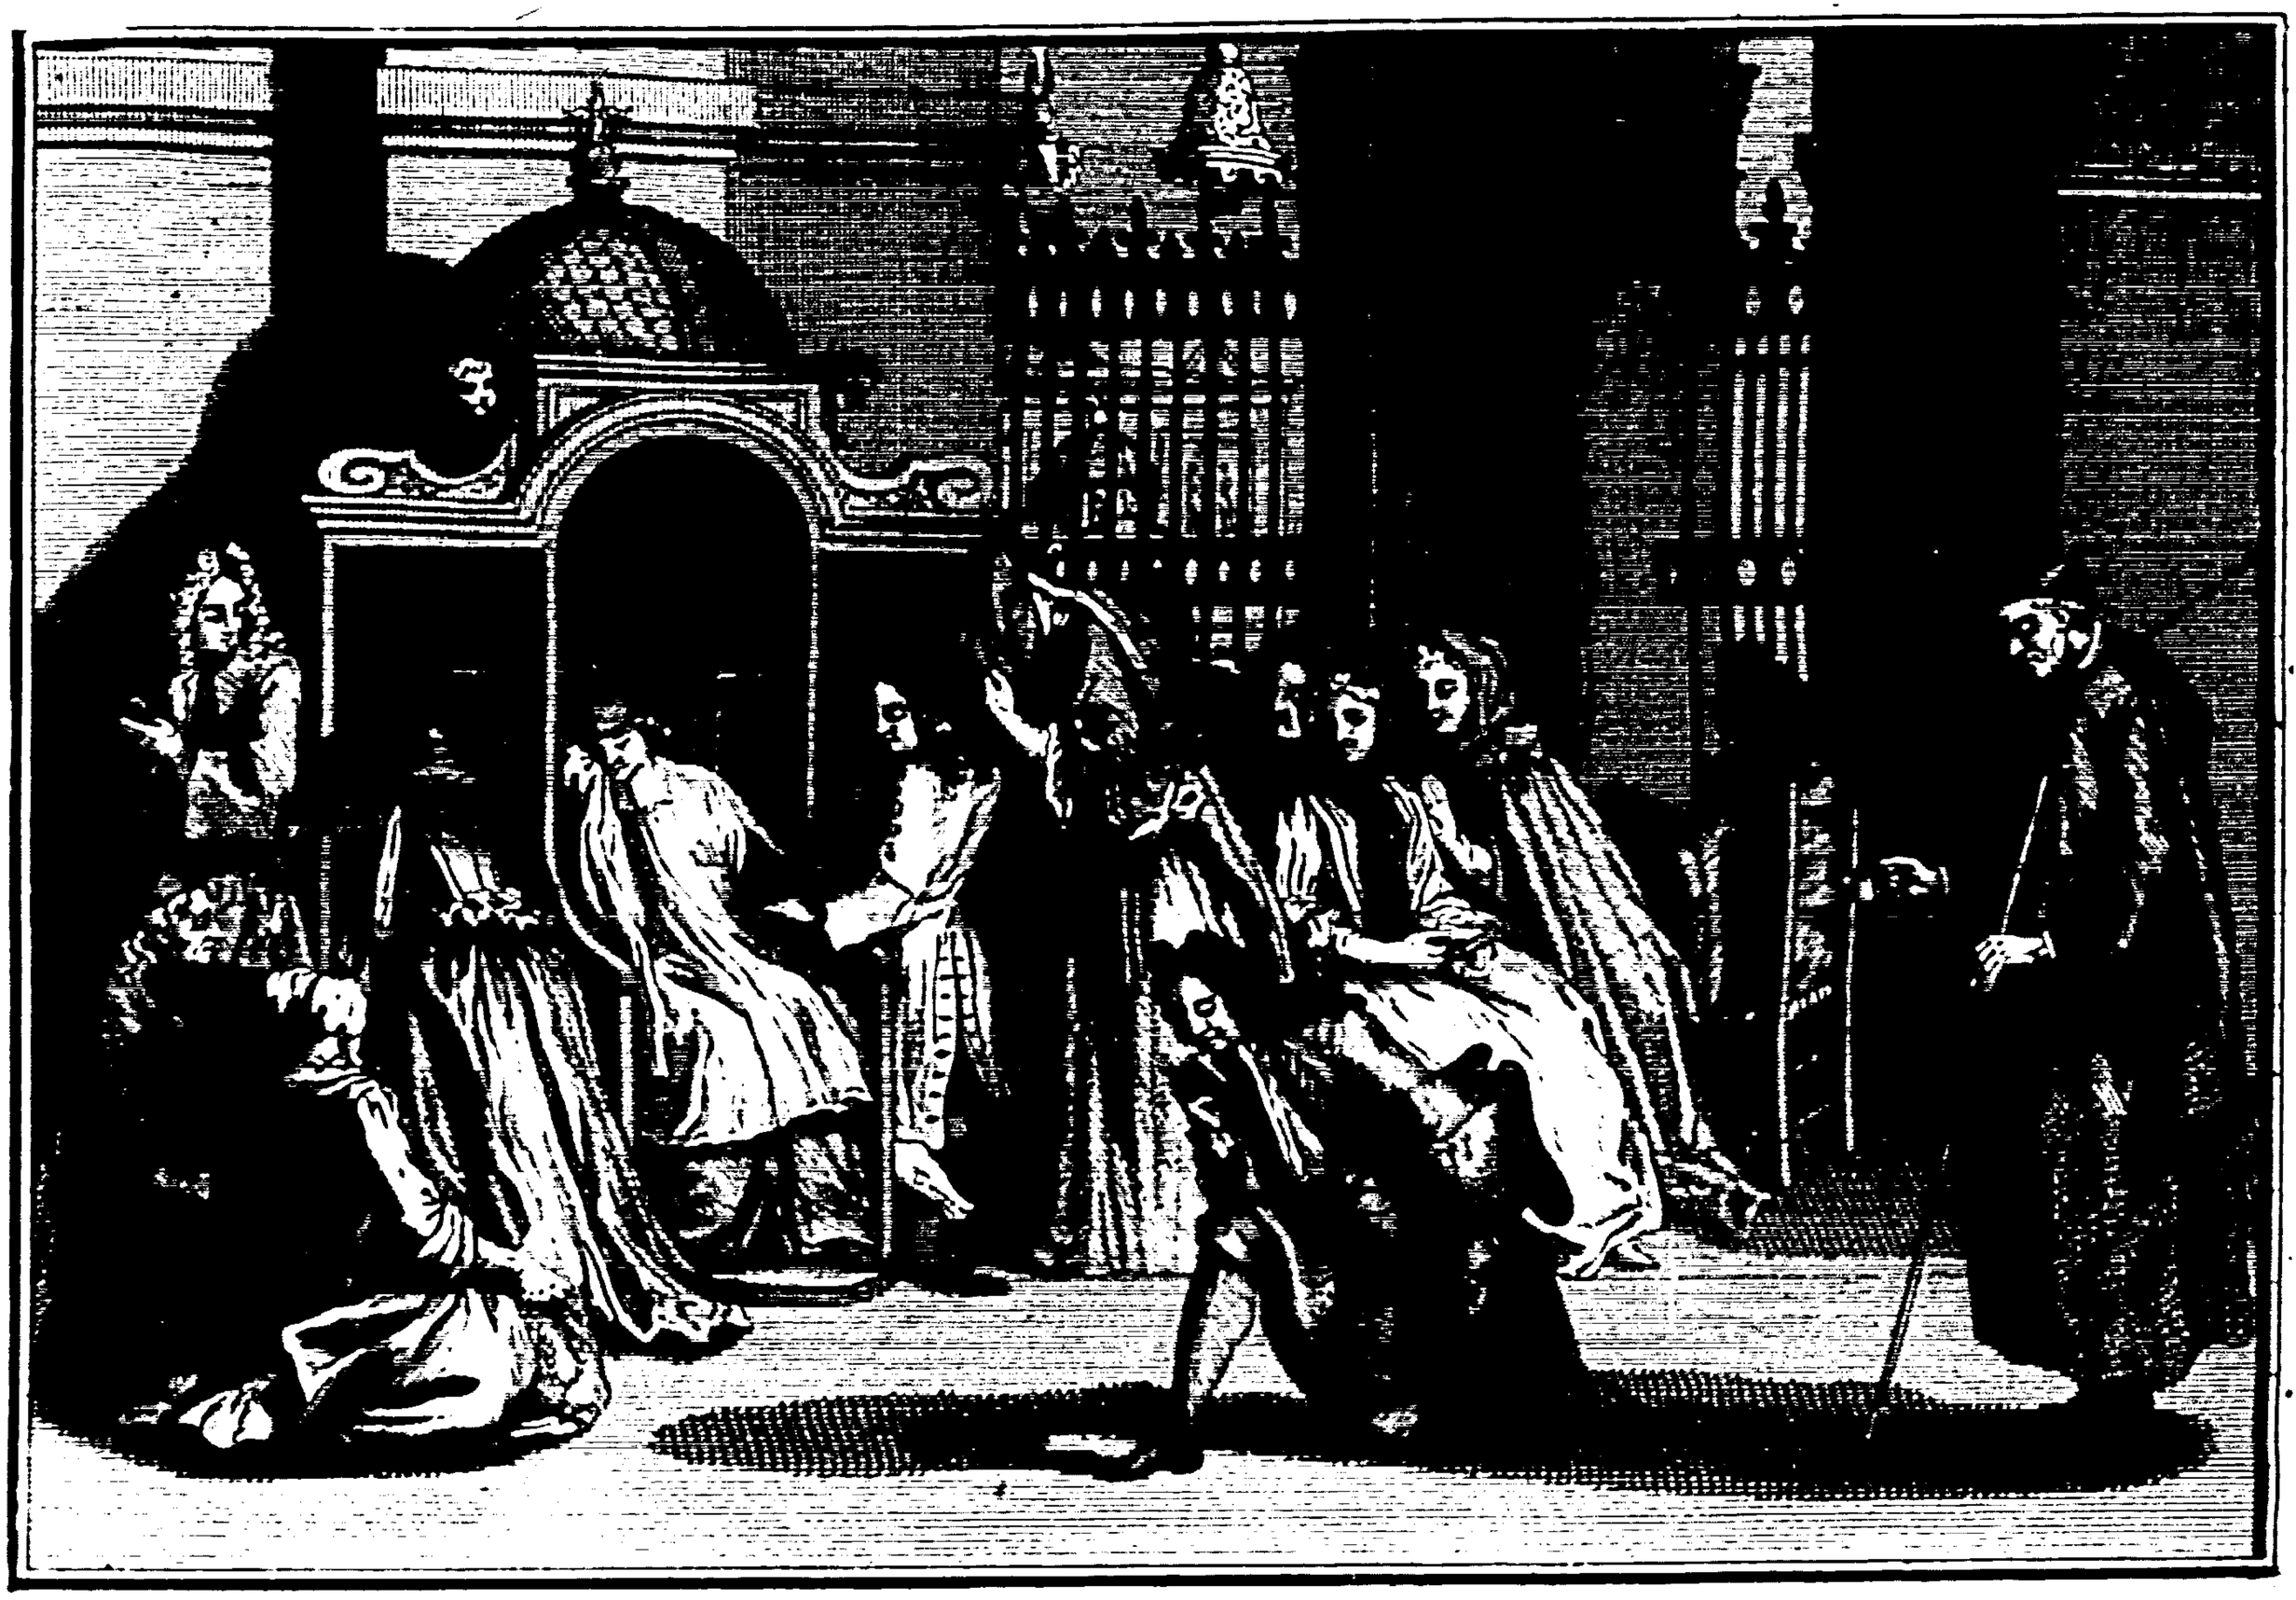
The ſame caution is obſerv'd in giving extreme unction to perſons infected with the plague. A long wand or rod is taken, at the end of which a piece of tow or cotton dipp'd in the holy oils is fix'd, with which the ſick perſon is anointed but once, with the uſual words. After this they run the end of the wand and the cotton into a fire, purpoſely prepar'd, in a chafing-diſh.

† The plate repreſents perfectly the diſpoſition of the ſick perſon who receives the Viaticum, and the perſons who aſſiſt at it.

IV. PENANCE.

Here follows the fourth ſacrament, which, according to the church, was inſtituted by our Saviour: however, this point is diſputed by thoſe of other opinions; but controverſy is not our province. 'Tis certain that the power annex'd to the prieſthood of remitting or retaining ſins, of inflicting puniſhments on ſinners, and of ſettling expedients for reconciliation between them and their Creator, is one of the nobleſt prerogatives that mankind could poſſibly enjoy. Nor have the falſe religions been leſs ſenſible of the advantages of this power; and of this the idolatry of the Greeks and Romans, of the Mexicans and Eaſt-Indians, furniſh us with ſeveral remarkable inſtances.

Biſhops have power to abſolve ſinners, thro'out the whole extent of their dioceſſes, and rectors in their pariſhes. As for other prieſts and monks, they muſt have an expreſs approbation from the biſhop, before they are allowed to hear confeſſion. However, there are certain caſes reſerv'd to the pope, the biſhops, and penitentiaries. We find ſeveral other remarks in the rituals on theſe articles, and the qualities requir'd in a confeſſor; but theſe are intirely foreign to our inquiries.



Faſting, prayers, alms, abſtinence from ſuch pleaſures and things as we chiefly delight in, are the general conditions of penance: there are others of a more particular kind, as to repeat a certain number of Ave-Marias, Pater-Noſters, and Credos; to kneel, or ſalute the hoſt a ſtated number of times; to give one's ſelf a certain number of ſtripes; to wear a hair-ſhirt, or a girdle made of horſe-hair, &c. next to the skin. 'Twould be needleſs to enter into a farther detail: thoſe who cannot hit upon auſterities ſevere enough for their purpoſe, will meet with ſufficient inſtructions on that head in the lives of the ſaints, and their legends. Such as practice the greateſt auſterities, are ſure at leaſt of gaining ſeveral indulgences, as has been already obſerv'd in the ſecond part of the firſt volume of this work.

" * The confeſſor muſt have a ſurplice over his caſſock, with a purple ſtole and a " ſquare cap; he muſt hear confeſſion in the church, at that part of it which is fartheſt " diſtant from the high-altar, i. e. at the bottom of the nave, which is moſt expos'd " to the view of the people, in the confeſſional or confeſſion-chair, which is the " tribunal of penance. The confeſſional muſt be open before, and have one or two " lattice-windows in it: when there are two windows, there muſt be two ſhutters " to them; and 'tis proper to put all reſerv'd caſes above the confeſſor's window, " and oppoſite to the penitent an image of the crucifix, or ſome myſtery of " the paſſion." Confeſſion muſt be made in the day-time, and if poſſible, when there are people in the church. As ſoon as the penitent is come up to the confeſſional, he muſt make the ſign of the croſs, and ask the confeſſor bleſſing. The form of words us'd in confeſſing, has been already taken notice of.

It cannot be denied but that confeſſion is an excellent method to keep perſons of mean capacities obedient to the duties of religion; for all chriſtians are not capable of a ſpiritual religion, nor of that kind of reflection which ought to inſpire a man to addreſs himſelf to God alone without the mediation of a prieſt. On the other ſide; confeſſion confeſſion ſeems to be attended with ſeveral dangerous conſequences, and of theſe we ſhall only obſerve two: How many odious and infamous particulars are divulg'd, which muſt naturally raiſe freſh ideas of impurity both in the prieſt and the penitent! Confeſſion ſubmits a fearful penitent, whoſe conſcience is oppreſs'd with ſcruples, loaded with remorſe, weakned by the remembrance of its ſins, to the abſolute will of a cunning prieſt ‡; he beholds ſcepters at his feet, he humbles crowns, and makes thoſe tremble who ſtrike terror into whole nations.

Confeſſion being ended, the confeſſor uncovers himſelf, in order to abſolve the penitent: accordingly he recommends him to the divine mercy, ſtretches out his right-hand towards him, begging God to remit his ſins; after which he puts on his ſquare cap, gives him the abſolution in the name of Chriſt Jeſus, and adds, holding his right-hand always lifted up towards the penitent, that he abſolves him, by Chriſt's authority, in the name of the Father, &c. He takes off his cap a ſecond time, and prays to God that our Saviour's paſſion, the merits of the holy virgin, and of all the ſaints, may conſpire to remit the penitent's ſins.

It is thought that confeſſion was inſtituted in the apoſtolic ages, and that it is * enjoined in the new teſtament. It is in all probability the fruit of a diſcipline, infinitely more exact and ſevere than it would have been, had it been inſtituted by the clergy latterly. In the primitive ages of chriſtianity there was no ſuch thing as auricular confeſſion, but it was always made in publick, as well as penance. In this manner chriſtians were kept to their duty, and the chriſtian religion was ſecur'd from the calumnies of its adverſaries. This publick penance was proportioned to the nature of the faults committed, ſo that it ſometimes laſted whole years. The penitents us'd to be ſeparated from the reſt of the aſſembly in a place appointed for them; here they were in a ſtanding poſture, in a ſtate of mortification, and in a mourning-habit, frequently in ſackcloth, cover'd with aſhes, and their eyes bath'd in tears. They were enjoin'd very ſtrict faſts, nor were they reſtor'd to the peace of the church till the time of their penance was compleated: but this ſeverity began to ſlacken by degrees; the time for the continuation of auſterities was much ſhortned, and very often the puniſhments inflicted on penitents were commuted into pecuniary mulcts. This was owing to a variety of reaſons, viz. the death of many chriſtians in a ſtate of penance; the indolence and deſpair they were afraid others would fall into, from the apparent weakneſs of their minds; the diſhonour and ſhame which the chriſtians, who degenerated from their priſtine humility, imagin'd they ſaw inſeparable from theſe publick reparations, after having confeſs'd, in preſence of the whole church, ſeveral enormous and often infamous crimes. Laſtly, the proſperity of the chriſtian religion, which made theſe publick reparations altogether unſeaſonable. From that time confeſſions began to be made in a more private and ſecret manner, and accordingly diſcreet and prudent perſons were † appointed confeſſors. This is the origin of the penitentiaries, which was firſt inſtituted by the Greek church; but that of the Latins retain'd the practice of publick confeſſion till the pontificate of Leo.

Here follows the manner of enjoining publick penance, and of abſolving thoſe who have undergone it. ‖ The penitent comes into the church in a very plain dreſs, and without his weapons, if he be a ſoldier, with a modeſt air, and kneels without the church at the door, in caſe he be excommunicated, or under an interdict, but within the

the door in caſe he be not. After ringing for maſs, the congregation being aſſembled, the penitentiary, or prieſt appointed for that ceremony, takes the purple-ſtole over his ſurplice, and goes, accompanied with the clergy belonging to the church where this ceremony is perform'd, to the middle of the nave, where he ſits down in a chair ſet ready for that purpoſe, and puts on his cap. Then the penitent goes up to him, kneels down, and implores with a loud voice that his ſins may be forgiven him: the prieſt anſwers him by a ſhort remonſtrance, and injoins him ſuch penance as he thinks proper. The Romiſh pontifical ſays that the penitent muſt be clothed in a hair-ſhirt, which is a kind of garment made of goats-hair; this the penitent muſt wear next his skin, the better to mortify himſelf. If he be alſo excommunicated, he orders him to go out of the church; after which ſome prayers are ſaid. He afterwards takes the penitent by the right-hand, or in caſe there be ſeveral, he takes the firſt ſo, and then all the penitents take hands; after which he leads them to the church-door, and ſays to them, you are turn'd out of the church, for the ſins you have committed, in the ſame manner as Adam, our firſt parent, was driven from paradiſe, becauſe of his diſobedience. The penitents being in this manner put out of the church, the prieſt returns back into it, and ſhuts the door. But in caſe the penitent be not excommunicated, the prieſt, after having enjoyned him penance, ſhews him the part of the church he muſt ſtand in, till ſuch time he has compleated the courſe of it, which is always to the left of the church-door, becauſe he muſt look upon himſelf as the meaneſt and moſt unworthy chriſtian in the world; theſe are the expreſs words of the Ritual. In caſe the penitent receives penance from the biſhop, or his penitentiary, it ſhall be given him in writing, in order that when he is return'd back to his own pariſh, he may preſent it to the rector thereof, who ſhall exhort him to execute it faithfully, and ſhall take care to ſee it punctually perform'd.

When the penitent has compleated the penance enjoin'd him, he ſhall return back to the biſhop, or his penitentiary, with a certificate ſign'd by the rector, to prove that he has fulfill'd it; after which they ſhall proceed to his reconciliation with the church. † This was antiently perform'd on holy Thurſday. But whether the people aſſemble on this, or any other day, the penitent muſt come to the church-door on the day appointed him for receiving abſolution. The Romiſh pontifical enjoins, that he ſhall be there upon his knees, with an unlighted taper in his hand. But it was not uſual always to excommunicate ſolemnly the penitent who appear'd in this manner: Be this as it will; he muſt be in a plain and ordinary dreſs, without his weapons, if he be a ſoldier, and bare-headed; in an humble and contrite manner; with a pale and dejected countenance, if he can aſſume ſuch an one. Women muſt be veil'd. Immediately before the parochial-maſs, the prieſt cloth'd with his albe or ſurplice, and the purple ſtole, ſhall give the people notice that the penitent or penitents are going to be reconciled to the church: he then ſhall exhort the congregation to pray for them; ſhall fall proſtrate before the altar, and pronounce ſome prayers, which are anſwer'd by the congregation. Theſe prayers, and all the reſt we meet with in the pontifical and the ritual, are compos'd of excellent paſſages taken out of the ſcriptures, ſelected by the church, and ſo well adapted to the ſubject, that 'tis impoſſible but the faithful muſt be greatly edified by them. Theſe † Penitents were reconcil'd to the church in the following manner in the beginning of the fifth century, by which it will appear, that the practice of the Romiſh church at this day does not differ very much from that cuſtom. He, who after having been excommunicated, ſhall teſtify a ſincere repentance, was ſolemnly reſtor'd to the church in preſence of the whole congregation. The biſhop, or his vicar, uſed to go to the church-door, attended with twelve prieſts, when the penitent preſented himſelf to him with all the tokens of penance and humility. After this the biſhop took him by the hand, brought him into the church, and admitted him to the communion.

Theſe prayers being ended, the prieſt goes to the church-door, and makes a pretty long exhortation to the penitents; which being done, he takes them by the hand, and brings them back into the church. But in caſe they have been excommunicated, he then, before he re-unites them to the body of the faithful, ſits down and puts on his cap, when he repeats the Miſerere; the penitent being at his feet, the congregation upon their knees, and the clergy ſtanding. * At every verſe of the Miſerere the prieſt ſtrikes the excommunicated penitent on the ſhoulder with a little ſtick, or whip made of cords. † The Romiſh rituals and the pontifical ordain, that the penitent who is abſolv'd in this manner ſhall be ſtript to his ſhirt, as low as his ſhoulders. This ceremony, as all the preceeding, muſt be follow'd by ſome prayers, and afterwards the litanies ſhall be ſung, the people being upon their knees. Thus have we given the explication of the ſix ceremonies repreſented in the plate.

When an excommunicated perſon dies unabſolv'd, they begin by examining whether he may have given ſufficient teſtimonies of a true contrition, and whether it may be proper to abſolve him, in order that his body may not be deprived of chriſtian burial, nor his ſoul of the publick wiſhes and prayers of the church. Here follows the form of this abſolution. The rector ſhall put a black ſtole over the ſurplice, and go in a ceremonious manner to the place where the corps lies. He ſhall be preceeded by his clerks in ſurplices, whereof one ſhall carry a wand, the other the holy water, and the third the croſs. If the body is not yet interred, he ſhall ſtrike it with his ſtick at every verſe of the Miſerere; after which he ſhall abſolve it, and it ſhall then be buried in conſecrated ground: But if the corps was buried in unhallowed ground, it ſhall be removed from thence, if poſſible, and he ſhall ſtrike it in the ſame manner; but in caſe it cannot be dug up, the rector ſhall ſtrike upon the grave with the wand.

The Jews had alſo their excommunication, whereof we have given a deſcription in the diſſertations upon their ceremonies. The idolaters likewiſe us'd to prohibit their myſteries to all thoſe who were polluted with any crime; which cuſtom anſwer'd to the excommunications of the Jews and Chriſtians. We take no notice of the interdict of fire and water, eſtabliſhed amongſt the Romans againſt criminals of a certain order. Among the antient Gauls the interdict from the ſacrifices was a capital puniſhment. Thoſe who were ſo unhappy as to incur this kind of excommunication were rank'd among the impious, whom all men ſhunn'd to meet, ſpeak, or have the leaſt correſpondence with: they were avoided as ſo many infectious perſons; all the duties of civil-ſociety were deny'd them; nor was there any juſtice for them in judiciary-proceedings. All this Cæſar aſſures us in his Commentaries.

The third compartment of the plate repreſents the excommunication perform'd with unlighted candles. This formidable excommunication is preceeded by the anathema, by which the perſon excommunicated is threatned with torments both in this life and in that which is to come; is deliver'd up to ſatan, ſeparated from civil-ſociety, and in a word, completely oppreſſed; which is the reaſon why it is compar'd to thunder. Antiently it us'd to ruſh with ſurpriſing ſwiftneſs, but now its violence is prodigiouſly abated. The papal fulminations in particular have often made the chriſtian world tremble; but at this time the ſtorms which gather in the Vatican, ſeldom extend farther than Italy, or at leaſt find it a very difficult matter to croſs the Alps: and the thunder of Jupiter Capitolinus no more daſhes crowns to pieces.

When the pope is to fulminate this ſolemn excommunication, ‡ he goes up to the high altar with all the air of an excommunicator, and accompany'd with twelve cardinal-prieſts, all of them having lighted tapers in their hands; he then ſits down on the pontifical ſeat plac'd before the high altar, and from thence thunders out his anathemas. Sometimes a deacon, clothed in a black dalmatica, goes up into the pulpit, and publiſhes this anathema with a loud voice; in the mean time the bells ring a kind of knell, as for deceas'd perſons, for the excommunicated perſon is look'd upon as dead with regard to the church. After the anathema, every one cries thrice with a loud voice, fiat, or ſo be it: at the ſame time the pope and cardinals throw their lighted candles upon the ground, and the acolyths tread them under their feet. After this the ſentence of excommunication, and the name of the perſon excommunicated, are ſet up in publick, * in order that no one may have any farther communication with him.

The Romiſh pontifical takes notice of three kinds of excommunication, viz. 1. Minor, 2. Major, and, 3. Anathema, which is that above-mention'd. The Minor may be conſider'd as a kind of ſpiritual infection, ſince it is incurr'd by thoſe who have any correſpondence with an excommunicated perſon. The pariſh-prieſt may abſolve from this excommunication; but he who has been ſo unhappy as to incur it, muſt immediately go and make a confeſſion thereof. The pontifical tells us, that a perſon who has incurr'd the minor excommunication, is oblig'd to confeſs himſelf in the following form of words; I confeſs my ſelf to God, and to you, reverend father, as having incurr'd excommunication for frequenting an excommunicated perſon; for having ſpoke, drank, eat with him, &c.

The major excommunication is made in writing againſt thoſe who diſobey the commands of the church, or of the holy ſee; or refuſe to ſubmit to certain points of diſcipline; infringe ſome immunities, &c. The pope fulminates his anathemas againſt all hereticks and apoſtates; againſt ſuch as unjuſtly ſeize upon the temporalities of the church; in a word, all the enemies of it. By this excommunication they are declar'd to be ſeparated from the ſacred body of Chriſt as rotten members; cut off from all chriſtian ſociety; excluded from the church both militant and triumphant; deliver'd over to the devil and his angels, &c.

When the excommunicated perſon gives tokens of a ſincere repentance, † he muſt take a new oath of fealty, incur the penalties inflicted on him, and make ſuch ſatisfaction as may be neceſſary. He firſt falls proſtrate on his knees, when the ſeven penitential pſalms are ſung; and after having been brought into the church, he falls on his knees a ſecond time at the foot of the altar, to which he is conducted by the perſon who reconciles him to the church. The latter goes up to the altar, and turning himſelf towards the perſon reconcil'd, offers up a prayer to God in his favour, and ſigns him with the ſign of the croſs. Whenever an heretick, an infidel, or an apoſtate, are reconcil'd to the church, before they are receiv'd into it, the pope, or the perſon who performs the ceremony of reconciliation, ‡ aſks him the ‡ Theſe formalities were obſerv'd at the abſolution of Henry IV. Being come to the great gate of St. Denis's church, the archbiſhop of Bourges was attending, he being appointed to perform the ceremony, at a little diſtance from the door within the church, ſeated in his pontifical habit, in a chair cover'd with white damask, with the arms of France and Navarre, and ſurrounded with a great number of prelates and friars, belonging to the abbey. The archbiſhop asking him who he was? he reply'd, the king. What is your buſineſs, reply'd the archbiſhop? I deſire, ſaid the king, to be received into the boſom of the Catholick church. Are you deſirous of it, continued the archbiſhop? Yes, anſwer'd the king, I very much deſire it. He then fell upon his knees, and made his confeſſion of faith. The formulary of this confeſſion of faith was put into the hands of the prelate that pronounced the abſolution, who gave the king his ring to kiſs, bleſs'd and abſolved him from the cenſures incurr'd by the hereſy he had profeſs'd and defended.

the occaſion of his coming thither, obſerving to ſay to him, * receive the ſign of the croſs of Chriſt and of chriſtianity, which thou hadſt borne before, but which the error into which thou didſt fall unhappily hath made thee loſe. He then † conducts him to the altar, in the manner repreſented in the ſixth compartment of the plate. He there examines him a ſecond time concerning the articles of the chriſtian faith; and the reſt of the ceremony concludes as uſual. If the perſon ſo reconcil'd has taught any hereſies or errors, he is obliged to abjure them in a ſolemn manner.

‡ Here follows the form of abſolution which the pope gives to crown'd heads, who have been excommunicated, as practis'd by the court of Rome. When his holineſs is to pronounce this ſolemn abſolution, a pontifical throne, richly adorn'd, is erected before St. Peter's church; here the pope is carried in proceſſion, and preſides therein with his rod or wand in his hand, in the midſt of the apoſtolical court. One of the maſters of the ceremonies brings a dozen wands, which he diſtributes among the twelve aſſiſtant-cardinals. The embaſſadors of the excommunicated princes appear with an air of humility before this formidable aſſembly, and throw themſelves at his holineſs's feet: but notwithſtanding the indignity of the perſon they repreſent, the vicar of our Saviour indulges them the privilege, or rather the favour of kiſſing them. This being done, one of the embaſſadors asks pardon, with a loud voice, of the church and the holy ſee; offers to make reparation in his maſter's name, and deſires to be abſolved. Then the fiſcal-attorney examines the full powers of theſe miniſters; a ſecretary reads them aloud, and the attorney asks them a ſecond time, (*) whether they are ready to obey the commands of the holy ſee and the church, i. e. if they will promiſe fealty to the pope and church, and ſwear to ſubmit to their orders and deciſions? Then the maſter of the ceremonies brings the maſs-book, which two cardinal-deacons hold before the pope, who lays his hand on it; on this the embaſſadors lay both their hands, when they promiſe, ſwear, and oblige themſelves by the holy goſpels, and the holy crucifix, which is brought there, to obſerve inviolably the engagement which they take in their maſter's name, whereof one of the apoſtolical notaries draws up a ſolemn inſtrument. The abſolution follows, when the pope and the twelve cardinal-prieſts ſing the Miſerere, obſerving to ſtrike each of thoſe miniſters on the ſhoulder, at the beginning of each verſe of the pſalms. The ceremony ends with prayers, &c. and the impoſition of a penance, proportionable to the fault committed by the perſon abſolv'd. Laſtly, the cardinals and penitentiaries conduct theſe embaſſadors to the Obedientia, with the accuſtomed ceremonies.

'Twas much after this manner that Clement VIII. (†) abſolved Henry IV. of France. D'Oſſat and Du Perron, who were afterwards made cardinals, received the blows † Here follows the formulary of the introduction; Return into the church of God, out of which thou haſt been caſt, having unhappily been miſled by error: Know that thou haſt been taken out of the ſnares of death; abhor idols, ſuperſtition, hereſy; adore God alone in three perſons, &c. May we not conclude from this formulary that the Catholick church is very unjuſtly accus'd of teaching idolatry? Are we to impute to it ſuch abuſes as are made by the vulgar and bigots? Is it not notorious that the common people always go to extremes in all ſuch things as relate to exterior practices, and that very few perſons are capable of abſtracting their ſenſes? Which of the two is preferable, an unity of worſhip, under a ſingle body of doctrine, or an eternal diſ-union, by virtue of a liberty of examining? An unbounded liberty, indulg'd to the meaneſt cobler, no leſs than the greateſt man of learning. Theſe are the arguments which zealous Roman-catholicks imploy, in defending their religion againſt the ſectaries.

blows with the wand, which their maſter would have had, had he himſelf appear'd in their preſence. As to the penalties, and the uſual works of piety, his majeſty was order'd to mumble over his beads once a-day; to ſay the litanies on Wedneſday, the roſary on Saturday; to obſerve all the faſts, and other injunctions of the church; to go to maſs every day, &c. Moreover, he was enjoin'd to found a monaſtery in every province of his kingdom, particularly in the province of Bearn, part of his demeſnes, which he ordered, to unproteſtantize itſelf, if I may be allow'd the expreſſion.

We are aſſur'd in the ceremonial, that abſolution was perform'd with much greater ſeverity in former ages, as for inſtance in ſeveral important caſes; then the * penitents us'd to go naked, and ſtand before St. Peter's porch, when twelve prieſts thereof beat them with their wands. But ſuch vaſſals as had rebelled againſt the pope and the church were beat very ſoundly for a † long time together, it laſting during the ſinging of ſeveral penitential pſalms.

The ceremonies of degrading, and reſtoring of the perſon degraded, bear ſuch relation to excommunication, that it would not be proper to omit them in this place. However we ſhall confine ourſelves to the deſcription of the degradation of a biſhop, in order not to vary from the inſcription of the figure repreſenting it. ‡ The biſhop who is to be degraded is conducted to the pope, and clothed in his preſence with all his pontifical veſtments. A ſecular judge aſſiſts at this ceremony. They begin by ſtripping the perſon to be degraded of his pontifical and other ornaments, piece-meal; after which he is deliver'd over to the ſecular judge, it being ſuppos'd that the actions he has committed are of ſo criminal a nature as to merit a temporal puniſhment.

It is uſual to raiſe a kind of throne or tribunal at the church-door, to give the degradation a more ſolemn air. At ſome diſtance from the perſons who perform the ceremony a little credence is ſet, tho not repreſented in the plate. Over this credence the ſeveral utenſils are plac'd, to denote the employment of the perſon to be degraded; as for inſtance, a veſſel fill'd with wine, another with water, the chalice, the paten, and the hoſt for the degrading of a prieſt; the book of the goſpels, that of the epiſtles, a candleſtick, with an unlighted candle in it, at the degrading of a deacon, a ſub-deacon, or an acolyth; a leſſon-book, at the degrading of a reader; keys, at that of a ſacriſtan or door-keeper; the antiphon, at that of a choriſter. On the above-mention'd credence a pair of ſciſſars, a knife, a glaſs, and the pontifical ornaments of the prelate are laid. The delinquent ſtands in the midſt of the miniſters and the civil magiſtrate, accompanied with ſome ſoldiers; as alſo a notary and a barber. All theſe ſeveral perſons and things are requir'd in the ceremony of degradation. Immediately the delinquent is brought in his uſual habit before the pope, or the perſon who repreſents him: after this the clerks dreſs him in his pontifical veſtments, and preſent him to the perſon that degrades him, who is cloth'd with the amict, the albe, the ſtole, the red chaſuble, the plain mitre, has his loins girded, &c. The perſon who degrades, begins with a ſpeech addreſs'd to the ſpectators, whereby he acquaints them with the particulars of the degradation; after which he proceeds to the execution of the ſentence, I ſtrip thee of the epiſcopal mitre, which thou haſt polluted, at the ſame time taking the delinquent's mitre from off his head: Return back the goſpel, continues he, when it is put into the hands of the delinquent, becauſe thou art become unworthy of preaching it. In taking off his pontifical ring he is told that he has violated the church, which is the ſpouſe of Chriſt. It would be needleſs to

to take notice of the ſeveral pieces which are the marks of the epiſcopal dignity. After he has been ſtript of all his pontifical veſtments, the perſon who degrades him ſcrapes the delinquent's fingers with a knife, or a little piece of glaſs, declaring to him, that the power of conſecrating, bleſſing, and ſanctifying, is taken from him; and eraſes all the marks of the tonſure in the ſame manner. The reader may ſuppoſe that the chalice, the paten, the hoſt, the water, the wine, &c. are taken from him with the ſame ceremonies. Laſtly, when all is done, except degrading him of the office of clerk, the perſon who degrades begins to eraſe the tonſure by cutting off his hair with his ſciſſars, and the barber compleats the reſt by ſhaving the delinquent's head all over: upon which he is told, that he is driven out of the inheritance of our Lord, as an ungrateful ſon; and that he loſes the crown, which is the mark of the royal prieſthood, becauſe of his evil adminiſtration. After this he is given over to the ſecular arm; but at the ſame time the perſon who degrades, intreats the civil magiſtrate to be merciful, becauſe the church abhors blood. This maxim agrees with the ſpirit of the goſpel; however the clergy make a multitude of exceptions to it.

As an example of the ceremony of degrading, we ſhall deſcribe that of the famous * John Hus. He was dreſs'd in all his ſacerdotal veſtments, and the chalice was put into his hands as if he had been to celebrate maſs.—After this his ſeveral veſtments were taken off one after another, ſome curſe being pronounced at the ſame time—but they heſitated a little whether they ſhould imploy the razor or the ſciſſars in eraſing the marks of the tonſure, but at laſt the ſciſſars prevail'd. His hair was cut in the form of a croſs, in order that there might not be the leaſt marks of the crown remaining; and they even waſh'd it, the better to take away any footſteps of it. Such a form of degradation, continues the author laſt cited in the margin, after having quoted the canon law, ſinks a prieſt to the laity; and altho it does not deprive him of his character, that being † indelible, it yet incapacitates him for ever from exerciſing any of the miniſterial functions. And to make the puniſhment of John Hus ſtill more ignominious, a paper miter was put on his head, with three hideous devils painted on it; which being done, the prelates who perform'd the ceremony, devoted his ſoul to all the devils in hell. In a word, the church gave him up; he was declar'd a layman, and as ſuch deliver'd over to the ſecular arm.

We muſt now take notice of the ſpiritual benefits of which thoſe are depriv'd, who have incurr'd the major excommunication, and theſe are ſeven in number: 1. The partaking in publick prayers, which the church offers up for the faithful; of theſe the perſons excommunicated are depriv'd, only with ſome certain reſtrictions, as may be ſeen in ‡ the rituals. 2. The right of adminiſtring and receiving the ſacraments. 3. The right of aſſiſting at divine office. If the prieſt ſees an excommunicated perſon enter into the church during the office, he muſt command him to go out of it: if he has begun maſs, he muſt diſcontinue the ſervice till ſuch time as the excommunicated perſon is gone out; and in caſe he refuſes to do it, the prieſt muſt put off his ſacerdotal veſtments, and diſcontinue the maſs; but in caſe the canon of the maſs is begun, he muſt continue it to the communion incluſive, and afterwards conclude it in the ſacriſty. This is what we find injoin'd in Alet's ritual upon this important head. Excommunicated perſons are allowed to aſſiſt at ſermons and inſtructions; but we are to ſuppoſe, tho they are preſent, they yet cannot have any communication with any other chriſtian, leſt they ſhould corrupt them: and therefore the excommunicated perſon muſt ſtand in ſome corner, or be intirely ſeparated from other chriſtians. Without this he would not be deprived of the fourth benefit, which is the being intirely * excluded from common converſation; the prayers in common, i. e. the privilege of praying with any good chriſtian; of the civilities, and all other duties of ſociety; of the pleaſure of living with other chriſtians under the ſame roof; of carrying on buſineſs, and working with them: in a word, they are prohibited from eating and lying in the ſame bed with an excommunicated perſon. However, there are certain caſes in which it may be lawful to have commerce with them; theſe are all expreſs'd in one † Latin verſe. It may be lawful to correſpond with an excommunicated perſon, provided it be with an intention to inform him of his duty, and to endeavour to bring him back to it. The word Lex expreſſes all the duties of the conjugal life, which excommunication does not diſpenſe from. The word Humile expreſſes the duties of children and ſervants, which continue after the excommunication. If a perſon ſhould ignorantly get acquainted with an excommunicated perſon, he in that caſe would be no way guilty. Laſtly, the neceſſity of affairs obliges or permits the frequenting of excommunicated perſons. This exception is now carried to very great lengths, there being hardly a Romaniſt who refuſes to have dealings with a heretick, tho hereticks are known to be excommunicated and anathematiz'd by the pope. 'Tis well known that the church deprives them of all ſpiritual ſuccour and benefits. This toleration, with regard to communication, is owing to the neceſſity of the times. Excommunication was more formidable, when the church had not yet loſt thoſe countries, which Luther and Calvin have ſever'd from it, within theſe two hundred years. The fifth ſpiritual benefit is the being buried in conſecrated ground. The ſixth the having either an active or paſſive voice with regard to all benefices or eccleſiaſtical dignities, i. e. he can neither elect or be elected. The ſeventh and laſt ſpiritual benefit is the exerciſe of ſpiritual juriſdiction, and the power of intermeddling in cauſes tried in ſpiritual courts.

This ſeverity againſt excommunicated perſons is ‡ founded on ſeveral paſſages of the new teſtament. As to the minor excommunication, it deprives thoſe who have incurr'd it of the paſſive communication of the ſacraments, and the right of being elected or preſented to any eccleſiaſtical benefice or dignity. The church likewiſe employs ſeveral other expedients to recall unthinking chriſtians to their duty; it will ſuffice if we give a deſcription thereof from Alet's Ritual. The monitory is a command which the church lays on its children to diſcover, upon pain of excommunication, whatever they know of any important matter whereof it may be proper to acquaint her. If the monitory is not complied with, excommunication enſues. Suſpenſion deprives a clergyman for ſome time of the exerciſe of his functions, after his having been found guilty by the church of ſome enormous ſin. The Interdict is an eccleſiaſtical cenſure, by which the church forbids the uſe of the ſacraments, divine office in publick, and eccleſiaſtical burial, for any capital ſin, &c. There is a local, a perſonal, and a mix'd interdict, which relate to perſons and places: the ceſſation à divinis, is when for any notorious injury or diſobedience to the church, a ſtop is put to all divine offices, and the adminiſtration of ſacraments, and chriſtians are depriv'd of church burial. Interdict differs from Ceſſation, in that during the former divine ſervice may be perform'd in ſuch churches, the doors being ſhut, as are not expreſly under an interdict, and even to celebrate them ſolemnly on certain high feſtivals; but in Ceſſation, no religious ſervice can be adminiſtred; the only liberty allow'd, is, to renew the conſecrated hoſts; to repeat every week a private maſs in the pariſh churches, the doors of the ſame being ſhut; obſerving alſo not to ring the bell, or to admit more than two perſons to adminiſter in it. Moreover, it is lawful, during the the Ceſſation, to adminiſter baptiſm, confirmation, and penance, to ſuch perſons as deſire it, provided they are not excommunicated, or under an interdict. The viaticum may likewiſe be adminiſtred, but then the prayers which are ſaid before and after that adminiſtration, muſt not be repeated. A whole dioceſe, a city, a village, or one or more churches, may incur Ceſſation. Irregularity is a canonical impediment, by which a perſon is incapacitated from taking holy orders, or exerciſing the functions of them when taken: it reſults from a defect in the body, mind, birth, reputation, age, civil duties, a neglect of the ſacraments, or ſeverity of temper. One of the defects, with regard to the mind, is extreme ignorance; but great numbers of prieſts may juſtly be reproach'd with this. Antiently many of them did not underſtand the meaning of in nomine patris, &c. uſed in baptiſm. We meet with ſeveral merry inſtances to this purpoſe in the apology of Herodotus; however, this author may be excepted againſt becauſe he was a Calviniſt: we ſhall only for the reader's ſatisfaction, quote an † epigram made by a poet of the romiſh communion. As to the defects of the body, we could almoſt venture to affirm, without thinking we advance a paradox, that 'tis better to avoid them than the defects of the mind: few people would be edified to ſee a prieſt either deform'd, one-eyed or maim'd, eſpecially in the face, performing the miniſterial functions; if it were poſſible to bear with him for any time, that muſt be owing intirely to the curioſity of the publick, and perhaps the only motive of people's ſeeing him, would be to inſult his defects, and make merry with his face. But who does not ſee the weakneſs of the human mind on this occaſion? After all, God himſelf has excepted all deform'd and mutilated prieſts under the Jewiſh law; and it is but juſt that the chriſtians ſhould follow a command, which, by preſerving the dignity of the prieſthood, points out to mankind, that as God is a being of ſupreme perfection, he will be ſerv'd by miniſters as perfect as human nature is capable of producing them. The catholick church obſerves this rule pretty exactly, but not the Calviniſts; ‡ and indeed a celebrated author has complained of their negligence in the choice of paſtors. Not but that numbers of that communion are very well pleas'd with handſome and agreeable preachers, who ſtrike their auditors much more by their exterior eloquence, and the fruitfulneſs of their imagination, heightned by the beauty of their countenance, than the regularity of their lives, or a ſpirit diſingag'd from all ſublunary things: be this as it will, they receive and conſecrate thoſe whoſe bodily qualities are very oppoſite to the abovemention'd talents. But to return from this ſhort digreſſion. Baſtards are by the church excluded from holy orders; however there are ſome exceptions to this rule, and ſeveral have in our days been admitted to them who were publickly known to be ſo. The defects as to reputation, age, and gentleneſs of behaviour, are liable to almoſt as many exceptions; theſe are ſo well known, that it would be needleſs to mention any examples upon that head.

We

‡ Oſtervald's treatiſe on the ſources of our corruption.

We are told in Alet's Ritual, that cenſures muſt not be employ'd in deſtroying ſuch animals as are noxious to the fruits of the earth, ſuch as rats, caterpillars, graſhoppers, &c. for in theſe caſes the church makes uſe of exorciſms, holy water, and certain prayers. The Ritual continues; the rector or curate is obliged to give the biſhop an account of the damage which inſects do to the fruits of the earth in his pariſh; in which caſe, if the biſhop thinks proper, ſome prayers are employ'd againſt them. For this purpoſe the parſon goes to ſome eminence in that part of the country where thoſe animals make the greateſt havock; here he puts on his ſurplice and the purple ſtola; and a clerk ſtands at his right hand, holding the veſſel of holy water and the ſprinker. From this eminence, the prieſt, after having made the ſign of a croſs, repeats the prayers appointed for that occaſion; after which he ſprinkles the fields with holy water, and this thrice in the form of a croſs. Tho 'tis forbidden to employ cenſures and excommunication againſt noxious animals, 'tis nevertheleſs uſual to excommunicate graſhoppers in a great many * places; and we muſt not omit the burleſque ſentence pronounced in the biſhop of Troye's court in 1516, againſt the caterpillars of that dioceſe: the official, or biſhop's judge, gravely admoniſhes the caterpillars to quit the place in the ſpace of ſix days, in default of which they are declar'd curs'd, and as ſuch anathematiz'd. Leonard Vair ‡ mentions likewiſe this manner of deſtroying inſects: "In ſome places, ſays he, to drive a-"way graſhoppers and other noxious vermin, a certain exorciſt is employ'd as judge, "before whom two attorneys are appointed, the one for the people, the other for "the vermin. Then the attorney of the people ſues for juſtice againſt the graſhoppers "and caterpillars, in order to drive them out of the fields: the other ſtands up for "his clients——. At laſt, all due ceremonies having been obſerv'd, ſentence of ex-"communication is pronounced againſt the inſects, in caſe they don't leave the place "at a ſtated time." This procedure does not appear ſo ſolemn to us, nor conſequently ſo remarkable, as that of the ſpiritual court of Troyes; but what ſhall we ſay of St. Bernard, who, in order to drive away the flies that perſecuted the members of a church which he himſelf had founded in the dioceſe of Laon, declared that he excommunicated them? To underſtand this expreſſion in an orthodox ſenſe, we are to ſuppoſe, by excommunication, that St. Bernard meant the prayers of the church, pronounced with the forms and ceremonies made uſe of upon this occaſion. We meet with various ways among the antient and modern heathens, of exorciſing noxious animals, which probably may have given riſe to ſeveral blameable practices that have unhappily crept into ſome parts of the chriſtian world, and chiefly among thoſe who lived remote from the civiliz'd part of it. The exorciſms of the Pſylli, of the Theſſalians and Telchines, are well known, as alſo thoſe of the modern Indians.

There remains only to make ſome mention of the office of the penitentiaries; we have already obſerv'd the antiquity of it. At firſt only one penitentiary was appointed to each church, but their number increas'd inſenſibly: 'twas not that chriſtians were become more ſcrupulous and more exact with regard to the article of confeſſion; but the authority of prieſts over the conſciences of men increas'd, and the office of penitentiary grew more uſeful and neceſſary, becauſe men were more eaſily ſcared at the reflection on their ſins. As for the modern penitentiaries, we ſhall confine our ſelves to the deſcription which Aimon has † given us of thoſe of Rome: "There are ſeven "in every great church in that city, appointed for the different nations, each of whom "hear in a different language; thoſe of St. Peter's, are Jeſuits; thoſe of St. John "of Lateran, Franciſcans; and thoſe of S. Maria Maggiore, Dominicans. " ſlight puniſhments; as for inſtance, to ſuch as over-indulge themſelves in eating " and drinking, to faſt; to the covetous, alms; to the indevout, the repeating of " ſeveral prayers at certain hours of the day, and ſo on. Theſe are call'd minor " penitentiaries, becauſe they have not the power of abſolving in ſuch caſes as are re- " ſerv'd to the pope, but only of certain others, which the ordinary confeſſors are for- " bid to abſolve. The grand penitentiary only has the power of abſolving in all thoſe " caſes which the pope has reſerv'd to himſelf; and for this purpoſe, he who has the " patent of grand penitentiary, which the pope never gives to a perſon of leſs dignity " than a cardinal, comes to the ſeveral great churches, in their ſeveral turns, a week be- " fore caſter, to hear the confeſſions, himſelf ſitting on a pulpit to which one aſcends " by three ſteps, in the form of a tribunal, that ſtands on the ſide of the high altar of " the ſaid churches. He then has a wand in his hand, in form of a ſcepter, made " of three different ſubſtances; the firſt which he graſps is of ivory, the ſecond of " braſil, and the third of ebony: all this is certainly to be taken in a myſterious ſenſe, " as may be naturally ſuppos'd, without our giving an explication of it.

" His power, beſides the abſolution of reſerved caſes, extends to give diſpenſations " for ſuch degrees as are prohibited by human laws, (the pope always reſerving to " himſelf ſuch as are forbid by the commands of the divine law.) He likewiſe " admits the legitimacy of children; diſpenſes from ſuch defects as prevent going " into holy orders, and from ſeveral articles relating to the monaſtick rules, as alſo " vows and ſimony. He likewiſe allows the holding a plurality of benefices. " He abſolves from murders in foro conſcientiæ, i. e. in the tribunal of the " conſcience; and as to clerks, his abſolution takes place not only with regard to the " conſcience, but likewiſe before the tribunal of the civil magiſtrate.

" He is impower'd to depute ordinary confeſſors, in any place ſoever, to abſolve, " in his ſtead, all who have any caſes reſerv'd to his holineſs, and whoſe buſineſs " will not admit of their coming to Rome; directing his commiſſion to them gratis " ubique, i. e. gratis to any place whatſoever, written on parchment, and ſeal'd with " the ſeal of the penitentiary's court. He ſometimes holds a congregation, to " debate upon caſes of conſcience, with the regent or keeper of the ſeal, who " is always a prelate, with two or three divines, who are generally Jeſuits, " and the ſame number of doctors of canon law. He diſpoſes and collates " to certain employments which are bought for money, whereof the moſt conſide- " rable are thoſe of the twenty-four attorneys of the penitentiary's court, whoſe office " is to defend ſuch petitioners as deſire to be diſpatch'd before the judges eſtabliſh'd " by the grand penitentiary, who examine the cauſe, when it is a litigious one; " in which caſe he puts one of the three decrees following in ſuch commiſſions " as he himſelf writes over again: fiat in forma, fiat de ſpeciali, fiat de " expreſſo, i. e. be it done in form, or ſpecially, or expreſly: and theſe various ex- " preſſions denote to thoſe who tax the caſe, the importance of the buſineſs contain'd " in the petition. This office of grand penitentiary was ſome years ago worth ſix " thouſand crowns per annum to the incumbent, but it has ſince been leſſen'd to the " profit of the apoſtolical chamber; and the pope allows now but twelve hundred " crowns of gold annually to the cardinal who enjoys that employment."

'Twould be needleſs to mention the caſual profits of this poſt, they amounting to an immenſe ſum of money: but after all, as it is impoſſible to juſtify the exceſſes which appears in the tax of the chancery, to the ſcandal of the chriſtian religion; ſo on the other ſide we cannot condemn the lawful uſe of eccleſiaſtical taxes, when they don't ſtrike at the ſolemn majeſty of religion, nor give a ſanction to crimes and diſ- orders. Let certain diſpenſations be granted; certain vows be diſpens'd with; certain penalties eſtabliſh'd by the canons be mitigated; nay, we will allow that thoſe who infringe the ſtatutes enacted by the holy ſee, ſhall be fined in very very heavy ſums, provided that all who perpetrate greater crimes may not be abſolved for money.

V. EXTREME UNCTION.

The rituals define extreme unction to be a ſacrament that gives all ſuch chriſtians as are afflicted with a dangerous fit of ſickneſs, a full remiſſion of their ſins; inſpires them with grace to ſuffer with patience the pains and troubles of their infirmity; indues them with ſtrength ſufficient to die the death of the righteous; and reſtores them to health, provided it be for the good of their ſouls. Thus the catholick church makes extreme unction a ſacrament, the indiſpenſable neceſſity of which it teaches us, as appears by the above-mention'd definition; and it muſt be own'd that this doctrine receives a great ſanction from a paſſage in the epiſtle of * St. James; from an almoſt univerſally receiv'd tradition, and the teſtimony of ſeveral of the antient fathers. It is therefore very unjuſt to reject it as a practice invented in the 6th century, by pope Felix IV. about anno 528, as a certain proteſtant † writer affirms, by pretending that the anointing in the primitive church, was founded on the power of healing the ſick, beſtow'd on the apoſtles and their diſciples. "As the gift of "healing, ſays he, ceas'd with other miracles, ſome hereticks were for retaining the "practice of this anointing, altho it had loſt its efficacy, and made it ſerve for an-"other purpoſe; for about the year 180, the Valentinians uſed to anoint their ſick "when at the point of death with oil, and added certain prayers to it," &c.

The form of the ſacrament of extreme unction conſiſts in theſe words, "‡ May "God by this holy anointing, and his moſt pious mercy, grant you the pardon of all "the ſins you may have committed." The prieſt pronounces this form of words while he is anointing thoſe parts of the body which are proper for it, becauſe they have been the occaſion, or ſerved as ſo many inſtruments for ſin, whereof, to uſe the words of Alet's Ritual, this ſacrament purges the dregs, i. e. thoſe ſins which we have not been careful enough to repent of: this ſacrament therefore compenſates for the defects of paſt repentance.

The prieſt only is the miniſter of this ſacrament, which is adminiſtred to none but ſuch as are afflicted with ſome mortal diſeaſe, or are in a decrepit age; provided that beſides their advanced age, they are likewiſe ſo extremely infirm, that it may be conſider'd as a deadly diſeaſe. But extreme unction is not adminiſtred to criminals condemn'd to die; and the reaſon given for this is, that the criminal is not in a ſtate of death, either by diſeaſe or any other infirmity. Some other remarks might be made upon this ſacrament, however we ſhall omit them, as they belong properly to the Rituals, and thoſe who by their function are oblig'd to peruſe them. We ſhall therefore content our ſelves with making two obſervations, viz. that extreme unction is refuſed to ſuch as are impenitent, and that in caſe a ſick perſon dies while he is anointing, the ceremony muſt immediately be diſcontinued.

The parts to be anointed are the eyes, the ears, the noſtrils, the mouth, the hands, the feet, and reins; but men only are anointed in the part laſt mention'd. The laity are anointed in the palms of the hand, and prieſts on the back of it, and ‖ that becauſe the palms of their hands have been already conſecrated by ordination. The ſoles of the feet are always anointed; if the ſick perſon has loſt any of thoſe members

* Chap. v. ver. 14 and 15. Is any ſick among you? let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith ſhall ſave the ſick, and the Lord ſhall raiſe him up; and if he have committed ſins, they ſhall be forgiven him. And alſo Mark vi. 13. And anointed with oil many that were ſick, and healed them.

members that ſhould have been anointed, the part next to it muſt be anointed. This is what relates to this ceremony in general; here follows the particular deſcription thereof. The prieſt muſt get ready ſeven balls of cotton, or ſome ſuch matter, to wipe thoſe parts which are to be anointed with holy oil; ſome crumb of bread to rub his fingers with; water to waſh them, a napkin to wipe them, and a taper to light him during the ceremony. Before he goes to the ſick perſon, he muſt ſanctify himſelf by prayer; after which he muſt waſh his hands, put on a ſurplice, and the purple ſtola; muſt take the veſſel in which the holy oils are contained, covered with a purple veil, or ſhut up in a bag of the ſame colour, and carry it in ſuch a manner as not to let the oil run out. If he goes at a great diſtance, he need only put on his ſurplice and his ſtola at the door of the ſick perſon, and in that caſe he muſt carry the veſſel of oils in a purſe, and hang it about his neck, in the ſame manner as the viaticum is ſometimes carried to the ſick. The prieſt muſt be attended by the clerk, who muſt carry the croſs without a ſtaff, the veſſel of holy water, the ſprinkler, and the ritual. They muſt not ring the little bell by the way, but the prieſt muſt offer up ſome prayers, with a low voice, in favour of the ſick. In entring into the ſick perſon's apartment, he repeats the ordinary form of words, Pax huic domui, & omnibus habitantibus in ea, i. e. peace be to this houſe, &c. After having taken off his cap, and ſet the veſſel of the holy oils upon the table, he gives the ſick perſon the croſs to kiſs; afterwards takes the ſprinkler, ſprinkles the ſick perſon, the apartment, and the aſſiſtants with holy water in form of a croſs, at the ſame time repeating the anthem aſperges me, &c. He tells the ſick perſon, by way of exhortation, that he would commit the utmoſt ſacrilege, in caſe he preſumed to receive extreme unction, without having firſt ſettled with his conſcience; but in caſe he is ſpeechleſs, and is not ſenſible, the † prieſt ſhall exhort him to the beſt of his power. If the ſick perſon diſcovers any tokens of a real contrition, the prieſt ſhall pronounce abſolution, which ſhall be follow'd by an exhortation, and this by a * prayer very edifying to the hearers. After this the ſick perſon muſt repeat the confiteor, or in caſe he is not able to do it, the clerk muſt pronounce it for him; the prieſt ſhall add for the ſick perſon the miſereatur tui, i. e. may the Lord have pity on thee, &c. Before they begin to perform the ceremony of extreme unction, all the perſons preſent muſt fall down upon their knees, and whilſt the anointing is performing, they ſhall repeat the penitential pſalms and litanies for the ſake of his ſoul.

part but when they may be eaſily turn'd in their beds, or may be laid down in them without danger. The anointing being ended, the prieſt rubs ſuch of his fingers as have touch'd the oil of the infirm, and afterwards waſhes his hands. The crumb of bread with which he had rubb'd himſelf, and the water with which he had waſh'd himſelf, muſt be thrown into the fire; the pieces of cotton that have been employ'd in anointing, are carried into the church where they are burnt, and the aſhes thereof are thrown into the ſacrarium.

The anointing being ended, the prieſt repeats likewiſe ſome prayers, which are followed by an exhortation to the ſick; after which the prieſt goes away, leaving a crucifix with the ſick perſon, in order that the ſight of the dying Saviour may adminiſter ſome conſolation to him. We are oblig'd to own, that ſome ſuch inſtruments of piety are neceſſary, in order to their working upon the minds of the vulgar. Some people never think of ſpiritual things but thro' the medium of material objects; and 'tis very well if they think of them with advantage to their ſouls. We are not to imagine, that the ſimple and ignorant are to be brought over by the ſame methods as the learned. Do ſuch chriſtians as are eternally talking of ſpirituality in religion, bring a greater number to Chriſt than thoſe who endeavour to gain over ſouls to him by ſuch objects as are in ſome meaſure palpable? A medium would be neceſſary in this caſe. Thoſe who are for having the vulgar deprived of theſe external ſuccours, by which the bulk of mankind are induc'd to devote themſelves to God, have too exalted a notion of ſuch ſouls as are but little accuſtomed to the meditation of ſpiritual things; and thoſe who talk in too pompous terms of theſe outward aſſiſtances, make either hypocrites or bigots. 'Tis ſurpriſing, that St. Charles Boromeo, when at the point of death, ſhould contemplate a picture wherein our Saviour was repreſented in his agonies in the garden of Olives. Should a ſaint of ſo elevated a rank condeſcend ſo far as to put himſelf in the rank of vulgar ſouls? And can we be perſuaded, that he could not lift up his heart to God without ſome ſuch object?

Some farther account of what is obſerv'd with regard to ſuch Chriſtians as are at the point of death.

When a perſon's laſt hour is drawing near, and that he has received the ſacraments, made his will, and ſet his conſcience in order, he ſhould be entertain'd with nothing but ſpiritual diſcourſes. The prieſt ought to viſit him frequently, in order to draw off his thoughts from the things of this life, diſſolve thoſe engagements which a wife and children in tears make it difficult for him to break, or which ſerve him for a pretence to wiſh to remove as far as poſſible, his journey to eternity: if the ſick perſon is bound to make any reſtitutions, the ſtrongeſt arguments muſt be employ'd to engage him to it; and in caſe he has not yet made his will, he muſt prevail with him to make it, and that in a juſt and honourable manner, ſo as not to create diviſions in his family, or leſſen his reputation in the world. The prieſt muſt not ſuffer the ſick perſon to bequeath any wealth to the church to the prejudice of his family, upon pretence of maſſes, prayers, and other religious exerciſes in favour of his ſoul. In a word, he muſt not ſuffer a ſick perſon to deprive his relations of his eſtate, which often, by falſe ſcruples of conſcience, is bequeath'd to prieſts, for the love of the heavenly bliſs, and the glory of God. A prieſt muſt likewiſe take care not to impoſe upon perſons, by terrifying them in their expiring moments. The clergy ſhould be forbid to receive ſuch donations as are unjuſt, and to the prejudice of private families; to enveigle by artful flatteries old female zealots, and antiquated debauchees, who think, in the evening of their days, to wipe out their ſins by leaving all their eſtates to prieſts. This is what what we are told in the rituals; and we ſhall now give the particulars of what may be call'd a ceremony in this laſt act of a chriſtian's life.

We ſhall not repeat that the prieſt at his coming into the houſe, gives his bleſſing to thoſe who inhabit it; that he ſprinkles both the ſick perſon and his apartment with holy water; * that at the repeating of certain prayers mention'd in the rituals, he puts on his ſurplice and the purple ſtole. Some of theſe prayers being ended, he again takes up the ſprinkler in order to ſprinkle the ſick perſon; then he reads ſome pious diſcourſe to him, and at his beginning it, makes the ſign of the croſs on the book, on his own forehead, his mouth, and his breaſt; and does the ſame on the mouth and breaſt of the ſick perſon, in caſe he is not able to do it himſelf. If the ſick perſon be a woman, ſome of her ſhe-friends ſhall make theſe ſigns of the croſs inſtead of the prieſt, who when he has done reading theſe pious diſcourſes, repeats a very ſhort prayer; after which he lays his right hand on the ſick perſon's head, makes the ſign of the croſs over him, ſprinkles him with holy water, and withdraws; but in caſe the ſick perſon is juſt ready to expire, the prieſt muſt not leave him. When he is in this condition he muſt give him the croſs, and ſay the office wherein the ſoul of the dying perſon is recommended to God, and the interceſſion of the ſaints. The lucid intervals, if I may be allow'd the expreſſion, of the ſick perſon, muſt be ſpent in acts of contrition, of renunciation of the world and its pomps, of charity for our neighbour, of faith in the doctrine of the church, of hope in God, &c. " It is alſo fitting, ſays Alet in " his ritual, that the ſick perſon ſhould be exhorted to confide in the prayers of our " lady——, in thoſe of his guardian angel, of the ſaint his patron, and of all the " ſaints." At laſt, when the ſick perſon's end is juſt approaching, the prieſt ſhall immediately ſprinkle him with holy water; in order to endue him with ſtrength ſufficient to reſiſt the prince of darkneſs, ſhall be more preſſing in his exhortations, if poſſible, than before; ſhall give him the crucifix to kiſs; ſet it before his eyes, in order to ſtrengthen his confidence in Chriſt Jeſus. The clerk ſhall light a conſecrated taper, if it was not lighted before. The prieſt and the perſons preſent ſhall begin the litanies, and this pious exerciſe ſhall continue till ſuch time as the ſick perſon is juſt going to reſign up his ſoul, when the prayers appointed for perſons in theſe circumſtances muſt be read, as we find them in the † rituals. And when he is juſt going to give up the ‡ ghoſt, the clerk ſhall, if poſſible, make him give ſome freſh tokens of his reſignation to the will of heaven, and ſhall not leave him till he has breath'd his laſt.

The ceremonies obſerv'd at funerals.

Thus have we deſcrib'd the ſeveral circumſtances of the devotion of a dying perſon, and the ceremonies with which he is prepar'd to ſet out on his dangerous journey to eternity. The devotion of ſuch as ſurvive is to pray for the deceas'd, and to teſtify their remembrance of him, either by the ſolemnity of his funeral, or their charity in offering up prayers, and appointing maſſes for the repoſe of his ſoul.

* Alet's ritual.

† The firſt begins, Proficiſcere anima chriſtiana, &c. depart O chriſtian ſoul in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghoſt; of the angels, archangels, thrones, powers, principalities, cherubims, ſeraphims, patriarchs, prophets, &c. The ſecond is to implore the divine mercy for him. The third recommends the ſoul of the dying perſon to God. Theſe three prayers are follow'd by what is call'd the Libera's, which is a prayer to God to beſeech him that his ſoul may be deliver'd from all the dangers to which it is expoſed at its departure from this world. After the Libera's follow certain prayers, and ſome pious pieces are read in caſe there be opportunity for it.

‡ It is cuſtomary in ſome places to toll the bell of the pariſh church, to give notice that one of the pariſhioners is at the point of death, to the end that the reſt may aſſiſt him with their prayers.

When the ſick perſon has given up the ghoſt, the prieſt ſtanding up uncover'd, ſays a reſponſe, in which the ſaints and angels are invoked to aſſiſt the ſoul of the deceaſed: he afterwards repeats a prayer. At the ſame time orders are ſent to toll the bell, to give notice of the ſick perſon's death, by which every one is minded to pray for his ſoul; but it never tolls in the night.

Then the prieſt withdraws; * the corps is put in order; † they waſh ſome parts of it, and ſet it in a decent place; obſerving to put a little crucifix in its hand, which muſt lie upon its breaſt: ſometimes the hands are laid croſs-wiſe. At its feet a veſſel full of holy water and a ſprinkler muſt be laid, in order that thoſe who come and pay him their laſt devoirs, may ‡ ſprinkle both themſelves and the corps with holy water. In the || mean time ſome clergymen muſt ſtay by the corps, and pray for the deceaſed, till ſuch time as he is laid in the earth. If the deceaſed was a prieſt, or of any other order in the church, he muſt have the tonſure according to his order, and his ſquare cap with a little croſs on his breaſt.

It was cuſtomary among the heathens to pray for ſouls departed, whereof  ſome mention has been already made; the form of words, ſit tibi terra levis, is very well known: the Jews obſerve the ſame cuſtom. 'Twould be very difficult to clear up the diſpute between the romaniſts and proteſtants, viz. what kind of prayer was offer'd up for the dead in the ſecond century, and which is acknowledged, tho with ſeveral diſtinctions, by the †† calviniſt writers. One of theſe ſays, that the church uſed to pray for the completion of their glory; conſequently it was not completed after their death, and therefore they did not arrive at a ſtate of bliſs immediately after their departure out of this world. The above-cited writer aſcribes to a particular zeal, tho unauthoriz'd by the church, the favour which the chriſtians in thoſe days uſed to aſk of the martyrs, which was, to pray, after their deceaſe, for the ſurviving faithful; by which we may preſume, that the interceſſion of the ſaints in paradiſe, was of very great efficacy in thoſe ages. Whatever ſenſe may be given to the prayers of the primitive chriſtians for ſouls departed, it is certain they were practiſed in the time of Conſtantine the great, ſince the people pray'd for his ſoul, as Euſebius informs us in the life of that emperor.

But the prayers of the primitive, as well as modern chriſtians, ſuppoſe at leaſt a middle ſtate between the pains of hell, and the felicities of paradiſe, and indeed without ſuch a ſuppoſition, where would be the aim and tendency of theſe prayers? 'Tis the ſtate call'd purgatory, and is for ſuch ſouls only as are dead in grace. But we are not to imagine that this purgatory is a material fire where men really fry; or waters

* That is, they cloſe its eyes and ſhut its mouth, according to the antient practice; they are either wrap'd up in a ſhroud, or left with their clothes on, as in Italy.

† Piſcara Praxis Cerem. This cuſtom is of great antiquity.

‡ The antients had a cuſtom that has ſome affinity to this: Upon going away from a corps they uſed to waſh themſelves with water, which was taken out of a veſſel prepared for that ablution. But this cuſtom does not ſeem to have much affinity with that of the holy water, with which thoſe who approach a corps, ſprinkle themſelves. Here follows what diſcovers a greater affinity: the antient Romans uſed to purify their dead, by watering them thrice with the water call'd Luſtralis; and this ceremony was always perform'd by a prieſt.

|| A proteſtant writer owns that this cuſtom was in uſe about an hundred years after the firſt Nicene council, and ſays as follows in the hiſtory of the ceremonies and ſuperſtitions, &c. anno 400: "It "was antiently the cuſtom, as ſoon as any perſon was dead, to ſend for ſome clergyman, who always "ſpent the night with the relations of the deceas'd, and diſcours'd with them about the word of "God, for their inſtruction. They uſed to ſing pſalms by antiphon or verſes, the one anſwering the "other." They recommended the ſoul of the deceaſed to God, and beſought him to preſerve it from hell, &c.

waters in which the ſoul is waſh'd from its ſins; or winds or ice that purify it. As theſe opinions were maintain'd with a ſerious countenance, they thereby impoſed on great numbers of ſimple people. The legend writers and their admirers were undoubtedly ignorant that ſouls don't occupy ſpace, and that indiviſible ſubſtances cannot be ſubject to fire, wind, ice, &c. 'Tis true indeed, that this philoſophy overthrows a numberleſs multitude of fictions, and quite deſtroys the diſcoveries the Monks have made for ſeveral ages in this fairy land. It is moreover true, that ſome * doctors in the laſt age have aſſured us, that purgatory is a ſubterraneous place, ſituated " over the hell of the damn'd, where ſuch ſouls as have not yet made the " full ſatisfaction they owe to divine juſtice for their ſins, are purged by fire, after a " wonderful, and at the ſame time incomprehenſible manner." However, ſuch chriſtians as know the difference between the ſoul and body, will not give credit to this fiction. We grant that ſouls are purged; and that all ſuch chriſtians as die in the fear of the Lord ought to be pray'd for: but then ſouls cannot be puniſh'd after death in the ſame manner as when they continue united to their bodies. The moſt rational idea we can form to our ſelves of purgatory, is, that the ſouls of good men are tormented for a certain time after this life, in order to be purged from thoſe dregs, which hinder them from entring into their eternal country, as the catechiſm of the council of Trent expreſſes it. But it were to no purpoſe to expatiate on a ſubject, of which we cannot poſſibly have the leaſt idea. All we ſhall obſerve in this place, is, that one part of the heathens, particularly the followers of Plato's philoſophy, believed that ſouls were purify'd by fire after the deſtruction of their bodies. Plato in one of his dialogues, ſeems to acknowledge a tribunal, where ſuch ſouls as in their life-time had been guilty of ſlight ſins, ſhall in the other world be condemn'd to finite pains, proportionable to the crimes they may have committed. The reader may ſee a full account of the ſentiment of that great philoſopher in the margin; 'tis to a learned † Jeſuit that we are indebted for it. The Eaſt-Indians look upon the circulation of ſouls in different bodies, as ‡ a kind of purgatory; an opinion which their anceſtors had borrowed from the Egyptians, from whom the antient heathen philoſophers had taken it. We might be much more copious on this ſubject of purgatory, and ſuch of the heathen ſentiments as have a relation to that doctrine, could it be inſerted in ſuch a diſſertation as this without affectation; but this we ſhall leave to the doctors and the learned: 'tis alſo their duty to defend them againſt the attacks of the hereticks, who are continually reproaching the catholicks that their purgatory is an in-

† Father Mourques in the eleventh letter of his theological plan. " The ſoul of every man is " judged immediately upon its quitting the body; there are ſome ſouls, but theſe, alas! are very few, " who are intirely ſound and healthy, and have nothing to fear from this tribunal; all the reſt " were ſick, ſome whereof were nevertheleſs capable of cure, and the others incurable. The healthy " ſouls wing their flight to the Elyſian fields, the region of liberty, where they are freed from all " their evils: here they complete their purification, which takes up a thouſand years. In order to " know what becomes of them afterwards, we muſt diſtinguiſh ſuch as muſt return into the world, " according to the decrees of fate, and thoſe who have ended their deſtin'd progreſs ——. When " the former are healed of all their illneſſes, by medicines of a very violent nature, ſome of them " go into the Elyſian fields, others go and continue to animate freſh bodies, which they are indiſ- " penſably obliged to do, not having yet run their race. But loſt and abandon'd ſouls, i. e. thoſe " which are charg'd with unpardonable crimes, are never ſuffer'd to go out of Tartarus." Vide the deſcription which Virgil has given of the purification of ſouls, after the deſtruction of the body, in his 6th Æneid.

invention of prieſtcraft; that it has given riſe to a numberleſs multitude of ſuperſtitious cuſtoms, and mortuary ceremonies, all under a maſk of piety, but in reality of no manner of uſe in religious matters, tho at the ſame time very well adapted to ſooth the avarice of the clergy, and to keep a numberleſs multitude of fearful chriſtians in ſubjection. It muſt be own'd that the ſcandal which has accrued to religion, by the groſs ſuperſtitions of paſt ages, and the pretended revelations of ſome ignorant and knaviſh friars, have afforded but too ſtrong a handle to the reproaches of thoſe who have withdrawn themſelves from the unity of the church. Would it be poſſible for us to read without indignation, the frequent apparitions of thoſe ſouls which return'd back into the world about ſix or ſeven hundred years ago; ſome with * their ſkins burnt, and others worm-eaten: of that † body which roſe from the dead in order to preſerve to St. Staniſlaus the poſſeſſion of an inheritance which he had acquir'd, for his church; and that the ſaint, in return, deliver'd him out of purgatory? Of ſeveral thouſand ſouls, who came and complained to their relations, how that for want of a ſufficient number of maſſes, they ſuffered very cruel torments in this place of purification? In fine, may we not juſtly conſider as an object of ſcandal, that bull in form of a theſis of the Carmelites, which every ſaturday takes both them and their brethren out of purgatory? thoſe ‡ ample powers diſtributed under the pontificate of Leo X. by which ſouls were to be delivered out of purgatory for money? and the order which pope Clement VI. preſumed to give the || angels to waft ſuch ſouls directly to paradiſe, as had gain'd the Jubilee publiſh'd by his holineſs? This order, if we may credit Cornelius Agrippa, in his treatiſe of the vanity of Sciences, was extant in his time at Vienna, and elſewhere.

To return to the ceremonies uſed at funerals. All ſuch prieſts, and eccleſiaſticks as die, are cloth'd in habits ſuitable to their rank, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel. Another cuſtom which relates to the miniſters of the church, is, that the corps of clergymen are carried to the grave by the clergy, in the ſame manner as that of a layman is carried by the laity. An eccleſiaſtick does not put on mourning for a relation, nor accompany him to the grave with the other relations; but walks with the reſt of the clergy in their ſacerdotal veſtments. The proteſtant clergy have not thought proper to follow this cuſtom.

The Ceremony of bleſſing † CHURCH-YARDS.

Church-yards are generally us'd for interment, for which reaſon the church bleſſes them ſolemnly, in manner following. This ceremony muſt be perform'd by a biſhop, or ſome prieſt appointed by him. The (†) eve before the day on which the bleſſing is to be perform'd, a (‡) wooden croſs, of the height of a man, muſt be ſet up in the middle of the church-yard: before the croſs a piece of wood muſt be plac'd, about ſixteen inches high, or thereabouts; on this piece of wood three tapers are plac'd, when the bleſſing is perform'd. The next morning, before the ceremony begins, a carpet muſt be ſpread in the church-yard near the croſs; and the ſeveral things neceſſary for the bleſſing of the place muſt be got ready, viz. holy water, the thuribles, the tapers, &c. Then the prieſt, being clothed † Cemitery is a Greek word, ſignifying a place of ſleep; becauſe according to the ſtyle of the old and new teſtament, the faithful don't die, but ſleep. Hence the origin of the name which the primitive chriſtians gave to the places in which they bury'd their dead. (†) Alet's ritual.

(‡) Or, according to the Romiſh pontifical, five muſt be ſet up, viz. four at the ſeveral angles of the church-yard, and one in the middle.

cloathed in his ſacerdotal veſtments, ſhall come out of the ſacriſty in proceſſion, i. e. with an exorciſt, or acolyth, carrying holy water; another the thurible; two clerks, carrying the ritual, and three tapers, made of white wax; the whole choir, walking two and two: afterwards the officiating prieſt advances forward, as was obſerved in the other ceremonies.

Being come to the church-yard, they range themſelves round the croſs, or croſſes, if there are ſeveral, when the officiating prieſt makes a || little diſcourſe to the aſſiſtants, on the holineſs, the privileges, and freedom of church-yards. After this three tapers are lighted up before that croſs which ſtands in the middle; and if there be one at each angle of the church-yard, three are alſo lighted up before each of theſe. Afterwards the officiating prieſt riſes up, repeats a prayer, which is followed by the chaunting of the litanies; and at the repeating theſe words, We beſeech you to purify and bleſs this church-yard, he makes the ſign of the croſs: He does the ſame a ſecond time, when he repeats them for the ſanctification of the church-yard; and a third, in  repeating them for the conſecration. The litanies being ended, the officiating prieſt ſprinkles the middle croſs with holy water; and whilſt an anthem and the Miſerere are ſung, he goes round the church-yard, and ſprinkles it with holy water. He afterwards takes one of the lighted tapers which ſtood at the foot of the croſs, and ſets it on the top of it; takes the other two, and ſets them on the two arms of the croſs. At laſt the whole ceremony ends with incenſing and ſprinkling theſe croſſes thrice with holy water.

If a church-yard, which has been thus conſecrated, ſhould afterwards be polluted by any indecent action, or profan'd by the burial of an infidel, a heretick, an excommunicated or unbaptiz'd perſon, it muſt be reconcil'd; and the ceremony of the reconciliation is perform'd with the ſame ſolemnity as that of the bleſſing.

The antient canons did not allow of the burying a corps in the church-yard, but a cuſtom was inſenſibly introduc'd of interring ſuch perſons only as were diſtinguiſh'd for their holineſs: then the emperors themſelves were never buried but at the church-doors; the † inſide was reſerv'd for our Saviour, and his ſaints; however the ſaints were ſuffer'd to lie a long time without company. A great number of ‡ chriſtians, either thro' fear of what was to come hereafter, or for their own ſecurity, deſir'd to be interr'd near them, as they hop'd to be ſcreen'd from the puniſhments due to them by the merits of thoſe, who, to uſe the words of St. Maximus, have made themſelves formidable to hell. Afterwards they allow'd not only ſuch of the clergy as had led exemplary lives to be buried in the church, but likewiſe thoſe who were remarkable for nothing but the dignity to which they had been rais'd. At laſt the laity themſelves were receiv'd there indifferently, as is now the cuſtom.

'Tis likewiſe affirm'd, that the primitive chriſtians would not ſuffer the bodies of the heathens to be interr'd near thoſe of the chriſtians, and 'tis from this cuſtom that hereticks and infidels are buried in unconſecrated ground. The primitive church preſerv'd for a long time the order enacted by the twelve tables, of (*) having the burial-places without the city; which laudable and uſeful cuſtom does not ſeem to have been infring'd till the reign of Theodoſius the emperor. Others are of opinion that it began under the pontificate of Gregory the great. Be this as it will; as the tranſlation of the relicks of the holy martyrs being very common at that time, and the devotion of the age having already granted leave for the burying chriſtians near the bodies of thoſe who were diſtinguiſh'd for the ſanctity of their lives; 'tis very probable, that ſovereign princes ſoon allow'd the having church-yards in cities.

Ceremonies relating to BURIAL.

Man does not always conſider death as a ſtate of humiliation, tho nothing can be more mortifying than to be ſtript of a body, which, by the diſſolution of its ſeveral parts, is decreed to be the food of worms, and to be trodden under foot like the duſt of the earth, after having been the inſtrument of his pleaſures, his paſſions, and his voluptuouſneſs; after having been the cauſe of the moſt ſurpriſing revolutions, and of the moſt difficult and ingenious actions that can enter into imagination. However, all theſe reflections are not ſtrong enough to abate his pride; he is too much elated to prevail with himſelf to go ſilently to a kind of annihilation: and indeed we meet with very few who are not deſirous of being remembred by poſterity; and the leaſt of a man's ambition is to live ſome time after he has left this world in the memory of his fellow-citizens, by the pomp of his interment. But theſe things do in reality very ill compenſate the loſs of life: however, ſince the law which has decreed all men to die is inevitable, we muſt ſeek for ſuch objects in death as may flatter our vanity, proportionable to the part we have acted on this ſtage of life. If, to borrow the expreſſions of a great poet, the * titles of ſovereigns of the earth, arbiters of peace, &c. periſh with thoſe who in their life-time made the whole world tremble, they endeavour to preſerve all their haughtineſs in their monuments, and their ſubjects ape them in it as near as poſſible: but both ſovereign and ſubject act in this manner, purely to compenſate for the little duration which nature has granted to man; at the ſame time that inanimate beings, or ſuch as are endu'd only with a vegetative life, have a much longer term allotted them than the moſt excellent of all created beings.

Such are the complaints of thoſe who don't ſee any thing in man but what is inferior to the reſt of created beings; and who only conſider him as a portion of matter expos'd continually to the different changes it is forc'd to undergo, becauſe of the different contexture of its parts; but who cannot conceive any thing beyond this. 'Tis certain, that the life of man is very ſhort; but would it be a very agreeable one, did it reſemble that of oaks and fir-trees, which wakes the enthuſiaſm of the poet? But a chriſtian argues upon ſounder principles, by ſaying that death is to man a ſtate of penance, a ſatisfaction which God has requir'd at his hands, to atone for his inſult of the divine majeſty by ſin. Agreeable therefore to this idea, we ought to lay aſide the vain pomp of burials, and funeral monuments: and were we but guided by this genuine principle, we ſhould leave no other trophies of our grandeur than prayers and alms. But ſtill vanity would intrude itſelf even in theſe motives, and the eloquence of the clergy would conſecrate them by eternal elogiums. Immortality is as certainly obtain'd by alms, by pious foundations, and particularly by thoſe legacies which charitable perſons bequeath to friars, prieſts, and convents, as by military exploits; the virtues of civil life, or brightneſs of genius.

The common cuſtom is to keep a corps four and twenty hours, but in ſome countries they are kept five or ſix days, particularly in Holland, where they are often kept ſeven. Here follow the ceremonies ordain'd by the rituals to thoſe who are allow'd * chriſtian burial. Theſe cuſtoms vary in certain circumſtances; but in general, when the time is come for the corps to be carried to church, notice thereof muſt be given by the tolling of a bell, to the prieſts, and other clergymen, who are to aſſiſt at the funeral, to aſſemble in proper order, cloth'd in their ſacerdotal veſtments, (their ſurplices and ſquare caps) in the pariſh, or any other church, where they pray. After this the rector ſhall put his black ſtole and chaſuble over his ſurplice, when they all ſet out to the houſe where the corps lies; the exorciſt carrying the holy water walks firſt, next the croſs-bearer, afterwards the reſt of the clergy, and laſt of all the officiating prieſt: and in this order they all ſet out towards the houſe of the deceas'd, whoſe corps muſt be either ſet at the church-door, or in ſome † apartment near it, with his feet turn'd towards the ſtreet, which the rituals ſay muſt be obſerved, tho the deceas'd were a prieſt. We muſt not omit, that the coffin is ſurrounded with four or ſix lighted tapers of yellow wax, in as many large candleſticks. When the clergy is come to the houſe where the corps lies, the croſs-bearer ſets himſelf, if poſſible, at the head of it; the officiating prieſt over-againſt him, at the feet; the perſon who carries the holy water, a little behind the officiating prieſt, at his right-hand; and the other perſons of the choir range themſelves on each ſide, obſerving to ſtand nearer or farther off from the officiating prieſt, in proportion to their rank in the church. Every thing muſt be order'd in this manner, provided there be room for it, for it often happens, that the croſs ſtands at the door, on that ſide where the funeral is to go; and that the choir are oblig'd to range themſelves in two lines, in order to leave room for the officiating prieſt. During this the tapers and torches of yellow wax are lighted, and given to thoſe who are appointed to carry them.

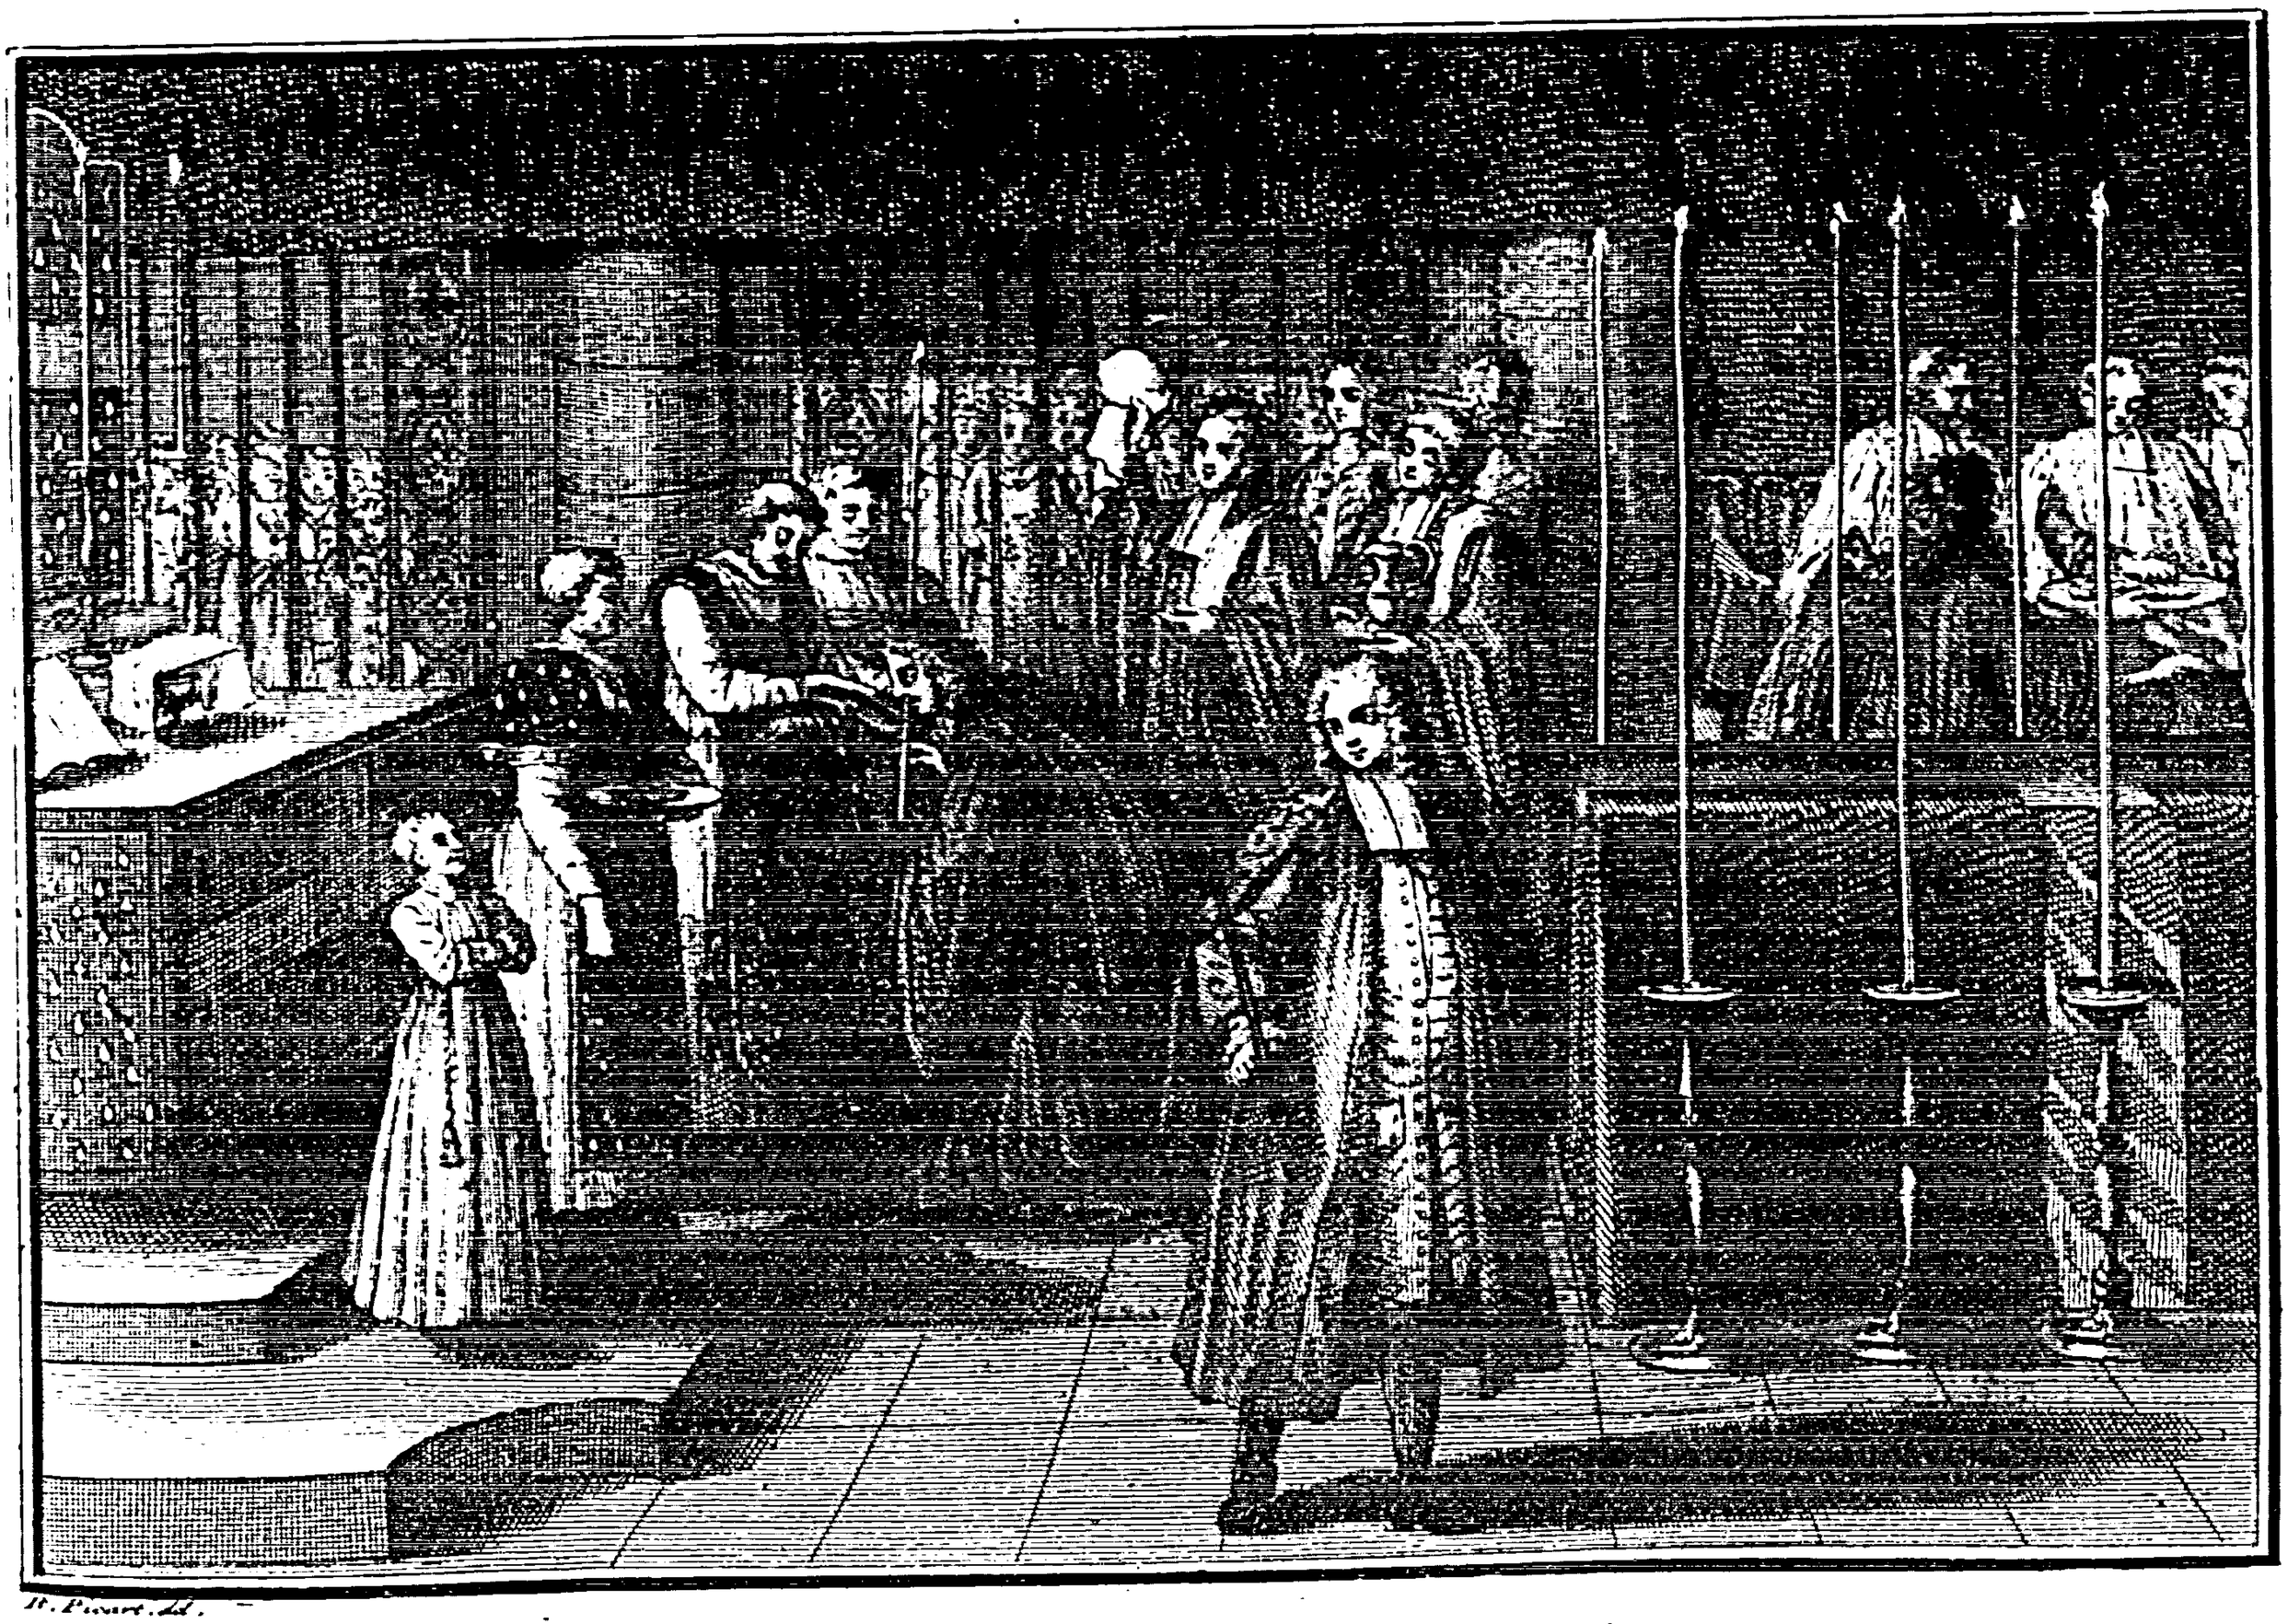
* Chriſtian burial is not allow'd to Jews, apoſtates, infidels, hereticks, ſchiſmaticks, perſons excommunicated, or under an interdict; to thoſe who having ſtruck a clergyman have not made ſatisfaction for it before their death; to ſuicides, or ſuch as loſt their lives in duels; to blaſphemers, or ſuch as have committed any enormous crime: laſtly, to thoſe who have not follow'd the injunctions of the church, with regard to confeſſion and communion.

† It was cuſtomary among the Greeks and Romans to ſet the corps in the entry of the houſe, with their feet turn'd towards the door; and as both theſe nations, as well as the Jews, thought that the living were polluted by touching the dead, a veſſel of holy water was always plac'd at the door, to ſprinkle thoſe who either went in or came out of the houſe.



The cuſtom of carrying lighted tapers at funerals began among chriſtians, after that peace was reſtor'd to the church; or rather, it was then renewed by the chriſtians, having before been a practice among the Romans. As chriſtians diſtinguiſhed themſelves in all things as much as poſſible from the heathens, they probably rejected this cuſtom as long as they continued under the yoke of Paganiſm; not to mention that chriſtians, during the ages of perſecution, were not allow'd to bury their dead with pomp. The doctors of the church, to give the greater ſanction to this cuſtom, tell us, that the torches and tapers lighted on theſe occaſions, denote ‡ faith operating with charity, in which it is preſum'd the perſon died. This idea might in ſome meaſure agree with the origin which a  proteſtant writer gives of this cuſtom, or rather one of the †† ſaints of the church before him. "The "lamps lighted at funerals, ſays St. Chryſoſtom, ſignify that we accompany the "deceas'd like ſo many generous champions." For it was uſual among the Greeks to attend upon their victorious warriors with lighted torches and tapers.

The officiating prieſt ſtanding before the croſs turn'd towards the body, the officer who carries the holy water preſents him the ſprinkler, when the prieſt ſprinkles the corps thrice in the ſame part, without ſaying a word. Then giving him back the ſprinkler, he begins a proper * anthem, but does not repeat it, becauſe two choriſters begin immediately to chaunt the pſalm De profundis, whence this anthem is taken. The two ſides of the choir conclude it alternately, ſtanding oppoſite to one another; and at laſt the following words are pronounced: Requiem æternam dona ei, Domine, & lux perpetua luceat ei; i. e. O Lord, give the deceas'd eternal reſt, and may thy everlaſting light ſhine upon him. After this the anthem Si iniquitates is again repeated; and the officiating prieſt goes on with another, viz. Exultabant Domino oſſa, &c. which likewiſe is not repeated. Immediately two choriſters begin the Miſerere, which the clergy continue to chaunt alternately. This being done, the proceſſion ſets out towards the church, in the following manner.

† The taper-bearers walk firſt, then the ſeveral fraternities of laymen, in caſe there be any; afterwards the clergy, two and two, at a ſuitable diſtance; before whom the perſon walks who carries the holy water, and the croſs-bearer. But the plate, repreſenting a funeral as ſolemniz'd at Paris, is ſomething different from the deſcription given above. Herein we ſee ſeveral children of the hoſpital of the foundlings at the head of the proceſſion, with each a taper in his hand; and afterwards the croſs-bearer, and next the clergy, all of them carrying lighted tapers. The officiating prieſt walks laſt, immediately before the corps. All theſe are cover'd, not excepting the croſs-bearer, and the officer who carries the holy water. They all ſing the Miſerere, and ſome other pſalms, if it be neceſſary; and at the end of each pſalm the Requiem is ſung. This cuſtom of ſinging at funerals is as old as that of carrying torches at them, as appears from ſeveral paſſages in the writings of the fourth and fifth centuries, which it would be needleſs to cite. The Greeks and Romans us'd to ſing alſo at their funerals; but what affinity ſoever there may appear between theſe cuſtoms and ours, they nevertheleſs did it from different motives. Among us pſalms and anthems are ſung for ſouls departed; whereas thoſe people us'd to ſing the Elogiums of their dead, and intermix them with || complaints and regrets. mentations were heightned with flutes and trumpets, ſounding mournfully. (‡) The relations of the deceas'd, and ſome of his friends, us'd to call him with a loud voice, and in a kind of recitative. We ſhall however obſerve, that there were a kind of ſingers among the Romans whoſe buſineſs was to ſing certain * ſongs, the ſubject whereof is not well known; but we may preſume it was intended to promote the felicity of the departed ſoul, ſince thoſe antient heathens were of opinion, that the † harmony of muſick made ſouls find out the paths of heaven more eaſily. Farther, the funeral-ſongs of the antients were of three kinds: during the proceſſion ſome were ſung in praiſe of the dead, and to deplore his loſs. Then they ſung at the pile: and laſtly, while the aſhes were taking up, perſons hir'd for that purpoſe, us'd to ſing a kind of prayer with a loud voice, to which the people made reſponſes; and ‡ this mournful concert between the people and the hir'd ſingers, continu'd till ſuch time as all the aſhes were got together. Then the whole aſſembly was diſmiſs'd by the word ilicet, i. e. go your ways, or rather, you are permitted to go. This is all the conformity that can be found between the funeral-ſongs of the Greeks and Romans, and thoſe of the Chriſtians.

It appears, that in St. Jerom's time the clergy were enjoin'd to aſſiſt at the burial of chriſtians with tapers in their hands, and to ſing hymns in their honour, and for their ſakes.

The corps follows immediately after the clergy, carried in the manner exhibited in the plate; and ſeveral children, belonging to the hoſpital of the foundlings, with torches in their hands, walking on each ſide of it. Then come the relations of the deceas'd, in long mourning cloaks; afterwards the friends: and laſtly, all thoſe who had any eſteem for the deceas'd, follow the proceſſion. In ſome, both Proteſtant and Romiſh countries, women alſo aſſiſt at burials, and walk after the men: which was likewiſe the cuſtom among the antients; but there was a law among the Grecks, by which all women under ſixty were forbid to aſſiſt at them. But it appears, that among the Romans, their women us'd to aſſiſt at their funerals, ſince the ſhe-relations and friends of the deceas'd uſed to make moſt of the preparations for the funeral. As to the mourning, a ſon, or next heir, &c. was clothed with a long black or very  dark-grey robe, which anſwers almoſt to our wearing long mourning cloaks. The ſons of the deceas'd us'd to walk with their heads cover'd, but the daughters with their heads bare, and their hair all diſhevell'd.

When the proceſſion is got to the church-door, Requiem is ſaid; and they begin again the anthem which begins with theſe words, Exultabunt Domino oſſa humiliata. Being come into the church, they ſing a †† Reſponſe, which is begun by one or two choriſters, and is carried by thoſe of the choir alternately, in order that the ſaints and angels may take the ſoul of the deceas'd to their care, and preſent it to God.

In performing the ſervice for the dead, the corps, if the deceas'd was a clergyman, is ſet in the choir; but in the nave, if he was a layman. The prieſts have their heads turn'd towards the altar. Alet's ritual ‡‡ ſays, " that the faces of deceas'd " laymen muſt be turn'd towards the altar, when they are plac'd in the church, and

" thoſe of the clergy towards the people; to ſhew, with regard to the former, that " in this laſt paſſage, they ought to go to God by Jeſus Chriſt; and with reſpect to " the latter, that being united to him by their miniſtry, they behold the people, " by continuing their care for their ſalvation, even after their death." Round the corps four lighted tapers, at leaſt, muſt be ſet; but eight are exhibited in the plate, which repreſents the corps ſtanding in the choir. As to the ſervice for the dead, we cannot oblige our readers better therein than by giving an abſtract of what is ordain'd in Alet's ritual upon that head. The order and the ceremony differ according to the various regulations eſtabliſh'd in different dioceſſes; but theſe are of too little conſequence to be taken notice of here. The corps being plac'd either in the choir, or nave of the church, " the croſs-bearer puts himſelf at its head, and " the officiating prieſt at its feet, but not directly in the middle, when they are " turn'd towards the altar: the clergy range themſelves on each ſide, in much the " ſame order as in the plate, with their faces turn'd towards each other; and thoſe " of the loweſt order in the church ſtand neareſt the croſs." —— After having ſaid the * office of the dead, maſs is ſaid, if the time will permit it, with the ceremonies ſuitable to the maſſes of the † dead. After maſs the officiating prieſt, preceeded by the incenſe-bearer, the officer who carries the holy water, the croſs-bearer, the taper-bearers, and the choir, advances towards the corps. He firſt reads the prayer, which begins with theſe words, non intres in judicium, &c. i. e. enter not into judgment, &c. After this the choriſters begin the Libera, which is continued by the choir; then the officiating prieſt ſays the Pater-Noſter, &c. aloud, and the choir repeats it with a low voice. This being done, the deacon preſents the ſprinkler to the officiating prieſt, " who ſprinkles the corps thrice with holy water, obſerving to begin " on its right, i. e. on the goſpel-ſide; namely, at the feet, at the middle, " and at the head. —— Having ſprinkled one ſide, he goes to the other—and " ſprinkles the corps thrice, on the other ſide, namely at the head, the middle, and " the feet. —— He then returns the ſprinkler to the deacon, who gives him the " thurible. —— He incenſes thrice the body on one ſide, and as often on the other, " in the ſame manner as it had been ſprinkled." The rituals inform us, that the incenſe denotes the charity which the church has for the deceas'd. The incenſing being ended, the prayer, Deus, cui proprium eſt miſereri, &c. is offer'd up, in which the officiating prieſt beſeeches God to command the unbodied ſpirits to take the ſoul of the deceas'd into their charge, and to conduct it to heaven.

The prayer being ended, the corps is carried to the grave, in the ſame order that it was brought. The officiating prieſt immediately covers himſelf, as do alſo thoſe of the choir, at their going out of church: the ſingers begin an ‡ anthem, which the choir continues very ſlow as they walk, and which they repeat over again after it is ended, in caſe it be neceſſary; as for inſtance, if the church-yard where the corps is to be buried is at a conſiderable diſtance from the church. Some pſalms may likewiſe be added, to lengthen it out; the whole with the utmoſt gravity, and on that tone, which, in the Breviaries and Rituals, is called right. Being come to the grave, the whole company pull off their hats, and draw up in much the ſame order as at church. The bearers lay the corps near the grave, with its feet turn'd towards the eaſt, it being affirm'd that our Saviour was buried in that manner. Be this as it will, this cuſtom was long in uſe before the age of venerable Bede, who mentions mentions it in his works. The deceas'd, ſet in this poſition, looks towards the eaſt on high, on him who is the ſovereign Creator of all things. But we ſhall obſerve, that the cuſtom of ſetting the corps of the dead with their faces towards the eaſt, was generally practis'd among the antient Greeks, tho they ſeem to have made ſome exceptions to this rule, the Athenians ſetting their faces towards the weſt. If the corps be buried in the church, its feet muſt be turn'd towards the altar; but thoſe of prieſts muſt have their heads turn'd, in the manner above-mention'd.

After the body has been laid on the brink of the grave, the officiating prieſt bleſſes it by a prayer, in which he makes the general commemoration of the dead who are interr'd in that ſepulchre. The prayer being ended, he again ſprinkles and incenſes the body thrice, as alſo the grave. He afterwards begins this anthem, Ego ſum reſurrectio, &c. I am the reſurrection and the life, &c. and concludes with the Requiem. Then the officiating prieſt performs a third time the triple ſprinkling the corps with holy water, but does not incenſe it; which is followed by another prayer, with the anthem ſi iniquitates and the de profundis. The body being laid in the grave, the relations and friends of the deceas'd come, before the earth is thrown into it, and ſprinkle the grave with holy water, in their turns; after which the company condole the relations of the deceas'd in a dumb compliment, as they walk before them, as we ſee repreſented in the plate: which being done, the whole company returns back.

The maſs for the deceas'd being ended, the funeral-ſermon is preach'd. Among the antient Greeks it was never pronounced till the corps was interred; but the Romans varied very much from this cuſtom. The proceſſions, before they were arrived at the pile where the body was to be burnt, us'd to ſtop at the Roſtra, or places whence the orators us'd to harangue the people: then the neareſt relation of the deceas'd, or the perſon who had the greateſt regard for his memory, went up into the Roſtrum, and pronounced an oration in praiſe of the deceas'd. A father us'd to harangue in praiſe of his ſon; a wife in praiſe of her husband. But this ſeems to have been a very ungrateful office, in what light ſoever we conſider it, whether the grief was real or ſpecious. Is it not much more natural that a clergyman ſhould perform this part, as is the cuſtom among us? La Mothe le Vayer tells us in the 137th letter of the ſecond volume of his works in Folio, that the Spaniards never have any ſermons preach'd at their funerals.

Sometimes a corps is buried in a ſeaſon when maſs cannot be ſaid, in which caſe the ceremony is perform'd with much greater ſimplicity; for then the corps is only ſprinkled and incens'd by a prieſt, cloth'd in his black chaſuble, and accompanied with two clerks, the one carrying the croſs, and the other the ſprinkler and the thurible.

The primitive chriſtians obſerved two pretty remarkable cuſtoms with regard to their dead; the firſt was to lay a * green turf, or ſome ſuch thing under their heads, a cuſtom that Durant recommends in his Rationale in theſe words: "Let ivy and "laurel be laid in the coffin under the corps; for thoſe plants which always keep "green, ſignify that ſuch as die in Chriſt, live eternally in him." Another cuſtom which they obſerved, and which ſeems to border upon ſuperſtition †, was, not to lay the bodies of their dead upon one another. However, this cuſtom ſeem'd to be of ſo much conſequence, that a council aſſembled at Mâcon, made a decree for the obſervation thereof. We are likewiſe to obſerve, that in the primitive ages, ſuch as died virgins were buried with crowns and chaplets of flowers. Great perſons, and eccleſiaſticks were buried with the marks of their dignity; and martyrs with the inſtruments which had been employ'd in their martyrdom.

After

After all theſe funeral-honours the officiating prieſt is paid. The poor only are exempted from * this expence: moreover, the rectors are obliged to furniſh the tapers, and every thing that is neceſſary for the burial. Among the Greeks it was cuſtomary to pay for the burial of the dead. Ariſtotle relates, in his OEconomicks, book ii. that for every corps two meaſures of corn and an obolus were given to the prieſteſs of Minerva at Athens. We muſt not forget the ridiculous cuſtom of putting a piece of ſilver into the mouths of the deceas'd, to pay Charon for ferrying them over the Styx. We may naturally ſuppoſe that either the prieſts got this money, or thoſe who ſuper-intended the funeral. Another remarkable cuſtom of the antients, and which is eſtabliſh'd in moſt countries in Chriſtendom, was, to have church-yards apart, for the † poor, and the meaner ſort of people.

Alet informs us ‡ in his ritual, that no one ought to be buried before he has been dead four and twenty hours; but this cuſtom is not ſo general but that it admits of a great many exceptions, in all Romiſh countries, not excepting France, where this ritual was writ. Plato, in his Laws, would have ſuch perſons as die kept three days, agreeable to the cuſtom of the age in which he lived. The Romans kept their dead ſeven days, burnt them the eighth, and buried them the ninth. During the firſt ſeven days they were waſh'd, anointed, kiſs'd, probably out of mere ceremony, wept and bewail'd, and called aloud by their names, which ceremony was call'd Conclamare.

By the ſame ritual, all rectors, curates, and other prieſts, invited to a burial, and the funeral-ſervice of the dead, are forbid to go and dine with thoſe who had appointed the funeral, and for this reaſon, becauſe at theſe kind of entertainments there generally happen things altogether inconſiſtent with the modeſty which a clergyman ought to obſerve in his converſation; which makes the laity loſe the reſpect they ought to have for the dignity of the prieſthood. This is the deciſion of the above-cited ritual.

All civiliz'd nations have thought themſelves indiſpenſably obliged to pay thoſe teſtimonies of reſpect to all who are willing to join with us in our tears, ſhare in our loſſes, and comfort us in our afflictions. An entertainment given in this view does no ways claſh with the laws of good-breeding; but it is ſurpriſing, that very polite nations ſhould formerly, and ſtill continue to make theſe entertainments an occaſion of riot and exceſs. It was cuſtomary among the Greeks to give ſuch funeral-entertainments as had rather the air of joy than mourning. The Romans had their Parentalia, which was perform'd with no leſs ſolemnity or licentiouſneſs: all which, as ‖ Lucian tells us, was done to diſpel the grief of thoſe who ſurvived. (*) The Germans make very expenſive, as well as riotous banquets, for all who are invited to a fu-a funeral: The Dutch have the ſame cuſtom and the ſame abuſes; and neither of them ſcruple to drink to great exceſs on theſe occaſions. Perhaps ſome excuſe might be made for theſe ridiculous cuſtoms.

As to the manner of inviting to burials, 'tis well known that the cuſtom is now to give tickets, and that perſons are employ'd for that purpoſe, clothed in black, to denote the mourning, and the function, for which they are appointed. The antient Romans had alſo perſons appointed for the ſame purpoſe, call'd Deſignatores. Theſe perſons uſed to give notice of the day of burial, and repeated it when the corps was to go to the grave; for it was look'd upon as an indiſpenſable duty, to accompany the corps to the pile or ſepulchre; and the more numerous the company, the more the deceaſed was honoured. Nay, ſo great was their vanity, that they cauſed inſcriptions to be put on their tombs, declaring that their corps was attended with a * great concourſe of people.

We muſt now make ſome mention of the commemoration of the dead. Their memory is ſolemnized the third, the ſeventh, and the thirtieth, not to mention the anniverſary. If we are to give credit to ſome doctors of the church, this inſtitution is of great antiquity; and 'tis certain that ſome writers, cotemporary with Charlemain, mention it as a cuſtom which was then of ſome ſtanding. Be this as it will, the doctors of the church have not omitted to ſeek for the myſtical explication of theſe ceremonies. Theſe tell us, that the ſervice of the third day is for ſins committed in thoughts, words, and actions, againſt God, one's neighbour and one's ſelf; at leaſt, that this ſervice is an emblem of the reſurrection. We may judge by this interpretation, of thoſe which are given for the other ſervices; but without ſubtilizing ſo much, we had better own ingenuouſly, that theſe † commemorations have been piouſly transferr'd from heatheniſm to chriſtianity.

‡ It is order'd that in all church-yards, ſome place muſt be ſet a-part for the burial of ſuch children as died before they came to years of knowledge: it being obſerved, "that the bodies of thoſe little children muſt be conſider'd as ſo many "temples, which had always been inhabited by the Holy Ghoſt; they muſt there-"fore be buried in a place ſeparate from the reſt. The ceremonies obſerved at "their interment are different from thoſe of the adult: we beg of God to pardon "the ſins of the latter; but we thank him for preſerving little children from "the corruption of mankind." The office for theſe conſiſts in prayer, pſalms of praiſe, and thanks to God, for his goodneſs in taking them to himſelf. However, notwithſtanding the great purity of children, ‖ they yet are admitted into paradiſe from the heavenly mercy, and conſequently without meriting it; whereas the adult receive it as a reward for having faithfully fought in the warfare of Chriſt Jeſus, and under his banner. This is ſignified by the croſs which is placed on a long pole at the burial of grown perſons; whereas at thoſe of children, the croſs is carried in a man's hand. Again, maſs may be ſaid over their body, to thank God for his goodneſs to theſe little children, in taking them to himſelf, while they were ſtill in their ſtate of innocence.

Here follows the manner of burying of ſuch children as die after baptiſm: The bell tolls, but in a different manner than at the interment of grown perſons. Neither ſhrouds, black ornaments, nor tapers made of yellow wax muſt be us'd on this occaſion; all the ornaments and tapers muſt be white. The corps muſt be dreſs'd according to the age of the deceaſed, obſerving that it be modeſt; and that a crown of flowers or odoriferous herbs be ſet on its head, as a token of innocence and purity. Four or ſix wax tapers, lighted, muſt be ſet round the coffin. The prieſt who performs the ceremony ceremony of burial, muſt have a white ſtole over his ſurplice; but there is nothing particular in the reſt of the ceremony, except that after the burial of little children, the Libera is not to be ſung in the church-yard, nor any other deprecations for the dead.

As to ſuch children as die unbaptized, they are to be buried in unconſecrated ground, and that becauſe they did not die in communion with the church. As they never were admitted into it, they are not to be pray'd for: as they had not waſh'd out the ſpots of their original ſin by baptiſm, they are look'd upon as excluded from the ſtate of innocence in which ſuch children as are baptized, die. But if it ſhould be aſked, whether thoſe who die unbaptized, are loſt, and muſt fry in hell thro' their parents negligence, or becauſe they were born in a religion which refuſes to acknowledge Chriſt for the ſaviour of the world? I anſwer, no; to ſay otherwiſe would be the higheſt cruelty. They have a place allotted for them, call'd Limbo; where they are to dwell to all eternity. Some writers aſſure us that this Limbo is ſituated in the upper region of hell; but we have only their words for it.

We ſhall conclude this article with obſerving, that almoſt all the heathens both antient and modern, ſeem to have ranſack'd their imaginations for the moſt whimſical ceremonies at the burial of their dead. We ſhall take notice hereafter of the extravagant cuſtoms of the Americans on this head, for the leaſt whimſical whereof we have endeavour'd to account from rational principles. The antient Egyptians gave a kind of immortality to their dead, by their wonderful art of embalming them, the ſecret whereof is now loſt: but the Perſians on the contrary, if we may give credit to ſome hiſtorians, gave their dead a prey to wild beaſts; however, Herodotus tells us that they buried them afterwards, which cuſtom he ſays was peculiar to the Magi: the other Perſians uſed to cruſt their bodies over with wax, in order to preſerve them. But the cuſtom of expoſing their dead to beaſts cannot have been very general, ſince modern travellers take notice of ſeveral magnificent ruins of the monuments of the antient Perſians. Farther, we have the teſtimony of Xenophon in the eighth book of his Cyropædia, not to mention ſeveral other authors, who relate that the Perſians had the cuſtom of burying. The Parthians and Bactrians uſed to caſt their dead to the dogs and birds; the inhabitants of Pontus Euxinus devour'd the bodies of their deceaſed parents; and ſome people of Aſia, did not permit their aged people to die a natural death, but uſed to kill them, in order, as they ſaid, to free them from the infirmities of old age. From this principle, children thought it was a charitable act in them to ſhorten the days of their decrepid parents; and in order to prevent their languiſhing in thoſe diſeaſes with which old age is oppreſs'd, they uſed to ſtab them, and afterwards devour their bodies, imagining they thereby reunited themſelves to thoſe, of whoſe ſubſtance they had made a part, before their birth. The Heruli, as Cælius Rhodiginus, book xvii. lectio. antiq. relates, treated all their aged people, and ſuch as were afflicted with any mortal diſeaſe, after the ſame barbarous manner. The Barcæans expoſed the bodies of their dead to vultures, becauſe the long life of theſe birds was ſome image of eternity; which kind of interment was look'd upon as ſo honourable, that it was indulged only to perſons of merit, none being buried but the meaneſt ſort of people, and ſuch as had lived in obſcurity. Several nations of antiquity uſed to burn their dead, the Greeks for inſtance, and the Romans their imitators: however, there were ſome exceptions to this rule among the latter, and 'tis probable that they had alſo preſerved the cuſtom of burying the dead without burning them. This practice was obſerv'd by the family of the Cornelii, however Sylla order'd that his * body ſhould be burnt after his death, for fear the Romans ſhould treat it in the ſame manner as he had done Marius. The Greeks likewiſe varied from from this rule; for Themiſtocles and Braſidas, both Grecian generals, were buried. 'Tis very probable that all the above-mention'd nations uſed firſt to bury their dead; it being the moſt rational, moſt natural practice, and moſt worthy of human nature: but in proceſs of time mankind, from a peculiar delicacy, intermix'd with ſuperſtition, of which they are but too fond, thought proper to burn dead bodies, either to purge or diſincumber them of all their groſs and terreſtrial particles; for, in their opinion, fire wafts the divine part of man to heaven, and leaves his impure and corruptible part behind on earth. One would think they were diſcourſing about a diſtillation or ſeveration of the elements, like to thoſe of our modern chymiſts. We ſhall here omit the various methods of burning the dead and the living along with them, it being our deſign to take notice of them in the ſequel.

It was antiently a cuſtom among ſeveral nations to throw their dead into the water, ſome in lakes, and others in ponds; ſome again in rivers, and others in the ſea. All thoſe ridiculous cuſtoms were founded on ſome reaſon or other, tho certainly very whimſical ones; probably thoſe people might therein follow the opinion of Thales, who look'd upon water as the principle of all things; or perhaps they might pretend that the waters into which they threw their dead, purged them from the filth they had contracted in this life. Here follows a cuſtom ſtill more fantaſtical, and as unworthy the dignity of human nature. The inhabitants of Colchis, and the Tibarenians, uſed to hang their dead upon the branches of trees in their woods and foreſts, firſt ſowing them up in ox-ſkins; but the antient Goths uſed to do their princes the honour to hang them up without all this pomp, as poſſibly thinking it ſavour'd too much of vanity. Cælius Rhodiginus tells us in his 17th book, ch. xix. that it was a cuſtom for the Troglodites to make their dead up in a bundle, thruſting their head between their legs, and afterwards tying them together with a rope, when carrying them into the fields, they there left them a prey to wild beaſts. The Sabæans threw their dead, not excepting their kings, among the filth upon the dunghils. Perhaps the greateſt part of theſe Barbarians might ſay with Mæcenas, ſepelit natura relictos, i. e. nature takes care to bury the dead; but unhappily for that Wit of antient Rome, 'tis a falſe thought. The people of the Baleares, now Majorca and Minorca, who were not altogether ſo barbarous, uſed to cut the bodies of their dead to pieces, and afterwards put them up in earthen pots. The Phrygians uſed to lay the bodies of their prieſts upon high pillars, whether it were to denote that the prieſts are ſuperior to other men, or to teach them that they ought to ſerve for examples, even after their death. The Naſamonians uſed to clothe their deceaſed warriors and captains in white; and inſtead of burying them afterwards, always laid them in rocks and deſarts. The Macrobii, a people of Africa, uſed to encruſt their dead with parget, or plaiſter, and ſhut them up in pillars of glaſs; theſe they kept in this kind of monument, and there offer'd them their firſt fruits: but this cuſtom is not altogether ſo ridiculous as it appears at firſt ſight; it being follow'd not only by the people who border'd on the Nile, but we are even aſſur'd that thoſe of Alexandria, ſhew'd the relicks of Alexander the great in a glaſs ſhrine; and perhaps 'tis to thoſe people that we owe the invention of our modern ones. It muſt indeed be own'd, that with regard to religious inventions, the mind of man does not want any models to ſet it at work. Such as ſerve God wholly by exterior practices, are ever fruitful in new ſhifts. Theſe applaud themſelves for it, and they flatter themſelves they ſhall draw down the bleſſing of the almighty, and the protection of the ſaints by this kind of ſervice, more than by a punctual obſervation of all the duties of religion. We ſhall conclude with ſome obſervations upon graves and ſepulchres.

All nations are unanimous in ſhewing reſpect to theſe laſt habitations of the living, if I may be allow'd this expreſſion; thoſe who violated them, were look'd upon as infamous famous and ſacrilegious wretches, and very ſevere laws were enacted againſt them. The Greeks and Romans had them in equal horrour, as may be ſeen in the works of thoſe who have made collections on this ſubject, particularly Cælius Rhodiginus, who has collected ſeveral curious articles upon this head. The burying of their enemies was alſo thought a debt due to decency and humanity, particularly the latter; for, according to the heathen theology, thoſe who remain'd unburied could not croſs the river Styx, but were oblig'd to ramble up and down for an hundred years about the borders of it, before they could be ferry'd over. Thus thoſe who met with an unburied corps, were obliged to throw a little earth upon it, by which means it was at laſt completely buried. 'Tis alſo to this opinion that the Cenotaphias or empty monuments, which were made for ſuch whoſe bodies could not be found, owe their original. If to theſe Cenotaphias we add the devotion of nine days, which undoubtedly were made for thoſe for whom thoſe empty monuments were deſign'd; the Vicennalia, or games celebrated every twenty years; the Tricennalia, exhibited every thirty years; and the anniverſaries; we may be ſure that the zealots among the heathens, thought they had done all that could contribute to the repoſe and conſolation of the deceaſed. They likewiſe had the cuſtom of ſurrounding, or as others call it, crowning the graves with greens, as for inſtance with hyacinths and amaranths, &c. the verdure of which plants was a ſymbol of eternity.

VI. MARRIAGE.

The Romiſh church defines marriage to be * a ſacrament inſtituted by our Saviour, to eſtabliſh a holy alliance between man and woman, in order that they may bring up the children who ſhall ſpring from it, in his fear and love. This definition however agrees with the chriſtian religion only. The above-cited ritual adds, « that the end of the ſacrament of marriage is, that man and wife may mutually « help and comfort each other, in order that they may ſpend this life in a holy « manner, and thereby gain a bleſſed immortality; and to contribute to the edifica- « tion of the church, by the lawful procreation of children; and by the care of « procuring them a ſpiritual regeneration, and an education ſuitable to it." All this is the reverſe of the carnal and ſelf-intereſted views of moſt perſons who enter into the married ſtate. But an unbeliever will ſay, man is created with a carnal appetite; why therefore ſhould not ſuch as are unable to conquer the ſtimulations of the fleſh, endeavour to ſatisfy them in marriage? 'Tis certain that the procreation of children is the firſt object of that mutual inclination which God hath implanted in both ſexes: however this act is heightned with ſome pleaſure; and let an agent in this commerce be ever ſo chaſte, 'tis certain his mind is no way fix'd upon heaven while he is endeavouring to propagate his kind. We don't find there is any prohibition to this pleaſure, whenever it may be lawfully enjoy'd. We daily have examples of numbers of looſe young fellows who have wives given to them, purely to engage them to quit their unlawful pleaſures. We might ſay farther, that a perſon is not abſolutely forbid to try to make his fortune by marriage, provided that procreation, the chief matrimonial duty, be duly attended to at the ſame time; but it were needleſs to inquire into a topick which is properly the province of the caſuiſt. We ſhall likewiſe omit thoſe counſels and devout prayers, which according to the directions of our ſpiritual guides, ought to be offer'd up by all perſons, before they enter into wedlock; but few people carry their piety ſo far. The idea which ſuch as are acquainted with marriage only in ſpeculation, form to themſelves of it, has ſo little either of gravity and ſerioufneſs in it, that we ſhall ſcarce meet with one in a thouſand, who would not think he was rallied, were he adviſed to

to pray to God; to meditate on the duties of the conjugal life, or to conſult with pious people before they enter'd into that ſtate. A young fellow who is juſt upon the brink of marriage, has no ſuch ſpiritual thoughts, and can ſcarce find time to trouble his head about devotion. Can any thing poſſibly interfere more with thoſe charms which Hymen preſents his votaries with at their firſt ſetting out, to the pleaſures he then offers them; to thoſe delights which are always made inſeparable from the divine precepts; precepts which were given to man for the propagation of his kind? A † ſpiritual director requires farther, that every perſon before he enters into wedlock, ought "to beſeech God to join him with ſuch a perſon, as he may "work out his ſalvation with; to examine whether or no the perſon he has "pitch'd his affections upon, has the fear of God before her eyes, if ſhe be "prudent, diſcreet, and able to take care of a family," &c. We muſt own that ſuch reflections as theſe are pious and beautiful; but they are far from entering into the heads of young perſons who are going to tye the indiſſoluble knot.

Perſons before they marry are generally betroth'd to one another, i. e. both parties promiſe reciprocally, in preſence of their relations and friends, to take each other for man and wife; after this the marriage articles are ſign'd, and by virtue of ſuch an engagement, the contracting parties might, without riſquing their honour, beſtow thoſe mutual endearments on each other, which are now forbid till the marriage knot is tied; did not the perfidiouſneſs of men, and the fickleneſs of the other ſex, make ſome ſtronger tie neceſſary, even in chriſtian countries: and to this, the marriage ceremonies uſed in different parts of the world, as well as the publick and ſolemn engagements by which perſons are obliged to bind themſelves, owe their original. And as the authority of heaven makes an impreſſion on the minds of men, it was thought proper to conſecrate marriage by a religious, ſymbolical, and myſterious form of words, as we ſhall ſhew hereafter. Becauſe of the falſhood and fickleneſs above-mention'd, or perhaps of the diſcovery that is made, after marriage, of certain defects which are inviſible but in a certain point of light, it has been thought proper to ſolemnize marriage immediately after the parties are betrothed; the contrary practice being very repugnant to the purity of the chriſtian religion. Not but it is fitting that perſons who are to ſpend their lives together, and whom our Saviour commands to love as their own fleſh, ſhould be pretty familiarly acquainted with one another: but how difficult is it to reſiſt temptation, or to conſider the perſon to whom we have plighted our troth, as forbidden fruit! Beſides, were long betrothings authoriz'd by the laws, people would inſenſibly make it a cuſtom to ſtop there; ſo that they would perhaps at laſt introduce the commodious practice of taking one another upon trial. But to be ſerious, it muſt be own'd that as religion and reaſon ought to be call'd in at this perilous change of condition, young perſons ſhould reſolve before hand to bear with each other, and to live in ſuch mutual harmony as if they both were perfect beings. In this caſe, the ſhorter the courtſhip the better; nor ſhould either party form too agreeable illuſions, or chimerical difficulties. Perſons who marry with this frame of mind may be very happy, and find a bliſsful tranquillity in family cares.

Here follows ſome other advice given by the rituals, to ſuch as are deſirous of making a chriſtian uſe of marriage. On the wedding day, the parties muſt reflect on the ſtate into which they are going to enter, and beg of God to preſerve their chaſtity in thoſe moments, when, tho a perſon be never ſo pious, the fleſh is victorious over the ſpirit; unleſs, like the quietiſt of * Rouſſeau the poet, the ſpirit ſhould be in prayer, while the body ſtoops to terreſtrial things. They muſt not give into dreſs, vanity, ſenſuality, &c. but 'tis well known that the contrary cuſtom generally prevails, vails, and that young perſons who marry, look on thoſe days preceeding marriage, which are ſpent in luxury and jollity, as the moſt happy. But the aged too are pleaſed with theſe things, which awake paſt pleaſures in their minds; they are fond of that gaiety and pomp which concludes with the joining of two perſons, by which they in ſome meaſure behold themſelves live a ſecond time; and farther, as old people are generally fond of reſpect, they are proud to ſee thoſe who are ſo nearly related to them make a very great figure. Thus do the aged gratify their vanity, in ſoothing that of young people. Could we think, ſuppoſing it were not with this view, that ſome venerable matrons (for old women are famous for being good match-makers) would be prevail'd with to unite together two young perſons? The bride and bridegroom ought to walk together to church with a modeſt and humble air; this religion enjoins, but cuſtom and the practice of the world teach the contrary. The latter are for having them walk with pomp, accompanied with a croud of bridemen, bridemaids, and other young perſons, in order that every thing they caſt their eyes upon may be inferior to themſelves. Laſtly, they oblige both parties to preſent themſelves before the prieſt, out of mere ceremony and pleaſure, wherein religion uſurps privileges that don't belong to it; ſuch is the pomp and pride of perſons who enter into wedlock. The reſt of the bridal day, if we may give credit to our ſpiritual directors, ought to be ſpent with modeſty, nor ought they to indulge in riot and exceſs: but the above-mention'd gentlemen are not enough acquainted with the world to know, that modeſty and ſobriety are impracticable in theſe days of high feſtivity. From the time of giving the bleſſing, to the conducting the married couple to the nuptial bed, luxury muſt triumph; and to ſay the truth, this cuſtom has taken ſuch deep root, that it would be ridiculous to pretend to be ſerious on thoſe occaſions.

* The rituals ordain that marriages be ſolemniz'd on work-days, and that becauſe the mirth and joy that reigns at weddings is inconſiſtent with the devotion ſuitable to ſundays and holidays; they ordain that a prieſt ſhall always be preſent at this ceremony. Banns muſt be publiſh'd thrice before marriage, on three ſundays or holidays ſucceſſively at the parochial maſs, and muſt be publiſh'd in thoſe places where the parties have dwelt a conſiderable time; if the man and woman live in different dioceſes, the banns muſt be publiſh'd at the ſame time in both. The deſign of theſe banns is in order to find out whether the perſons may lawfully marry, which obliges us to take ſome notice of the impediments with regard to that ſtate; theſe are reckon'd fourteen, all which are expreſs'd in the ſix † latin verſes quoted in the margin. The firſt impediment is call'd error; as for inſtance, if a perſon ſhould be ſo far impoſed upon as to be made to marry one perſon, when he intended another. The ſecond, call'd condition, is when a perſon imagines he marries one of a condition ſuitable to his own, and it is afterwards found that ſuch perſon is of a mean and diſhonourable condition. A ‡ ſolemn vow of chaſtity made in any religious order, approved by the church, is likewiſe an impediment, and that becauſe the perſon who has made ſuch vow, contracts a ſpiritual marriage with God. But in caſe a perſon ſhould repent of his vow; if after having made a ſolemn engagement with heaven for ſeveral years, a perſon ſhould find it impoſſible for him to reſiſt the ſtimulations of

of the fleſh, would not marriage be a moſt ſalutary remedy? would there not be leſs guilt in it than in the clandeſtine intrigues of monks and nuns? A perſon who has only made a private vow of chaſtity cannot marry afterwards, without committing a great ſin; but a marriage in this caſe is valid. But when once perſons have made ſuch a vow, they muſt no longer ſollicit their partner, to indulge the procreative faculty; but live together like ſo many angels, and not as perſons of a different ſex. Another impediment is conſanguinity, whereof it were needleſs to ſet down the degrees in this place, nor the alliance comprehended by the impediment cauſed by conſanguinity, nor of the ſpiritual alliance mention'd in the article of baptiſm. Certain crimes are likewiſe an impediment to marriage, ſuch as homicide, adultery, &c. A difference of religion is likewiſe an obſtacle in certain caſes: as for inſtance, an unbaptiz'd perſon, is incapable of contracting marriage with one who was baptiz'd; but the marriage between a roman-catholick and a heretick is valid. Force or violence is alſo an impediment to marriage, ſince it deprives the will of its juſt liberty; ſuch as running away with, or ſtealing a woman. The obſtacle with regard to order, is when a perſon has taken orders. The impediment with regard to tyes, is when one of the partys is already married to ſome other perſon. Impediment with regard to decency, is when a perſon betroth'd to another happens to die, or enters into a religious order, before the marriage is conſummated; in which caſe the ſurviving perſon, or who has not embraced a religious life, is not allow'd to marry with the brother or ſiſter of the other perſon. Impotency is ſo much the greater obſtacle, as procreation is the chief end of marriage: impotency is of two kinds; the one perpetual, the other accidental, or occaſion'd by incantation. As to a perpetual impotency, it is unanimouſly agreed, that it ſhould either be an obſtacle before marriage, or diſſolve it after 'tis contracted. Eunuchs come under this head of perpetual impotency, as alſo thoſe who are invincibly cold by nature. The caſuiſts pronounce ſentence againſt theſe, and againſt an order of huſbands who are in the caſe mention'd by * Petronius. However, theſe caſuiſts and the eccleſiaſtical judges allow three years to this kind of palſy; but then they ſhould grant a reaſonable compenſation to the ſuffering party. Is it juſt and equitable for one to undergo an undeſerved trial, and † after having embraced for many years a mere ſhade, be forced to continue three years longer in a ſtate of life in which virtue is expos'd to the ſtrongeſt temptations? But on the other ſide, they allow aged people, not excepting the decrepid, to marry together; but how greatly does this claſh with the chief end of marriage! And is it not plain that an antiquated fellow who marries, may be juſtly compared to a man who pretends to walk tho he has no ſinews in his legs? But women don't ſcruple to run this diſagreeable riſk; and flatter themſelves they ſhall be able to warm the moſt frozen old age. 'Twould be to no purpoſe to quote to them the example of David, who in vain attempted to preſerve, or rather recover his loſt natural heat, in the embraces of a young woman. 'Tis well known that this is not the deſign of marriage. The Romans, in the time of their republick, had a law call'd Papia Popæa, which was afterwards abrogated by Claudius Cæſar, at a time when their manners were very much corrupted. By this law all perſons upwards of ſixty were forbid to marry. However, ſuch a ſalutary medium might be made uſe of in this caſe as would be more worthy the genuine ſpirit of religion; which is, that old people ſhould be prohibited marrying with young, but at the ſame time be left at liberty to marry perſons of an age ſuitable to their own: thus would marriage be an indiſſoluble union between two perſons of different ſexes, for their mutual comfort and aſſiſtance. Let us wave this inquiry ſince ‡ Sanchez has in ſome meaſure appropriated it to himſelf, ſelf, by his ſkilful and diligent examination of it: we refer to that learned Jeſuit, all who are deſirous of knowing whether barrenneſs ought to be conſider'd and treated as impotency; whether a woman, who in caſe ſhe is made a mother, runs the riſk of loſing her life, ought to be rank'd among the impotent; whether on certain occaſions ſuch natural defects as cauſe an exterior impotency, may be repair'd by violent methods, &c. If that nuptial tie may be diſſolv'd in which both parties were not made for each other, becauſe it has pleaſed nature to be ſometimes over liberal, and at other times too ſparing. In this caſe Sanchez informs us alſo, and the popes had ſaid the ſame thing before him, that both parties are allow'd to ſeek for better fortune in a ſecond marriage.

As to impotency imputed to ſorcery, it may be cauſed by various methods, which it would not be decent to mention in this place. This kind of ſorcery may be call'd faſcinating a married couple. This faſcination, whoſe virtue is ſuch as to prevent the conſummation of marriage, is perform'd after ſeveral ways: here follows one of them. Take a wolf's pizzle, and the ſkin of a dog or cat; dye it of two or three colours; make it with three or nine knots; ſpit thrice on the duſt, or in one's cap, and mutter over ſome barbarous and obſcure words, whilſt the prieſt is pronouncing his bleſſing on the marriage. However, a man muſt have a good ſtock of faith to give credit to ſuch idle ſtories. Nevertheleſs the rituals ordain, that on theſe occaſions recourſe ſhall be had to prayer and confeſſion, in order to diſſolve the charm of the wicked ſpirit, or his pretended agents; nay, publick prayers may be made in the church, and exorciſms uſed for ſuch perſons as imagine they labour under this faſcination.

Formerly it was a cuſtom to make a publick trial of a perſon's procreative ability, either in preſence of a ſpiritual or ſecular judge, and ſeveral ſurgeons and matrons; but it was aboliſh'd in France in 1677, after having been obſerv'd for near a hundred and twenty years. Juſtinian the emperor had alſo forbid this, and other ſuch cuſtoms enacted for the examining ſuch caſes.

In fine, the rituals teach that the duties of marriage are not to be refuſed, however there are ſome exceptions; among which are thoſe which the ſolemnity of religion requires. The Romiſh maſs-book ordains, that the prieſt muſt enjoin thoſe he marries, to be chaſte in the ſeaſons of prayer, in the days of faſting, and on ſolemn days. * The ſame was enacted among the heathens, and ſuch were rank'd among the profane as approach'd the altars after having ſolemniz'd the myſteries of love. The above-mention'd † rituals inſinuate at the ſame time, that copulation is ſinful when a woman is with child, or when both parties are unable to get children. It muſt be own'd that beaſts inſtruct mankind in this caſe; but to wave this trite obſervation, a famous queen boldly anſwer'd her confeſſor, that beaſts act in this manner becauſe they are beaſts.

The ceremonies of MARRIAGE.

Beſides the age requiſite for marriage, the liberty of contracting, and the publication of the banns, the Rituals require farther, that the perſons to be join'd together in matrimony, ‡ ſhould be ſufficiently inſtructed in the chriſtian doctrine; that they ſhould know the nature of the ſacrament of marriage, its ends, its obligations; and that they ſhould firſt confeſs themſelves, and receive the ſacrament before they join themſelves together together for ever. The prieſt ought to beſeech God that the married couple may acquit themſelves in a holy manner of the duties of marriage, which muſt be celebrated at the high altar, himſelf being clothed in his moſt pompous veſtments.

When the prieſt is got to the altar, he is preceeded by one or two clerks in their ſurplices, as we ſee in the figure repreſenting this ceremony. Theſe clerks carry the holy water pot, the ſprinkler, the Ritual; a little baſon to put the ring in, in order to bleſs it. After having ſaid the prayer for the couple, he advances towards them on the laſt ſtep of the altar; the man ſtanding on the epiſtle and the woman on the goſpel ſide, ſo that the man ſtands at the woman's right hand. The relations and witneſſes ſtand behind them. Then the prieſt aſks the couple their names and ſirnames; which is only a formality, their names being already known to him, by the publication of the banns, and by a certificate confirming the ſame, which the couple are oblig'd to produce at that time. He afterwards addreſſes himſelf to the man and woman ſeparately, in the language of the country, calling them both by their proper names, and aſks the man whether he will have ſuch a one for his wife; and to the woman whether ſhe will have ſuch a one for her huſband. This reciprocal conſent is abſolutely requiſite in this caſe, and without it the marriage would be null. After mutual conſent has been given by expreſly anſwering, yes, or ſome equivalent ſign; the prieſt who before was cover'd, uncovers himſelf, takes the couple by the hand, and making them join hands, ſays, ego jungo vos in matrimonium, &c. that is, I join you together in marriage, &c. At the ſame time he makes the ſign of the croſs towards them, and taking the ſprinkler, ſprinkles them with holy water. This being done he bleſſes the wedding-ring, and ſprinkles it with holy water in the form of a croſs; after which he gives it to the man, who puts it on the wedding-finger of the woman's left hand. This ring is the pledge of the conjugal chaſtity and fidelity which the wife owes the huſband. To all this the prieſt adds ſome prayers, after which follows an exhortation to the married couple, and to the aſſembly, and afterwards maſs.

The married couple are bleſs'd in the following manner, when the woman is a virgin, and has always had the reputation of chaſtity. The prieſt, after the offertory, goes to the foot of the altar, and the married couple make what oblation they think proper; the husband firſt, and the wife afterwards. The prieſt likewiſe repeats ſome prayers, and the ceremony ends with an exhortation to the married couple. The ſubject of this exhortation is on the duties of the conjugal life; the end and deſign of marriage, reciprocal love, &c. after which he ſprinkles them with holy water. Young people are not to inhabit under the ſame roof, or be in company together, except in the preſence of their parents, till ſuch time as they have received the bleſſing of the church. But when this is over, they may go and conſummate the marriage, and taſte thoſe pleaſures which are criminal, when taken without the formalities eſtabliſh'd by the church.

The married couple muſt deſire the prieſt to bleſs the marriage-bed; the ceremony of which act is here repreſented. Among other bleſſings which are ask'd by the mediation of the prieſt who bleſſes the marriage-bed, is the following, that thoſe who are to lie in it may increaſe and multiply. The holy water compleats the ſanctification of the nuptial bed.

Sometimes the married couple are impotent, and imagine that it is owing to ſorcery and incantations, whereof we have already ſpoken. But this is frequently made uſe of as an excuſe by husbands, who are really impotent, or have worn themſelves out by their debauchery.

Et tout cela n'eſt que pour amuſer,
Un peu de tems des eſprits de poupée.

That is, This is contriv'd only to amuſe ſimpletons for ſome time.

A husband muſt be very much puzzled when this is the only ſhift left him to ſave his honour. Every man ought to be acquainted with himſelf, and to know what he is fit for. However, there may be ſome exceptions to this rule: but in general, this pretended ſorcery is no other than a want of ſpirits, an extinction of the natural heat; and in this caſe a man is ſo far from being a R——m, that he is not even a husband of the loweſt order. Be this as it will; in this unhappy ſtate of impotency the prayers of the church have been thought neceſſary. Here follow the formalities which are to be obſerv'd on this occaſion.

The * prieſt muſt begin by exhorting the married couple to put their whole truſt in God.——He ſhall admoniſh them to devote themſelves to prayer till the day appointed by him for the performing of the ceremony: which being come, he ſhall celebrate a maſs upon their account, and in their preſence, when they ſhall fall down on their knees; during which he repeats the prayers and pſalms. In theſe prayers he ſhall exclaim againſt the devil, the author of witchcrafts and ſorcery, and ſhall beſeech heaven to reſtore the married couple their faculties. Laſtly, he ſhall lay his hand on the woman's head, praying that ſhe may be fruitful. The ceremony ends with ſprinkling holy water.

We ſhall here make ſome remarks on the conformity between the cuſtoms of the antients, and thoſe now in uſe among us, with regard to the decorums, the ceremonies, and advantages of this ſtate. We need ſcarce mention the portion or fortune, the cuſtom whereof is of great antiquity, and was eſtabliſh'd among the moſt unciviliz'd nations. The giving a fortune with a woman, is in ſome meaſure the beſtowing money upon her to purchaſe a maſter with, as Euripides obſerves in his Medea. This thought is ſo far from being new, that it is ſunk to mere common place, which the fathers have not forgot to † mention, in their enumerating the advantages of virginity: however, very few young girls are ſo fond of this privilege, as to be prevail'd with to live unmarried. Solon, an antient legiſlator among the Greeks, enacted that a woman's whole fortune ſhould conſiſt in three ſuits of clothes, and a few houſhold-utenſils; and this in order to prevent the motives of conjugal ſociety from being venal. But ſuch a cuſtom would not take place in thoſe countries where a man's whole fortune depends on his wife's portion, without the leaſt regard to her merit and qualities. But here follows a much more ſingular particular. The Greeks look'd upon marriage ſo eſſentially neceſſary to the publick good, that the Lacedemonian women were allow'd to beat and buffet publickly all the old batchelors, once a-year at leaſt; and the anniverſary of this whimſical cuſtom us'd to be celebrated on a very ſolemn feſtival, at the foot of the altars. But theſe very people, who looked upon marriage as one of the foundations of the happineſs of their common-wealth, allow'd two other cuſtoms, both of which interfer'd very much with that domeſtic tranquillity they ſeem'd deſirous of eſtabliſhing, and which is the greateſt pleaſure of a married ſtate. They allow'd of ‡ proſtitutes and concubines, to act in thoſe domeſtic employments which are now given to chamber-maids. Be this as it will; the chriſtian religion has depriv'd husbands of theſe two privileges, and if they pay their tribute to any but their wives, 'tis contrary to its dictates, and the duties it preſcribes to married people; but at the ſame time women gain a very noble privilege thereby, ſince it puts them upon the ſame level

* Alet's Ritual.

† St. Ambroſe declares, that a woman who marries ſells herſelf for a ſlave; nay, he even affirms, that the condition of a ſlave is preferable to that of a wife. "The merit of a ſlave is bought, "whereas a poor young girl is frequently oblig'd to give a good ſum of money to be receiv'd in quality "of a ſlave." But how pretty ſoever this thought may be, it is not very juſt.

level with the other ſex. But this cuſtom is obſerv'd by chriſtians only; for the Heathens, the Turks, and the Jews, uſurp ſuch an authority over women as is not many removes from tyranny.

We omit the ceremonies of the woman's asking her parents conſent, the contract of marriage, and betrothing; theſe particulars being pretty near the ſame antiently as at this time. They likewiſe us'd a ring at marriage, call'd annulus pronubus, or the wedding-ring.

The bride-men and maids us'd to accompany the bride and bridegroom, to do them the greater honour, and to aſſiſt them as counſellors, maſters of ceremonies, and to guard them. The betrothing us'd to be ſpent in feſtivity and mirth. They us'd to viſit, compliment, and congratulate. The wedding was kept for three days together, when the bride, the bridegroom, and the young people who aſſiſted at it were dreſs'd in their fineſt clothes, and deck'd with jewels. The bride was crown'd, and carried with great ceremony to her husband's houſe, where the nuptial bed, adorn'd with flowers, was prepar'd; and here the bride was laid into bed by a company of matrons, call'd Pronubæ. Theſe matrons were like thoſe of our days, of about fifty or threeſcore years of age; perſons who were grown hoary in the labours and fatigues of wedlock, and who being thorowly experienc'd in that warfare, imagin'd they had an authority to inſtruct the bride. We muſt not omit a cuſtom which bears ſome affinity to one practis'd in Holland, viz. that the threſhold of the houſes of a new-married couple were ſtrewed with flowers and greens; and among theſe feſtoons and foliage, the laurel made the moſt conſpicuous figure. So that this ſignification might be drawn from it, that the wedding-day is the fineſt in life; a day of conqueſt and triumph.

The nuptial ceremonies us'd among chriſtians, vary according to the countries, and even provinces of a country. In ſeveral parts of France, the bridegroom, attended with his relations and friends, goes to the bride's houſe, and carries her from thence to church in great ceremony. He himſelf walks between his two neareſt relations, and is followed by the bride-men. The bride is conducted with the ſame ceremonies: ſhe is attir'd according to her quality, and crown'd with flowers, and is follow'd by the bride-maids, who are alſo crown'd. In Italy, if Gaiac, author of the marriage-ceremonies, may be credited, the bride and bridegroom are married in church without the leaſt ceremony. But the French are pretty long in their courtſhips, and will be acquainted with a woman before they ſet their affections upon her; or at leaſt they uſe this as a pretence to ſcreen the inclination they have to be ſweet-hearts a long time. But the Italians are no friends to theſe long preliminaries. At Venice matches are made between perſons who have never ſeen or ſpoke to each other; a cuſtom which differs vaſtly from that once eſtabliſh'd among them *, ſince young virgins us'd to be put up to ſale, and given to the higheſt bidder. Now ſeveral whole months are ſpent between the wedding and conſummation. The commentary which Miſſon makes in his travels upon this cuſtom is ſomething waggiſh; "You are not, ſays he, to imagine that people marry here "with the ſame views as in all other countries, for here love, eſteem, and affection "are intirely out of the queſtion. If any of theſe ingredients happen to ſeaſon the "ſtate, ſo much the better: however, they regard nothing but money, or the "greatneſs of a family; for as to the perſon 'tis out of the queſtion." Here follows the progreſs of the Venetian gallantry, when every thing has been adjuſted between the parties: S. Didier tells us, that cuſtom has ſo eſtabliſh'd it, that the galant muſt, every evening, at certain hours, paſs backwards and forwards under his miſtreſs's windows. Another cuſtom is, that the bridegroom never makes a viſit viſit to his bride but he carries her the pearl necklace, which he is oblig'd to give her. This firſt interview of perſons who had never ſeen one another before, often makes the firſt accoſting vaſtly whimſical; and this is owing in general to the retir'd way of life their women lead.

Concubinage is frequently made uſe of as a remedy to thoſe whimſical, and frequently deceitful marriages: and this cuſtom is now ſo well eſtabliſh'd among them, that it is very common to ſee wives live in great harmony with their rivals; like to thoſe wives in the infancy of the world, mentioned in Geneſis, chap. 30. who were ſo far from being jealous of their husbands concubines, that they aſſiſted them in child-birth, by which they ſeem'd to appropriate to themſelves in ſome meaſure the children of thoſe concubines. Nay, the concubinage of the * Venetians is frequently a kind of clandeſtine marriage, the ceremony whereof is not perform'd till a long time after conſummation; and this generally a few days only, or even hours, before the death of one of the parties. But the moſt unaccountable circumſtance in theſe cuſtoms, ſo repugnant to the laws of chriſtianity, is, that mothers themſelves ſhall procure concubines and miſtreſſes for their ſons. The ſame cuſtom is pretty nearly obſerved in Perſia, according to Chardin.

Nor are theſe exceſſes leſs frequent in Spain. Several travellers aſſure us, that their young boys get themſelves miſtreſſes, and engage in ſuch a commerce with them as ſpoils them for ever after. Nevertheleſs, the Spaniards carry love and gallantry to a very great exceſs. "The French have never lov'd with that delicacy, "ſays Madam D'Aunoy in her travels, as the Spaniards; and not to mention the "cares, the eagerneſſes, the delicacy, the devoting even to death —— what to me "appears more meritorious than all the reſt, is their great fidelity and ſecrecy:" Two circumſtances which the French are very much wanting in. "Here lovers "never mention their miſtreſſes but with ſo much reſpect and conſideration, that one "would think they were their ſovereigns." 'Tis in this country therefore that true and perfect love is to be found. The lovers muſt never forget each other. 'Tis an uninterrupted intercourſe of intellectual ſenſations, expreſs'd after a thouſand different ways, and all with equal paſſion and warmth. However, they omit nothing that may at laſt indulge them the gratification of their paſſion, which is the ultimate of love: how pure and chaſte ſoever the deſires of a lover may be, 'tis well known that love is not ſatisfied with ſpiritual fires. Theſe miſtreſſes, for whom the Spaniards have ſuch pure and exalted ſentiments, are of a different order from the concubines; for theſe, if we are to credit Madam D'Aunoy, don't occaſion any domeſtic broils. A husband ſhall often have a wife, a miſtreſs, and a concubine. All this, ſays ſhe, is allow'd, and does not occaſion the leaſt noiſe, confuſion or diſorder in families.

The laſt particular we ſhall take notice of relating to the Spaniſh gallantry, and which is very ſingular, if it be true, is, that after a lady has been let blood, the ſurgeon who perform'd the operation has a conſiderable preſent made him by her lover, for the fillet with which he binds the orifice.

Laſtly, to be ſomething more particular in what relates to their marriages. When a young maiden has fix'd her choice, ſhe is allowed to marry, tho againſt her parents conſent: in which caſe ſhe addreſſes herſelf to the pariſh-prieſt, who takes her from her father's houſe, puts her into a convent, or with ſome old female devotee; and if ſhe ſtill continues in her reſolution, obliges her parents to give her a portion according to their wealth.

Theſe cuſtoms are very fantaſtical; however we ſhall meet with ſome in the ſequel of this work that are much more extraordinary.

* Miſſon's voyage to Italy, vol. I.

The Bleſſing of a WOMAN with CHILD.

In this circumſtance, which often proves ſo fatal to women, and which they ſeldom reflect upon before marriage, ſome devout females have recourſe to S. Margaret's girdle, that of St. Francis, certain relicks, &c. On theſe occaſions the church injoins as follows. The * prieſt ſhall begin by exhorting the woman with child to ſubmit herſelf intirely to the will of God; to offer to him the pains and labours of child-birth, for the ſatisfaction of her ſins, &c. Being clothed in his ſurplice and his ſtole, he ſhall repeat certain prayers, which we find in the ritual. After this he ſhall take the ſprinkler out of the hands of his clerk, and ſhall ſprinkle the woman with child with holy water, himſelf and the aſſiſtants repeating alternately the 66th pſalm. The whole concludes with prayers.

Another ceremony obſerv'd by women immediately after their lying in, is to deſire the prieſt's bleſſing before they go into the church: nay, many of them are ſo very ſcrupulous as to keep from it for ſome time; which cuſtom, ſays Alet in his ritual, is approved by the church, altho neither our Saviour or the church have given any precept on that head. But in this they imitate the practice of the holy virgin, who went to the temple to purify herſelf, and preſent her ſon: and the bleſſed virgin on this occaſion follow'd one of the principal rites of the Jewiſh religion.

A woman who deſires the prieſt's bleſſing after lying in, muſt ſend him notice of it, and in the mean time ſtay at the church-door upon her knees, with a lighted taper in her hand. Women ſtay in this manner out of humility, in order to be introduc'd into it by the prieſt, as being cleanſed from all their ſins, and reconciled to the church. The lighted taper denotes, that they ſhall bring up their children in the faith of Chriſt, and ſhall ſerve as an example to them. The prieſt having his white ſtole over his ſurplice, the ſprinkler, and the holy water, ſhall come and meet the woman at the church-door, when he ſhall take off his cap, ſprinkle her with holy water, make the ſign of the croſs over her, repeat an anthem and a pſalm; after which he ſhall put the corner of his ſtole in the woman's hand, bring her into the church, and lead her to the choir, ſaying, Ingredere in templum Dei; adora filium beatæ Mariæ virginis, qui tibi fæcunditatem tribuit prolis: that is, enter into the temple of the Lord; adore the ſon of the bleſſed virgin Mary, who has been ſo propitious to you as to make you a mother. Being there, ſhe ſhall ſay her prayers on her knees; and the prieſt having ended the prayer he had made for her, ſhall ſprinkle her with holy water.

EXORCISM.

This ceremony the hereticks and libertines have frequently attempted to burleſque; nevertheſs, the former allow the antiquity of it, i. e. of the power of caſting out evil ſpirits: but this power was at that time the effect of the gift of miracles, which having ceas'd for many ages, they pretend exorciſm is a mere chimera, and that the power of modern exorciſts over the infernal powers, exiſts only in the imagination of the vulgar and weak people. They † likewiſe affirm, that after the ceaſing of miracles, publick prayer was thought to be the beſt expedient for delivering demoniacks. Accordingly they were carried into the church: and 'tis to the publick prayers that this employment of exorciſt, with regard to the office, owes its original. Libertines make exorciſms, and the being poſſeſſed with an evil ſpirit, a handle for raillery and diverſion. Theſe aſcribe the modern bewitchings to pious frauds, intereſted motives, and crazineſs; but as to women and young girls being poſſeſs'd, they imagine that certain irregular * deſires are the only devils who poſſeſs them. However, ſay theſe people, if the devil is caſt out of a young girl, they piouſly celebrate the defeat of the hobgoblin.

——— Et le clergé n'eſt pas
Des plus tardifs a prendre part au cas.

In Engliſh:

The clergy themſelves are not unwilling to have a finger in the pye.

Tho in reality he has ſenſe enough to be perſuaded, that an exceſs of continence, a long retirement from the world, and an over-fluſh of health may very often make people demoniacks, and particularly nuns, whoſe being poſſeſſed (which in this age has exerciſed the pens of ſeveral able writers) has raiſed a thouſand ſcruples in the minds of good people, and forced the moſt reaſonable zealots to ſay:

Eſt-ce l'eſprit immonde,
Ou l'eſprit de Dieu?
Ou plutôt la chair et le monde,
Qui jouent leur jeu?

That is:

Is it the unclean ſpirit, or the ſpirit of God? or rather, is it not the fleſh and the world that act this farce?

Such are the diſcourſes of our libertines, and even of thoſe who endeavour to aſſign phyſical reaſons for a thing which gives the common people a great idea of the power of the clergy. And indeed can there be a greater or a more noble privilege than that of driving the enemy of mankind out of the body of a chriſtian, and of triumphing over him who is the prince of darkneſs, the ſource of evil, the tempter of the faithful, the great, and even in the judgment of ſome divines, the only cauſe of the diſorders of the univerſe; in a word, the ſworn enemy of grace, and the tyrant over man's will?

The antient heathens were acquainted with, and practiſed exorciſms; and of this we have a thouſand examples among them: however, this employment, ſo holy among us, was given only to their old women, who gadding from houſe to houſe, uſed to ſprinkle with holy water, and lay the ſpirits by the power of certain words, and ſome very whimſical ceremonies, which are deſcrib'd in ſeveral † authors.

As

* Women and young girls are ſometimes ſubject to vapours and ſuffocations of the matrix, which probably may contribute to thoſe contorſions and convulſive motions which have been obſerved in thoſe of Loudun, Cartigny, Louviers, &c. who were poſſeſs'd. The diſtemper, called by phyſicians furor uterinus, ſeem'd to have ſeiz'd the brain of that woman who was poſſeſs'd by the devil at Loudun, who imagin'd that an Incubus uſed to come every night, and force her to his embraces, under the ſhape of a confeſſor, and pollute her chaſte bed. But it may be ſaid, that thoſe who were poſſeſs'd at Loudun, gave other marks of their being ſo, and ſuch as are indiſputable. But to theſe we might oppoſe the remarks of the phyſicians of Montpellier, who were conſulted in this affair. We are to obſerve farther, that in theſe latter ages the devil has always taken up his abode in the bodies of women, whereas in the infancy of the church he had no reſpect of ſexes.

As to the modern heathens of the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies, they alſo have ſeveral ceremonies among them for caſting out devils and hobgoblins; but for theſe we refer the reader to the diſſertations on the ceremonies of thoſe idolaters.

The church not only diſpoſſeſſes the bodies of men and animals, but likewiſe drives evil ſpirits from all places where they endeavour to ſettle themſelves. We have already obſerved in what manner they drive away the devil from a bridal bed, from the bridal chamber, from ſalt, oil, water, and chriſm; he would certainly be in all thoſe things, did not the ceremony of exorciſm drive him from them. Hence we may form to our ſelves an idea of the importance of the employment of exorciſt, ſince the church devolves on him the authority it has over the infernal powers. However, this office is now uſeleſs, ſince the clergy reſerve to themſelves only the functions of it; which is ſo far from humbling the devil, that on the contrary it puffs him up, * by the great honour which is done him, becauſe none but prieſts and biſhops are employ'd againſt him.

The moſt infallible indication of a perſon's being poſſeſs'd by the devil, ſays Alet's Ritual, is, if the perſon ſo poſſeſs'd either ſpeaks, or underſtands languages that before were unknown to him, eſpecially if he holds long diſcourſes, &c. To which we will add, that the devil muſt be conſiſtent with himſelf, and not make ſoleciſms or barbariſms, as has ſometimes happen'd; witneſs what writers relate concerning the devils of Loudun, who were not near ſo learned as thoſe of Cartigni, who were put to the trial in ſixteen languages: but the poſſeſs'd of Loudun, if we except a few improprieties in latin which the poſſeſs'd of Cartigni ſpoke to the exorciſts, they kept ſtrictly to the French, which was undoubtedly their mother-tongue, and conſequently was moſt familiar to them. Another mark of poſſeſſion, is the diſcovering of ſecrets, things that are doing at a great diſtance, or the divining a perſon's thoughts. A third indication, is to make ſuch efforts, or perform actions, as are above the natural ſtrength of the perſon poſſeſs'd, in whatever condition, or with what ſickneſs ſoever they may be afflicted. A † fourth, is to anſwer difficult queſtions, and ſuch as are above the reach of the human mind.

The Rituals forbid the exorciſing of any perſon, unleſs the biſhop's leave be firſt obtain'd for that purpoſe, who muſt always be told the ſeveral ſymptoms which are obſerved of the poſſeſſed, in order that he may inquire whether or no they are genuine, to prevent the tricks and impoſtures which are too frequently employ'd on theſe occaſions. He alſo muſt direct the conduct of the exorciſt on this occaſion, who, to enable himſelf the better to caſt out the devil, muſt exerciſe himſelf in faſting and prayer. He muſt bear with patience all the inſults of the devil, and take care that no vice, particularly pride, may give that enemy to God any advantage over him; he muſt afterwards endeavour to acquaint himſelf with the character and abilities of the particular devil, and examine whatever is moſt repugnant to him. As for inſtance, he muſt obſerve what expreſſions are moſt ſhocking to him, and theſe he muſt repeat over often. He muſt know the names and number of the devils who have taken up their abode in the body of the demoniack; how long they may have been poſſeſs'd; the cauſe, accidents of ſuch poſſeſſion, &c. He muſt obſerve all theſe circumſtances very religiouſly, and anſwer exactly to every particular; for the Rituals aſſure us that the devils are very fond of talking at random, and endeavour by equivocations and evaſions, to parry the thruſts of an exorciſt. They ſometimes fight flying, and frequently, out of a feint, pretend to take to their heels.

The demoniack muſt have a crucifix in his hands, or in his preſence, and ſome relicks of ſaints muſt be laid on his head; he muſt likewiſe be provided with Agnus's;

* Alet's Ritual.

† See ſome queſtions of this kind in Bayle's dictionary, under the article Grandier.

Agnus's; be cover'd with a monk's cowl, a ſtole, or ſome other ſacred ornament. As to the hoſt, the Ritual will not allow it to be laid on the head or breaſt of the perſon poſſeſſed. They likewiſe prohibit an exorciſt from exorciſing a woman who is poſſeſs'd, unleſs accompanied with her relations, and ſome pious perſons. They muſt not touch her, except when they ſign her with the ſign of the croſs on the forehead, mouth, and breaſt. The demoniack, ſay the above-mention'd Rituals, ought to faſt and pray, to reconcile himſelf to God, renounce vice, eſpecially that which is ſuppos'd to have brought the calamity upon him; otherwiſe we are told that the exorciſt would labour in vain, and it would be doing the devil a kind of injuſtice, to drive him out of a man who was his property, * and ſlave. And indeed, who is ignorant that 'tis not lawful to diſpoſſeſs an uſurper, when he has long preſcription to plead in his favour? And is it not well known that the rules of morality forbid us to deprive a man of his poſſeſſions, tho we ſhould think them unjuſtly acquir'd?

The ceremony of † exorciſm muſt be perform'd in the church, but not before the altar, which the devil or the demoniack muſt not be ſuffer'd to caſt their eyes upon. It muſt be perform'd at the lower end of the church, towards the door, this being the place appointed for catechumens, penitents, and excommunicated perſons, who are not worthy of approaching the altar. If Alet is to be credited in his Ritual, this contempt of the devil will drive him out the ſooner. In caſe the demoniack is ſick, or hindred from going to church by any juſt or lawful cauſe, the exorciſm may be perform'd privately in a houſe, provided it be done before witneſſes. The exorciſt, before he performs the ceremony, muſt confeſs himſelf; which being done, in caſe he be a prieſt, or a deacon, he muſt put on the ſurplice or purple ſtole; and if the exorciſm is perform'd in the church, he muſt go and addreſs himſelf in prayer to heaven before the altar, accompanied with ſome eccleſiaſticks in ſurplices, or with a clerk carrying the holy water, and the ſprinkler. Prayer being ended, the prieſt draws near the demoniack, and makes him kneel down, and if it be neceſſary has his hands and feet tied. After this he puts his ſtole about his neck, and after having ſign'd the demoniack, himſelf, and aſſiſtants, with the ſign of the croſs, he ſprinkles the demoniack with holy water: he likewiſe ſprinkles the aſſiſtants, which is a holy and laudable precaution; for otherwiſe the devil who inhabits the demoniack, might upon feeling the holy water be ſo terrified as to run out from the body of the demoniack, and ſhelter himſelf in that of one of the aſſiſtants, were he not prevented by the ſprinkling. Theſe firſt ſprinklings with holy water being perform'd, the exorciſt kneels down, and the aſſiſtants alſo; when he begins the litanies of the Saints, to which the aſſembly makes the reſponſes. The litanies are follow'd by ſome pſalms, and a prayer. Prayer being ended, the exorciſt conjures Satan and his companions by the myſteries of the chriſtian religion; aſks him his name, and forbids him either to afflict or trouble the perſon or place, which are exorcis'd. Then the exorciſt ſigns himſelf a-new, the demoniack or perſon poſſeſs'd, and the goſpel he is going to read, with the ſign of the croſs, making choice of ſuch paſſages as may beſt mortify the prince of darkneſs and his ſatellites; as for inſtance, the beginning of St. John's goſpel, which mentions the incarnation of the Word; the power which Chriſt gives to the apoſtles of driving out devils, and ſuch like paſſages, the whole agreeable to the tenor of the goſpels; then follows a prayer, and the ſigns of the croſs are repeated. Afterwards the exorciſt lays his right hand on the head of the demoniack, and repeats a prayer which is follow'd by the ‡ exorciſm, by which the devil is is prodigiouſly four'd; nor is that which follows it, after the exorciſt has made three croſſes on the breaſt of the demoniack, leſs dreadful to him. Then they enter in cloſe attack with the ſpirit of darkneſs, and ſet before him (making at the ſame time a great number of ſigns of the croſs) the power and judgments of God; the ſacrament, or rather ſacrifice of the croſs; the faith of the holy apoſtles, and of all the ſaints; the death of the martyrs, the chaſtity of confeſſors, the interceſſions of ſaints, and the force of the myſteries of the chriſtian religion. He is reproach'd for all his guilt, is told that his empire has been deſtroy'd, and that he has been caſt into outer darkneſs. This is one of the chief reaſons which the hereticks employ, to prove that ever ſince the reign of Chriſt, ſatan has been bound in everlaſting chains, and baniſh'd to hell, till the conſummation of all things. In the mean time he is conjur'd, in the name of the Lord, to come out of the perſon poſſeſs'd. "It is hard "for thee to reſiſt, ſays the exorciſt to him, and to kick againſt the pricks; but thy re- "ſiſtance will ſerve only to heighten the rigour of thy puniſhment, &c." Then follows a prayer, and afterwards a third exorciſm; in caſe the devil is not gone out at the firſt or ſecond ſummons. This third exorciſm is of the ſame nature with the reſt, and conſiſts of hiſtorical quotations from the holy ſcriptures, accompanied with ſigns of the croſs, which very much mortify evil ſpirits. This laſt exorciſm muſt be repeated, till ſuch time as the devil is come out of the body of the demoniack; as alſo from time to time, pſalms, ſpiritual ſongs, the apoſtles creed, that of Athanaſius, the Lord's prayer, ave Maria, &c.

When the wicked ſpirit has taken up his abode in a houſe, the rector or curate of the pariſh, after having taken the neceſſary informations, and receiv'd the biſhop's orders, ſhall exhort the inhabitants of the houſe to penance: and if this act of return to God is not ſufficient, he ſhall go into the houſe which is troubled with the evil ſpirit; ſhall exorciſe him in the manner above-mention'd, and ſhall ſprinkle all the apartments of the houſe with holy water.

The SACRAMENT of ORDERS.

THE laſt part of this diſſertation ſhall be employ'd in whatever bears any relation to the ſacrament of orders. It were needleſs to give the origin of the name of this ſacrament, for that * order in general is ſuch a diſpoſition and arrangement of different things, that each has its proper place; that by this ſacrament, an order is ſettled among the faithful, diſtinguiſhing the laity, who compoſe the inferior part of the church, from the clergy, who are the ſuperior part of it, and to whoſe government the laity are ſubordinate; that by this ſacrament, an order and relation is ſettled between the ſuperior and inferior miniſters of the church; laſtly, that the clergy are obliged, by virtue of the ſacrament of orders conferr'd upon them, to preſerve order among the faithful committed to their charge.

There are ſeven orders; that of ſacriſtan or door-keeper, reader, exorciſt, acolyte, ſubdeacon, deacon, and prieſt, which includes epiſcopacy, this being the accompliſhment or perfection of this laſt order. Among thoſe ſeveral orders, that of the ſubdeacon, of the deacon, and prieſt only are ſacred, and that becauſe the vow of chaſtity is more immediately attach'd to it; and that this † vow ſeparating theſe, as it were, from the reſt of men, on whom thoſe orders are conferr'd, does thereby devote them intirely to the ſervice of God's church. Theſe ſacred orders are likewiſe call'd majores or the greater. The reaſon for this plurality of orders, according to the rituals, is the glory of God, which requires a great number of officers in different ſtations; ſtations; and the excellency of the ſacrifice of the euchariſt, for which thoſe officers act. They add, that as the inferior orders are ſo many ſteps for arriving at the ſuperior ones, thoſe who take orders have thereby an opportunity to exerciſe themſelves in the practice of all the virtues and duties of the genuine prieſt.

* Alet's Ritual.

† The Hebrew word ſignifying holy, for the ſame reaſon ſignifies reſerv'd or ſeparated.

* Writers who have explain'd the myſteries of the church, imagine they find their inſtitution, in the fourth and following verſes of the twelfth chapter of the ſecond epiſtle to the Corinthians. That wiſdom there mention'd, denotes epiſcopacy; knowledge, the prieſt; faith, the deacon; the gift of miracles, the ſub-deacon; that of healing diſeaſes, the exorciſt; the interpretation of tongues, the acolyte; prophecy, the reader; the variety of tongues, the ſinger; and the gift of penetrating the human mind, the door-keeper.

Some of the above-mention'd writers tell us, that our Saviour took upon him theſe ſeveral orders, during his reſidence upon earth. That he was the door-keeper when he drove the money-changers out of the temple; reader, when he read in the ſynagogue; exorciſt, when he caſt out devils; acolyte, when he declared he was the light of the world; ſub-deacon, when he turn'd water into wine; deacon, when he diſtributed the bread and wine among his diſciples, and at other times; and prieſt when he adminiſtred the ſacrament. As to the origin of orders, we find in a little book written by a proteſtant, that "‡ Hyginus, biſhop of Rome, made the "clergy into the body, and divided it into the ſeveral ranks and orders thereof; that "before this, there were but two poſts in the church; that of prieſt, (elder) or "biſhop, and that of deacon." The ſame writer tells us, that in the infancy of the chriſtian religion, the office of prieſt and biſhop ſeem to have been one and the ſame thing. However, we are not to be guided by a proteſtant writer, ſince we have the teſtimonies of Euſebius, and ſome other writers of greater antiquity than that biſhop. And 'tis certain, that this diſtinction of orders is very antient in the church.

All thoſe who intend to enter into holy orders are obliged to live || ſingle, and muſt have a teſtimonial of their probity, virtue, &c. A declaration is made in the church on on three ſundays ſucceſſively, before the day of ordination, of their intention to take orders. They enter into orders by the tonſure, which, according to the rituals, denotes the renouncing of the world. The ceremony of the tonſure owes its original to the Nazareat, or ſtate of the Nazarenes among the Jews, which St. Paul allow'd of, in order to bring over that people to chriſtianity *. The eccleſiaſtical writers aſſure us, it was practiſed in the primitive church. † An antient prelate, who was mighty fond of the allegorical and myſtical interpretation of ceremonies, informs us, that ſimple tonſure is an image of the crown of thorns which was planted on our Saviour's head, to deride his ſovereignty; and that the double repreſents St. Peter's head, or rather the crown of martyrdom with which it was crown'd, after the apoſtle had loſt it in his miſſion to the infidels: however, 'tis related in the acts of St. Peter's martyrdom that he was crucified. If the reader is not pleaſed with theſe allegories, here follow ſome others. The orbicular form of the tonſure is a hieroglyphick of the ‡ perfection to which a clergyman ought to aſpire. This tonſure, which is call'd a crown becauſe of its form, repreſents alſo the ſpiritual ſovereignty of the clergy. We cannot preciſely ſay whether the heathens did not alſo endeavour to explain the tonſure of ſome of their prieſts, by ſuch like allegories; as for inſtance, that of the prieſts of Iſis and Serapis, for they alſo had their heads ſhaved.

|| However, 'tis certain that the clergy in the primitive ages were married: it muſt indeed be own'd, that the celibacy of the clergy was debated in the firſt council of Nice, and perhaps earlier; but at laſt, in ſpight of the oppoſition of ſome puriſts in religious matters, the marriage of the clergy prevail'd. Not but that ſeveral plauſible reaſons were made uſe of, in oppoſition to that liberty; ſuch as the cares of a family; a neglect of the cure of ſouls, or a dioceſe, occaſion'd by thoſe cares; the prieſt's employing the temporalities of the church to the maintenance of their families; the tenderneſs for a wife and children, incompatible with that which a prieſt or biſhop ought to have for their flock, who are their ſpiritual children. Be this as it will, there was in that age no eccleſiaſtical law enacted againſt the marriage of ſuch as were in holy orders. It is affirm'd that pope Syricius, who lived at the end of the fourth century, enacted the firſt decree againſt the marriage of the clergy of the Romiſh church: however this decree was not univerſally received, and ſeveral centuries after, a great number of the clergy were married. Notwithſtanding pope Pius II. boldly affirm'd, that prieſts had been prohibited from marrying for very good reaſons, but ought to have been allowed that privilege for better; 'tis nevertheleſs certain, that continence in a clergyman is honourable, and perfectly well adapted to the purity of the chriſtian religion. It muſt be own'd that the animal part of man finds it a very difficult task to obſerve ſuch an awful ſilence on this occaſion, as the church requires; but wherefore does it reject eunuchs, ſince it prohibits marriage? To this it will be anſwer'd, that the church offers nothing to God but what is perfect; but in a ſpiritual religion God requires nothing but a ſpiritual perfection. A viſible imperfection in the body, might diſguſt great numbers of good chriſtians; but the inviſible can give no one a diſtaſte. Eunuchs were likewiſe rejected in the Jewiſh church: but the Egyptians uſed to carry eccleſiaſtical perfection to a moſt extravagant exceſs; for among them, none were admitted to the prieſthood, before he had undergone a probation in the rites of Priapus, and duly practiſed the different ceremonies of his worſhip.

The biſhop adminiſters the ſacrament of orders in quality of ſuperior of the church, and of all the clergy. This religious ceremony muſt be perform'd before the people, and if poſſible in the cathedral; the ſeaſons for it, are lent, eaſter-eve, and the ember weeks. At theſe times, ſay the rituals, the faithful faſt and pray, in order to implore of God wiſe and prudent miniſters over the church.

When a perſon is to receive the tonſure, he preſents himſelf before the biſhop, in a black caſſock, having a ſurplice on his left arm, and a lighted taper in his hand: || he is kneeling, but the biſhop is ſtanding, and cover'd with his mitre when he repeats a prayer, and ſeveral verſes out of the ſcriptures ſuitable to the ceremony. This being done, the biſhop ſits down, and  cuts his hair in five parts of his head, viz. before, behind, on each ſide of his ears, and on the crown; during which the perſon who is tonſur'd ſays, with the biſhop, Dominus pars hæreditatis meæ, &c. i. e. the Lord is my inheritance, &c. The tonſure being performed, the biſhop takes off his mitre, and repeats a prayer over the perſon tonſurated, and the choir chaunt an anthem; which being done, the biſhop repeats a ſecond prayer, obſerving to turn himſelf towards the perſon who receives the tonſure. He afterwards puts the ſurplice on him, ſaying at the ſame time, induat te Dominus novum hominem, &c. may the Lord clothe thee with the new man, &c. †† When the ceremony is perform'd in private, the tonſurate prieſt gives the taper to the biſhop, who gives him his bleſſing. Alet tells us in his ritual, that the black caſſock which

‡ The Egyptians repreſent perfection and eternity by a circle; which hieroglyphic was afterwards employ'd by the Jews, as is manifeſt from the circle or golden crown which was round about the ark of the covenant. Laſtly, we meet with it among the antient Mercians. Vide the third Volume of this work, containing the ceremonies of the idolatrous nations.

 Formerly it was the cuſtom to cut the hair in ſuch a manner, as to leave only a little circle at the extremities; in the ſame manner as the monks and ſinging boys at this day. the tonſurate prieſt puts on, teaches him that he muſt clothe himſelf intirely with the chriſtian virtues; and its colour, that he muſt look upon himſelf as dead to the world; that the lighted taper he holds in his hand, denotes the innocency of baptiſm, which the tonſurate prieſt has preſerv'd, or the light of the faith; that the tonſure is a mark of the renunciation of the world, and its vanities; but the * hair that is left denotes with what ſobriety he ought to uſe the things of this world. It may be farther ſaid, that the hair cut above the eyes, ſignifies that the clergy ought to be deliver'd from ſpiritual blindneſs; and as to its cutting about the ears, it denotes that they ought to be open to the word of God; behind the head, that they ought not to meditate on things behind them; on the crown, that they partake of the ſovereignty of Chriſt Jeſus: the whiteneſs of the ſurplice, denotes the innocency and purity of life; nay, the very flax, of which the ſurplice is made, has an allegorical ſignification.

The employment of the door-keeper, call'd ſacriſtan, in the third compartment of the annex'd plate, is to open and ſhut the church-doors, as alſo to take care that the bells be rung; that of the reader, to read aloud the leſſons and propheſies which are ſung at mattins and maſs; that of exorciſt, to caſt out devils from the bodies of perſons poſſeſs'd; that of acolyth, to bring the tapers, to light them, to take care to put fire into the thurible, and frankincenſe in the navicula, to prepare the wine and water for the ſacrifice, to attend upon the ſub-deacon, the deacon, and the prieſt. The employment of the ſub-deacon is to take care of the holy veſſels, to prepare and pour out water on the wine in the chalice, to ſing the epiſtle at ſolemn maſſes, to bring and hold the book of the goſpels to the deacon, to give it the prieſt to kiſs, to carry the croſs in proceſſion, and to receive the oblations of the people. The function of the deacon, is to give to the prieſt all things neceſſary for the † ſacrifice; to read the goſpel publickly, to explain it; to be in ſome meaſure the church's attorney, with regard to the diſtribution of thoſe things which were given to the poor. Alet tells us in his ritual, that antiently it was the deacon's buſineſs to turn out of the church before maſs began, all ſuch perſons as were not allow'd to be preſent at it, and that after maſs he ſent away ſuch as had aſſiſted at it. The deacon uſed to ‡ remind the faithful of humility, which cuſtom is ſtill obſerv'd. Moreover, the deacon muſt aſſiſt and ſerve the prieſt in the adminiſtration of baptiſm, and may himſelf baptize in the abſence of the prieſt in caſes of neceſſity. Laſtly it is his duty to give the biſhop an account how the laity ſpend their lives, purely for their edification, and the better government of the church. The duty of the prieſt is to offer up the ſacrifice of the maſs, to adminiſter the ſacraments, (thoſe of confirmation and orders excepted) to preach the word of God; to bleſs the people, and to watch over the ſouls committed to his charge.

When a biſhop ordains a door-keeper or ſacriſtan, he gives him the keys of the church, when the ſacriſtan touching them, the biſhop ſays to him, remember that you are to give an account to God, of whatever theſe keys ſhut up; or rather, govern your ſelf, as being to give an account, &c. ſic age quaſi Deo redditurus ſis rationem, &c. || This being done, the arch-deacon gives the door-keeper full power to exerciſe his office, † Antiently the deacon uſed to give the cup in the ſacrament, and the biſhop or prieſt the bread.

‡ By ſaying to them, humiliate capita veſtra Dēo, i. e. humble your ſelves before the Lord; which we are told, was generally directed to penitents, who uſed to proſtrate themſelves when the biſhop or prieſt laid his hands upon them. But in ſeaſons of a general penance, ſuch as lent, they uſed to ſay theſe words publickly at the end of the maſs for the whole congregation in general; in order that they might kneel down when the prieſt pray'd for them, becauſe it was not poſſible for him to lay his hands on each particular penitent.

office, by cauſing him to open and ſhut the gates of the church, and to ring the bells. During the ceremony the biſhop makes an exhortatory diſcourſe to the ſacriſtan.

The fourth council of Carthage, held in 398, but which ſeveral learned writers look upon as fictitious, mentions the greateſt part of the ceremonies made uſe of in theſe ordinations. 'Twould be needleſs to obſerve, that perſons were appointed in the temple of Jeruſalem, whoſe employments were much the ſame with thoſe of theſe inferior officers of the church. There are alſo ſuch officers in the temples of the idolaters.

When a perſon is admitted into reader's orders, the biſhop cauſes him to lay his hands on the book of the propheſies, and the leſſons of mattins, ſaying to him at the ſame time, accipe & eſto verbi Dei relator, &c. i. e. receive this book, render an account of the word of God, and if you acquit your ſelf worthily of this office, be aſſured that you ſhall have a portion of the inheritance, allotted to thoſe, who from the beginning have diſpenſed the word of God. We are told that the readers are at this time, in the church, the ſame with the prophets among the Jews; at leaſt their office bears ſome affinity to thoſe who were called to the reading of the holy books in the ſynagogue, and to ſuch as perform that office to this day, but with this exception, that the Jews do not rank them in the body of their clergy.

When ever the biſhop ordains a perſon exorciſt, he makes him lay his hand on the book of exorciſms, ſaying to him, receive this book, and remember at the ſame time that you receive the power of exorciſing demoniacs, or ſuch as are poſſeſs'd, whether they have been baptiz'd or are only catechumens. The ceremony of exorciſing is perform'd by the prieſt; the buſineſs of the exorciſt being generally only to get ready the ſalt, and every thing neceſſary for the bleſſing of the water, the day it is bleſs'd. When the prieſt exorciſes any perſon, the exorciſt muſt aſſiſt at it, and get ready the book of exorciſms.

The perſon who is ordained acolyth, lays his hand on the candleſtick with the taper which the biſhop gives him, at the ſame time repeating to him the words ſuitable to this act. After this the biſhop preſents him the burette, or little cryſtal flaggon, (but empty) in which the wine and water uſed in the ſacrifice of the maſs is put. This ceremony, the ſame as the former, is accompanied with an exhortation.

The biſhop when he confers the order of ſub-deacon, cauſes the candidate to lay his hand on the cup and the patten, both being empty, ſaying to him at the ſame time, videte cujus miniſterium vobis traditur, &c. i. e. take care of the miniſtry which is committed to your charge, preſent your ſelf to God in ſuch a manner as may be agreeable to him. After which he cauſes the ſub-deacon to lay his hand on the epiſtles, ſaying to him, receive this book, and the power of reading the epiſtles in the holy church of God, &c. The perſon to be ordain'd muſt preſent himſelf clothed in a white albe girded about him, and a lighted taper in his right hand; he then falls proſtrate on the ground, during which the biſhop and the clergy read the litanies of the ſaints. After this the biſhop turning himſelf towards the perſon, (or perſons to be ordained) who is ſtill proſtrate, gives his bleſſing * thrice, and makes a diſcourſe, in which he repreſents to him the importance of the ſub-deaconſhip; after which he gives him the patten, &c. in the manner above-mention'd, and repeats ſome prayers. Theſe being ended, the biſhop clothes him with the amict, ſaying to him, accipe amictum, per quem deſignatur caſtigatio vocis, i. e. receive this amict, which denotes the bridle of ſpeech. He then puts the maniple on his left arm, telling him that it ſignifies ſies the fruit of good works: he clothes him with the dalmatica, telling him that 'tis a garment of joy. Alet tells us in his ritual, that the amict denotes the application of the tongue; the maniple, that of the hands; and the dalmatica that of the heart to the ſervice of God.

Caſalius in his book of the ceremonies of the antient chriſtians, is of opinion that the ſub-deacons have ſome affinity to the Nethinneans, who were ſubject to the Levites, and whom Joſhua firſt choſe from among the Gibeonites. Be this as it will, the inſtitution of the ſub-deaconſhip is of great antiquity; but 'tis the buſineſs of the criticks to inform us whether that order, and the minor ones above-mention'd, were exerciſed in the ſame manner in the antient church, as at this day.

Here follows the ceremony of the ordination of deacons: The candidate preſents himſelf clothed in the ſub-deacon's habit; then the biſhop enquires his character of the arch-deacon and the people, who afterwards makes an exhortation to him on the excellency of the deaconſhip: the deacon proſtrates himſelf in the ſame manner as the ſub-deacon. After this the biſhop gives him the Holy Ghoſt, by laying his right hand on his head, to ſhew that he does not receive it as fully as the prieſt. The biſhop * being ſeated, the candidate kneels before him, and receives the ſtole on his left ſhoulder, which an † acolyth fixes on to his neck, and on his left ſhoulder, in ſuch manner that it comes down on the right ſhoulder. He next receives the dalmatica. The ordination being ended, the biſhop preſents him with the book of the goſpels, and the ceremony concludes with the prayers of the biſhop and people. An Italian writer on ceremonies tells us, ‡ that after the offertory, the new deacons offer tapers, &c. The Rituals aſſure us, that the ſtole over the albe |||| denotes the power given to the deacon, which is inferior to that of the prieſt; and indeed the ſtole is put on the deacon under the right ſhoulder only. The dalmatica points out to the deacon three gifts of God, || the divine protection, joy, and juſtice. The origin of the inſtitution of deacons may be ſeen in the ſixth chapter of the acts of the apoſtles: they were the miniſters of the apoſtles.

The order of prieſt is ſuperior to all thoſe above-mention'd, becauſe he is impower'd to conſecrate the body of our Lord. He preſents himſelf to the biſhop in a deacon's habit, with a lighted taper in his right hand, and the chaſuble folded over his left arm. After the arch-deacon has acquainted the biſhop with the character of the candidate, and the latter has made a previous exhortation to the aſſembly, the litanies are ſaid; the candidate lying proſtrate on the ground at the ſame time, in teſtimony of his humility: he afterwards riſes up, and preſents himſelf to the biſhop, who lays both his hands upon him; all the prieſts who aſſiſt at the ceremony do the ſame, which being done, the biſhop and his miniſters repeat ſome prayers appointed by the pontifical. Then the prelate takes the ſtole, which is on one ſhoulder only, and puts it on both, in ſuch a manner that it  lies croſs-wiſe on the candidate's breaſt. The biſhop in putting on his ſtole ſays to him, receive the yoke of the Lord. The ſtole thus fix'd on both the prieſt's ſhoulders, points out to him, that he receives a fulneſs of charity greater than that of the deacon. After the ſtole, the biſhop gives him the chaſuble, which ſignifies charity; and indeed the biſhop when he gives it the prieſt, ſays to him, accipe veſtem ſacerdotalem, per quam charitas intelligitur, i. e. receive the ſacerdotal veſtment which repreſents charity. The chaſuble is firſt given to the prieſt, ſpread before, and afterwards behind, which we are told denotes to him the great †† extent of charity. This ceremony is follow'd by another prayer, and the veni Creator is ſung, during which the biſhop anoints the candidate's hands in the form form of a croſs, with the oil of the catechumens. This being done, the biſhop joins the prieſt's hands together; and the prelate's vicar, or ſome other of his miniſters, * wraps them round with a piece of clean linen.

After this, the biſhop empowers the prieſt to conſecrate, by making him lay his hand on the chalice in which is ſome wine, and the paten, on which a wafer or hoſt is laid: the paten is ſet on the chalice. At the concluſion of the ceremony the new ordain'd prieſt receives the ſacrament, and the biſhop gives him his bleſſing, after having made him repeat the creed, laid his hands a ſecond time on his head, ſaying to him at the ſame time, receive the Holy Ghoſt; and obliged him to make the ſolemn promiſe of reverence and obedience which the prieſt owes the biſhop, which he receives by taking both the hands of the prieſt, and putting them between his own.

The BENEFICES and DIGNITIES of the CHURCH.

Benefices being the conſequence of orders, and an eccleſiaſtical ſtate, can belong to thoſe only who are in orders, or have receiv'd the tonſure; eccleſiaſtical dignities are of much more antient date than benefices, † the latter taking their riſe from the degeneracy of the church in latter ages.

As to the origin of the word beneſice, we find it as follows in the above-cited Ritual: "This word was antiently appropriated to the lands which kings uſed to "beſtow on thoſe who had fought valiantly in the wars; and was not uſed in this "particular ſignification, but during the time that the Goths and Lombards reign'd "in Italy, under whom thoſe fiefs were introduced which were peculiarly term'd "beneſices, and thoſe who enjoy'd them beneficiarii or vaſſals. For notwithſtanding "that the Romans alſo beſtow'd lands on their captains and ſoldiers, yet theſe lands "had not the name of benefices appropriated to them; but the word beneſice "was a general term which included all kinds of gifts or grants, according to "the antient ſignification of the latin word. In imitation of the new ſenſe in "which that word was taken with regard to fiefs, it began to be employ'd in the "church, when the temporalities thereof began to be divided, and to be given up "to particular perſons, by taking them out of thoſe of the biſhops: this the biſhops "themſelves firſt introduced, purpoſely to reward merit, and aſſiſt ſuch eccleſiaſticks "as might be in neceſſity. However, this was ſoon carried to greater lengths, and "at laſt became unlimited, as was ſince manifeſt in the clericate, and the monaſte-"ries. A benefice therefore is not merely a right of receiving part of the tempo-"ralities of the church, for the ſervice a perſon does in it; a right which is founded "on the goſpel, and has always ſubſiſted ſince the apoſtolick age; but 'tis that of "enjoying a part of the temporalities of the church, aſſign'd and determin'd in "a ſpecial form, in ſuch a manner that no other clergymen can lay any claim or "pretenſion to it ——. And in this age 'tis not barely the right of enjoying part "of the temporalities of the church; but 'tis likewiſe, a fix'd and a permanent "right, in ſuch a manner that it devolves on another, after the death of the incum-"bent: which was otherwiſe antiently, for at the riſe of benefices, they were in-"dulg'd to clergymen only for a ſtated time, or for life; after which they reverted "to the church."

A perſon muſt be fourteen years of age complete, before he can be entitled to receive a benefice, and muſt have receiv'd the tonſure. As to the qualities requiſite for ſuch as have the cure of ſouls, we ſhall take no notice of them, nor of the vocation of thoſe who take holy orders.

* Pontif. Roman. Piſcara Praxis cerem. † Ale.'s Ritual.

As to the plurality of benefices, Alet argues very judiciouſly in his ritual upon that head: "It was impoſſible, ſays he, for the fathers of the antient church, to con-" demn this plurality, ſince the poſſeſſion of benefices, as ſettled at this day, was " unknown to them. However we ſee what were the ſentiments of the church " upon that head, in one of the canons of the council of Calcedon, which prohibits " the clergy from inſerting their names in the liſts of two churches, or, in other " words, to enjoy a plurality of benefices ———. The ſecond council of Nice held " under Charlemaigne, prohibits the ſame thing as an infamous profit; with this ex-" ception however, that it is allow'd the rural clergy, becauſe of the ſmall number " of clerks in thoſe ages. Finally, a council held at Paris in 829, condemns this " practice, and declares it to flow from the ſame ſource, viz. covetouſneſs." Nor have pluralities been leſs cenſur'd ſince the eſtabliſhment of benefices. The doctors of the church complain'd of it, and tho the pope himſelf diſpenſed with holding a plurality of benefices, they nevertheleſs aſſerted that ſuch a diſpenſation did not wipe out the ſin of plurality. They inſinuated that it might do well enough in this world, but otherwiſe in heaven: nevertheleſs the cuſtom of holding ſeveral benefices at the ſame time has been general for many ages.

All incumbents, eſpecially thoſe who have a cure of ſouls, are obliged to reſidence; but they frequently leave them to their curates: however, by the laws of the church, they are forbid to receive any of the fruits of their benefice, during the time they may have been abſent from it. The great number of ſuch as are non-reſident, gives us reaſon to believe that a great indulgence is ſhewn on this occaſion; and moreover, the diſtemper is grown ſo inveterate, that it is impoſſible to cure it.

A clergyman is forbid to buy or ſell ſpiritualities, or ſuch things as are annex'd to it: this traffick is call'd ſimony. By ſpiritual things we underſtand the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, the ſacraments, and the ſpiritual functions; ſuch as preaching, and celebrating the maſs. By things annex'd to the ſpiritual, we underſtand the revenues of benefices, which depend on the ſpiritual functions the incumbent is to exerciſe. Were the article of ſimony to be urged a little home, 'tis to be fear'd that the ſin which is the conſequence of it, has infected the greateſt part of the clergy. Simony is diſtinguiſh'd into mental, conventional, and real. The mental is, when a perſon in giving one of ſuch things as conſtitute the ſimony, does it with an intention to oblige the receiver to give him the value either in money, or ſomething equivalent to it; or when any ſuch gift is made with deſign to receive a benefice by that means. The conventional is, when two perſons negotiate either expreſly, or tacitly, to beſtow a ſpiritual thing, or that which is annex'd to it, for a temporal thing. The real is, when two perſons agree together to give money for a benefice. Such as are more rigid againſt ſimony, carry this matter ſtill farther, and reduce under this head all intreaties, applauſes and flatteries which may be employ'd purely to obtain or procure a benefice for any perſon. Beſides ſimony, there are other ſiniſter methods of procuring a benefice; as of * confidence, which is, "when one either reſigns or " procures a benefice for ſome other perſon, with deſign or agreement to give it to " a relation or ſome other man; or ſhall ſuffer ſome other perſon to take the fruits " thereof, reſerving only the title to himſelf." 2. The negotiation and traffick made in permutations, i. e. when one exchanges a benefice with ſome other perſon not for the advantage of the church, but for one's private intereſt, and to procure more wealth. 3. Fraudulent permutations. 4. Pretended reſignations. 5. Pretended inſtruments in order to enjoy a benefice. 6. The foundation of an obit, which is as follows: "A perſon deſiring to procure a benefice either for himſelf or ſome rela-" tion,

* Alet's Ritual.

" tion, lays out a ſum of money, or buys a piece of ground, upon condition to " beſtow the intereſt of the money, or the revenue of the land, on a perſon for celebra- " ting a weekly maſs; when giving the name of benefice to this foundation, which he " calls obit, he exchanges it with another perſon for a prebend or cure." After this let the reader judge, whether there are many clergymen in the world who can boaſt of being exempt from even the appearances of ſimony. But the clergy will make the following objection; are not ſuch caſes of ſimony, and other irregularities purely imaginary? and is not the perſon who oppoſes them ſo warmly, too violent and ſevere?

Ceremonies relating to the ELECTION of BISHOPS.

Biſhops are conſider'd as the fathers and paſtors of the faithful, the ſucceſſors of the apoſtles, and as ſuch the * ſuperiors of the church of chriſt, †by virtue of which they are allow'd the chief places in the choir, in chapters and proceſſions, &c. As ſucceſſors to the apoſtles, they claim reſpect and homage from the laity. As fathers and paſtors, they themſelves are obliged to preach God's holy word to the faithful. This was the cuſtom in the primitive church; there is no preſcription on this head, ſince, in the conſecration of biſhops, they are commanded to preach the goſpel to thoſe over whom they are appointed paſtors ‡. It muſt indeed be own'd, that, for many years, they have willingly diſpenſed with that painful function; and that their luxury and indolence has frequently render'd them obnoxious to the ſharpeſt cenſures of writers, whether orthodox or hereticks.

The ceremonial of the biſhop enjoins, that he be clothed in purple. The regular biſhops may continue to wear the habit of their order. During lent and advent they muſt be in black, and always clothed in the dalmatica; but they are allow'd to wear ſhort clothes when on a journey.

The pope only has the right of electing biſhops: this is a pretended prerogative which the partiſans of the court of Rome carry to a very great height, to the prejudice of kings and ſovereign princes. Nevertheleſs ſome of theſe have reſerved to themſelves the right of nominating to biſhopricks; after which the pope ſends his approbation and the bulls to the new biſhop. At Rome, it is cuſtomary to ‖ publiſh in ſome conſiſtory, that the candidate for a biſhop's ſee, is duly qualify'd for the ſame. He is then confirm'd, after an inſtrument has been drawn up to teſtify the probity of his life and manners. After which  an inſtrument is drawn up in his favour, call'd by the inhabitants of Rome, conſiſtorial, or apoſtolical Letters. All theſe formalities contribute to ſubject the biſhops to the pope: however, ſuch of thoſe prelates who ſpeak ſincerely, and are not wrought upon by any political motives,

* Biſhop is a Greek word ſignifying inſpector; which manifeſtly proves that they were ſuperior in dignity to other prieſts.

† Piſcara Praxis Cerem. ‡ See the ſequel.

‖ A perſon who is a candidate for a biſhop's ſee in any city of Italy, ſays Lunadoro, Relaz. della Corte di Roma, muſt make a confeſſion of his faith, in preſence of ſome cardinal nominated by the pope. After that the cardinal has heard the depoſitions of the witneſſes, with regard to the life, manners, &c. of the candidate, he cauſes an inſtrument to be drawn up to that purpoſe, afterwards ſigns it, and gives it to three cardinals, heads of each order, to be reviſed by them. The witneſſes muſt likewiſe give their affidavits, that the candidate was born in lawful wedlock; that his father and mother were never ſuſpected of hereſy. Theſe formalities being ended, a report is made of the candidate in a ſecret conſiſtory, and he is propoſed in a ſecond conſiſtory.

 By this inſtrument the candidate binds himſelf to pay to the ſacred college, to the apoſtolical chamber, and the chancery, all the charges of his promotion. By virtue of this bill, bulls are granted in his favour.

tives, pretend that they hold the authority they have over their dioceſes, from our Saviour only; but they ought to be as ſincere in owning, that they hold it from the pope. *Hence is the origin of degrees and diſtinctions, which have given riſe to numberleſs diſputes with regard to the divine right of epiſcopacy. By virtue of that divine right ſome biſhops have had the preſumption, to write at the head of their decrees and mandates, ſuch a one, by the grace, or by divine providence: but † Innocent XI. cenſur'd them very ſmartly upon this account.

When †† a perſon hears that the pope has raiſed him to the epiſcopal dignity, he muſt enlarge his ſhaven crown, and dreſs himſelf in purple. If he be in Rome, he ſhall go and ſalute his holineſs, and receive the rochet from him. Three months after his having been confirm'd in his election, he ſhall be conſecrated in a ſolemn manner; which muſt be perform'd on ‡ a ſunday, ‖ or one of the feſtivals of the apoſtles, obſerving to faſt on the eve of his conſecration. The altar, as we find in the book of ceremonies, muſt be adorn'd with flowers, and a carpet ſpread on the ground before it, and on the ſteps. The pontifical ornaments muſt be laid on the altar, and the chriſm, the veſſel of holy water, the chalice, the pyx, the pontifical ring; the ſandals, the paſtoral ſtaff, the mitre, gloves, &c. on the credences. There are likewiſe two little barrels fill'd with the beſt wine, two loaves, one of them gilt with gold, the other with ſilver, with the arms of the officiating prelate and the biſhop engraved on them, and two tapers each weighing four pounds. Some acolytes ſtand by the biſhops who conſecrate, and the perſon to be conſecrated: the latter places himſelf in the middle of the two aſſiſting biſhops, oppoſite to the officiating prelate, who ſits on the epiſcopal ſeat placed about the middle of the altar. Then one of the aſſiſtants addreſſes himſelf to the officiating prelate, ſaying to him, that the ‡‡ catholick church requires ſuch an one (naming the perſon) to be raiſed to the dignity of a biſhop. Then the officiating prieſt demands of him the apoſtolical mandate, which is given to his notary who reads it, when the officiating prelate anſwers at the concluſion of the mandate, God be praiſed. This firſt ceremony concludes with the oath of the candidate, which he takes on his knees before the biſhop who conſecrates him. By this oath he  engages himſelf to be faithful to St. Peter, to the holy Romiſh church, and to the pope; to defend them to the utmoſt of his power, and not divulge ſuch ſecrets as the pope ſhall entruſt him with. He ſwears that he will maintain towards and againſt all men the ‖‖ papacy of Rome and the regalia of St. Peter; the rights, honours, privileges, and authority of the holy Romiſh church: that he will not enter into any council or machination, againſt either the church or its head; that he will faithfully reveal to them whatever may claſh with their intereſts; that he will obſerve the rules preſcrib'd by the holy fathers, the decrees, orders, proviſions, and apoſtolical mandates; that he will proſecute hereticks, ſchiſmaticks, and all ſuch as rebel againſt the holy father. He farther promiſes to give him an account of his adminiſtration, and of every thing that relates to the ſtate and diſcipline of the church; to execute expeditiouſly and with humility all the apoſtolical mandates, either by himſelf or his miniſters, miniſters, &c. We are told in one of the rubricks of the pontifical, that all patriarchs, primates, arch-biſhops and biſhops of Italy, and of the neighbouring iſlands, are obliged to renew this oath every three years, thoſe of France, Germany, Spain, Flanders, the Britiſh Iſlands, Poland, &c. every four years; thoſe of the extremities of Europe and of Africa, every five years; and laſtly, thoſe of Aſia and America every ten years.

* See this ſubject debated in the council of Trent, in the hiſtory thereof by Father Paul.

† One of theſe mandates put the holy father into ſuch a paſſion, that he is ſaid to have cried out, Ecco un ridicolo barone con la ſua grazia di Dio, &c. there's a ridiculous ſcoundrel with his grace of God, &c. had it not been for mine he had never have been a biſhop.

After this oath a formulary call'd the * examen is read: by this formulary he promiſes to † ſubmit his wiſdom and knowledge to the ſenſe of the holy ſcriptures, and this is follow'd by ſeveral interrogatories which conclude the examen. Theſe interrogatories relate to ſuch duties of obedience as the pope and the church require, the obſervance of its commandments, traditions, the purity of manners, its faith with regard to the tenets of the chriſtian religion. After the oath, the candidate kiſſes, on his knees, the hand of the officiating prelate. The maſs which follows the oath and examen being read or ſung, he puts off the pluvial, and the acolytes give him the ſandals, while the pſalms are ſinging. He next receives the paſtoral croſs, the ſtole, and other pontifical ornaments; and thus habited he goes and ſtands before the altar, where he reads the office of the maſs, having the two aſſiſtant biſhops on each ſide of him. This being read, he makes a bow to the officiating prelate, who repeats the following words to him, which include the epiſcopal functions: "The duty of the biſhop is to judge, interpret, conſecrate, confer "orders, ſacrifice, baptize, and confirm." After the repeating of theſe words and a ſhort prayer, the officiating prelate and aſſiſtants all kneel down in the manner repreſented in the third compartment of the plate, except the candidate biſhop, who proſtrates himſelf, and continues in that poſture, during which the officiating prelate, with his paſtoral ſtaff, ſigns him with the ſign of the croſs. The aſſiſtants perform the ſame ceremony.

Before the officiating prelate proceeds to the anointing, he takes the book of the goſpels, and lays it on the ſhoulders of the biſhop elect. The officiating prelate and the two aſſiſtants afterwards lay their hands on his head, ſaying unto him, receive the Holy Ghoſt. Then a napkin is put on the neck of the biſhop elect, and the officiating prelate anoints his head with the chriſm: the anointing is perform'd in form of a croſs on his ſhaven crown; he then anoints his two hands, which are alſo laid croſs-wiſe. This anointing is perform'd from the thumb of the right hand to the fore-finger of the left; and from the thumb of the left hand to the fore-finger of the right: after which the officiating prelate anoints the palms of both his hands, and concluding this anointing with a prayer, proceeds to ‡ bleſs the paſtoral ſtaff, ſprinkles it with holy water, and gives it to the biſhop elect, in the manner repreſented in the ſixth compartment of the plate. ‖ The paſtoral ring is bleſs'd, ſprinkled, and given with the ſame ceremony; the whole accompanied with exhortations very ſuitable to the uſes which the new prelate ought to make of the ſeveral things that are put into his hands. The goſpel (ſhut) is given to him with this exhortation, "receive the goſpel, go and preach it to the "people committed to your charge, &c." After this exhortation the officiating prelate and the two aſſiſtant biſhops, give him the kiſs of peace. Theſe ceremonies end with the myſtical offering of the new prelate, which are two lighted torches, two loaves, and two ſmall rundlets of wine; and afterwards the officiating prelate gives the communion to the newly conſecrated biſhop. The communion being ended, he bleſſes the mitre, ſprinkles it with holy water, and puts on the head of this new elected prelate the helmet of defence and ſalvation, the * ſtrings whereof, like to the horns of the two teſtaments, are to make him appear formidable to the enemies of the truth, &c. The gloves are given him; theſe gloves repreſent the † purity of the new man, which muſt encloſe the hands of the new prelate, and render him like Jacob, who by offering to his father ſuch meats as were agreeable to him, having his hands cover'd with goat-ſkin, artfully procured his father's bleſſing. Laſtly, he is inthron'd, (or put in poſſeſſion of his ſee) i. e. the officiating prelate and the firſt aſſiſtant, take him by the hand, and ſet him on the epiſcopal ſeat, on which the officiating prelate was before ſeated. After this the aſſiſtants lead him up and down the church, where he bleſſes the people; then walks up towards the altar, with his mitre on his head, and the paſtoral ſtaff in his hand. From thence he bleſſes the people a ſecond time, having firſt ſign'd himſelf with the ſign of the croſs: then goes on the epiſtle ſide, kneels down there, obſerving to turn himſelf towards the celebrating prelate, ‡ with his paſtoral ſtaff in his hand, and ſays to him ſinging, ad multos annos; which words he repeats thrice: firſt on the epiſtle ſide; and, being turn'd towards the officiating prelate, afterwards in the midſt of the altar; and laſtly, upon his knees, at the feet of the above-mention'd celebrating prelate. The ceremony concludes with an anthem; the officiating prelate kiſſes the new conſecrated biſhop, makes the ſign of the croſs and ſalutes him; which the new biſhop returns, and goes and puts off his pontifical veſtments.

‡ This paſtoral ſtaff or crozier, is the ſymbol of the power which the new prelate receives of chaſtizing thoſe who rebel againſt the church. The crozier bears ſome affinity to the lituus or ſtaff of the augurs among the heathens.

All theſe ceremonies muſt be exactly obſerved; and as to the devoirs which relate in particular to the holy father and the apoſtolick court, they muſt be paid by the proxy of the new prelate, in caſe he has not an opportunity of doing the honours in perſon.

There are ſome biſhops who have no churches under their care; others are merely titular, and theſe are generally the creatures of the court of Rome. A biſhop ſaid formerly, that  titular biſhops were a mere invention of the court of Rome, (figmenta humana.) There are no footſteps of this dignity among the antients.

The arch-biſhops are ſuperior to biſhops; and the former are diſtinguiſh'd by the †† pall which the pope ſends them.

If the perſon nominated to an arch-biſhop's ſee be at Rome, the chief cardinal deacon performs the ceremony of putting the pall on his ſhoulders, tho it was formerly done by the pope. The pall is laid upon the altar; after maſs the officiating prelate, clothed in his pontifical veſtments, receives the oath of the arch-biſhop elect, who is clothed with the ſame pomp, his gloves and mitre excepted. After this the officiating prelate riſes up, and putting the pall on the ſhoulders of the arch-biſhop elect, ſays theſe words to him, to the glory of God, of the bleſſed virgin, ‡‡ of the apoſtles St. Peter and St. Paul, of our lord the pope, and of

of the holy church of Rome, &c. receive this pall, which is taken from the body of St. Peter, and in which the plenitude, or perfection of the function of pontiff, or patriarch, or arch-biſhop, is found; make uſe of it on certain days, * noted in the privileges which are granted to you by the holy ſee apoſtolick, in the name of the Father, &c. The arch-biſhop is to wear the pall in the ſolemnities of the maſs, and on high feſtivals, at the conſecration of a church, at ordinations, at the conſecration of a biſhop, and at giving nuns the veil. In the formulary of the election it is ſaid, that the pall is taken from St. Peter's body, becauſe the pope only has a right of giving it, as † a manifeſt indication of that ſovereign power which flows, as it were, from the head of the apoſtolical church, to the ſeveral eccleſiaſtical members thereof.

After that the arch-biſhop has received the pall, he goes up to the altar, and bleſſes the people. He is not allow'd to perform any of the archi-epiſcopal functions, till after he has received the pall in a ſolemn manner, before which time the archi-epiſcopal croſier is not carried before him.

The ſhape and form of this pall is ſeen in the plate: it conſiſts of certain pieces of white woollen ſtuff, three fingers in breadth, and embroider'd with red croſſes. The pall, before it is given to the arch-biſhop, either at Rome or elſewhere by proxy, muſt be left for one whole night, on the altar of St. Peter and St. Paul. We ſhall obſerve that the uſe of the pall is pretty antient in the church, and that ſome footſteps of that ornament are found among the Romans. The officers who ſerv'd at feaſts and ſacrifices, uſed to wear on the left ſhoulder, a pretty broad piece of ‡ woollen ſtuff, with || the fringe or ſhag hanging down from it. This was the badge of their miniſterial function, and after it had been conſecrated in the church, it was anointed. The pall hung about the archbiſhop's neck, denotes the humility of our Lord: 'tis ſaid that it likewiſe denotes the vigilance of the paſtor, the excellence of the virtues that ought to ſhine out in the arch-biſhop, &c. The pall is made of wool, and laid on the biſhop's ſhoulders; it being the  emblem of the loſt ſheep, which the ſhepherd lays on his ſhoulders, and puts again into the ſheepfold.

The pall ſerves for that arch-biſhop only to whom it has been given; but †† he cannot make any uſe of it in caſe he is tranſlated from one arch-biſhoprick to another, nor leave it to his ſucceſſors. When an arch-biſhop dies his pall is buried with him, and if he is buried in his own dioceſe it is laid on his ſhoulders; but if out of it, on his head. If an arch-biſhop has been tranſlated to ſeveral ſees, all his palls ‡‡ muſt be buried with him; that of his laſt archi-epiſcopal ſee is laid on his ſhoulders, and the reſt are laid under his head.

'Tis thought that the ceremonies which we are now going to deſcribe, were introduced into the church upon the pall's being made of wool. If this be true, they are of conſiderable antiquity. After the ite miſſa they are laid on the altar, one on the epiſtle ſide, and the other on that of the goſpel, each of them on a white damaſk pillow edged with a gold lace, or a kind of fringe; after which they ſing the anthem, ſtans à dextris ejus agnus nive candidior, which words ſuit the colour and quality of lambs. After the anthem, the officiating paſtor gives them his bleſſing in manner following: Let our help be, &c. O Lord, who haſt inſtituted by* Moſes thy ſervant, the veſtments of the miniſters of the tabernacle; and by thy holy apoſtles, thoſe of the evangelical ſacrificers and prelates; pour out thy bleſſing on thoſe lambs, with whoſe fleece the palls of the ſovereign pontiffs, patriarchs, and arch-biſhops are to be made; to the end that thoſe who wear them, may arrive, together with the people committed to their charge, at everlaſting bliſs, by the interceſſion of S. Agnes, virgin and martyr, and by the merits of Chriſt Jeſus, &c. After this, two prebends of St. John of Lateran take thoſe conſecrated lambs, and give them in charge to the apoſtolical ſub-deacons, who ſend them into the fields ſacred to S. Agnes. † We are told, "that the tax of theſe conſecrated "lambs is a crown a month, reckoning from the time of their births, to the "time of their firſt ſhearing." The nuns of St. Laurence in Paniſperna, or the Capuchin nuns, ſhear them at the proper ſeaſon; ſpin the wool after they are ſhear'd, and make the palls therewith. The prebends of St. Peter's church lay theſe palls on the high altar, and put them in a very ceremonious manner on the bodies of St. Peter and St. Paul; and after they have lain there one night, they are again given in cuſtody to the apoſtolical ſub-deacons, as has been already obſerved.

The ENTRY of a new elected PRELATE into his DIOCESE.

Immediately after the election of a prelate, the bells are rung, Te Deum ſung, and the biſhop's ſtall is adorn'd. The clergy both regular and ſecular, and the fraternities, ſet out on their march, and go in proceſſion to return thanks to God. In caſe the perſon elected happens to be abſent, he ‡ takes poſſeſſion of the epiſcopal ſee by ſome clergyman of diſtinction, whom he conſtitutes his proxy for that purpoſe. The proxy goes into the cathedral of the dioceſe with a notary and proper witneſſes, when he addreſſes himſelf in prayer to heaven, and orders the notary to read the apoſtolical letters aloud; after which two members of the chapter lead the prelate's proxy to the high altar, who takes poſſeſſion of it by kiſſing it in the middle, on the epiſtle, and goſpel ſide. From thence the proxy is conducted to the pontifical ſtall, which is hung with a rich ſtuff, and a canopy over it: the proxy ſits here a ſmall time, after which he goes round the church, and walks into the chapter-houſe, where he ſeats himſelf in the epiſcopal chair, and addreſſes himſelf to the chapter in the name of the biſhop: the chapter returns him his compliment, and leads him to the church-gate; when he afterwards goes and takes poſſeſſion of the epiſcopal palace.

When a prelate ſets out to take poſſeſſion of his dioceſe, * he muſt endeavour to obtain ſome grant or favour from his holineſs; particularly he ſhall intreat him to beſtow a plenary indulgence on all ſuch of the faithful as may aſſiſt at the firſt maſs.

It is enjoin'd in the ceremonial of biſhops, that the prelate elect ſhall provide himſelf with ſuch things as may enable him to make his entry in a manner ſuitable to his dignity; which certainly, if I may be allow'd the expreſſion, cannot fail of giving a luſtre to that apoſtolical humility which ought to adorn the miniſters of the church. As ſoon as an archbiſhop enters into his dioceſe, the croſs muſt be carried before him. Before his arrival, he ſhall ſend notice of the day and hour of it to his vicar generals, his prebends, to the whole chapter, the magiſtrates, and the ſpiritual court under his juriſdiction, in order that they may come and meet him, and pay him due honours. The clergy in a body muſt go and receive him in proceſſion; a canopy muſt be prepared at the church-gate; the ſtreets muſt be ſwept, and ſtrew'd with leaves and flowers. When the biſhop is come near to the gate of the city, he ſhall clothe himſelf in his epiſcopal veſtments, and his clergy ſhall receive him without the gates; where he muſt kneel down, make a private prayer, and kiſs the croſs. He afterwards enters the city, preceded by the citizens in a body, the magiſtrates, clergy, &c. The prelate is mounted on a fine horſe, and rides under a canopy ſupported by the chief citizens, as the apoſtles would have practiſed had they lived in theſe ages. As he paſſes along he gives his bleſſing to his flock. At the door of the cathedral, the ſprinkler muſt be given him; when he firſt ſprinkles himſelf, and afterwards the faithful preſent. The head of the chapter ſhall incenſe him thrice. Being come to the altar, and the Te Deum being ſung all the time, he bends the knee before the hoſt, ſalutes the croſs, and makes a private prayer. Laſtly, he admits the chapter to the accuſtom'd homage, which is perform'd by kiſſing his hand. Being return'd to the altar, he ſhall take off his mitre at the loweſt ſtep thereof, ſhall ſalute the croſs, ſing the prayer of the ſaint who is patron of the church, and pronounce a ſolemn bleſſing; which being done, he ſhall be conducted back to his palace. The ceremonial obſerves farther, that in caſe a ſovereign prince ſhould offer to accompany the biſhop to the epiſcopal palace, he ſhall make ſome ſcruple to accept of ſo great an honour; however, 'tis inſinuated † in the ſame place, that the prelate ſhall turn his compliment in ſuch a manner, that the prince ſhall not take him at his word.

When a biſhop performs the viſitation of his dioceſe, he is received in the manner repreſented in the third compartment of the plate, much after the ſame manner as at his firſt entry. The church he is to go into is ſet off with the greateſt pomp; the bells are rung; the clergy both ſecular and regular aſſemble with great ſolemnity, and wait upon the biſhop at his palace, and attend him in proceſſion. The biſhop walks under a canopy ſupported by four clergymen, preceeded by the clergy in a body, who ſing the hymn, veni creator ſpiritus. The chief prebend, cloth'd in his chaſuble, ſtands at the church-door, having the croſs in his hand, which he gives the prelate to kiſs, who kneels down at that ceremony. Then follows the holy water, incenſing, and the prayers at the altar. After the prelate has ended his private devotion, he ſings the maſs of the Holy Ghoſt in a ſolemn manner, or, as is frequently practiſed, the chief dignitary in his ſtead. The whole is pre-

The Death and Funeral of a BISHOP.

All that now remains is, to take a view of theſe ſucceſſors of the apoſtles on their death-beds. The book of ‡ rites informs us, "that a biſhop ought there to "be prepared for the great account he is going to give of his adminiſtration, "and ready to preſent himſelf before the Lord, who is the ſpouſe of the "church, &c."

After he has confeſs'd, repented, and received the communion in his || epiſcopal veſtments, upon the firſt ſummons of approaching death; he ſhall give orders for the aſſembling of his clergy, ſhall make his confeſſion of faith to them, recommend his church to their care, and ſhall refrain from all converſe, except with perſons of ſtrict piety, who  ſhall ſhew him the holy croſs, and give it him to kiſs. Having yielded up the ghoſt, the prebends who ſaw him die, ſhall, in their turns, repeat the following verſe over him, a porta inferi, &c. i. e. deliver his ſoul from hell gate; ſhall ſprinkle him with holy water, and cloſe his eyes. The prelate's ſervants ſhall waſh his corps with wine and warm water. After this he ſhall be dreſs'd in his epiſcopal veſtments, and if an archbiſhop, in his †† pall, when he ſhall be laid on a bed of ſtate, with four or ſix lighted tapers ſtanding round it; his pontifical hat ſhall be laid upon him near the feet. At the foot of the bed a little cupboard muſt be ſet, on which two lighted tapers, the veſſel of holy water, the ſprinkler, the maſs-book, the navicula, thurible, ſurplice, ſtole, and black chaſuble muſt be ſet. The clergy both ſecular and regular, muſt come and ſing the office of the deceaſed prelate, ſtanding round his corps; ſprinkle with holy water, incenſe it, &c. This ceremony is perform'd by ſeveral detach'd bodies: for firſt, part of the clergy advance forward, in order to ſing veſpers near the corps; theſe draw off, and are ſucceeded by others, who come and chaunt mattins; and a third detachment comes and ſings laudes. As to the interment of a biſhop; he is carried to church, the bell tolling all the while, and the clergy walking before in a body. The corps is carried on the ſhoulders of prieſts, the chief citizens follow after, and the burial concludes as uſual.

The great number of ceremonies in the church muſt neceſſarily require a conſiderable number of ſervants, the meaneſt whereof contribute to the glory of God, |||| are veſſels equally conſecrated to his honour, and all uſeful to the Lord. 'tis he who directs the order of the ſeveral ceremonies: he muſt take care that all ſuch as have lately taken orders, obſerve the uſages and practices of the church, and that every thing be done in the choir conformable to the diſcipline hereof. He muſt likewiſe regulate the order and march in all proceſſions; aſſiſt at all pontifical ceremonies, ſuch as ſolemn maſſes, the entry and conſecration of biſhops, ſynods, the viſitation of a dioceſe, &c.

The maſter of the ceremonies muſt be in orders, and his veſtments are of a purple colour; but he muſt be clothed in a ſurplice when in the choir, and at the divine offices of the church. On high feſtivals he may carry a * kind of wand, which is generally of a purple colour.

The ſacriſtan has the care of the relicks, of the ſacred veſſels, and every thing uſed in the church: it is his buſineſs to ſee after the furniſhing of the altar, and its ornaments; he furniſhes the wax at funerals, and orders every thing relating to the ſolemnity obſerved on thoſe occaſions. The ſacriſtan has ſeveral clerks under him, to aſſiſt him in his office: one of theſe ſubordinate officers, like our vergers, takes care that every one behaves decently in the church, that no noiſe be made in it, that the women be ſeparated from the men, &c. 'Twould be needleſs to mention the particulars of the duties of thoſe clerks, who are as ſo many coadjutors to the ſacriſtan. Some are to adorn the altar, and furniſh it with all neceſſaries, ſome to take care of the pyx and the wafers, and others of the chalice. There are likewiſe certain clerks appointed to take care of the linen and veſſels of the altar, the ſacerdotal veſtments, tapers, lamps, bells, &c.

Of the acolytes; ſome are to carry the holy water to the altar, ſome incenſe, and others tapers. An acolyte likewiſe holds the mitre of the officiating prelate, another the maſs-book, a third the epiſcopal crozier, in caſe the perſon officiating be a prelate; another preſents him with the gremial, a kind of ſilk apron; another his gloves and his ring; and another the pall, if he be an arch-biſhop. The croſs-bearer is likewiſe of the order of acolytes; the train-bearer carries the train, or end of the cope of a biſhop, or other ſucceſſors of the apoſtles. An acolyte likewiſe looks after the biſhop's ſtall. We ſhall make no mention of the miniſters of the choir, ſuch as the choriſters, and organiſts; nor of the readers, whoſe functions are pretty well known.

The ſub-deacon ſerves at maſs, he chaunts the epiſtle, gives the officiating prelate or prieſt the book to kiſs; takes care of the chalice and paten, which he preſents to the deacon; he receives the pax from the deacon, and carries it to the congregation in the choir; he goes, preceeded by an acolyte, and carries the chalice to the credence; he aſſiſts the officiating prieſt in putting off his veſtments in the ſacriſty: at a pontifical maſs, he carries and preſents the ſandals to the biſhop, gives him the maniple, and preſents that part of it to him to kiſs where the croſs is, and afterwards puts it on his left arm.

The deacon preſents the incenſe to the officiating prieſt or prelate, and chaunts the goſpel; after which he incenſes the officiating prieſt, lays the corporal on the midſt of the altar; and receives the paten and cup from the ſub-deacon, and preſents them to the perſon officiating: he then goes and incenſes the choir, and returning to the altar, likewiſe incenſes the ſub-deacon: he receives the pax from the officiating prelate, and carries it to the ſub-deacon, who carries the brotherly kiſs to the choir, as has been already obſerved. At the pontifical maſs, when the biſhop gives his bleſſing, he puts his mitre on his head, takes off the arch-biſhop's pall, and lays it on the altar.

We are told that the prebends, or canons, are the * ſenators of the church. The name from whence their dignity is call'd, ſignifies originally rule; but as they have degenerated from their firſt inſtitution, people have frequently made merry at their coſt. Not ſatisfy'd with quoting them as ſo many models of indolence and ſenſuality, their corpulency is even become † proverbial. What a ſcandal is this to all good men? muſt holy things for ever ſuffer by the abuſe that is made of them?

" The colleges of prebends (to ſpeak with Paſquier in his Recherches, book iii. " chap. v.) that have been introduced into each cathedral, were not in the antient " church, but are of modern inſtitution, notwithſtanding what ſeveral learned " perſons of the age have ſaid to the contrary: but as I don't find them men- " tion'd in any antient council, except only in Charlemaign's time, I cannot be " perſuaded that their inſtitution is of any antiquity. I therefore carry it very low, " to the decline of the empire, and the riſe of the French monarchy. —— Gregory " of Tours informs us, that in the church of Tours, which was the metropolitan, " and one of the chief in the kingdom of France, Baldwin the ſixteenth arch- " biſhop, under the reign of Clotharius the firſt, inſtituted a college of prebends " in his church. I can never be of opinion, that that body of men were ever " look'd upon as the chief ſenators of their churches, who were not obliged to " be in prieſt's orders. But, if I miſtake not, there were a nurſery of young per- " ſons of quality, whom the biſhops kept about them, ſome being deacons, others " ſub-deacons, who were afterwards to be ſent to other churches, as neceſſity " might require, upon which occaſion they were made prieſts; I mean by be- " ſtowing ſuch churches on them as were deſign'd for prieſts only, who are " ſince call'd parſons or rectors. But as time changes all things, they have ſince " been incorporated under the name of the college of prebends. However, they ſtill " retain the privilege they had antiently, viz. that they may hold prebends or canon- " ries without being in prieſts orders." By this paſſage, and another of the ſame author, book iii. chap. xxxvii. it appears that theſe prebends were ſo many clerks united under certain rules and inſtitutions, which, if I may ſo expreſs my ſelf, diſtinguiſh'd them from the common people of the church: " However, thoſe prebends " did not compoſe the general council of the biſhop, as ſome perſons have thought " thro' miſtake, but were a nurſery of young clergymen entertain'd in the great " churches, and were afterwards divided among the parochial churches, after they " had been ordain'd prieſts: and from this antient cuſtom it is that we ſay, a ca- " nonry is a benefice of the ſimple tonſure."

When a perſon is promoted to a prebend, he muſt be preſented in a very ceremonious manner to the chapter, who aſſemble in the cathedral in order to ‡ receive him. He is preſented by a deputy of the chapter, accompanied by the biſhop's notary and ſome witneſſes. This deputy conducts the perſon elected to the altar, which the latter kiſſes thrice; after which he goes and takes his ſeat in the choir, and ſtays there ſome time, during which the deputy gives the chapter an account of his promotion: and afterwards he goes and takes him into the choir, and preſenting him to the chapter, deſires them to receive the per- ſon elect as one of their brethren. The prebend elect makes his confeſſion of faith aloud, and ſwears to obſerve the ordinances of the church, and of our holy father the pope. Being thus ſolemnly inſtall'd, they are impower'd to aſſiſt at the chapter, to chaunt the office in the choir, &c.

The arch-deacon is the chief of the deacons and ſub-deacons; his office is to examine the candidates for holy orders, and to preſent them to the biſhop. An arch-deacon is ſuperior to a prieſt, notwithſtanding that the order it ſelf is inferior to that of the prieſthood.

The arch-prieſt is ſuperior to other prieſts. In the abſence of his biſhop he celebrates the ſolemn maſſes: 'tis he who on aſh-wedneſday leads penitents out of the church, puts aſhes on their heads, and preſents them to the biſhop on holy thurſday.

* Ritual writers, moſt of whom are ſtrictly in the intereſt of the court of Rome, aſſure us, that the office of prothonotary was inſtituted by pope Clement, and that at that time, and under the popes Antherus and Julius I. their office was to write the acts of the martyrs, to look after the church regiſters, &c. This office being of ſo great antiquity, greatly heightens the prerogatives of the pope. The prothonotaries at Rome are all prelates, are impower'd to create doctors, and to make baſtards legitimate.

To come to the monks, that ſpiritual nurſery of † indolent devotees, and uſeleſs ſervants of the church militant; whoſe origin is owing to the retirement of the firſt chriſtians, and their ‡ diſorder and irregular conduct to the immenſe treaſures which the blind devotion of people of paſt ages have bequeathed to them. It muſt be own'd, that God has preſerved to himſelf ſeveral elect among the monks; however, there is no doubt but the corruption of this vaſt body, has given a juſt handle to the uncommon liberty theſe writers have taken with their characters. The monks have complain'd againſt it, and cry out hereſy, and prophanation, &c. After all, would they oblige us to believe as an article of faith, that 'tis in convents only that virtue is to be found in its greateſt purity, and that none of the regular clergy can be accuſed of the leaſt diſorder? that every monk is free from ſenſuality? that a man, upon taking the religious habit, immediately ceaſes to be covetous, proud, hypocritical, and debauch'd? or, at leaſt, that that habit has the virtue of extirpating all the human paſſions? We may lay it down as an infallible rule, which may be applied to the monks, and all ſuch bodies as have been the objects either of ſatire or cenſure, that had not they themſelves been guilty of ſeveral enormities, they would never have been loaded with calumny.

The world has been undeceived with regard to the piety of a monaſtick life, becauſe it is the common refuge of perſons, who " either are terrified by their † evil " conſciences, or dread the ſeverity of the laws, and having neither houſe nor home, and " having led infamous and ſcandalous lives, are forc'd to ramble up and down, and " to beg their bread, after having ſpent all their ſubſtance, and run themſelves in " debt over head and ears. Nevertheleſs their lives are frequently a continued " ſeries of vice, but ever clothed under the veil of religion; for they enjoy very " great privileges from the court of Rome, and by that means ſcreen themſelves " from all ſecular power——, in order to enable them to perpetrate crimes with " impunity.——And notwithſtanding they profeſs the greateſt humility, appear- " ing in a poor and mean habit——, they yet, in reality, bear all the marks of con- " tempt and mockery, for (as they tell us) the ſake of Chriſt Jeſus and his religion; " they are nevertheleſs inſpired with the utmoſt ambition, and ſtudy only to gain " titles——, taking a pleaſure in being call'd rectors, provoſts, guardians, priors, " abbots, vicars, provincials, generals, and ſuch like; inſomuch that there is not a " body of men more deſirous of precedency and preeminence, than they." The author adds, that the above-mention'd character does not affect ſuch of the monks as lead truly religious lives, and in this we agree with him; but at the ſame time it muſt be own'd, that the motives for embracing a religious life, and the characters of monks in general, are juſtly expoſed in this paſſage.

When a perſon devotes himſelf to a monaſtick life, he muſt immediately not only renounce the pomps and vanities of the world, but alſo ‡ marriage and every kind of gallantry. Chaſtity, obedience, and poverty, are the three vows of the monaſtick life.

BENEDICTION des HABITS des RELIGIEUSES.

Les RELIGIEUSES reçoivent le VOILE.

We are told that the perſecutions which chriſtians laboured under in the primitive times, from the heathens, gave riſe to the monaſtick life. St. Anthony firſt inſtituted it in Egypt, in the beginning of the fourth century, and others continued it on the ſame plan. Afterwards new rules, and more auſtere mortifications were added, and they diſtinguiſh'd themſelves by a difference of habit. The work ſoon grew to a prodigious height, ſo as to become a great burden to the church; however, as they put on a great appearance of piety, its growth was wink'd at. However, 'tis certain that there were monks long before St. Anthony, i. e. chriſtians who ſpent their lives in retirement, and intirely diſengaged from the world. St. John baptiſt might poſſibly have ſerv'd for a model to thoſe religious hermits, tho we may ſuppoſe that he himſelf did not follow this way of life. St. Jerom* conſiders the ſons of the prophets as monks. The Therapeutæ were probably of this order, tho they admitted women, an article which is abſolutely forbidden to monks, becauſe of the ill conſequences attending it. Some pretend that theſe Therapeutæ were chriſtians, and others affirm them to have been Jews. As it is not our buſineſs to inquire into this point of hiſtory, we ſhall leave it to the deciſion of the learned; 'tis ſufficient for our purpoſe, that thoſe perſons led a kind of life different from the reſt of the world, and lived in retirement, whence we may juſtly conſider them as a ſort of monks. Other religions have formerly had, and ſtill have, great numbers of anchorets, of religious, of perſons of both ſexes, who withdrew from the ſociety of their fellow creatures, whether in cities, or rural retirements, the better to apply themſelves to devotion. Such probably were the Rechabites and † Eſſenes among the Jews: ſuch were, and are ſtill the Brachmans and Bramins. Probably ſome of the ſects of the antient philoſophers may be look'd upon as ſo many religious orders. We ſhall conclude this article with a remark, which is, that notwithſtanding the purity of religion in its infancy, nevertheleſs corruption and diſorder crept in early among ſuch as ſeparated themſelves from the reſt of the world: for there aroſe a certain tribe of people, who under a pretence of withdrawing and ſeparating themſelves from the reſt of mankind, burleſqued the piety of people of worth, by cenſures, calumnies, and invectives; robb'd the poor of alms, by a fraudulent and unjuſt trade of begging, and deceived the piety of good chriſtians by a ſevere outſide, and a dirty, greaſy dreſs. Theſe mock religious were call'd ‡ Rhemebothes.

The abbot preſides over the monks. The word abbot, which is originally Hebrew or Syriack, ſignifies father. The abbot is a prelate inferior to the biſhop: he we conclude of the numberleſs gallantries of the Cordeliers, confeſſors and directors of the nuns of Provins, as we find it in the proceedings that go under their name? We there ſee the amorous education which the worthy followers of St. Francis, beſtow'd on the boarders of the monaſtery of St. Clare. This education was improved by the gallant confeſſions, the jovial diſcourſes, the myſterious preſents, and ſuch edifying pieces as the catechiſm of love. Sometimes indeed their gallantry took the cloiſter turn, with the exception however of gay devices, amorous knots, red, purple grey, flame-colour, &c. ribbons, gay ſports, and ſuch like love-devotions. But then it will be anſwer'd, that theſe ſcandals were found only in one community, and at worſt by a particular order of monks, which has been but too much cenſur'd by ſatirical pens. Cannot we quote one virtuous monk? are there not whole bodies of them both learned and religious?

* Filii prophetarum, quos monachos novimus in veteri teſtamento, ædificabant ſibi caſulas, prope fluenta Jordanis, & turbis urbium derelictis, polentâ & herbis agreſtibus victitabant. S. Hierom. Epiſt. 4. ad Ruſticum, cited in Caſal. de rit. vet. Chriſt. cap. lii.

† Gens æterna ubi nemo naſcitur, ſays Pliny ſpeaking of the Eſſenes. The ſame may be ſaid of the monks among chriſtians.

he is the Lord's vicar over his monks; their father; and the myſtical * ſpouſe of his convent (which is the epitome of the church of God.) But it muſt be obſerved, that we here ſpeak of regular abbots. There are another ſort of abbots, or rather abbés, who have neither rule, tonſure, nor monaſtick juriſdiction; theſe devote themſelves intirely to gallantry, and hold no rank but in the empire of the fair ſex.

‡‡ A regular abbot is bleſſed by the biſhop in preſence of two abbots aſſiſtants, and this is perform'd with the ſame ſolemnity as that of a biſhop, &c. Both the perſon who conſecrates and the candidate for conſecration, are obliged to faſt; the church is adorn'd, and a ſolemn maſs is ſaid. On the credence near the altar the monaſtick habits of the abbot elect are laid, two little caſks of wine, &c. as at the conſecration of a biſhop. The abbot elect preſents himſelf, accompanied with the abbots aſſiſtants, and delivers the apoſtolical letters to the officiating prieſt or prelate, who afterwards bleſſes the habit, by praying over it, and ſprinkling it with holy water. The benediction being ended, he undreſſes the abbot elect, ſaying to him, exuat te Dominus veterem hominem cum actibus ſuis; i. e. may God put off from you the old man and his works: and at the ſame time he clothes him with the monaſtick habit, which repreſents † the new man, created according to God with juſtice and truth. The abbot being clothed in the monaſtick habit, and his hands join'd over his breaſt, ſays aloud in preſence of his monks, receive me, O Lord, according to thy holy word, that I may not be confounded. The monks anſwer, O Lord, we have received thy mercy, &c. After this the abbot muſt be received into the body of the monks, which the perſon who officiates performs, by preſenting the abbot to them: then the monks give him the kiſs of peace. We are not to omit, that the abbot who is inveſted in his dignity by the ‡ authority of the holy ſee, muſt take an oath of fidelity to the pope, in the ſame manner as the biſhops.

Laſtly, the officiating miniſter lays his hands on him in the manner deſcribed in the plate; gives him the rule by which he is to govern his convent; the paſtoral ſtaff, with which he is to govern the flock committed to his charge; the ring, which is the ſeal of the faith he owes to the church, the ſpouſe of Chriſt. After the offertory, the new elected abbot, on his knees, preſents two tapers, two loaves, and two little rundlets, to the officiating miniſter: he afterwards receives the ſacrament. The poſt-communion being ended, he receives the abbot's mitre, which, according to the pontifical, is the helmet of ſalvation, and alſo repreſents the two horns of the two teſtaments, whoſe enemies (thoſe of truth) he is preparing to combat. The gloves are the laſt thing he receives; but in caſe he be not a || mitred abbot, the latter ceremonies are omitted.

The manner of NUNS being PROFESSED.

'Tis probable, that the aged widows, and devout maidens, mention'd by writers in the firſt age of the church, and even in the new teſtament, were a kind of volunteer nuns, who uſed to preſcribe to themſelves certain duties, ſuch as faſting, doing works of charity, leading a life of celibacy, &c. In proceſs of time theſe nuns form'd communi-

‡‡ The ceremony deſcribed here is obſerved with regard to all kind of abbots.

communities, and eſtabliſh'd rules and practices for themſelves, which were carried to the ſame height as the numberleſs eſtabliſhments of the monks. The Jews had alſo certain devotees among them, who lived ſequeſtred from the vanities of the age, applying themſelves entirely to prayer and works of mercy: ſuch was Dorcas, and ſuch was Anna the propheteſs, mentioned in the new teſtament. 'Tis even probable enough, that the firſt ſhe-zealots of the church, quitted Judaiſm with this ſpirit of retirement, and introduced it into the chriſtian religion. The Veſtals among the Romans were likewiſe true nuns, who during their vow, * lived under a very ſevere rule. Theſe made a vow of celibacy in convents, into which men were not allow'd to enter, and were govern'd by an antient matron, call'd by the Romans, Maxuma, which is the ſame as ſuperior. This is all the affinity that can be perceiv'd between our nuns, and thoſe of the people above-mention'd.

When a perſon is to be choſen abbeſs, ſhe firſt takes the oath of fidelity to her ordinary, and to the church over which he preſides; then the prelate who receives her, gives her his bleſſing, and after having laid both his hands on her head, gives her the rule; bleſſes the white veil with which he covers her head, and † puts it on in ſuch a manner as to let it fall on her ſhoulders and breaſt. The reſt of the ceremony has nothing particular in it, which is only the kiſſing of the pax, and introducing the new elected abbeſs among the nuns.

Nuns or abbeſſes never receive the veil, but on ſolemn days, ſuch as ſundays or high feſtivals. In general, young women ought not to be allow'd to take the veil till five and twenty, nor till after they have paſs'd the ſtricteſt examination, and particularly till it has been ſtrongly inculcated to them, that they muſt live in a ſtate of virginity the remainder of their days; a vow that may indeed be made in a great warmth of devotion, and ſometimes from a pique, but the execution whereof depending upon a ‡ numberleſs multitude of circumſtances, is therefore expoſed to many dreadful temptations, even in the moſt ſtrict retirements: for the devil intrudes into all places. We might add, that many women make a vow of virginity after having taſted the ſweets of love; were not ſuch a reflection too uncharitable to be allow'd a place in the deſcription of a ceremony, in which a maiden profeſſes to devote herſelf to God only. The caution that is obſerv'd, to aſk them whether they are || real virgins; and the anſwer they certainly make, is no proof that they are truly ſo. In ſuch a caſe, a young woman who intends to devote herſelf to heaven, ſeldom fails of anſwering in a pious ſtrain. The habit, the veil, and ring of the candidate, are all carried to the altar; and ſhe herſelf accompanied by her neareſt relations, is conducted to the biſhop; two antient venerable matrons are her bride-women, when the biſhop ſays maſs. After the graduals, the candidates for the veil, attended in the manner above-mention'd, and with their faces cover'd, enter into the church, and preſent themſelves before the biſhop; but before they do this the arch-prieſt chaunts an anthem, the ſubject of which is, that they ought to have their lamps lighted, becauſe the bridegroom is coming to meet them; and while he is ſinging, they light their lamps. The arch-prieſt preſents them to the biſhop, in the manner repreſented in the fourth compartment of the plate. The biſhop, after their being preſented, calls them thrice in a kind of recitative,

* Their vow expired when they were thirty, after which they were allow'd to marry.

† Vide the third compartment. This ceremony is uſed when the abbeſs is not a nun.

‡ Phyſicians tell us, that an exceſs of continence often occaſions a great number of diſeaſes. 'Tis farther obſerved, that old maids are generally croſs-grain'd, ſour, and ſwell'd with ſuch a haughty ſpirit of devotion, as is very troubleſome to all about them.

whom they anſwer * in the ſame manner. Being come before the prelate, and on their knees, they attend to the exhortation he makes them with regard to a religious life, while the choir chaunt the litanies. Then the biſhop, having his crozier in his left hand, completes his benediction. They then riſe up, when he bleſſes the new habits, which denote the contempt of the world, and the humility of their hearts. A ſprinkle with holy water concludes the conſecration, and then the candidates go and put on their religious habits.

The veil, the ring, and the crowns are bleſſed after the ſame manner. All theſe benedictions being ended, they preſent themſelves in the habit of nuns before the biſhop, and ſing the following words on their knees, ‖ ancilla Chriſti ſum, &c. i. e. I am the ſervant of Chriſt, &c. In this condition they receive the veil; afterwards the ring, by which † he declares he marries them to Chriſt Jeſus, &c. and laſtly, the crown of virginity, to which they are call'd by the chaunting of an ‡ anthem. Being thus crown'd, an anathema is denounced againſt all who ſhall attempt to  turn them from God, by endeavouring to make them break their vow, in what manner ſoever, or ſhall ſeize upon any part of their wealth. After the offertory, they preſent lighted tapers to the biſhop, who afterwards gives them the communion; and as 'tis the cuſtom in ſeveral convents, for the nuns to read the office, and begin the canonical hours, the biſhop gives the breviary to thoſe who are to go into them. Theſe ceremonies being ended, the prelate gives them up to the conduct of the abbeſs, by ſaying to her, take care to preſerve pure and ſpotleſs thoſe young women whom God has conſecrated, &c.

The cuſtom of giving the veil to nuns is of great antiquity, and was practiſed before the age of St. Ambroſe and pope Liberius; as is manifeſt from the writers of the ſecond and third century.

Ceremonies relating to the CARDINALATE.

The cardinals are the ⌗ ſenators of the church, the counſellors of the ſucceſſor of St. Peter, and alſo ſometimes his tutors; for how perſuaded ſoever their eminencies may be of the infallibility of Chriſt's vicar, they yet take great care to guide him, and frequently oppoſe his views when they think them contrary to the intereſts of the church militant, or rather thoſe of the hierarchy. †† One of the Roman catholick writers ſup-

* In cantu, dicens venite. Virgines reſpondent, & nunc ſequimur. The firſt time they advance to the entrance of the choir; the ſecond to the middle, and the third to the chancel of the altar; they kneel down before the biſhop, with their faces to the ground, and afterwards riſe up ſinging this verſe, receive me, O Lord, according to thy holy word.

‖ Pontif. Roman.

† Deſponſo te Jeſu Chriſto, filio ſummi patris, qui te illeſam cuſtodiat. Vide the firſt compartment of the annex'd plate.

‡ Veni, ſponſa Chriſti, &c. Come, O ſpouſe of Chriſt, and receive the crown. In the firſt ages of the church it was uſual to ſet a crown on the heads of ſuch as died virgins, which cuſtom is ſtill obſerved in ſeveral parts of chriſtendom.

 The obligation of keeping a vow of chaſtity, is not of modern date, and is owing to the general opinion, ſo univerſally received in all religions, viz. that what has been once conſecrated to God, ought no longer to belong to men. By the fourth council of Carthage, all Widows, not excepting the moſt blooming, were forbid the communion, who after having devoted themſelves to God, and aſſum'd a religious habit, growing weary of ſpiritual marriage, embraced the temporal one: ad nuptias ſeculares.

⌗ Pius II. gave them the title of ſenators of Rome. In the time of Leo X. ſuch as affected writing in claſſick latin, ſpeaking of the cardinals and people of Rome, have often employ'd this antient expreſſion, ſenatus populuſque Romanus.

ſuppoſes that the cardinals were inſtituted by St. Peter, in order to be his coadjutors, his counſellors, his vicars in the pontificate. According to this author, Linus, Cletus, Clement, and St. Mark, were true cardinals tho they did not yet bear that auguſt title. Be this as it will, tho the dignity of cardinal were not originally inſtituted by St. Peter, 'tis nevertheleſs of great antiquity. It is thought, that in the beginning it was eſtabliſh'd for uſe rather than for ſhew. St. Eværiſtus eſtabliſh'd ſeven deacons, * as cardinals, to aſſiſt the wants of the poor chriſtians in Rome. Theſe deacons were then diſtinguiſh'd by the name, or pariſh of that diſtrict over which they preſided; and this is the firſt original of the titles given to cardinals. To theſe ſeven deacons St. Hyginus aſſociated others, both prieſts and deacons; but with this difference, that the latter ſhould conſider the former as their deans, or, as ſome will have it, cardinals; tho ſome are of opinion, that this word is too barbarous to be uſed in the age of Hyginus. We are aſſured, that under the reign of Conſtantine the great, there were twenty-eight of theſe cardinal prieſts and deacons, who took their titles † not only from the pariſh of their diſtrict, but likewiſe from ſuch family eſtates as charitable chriſtians bequeath'd to the clergy for their maintenance: and as theſe charities were frequently very conſiderable, it ſometimes, at that time, happen'd, that one cardinal enjoy'd three titles. 'Tis ſaid that St. Gregory the great increaſed the number of deacons, whoſe functions were the ſame as thoſe of cardinal-deacons, to ſeventy; however, that the laſt created were inferior to the former. But notwithſtanding this, about the age of Hugh Capet the dignity of cardinal was vaſtly inferior to what it is at this day. This is the remark of Paſquier, in his Recherches de la France, lib. iii. cap. v. who has added ſeveral reflections, to ſhew what opportunities this dignity gives the pope of increaſing his authority.

There are now three orders of cardinals, viz. biſhops, prieſts, and deacons: ſix of theſe are biſhops, fifty are prieſts, and fourteen deacons. ‡ Sixtus V. fixed the number of cardinals to ſeventy, and 'tis this aſſembly which is now call'd the ſacred college. This aſſembly, as Lunadoro tells us, in his relation of the court of Rome, has its camerlingue, or chamberlain, which poſt is annual; (but the popedom is for life.) A ſecretary, who is always an Italian; a national clerk, who is annual, and by turns a German, a Spaniard, a Frenchman; and a computiſt or accomptant. But a more copious account of thoſe employments will be given hereafter.

In

* 'Tis thought that the name of cardinal began in the age of St. Hyginus, about anno 159.

† After the church enjoy'd a calm, theſe firſt cardinals added to their titles the name of holy martyrs and confeſſors of the church.

‡ Or Paul IV. to imitate the antient Sanhedrim, compoſed of ſeventy elders, or rather in memory of the ſeventy diſciples of our Saviour. This regulation was confirm'd by Sixtus V. by a bull publiſh'd in 1586, Caſalius de veter. ſacr. Chriſt. Ritib. Lunadoro, an Italian author, ſpeaks of it as follows, where he mentions the change that has happen'd from time to time with regard to the election of cardinals: "Till the pontificate of Innocent II. ſubſiſted the cuſtom of electing cardinals one by one, i. e. to fill up the number of the ſacred college, as any of them died. Innocent II. and his ſucceſſors, introduced the cuſtom of giving the offices of ſuch cardinals as died, in commendam to the ſurviving ones; and ſometimes they gave the adminiſtration of the vacant cardinalate, to the arch-prieſt of the cardinals." However, Innocent II. himſelf created ſeveral cardinals at once. But the ſchiſm of Avignon having expoſed the apoſtolical ſee to the uſurpations of anti-popes, cardinals increaſed vaſtly above the uſual number, which till that ſchiſm, had conſiſted only of fifty-two or fifty-three. He adds, that to prevent freſh diſorders after the cruſhing of the ſchiſm, the cardinals of different obediantiæ were left in poſſeſſion of their titles and dignities. Under Leo X. there were ſixty-five cardinals; under Paul III. ſixty-eight; under Pius V. ſeventy-ſix. Aimon, in his picture of the court of Rome, has given the titles of antient and new cardinals to the number of ſeventy-one. He adds, that the ſupernumerary title of ſeventy-one, and ſometimes ſeventy-two, is preſerved for an extraordinary caſe; as for inſtance, the converſion of ſome great Prince.

In 1125, pope Honorius eſtabliſh'd ſeven cardinal biſhops, viz. of Oſtia, Porto, S. Ruſina, S. Sabina, Paleſtrina, Freſtati, and of Albano. The biſhops of Porto and St. Ruſina having been ſince united, there are no more than ſix cardinal-biſhops. However, mention is made of ſix cardinal-biſhops towards the cloſe of the eighth century, under the pontificate of Stephen IV. Others affirm, that theſe biſhops were not call'd cardinal biſhops, nor admitted to the election of the popes, till the pontificate of Alexander III. about the end of the twelfth century. As to the cardinal-deacons, we have already taken notice of their original, and their firſt functions; but time produced an alteration in theſe things: the care of the apoſtolical patrimony, and of the alms, were taken from them, and they had only left that of ſinging the goſpel before the holy father. As for the cardinal-prieſts, in the firſt ages of the church, their employment was to baptize, to bury, and take care of the bodies of the martyrs. This we find in ſome authors, who tell us farther, that from among theſe the pope uſed to chuſe the apoſtolical legates.

The PROMOTION of CARDINALS.

" When his holineſs makes a promotion of cardinals, as Aimon tells us, in his de-
" ſcription of the court of Rome, he gives them the title of prieſt, or deacon, ac" cording as he thinks proper; they afterwards arrive at epiſcopacy by right of ſu-
" periority, or by aſſuming the title of thoſe who die. And becauſe all cardinals " are equal by their dignity, they take place according to the date of their pro" motion, and the quality of their title. Prieſts have the precedency of deacons, tho
" the latter are biſhops, becauſe they have not ſuch title in the college till it has " been their option. On which we are to obſerve, that there are ſome titles for " deacons and prieſts, which are more profitable than thoſe of biſhops; tho ſome
" of the former are very burdenſome, and that none but cardinals who are actu" ally at Rome, when a title is vacant, are allow'd to chuſe. From all theſe circum-
" ſtances it reſults —— that ſometimes ſimple clerks have the title of prieſts,
" and prieſts have thoſe only of deacons; whilſt biſhops have only titles which " oblige them to yield the precedency to prieſts, and deacons, who have aſſum'd
" the title of biſhop by reſiding at Rome, or by taking advantage of the date of " their promotion, in caſe it has been made before that of the biſhop.

" The chief cardinal-biſhop, the chief cardinal-prieſt, and the chief cardinal-
" deacon, are call'd chief of the order. In this quality they have the prerogative
" in the conclave, of receiving the viſits of embaſſadors, and giving audience to " magiſtrates.

" The cardinal who is ſenior with regard to the date of his promotion, or who " has had an opportunity of aſſuming the firſt title of the cardinal-biſhops, namely " that of Oſtia, is by virtue thereof dean of the ſacred college, and has a right to " crown the pope, when he is elected from among ſuch cardinals as are not biſhops;
" upon which account he wears the arch-biſhop's pall, by a grant from pope Mark,
" the immediate ſucceſſor to Sylveſter. And as he repreſents the whole college, he " has the precedency of kings, and all temporal princes, and receives viſits before " all thoſe potentates who acknowledge the pope.

" Every cardinal at his promotion to the cardinalate, loſes all the benefices, pen-
" ſions, and employments he before enjoy'd; and as they are look'd upon as va" cant, 'tis wholly in the pope's breaſt to reſtore them to them, and to collate them
" to others, to enable them to live with greater ſplendor, and in a manner ſuitable
" to the dignity to which they are raiſed. As to their employments, particularly " thoſe they enjoy in Rome, as auditors, clerks, or treaſurers of the apoſtolick cham" ber,

" ber, and ſuch like, they revert to the chamber, which ſells them to others to the profit " of his holineſs; but foreign cardinals named by crown'd heads, don't receive the " hat till ſuch time as they have obtain'd an induct, or ſpecial grant de non vacando, " by virtue whereof they preſerve their poſts and employments, the pope remitting " his right of confiſcating them.

" Cardinals pretend that their dignity equals them to kings: they diſpute the " precedency with the children, brothers, uncles and other relatives of crown'd " heads, and with all princes who are not crown'd heads.

" Such cardinals as are biſhops of other dioceſes, than the ſix ſuffragans to Rome, " are not exempt from reſidence, except by a particular diſpenſation from the " pope, or are oblig'd to come to Rome when a conclave is to be held, or on ſome " other affair of great importance. But the ſix biſhops ſuffragan to Rome are not " obliged to reſidence, becauſe moſt of them are uninhabited, ſuch as Oſtia and " Porto, and are moreover ſo near Rome, that the abſence of their biſhop is no way " prejudicial to them; not to mention that they have always a vicar-biſhop upon the " ſpot, in partibus infidelium, in order to perform the epiſcopal functions.

" As cardinals, with regard to ſpirituals, are to govern the church of Rome " in all parts of the chriſtian world, ſeveral ſubjects of the different nations of " it are allow'd to aſpire to this dignity, according to the council of Trent. For " this reaſon the popes often create ſuch perſons cardinals as are nominated by " crown'd heads, who, 'tis preſum'd, have propoſed the moſt eminent among their " ſubjects for that purpoſe. Formerly the pope, in promoting of cardinals, uſed " to adviſe with the antient ones; but now he creates them without conſulting " any perſon. His holineſs does not even ſcruple of admitting his own relations " to the cardinalate, pretending that he therein imitates our ſaviour, who incorpo- " rated ſome of his relations into the apoſtolick college. He likewiſe rewards with " the purple, all thoſe who have done any important piece of ſervice to the court " of Rome; ſuch as nuncio's, auditors of the rota, clerks of the chamber, and o- " ther chief officers of the court; and ſometimes alſo, ſuch as are famous for their " learning, politicks, &c.

" All cardinals are, as ſuch, intitled to aſſiſt at conſiſtories; whenever the pope " or a king aſſiſts ſolemnly at maſs, at proceſſions, cavalcades, and other papal and " cardinal functions; and all thoſe who uſually reſide at Rome, are deputed to aſſiſt " at councils and congregations.

" Cardinals enjoy all epiſcopal rights in their churches, or titles, and all their de- " pendencies, except that they are not oblig'd to reſidence; and as to their juriſdicti- " on, they enjoy it jointly with the cardinal vicar-general; nothing but anticipa- " tion, or foreſtallments, can regulate their rights. But when thoſe titles or churches " are poſſeſs'd by regulars, they have nothing to do with the regular government of " their houſes, the cure of ſouls, and adminiſtration of ſacraments excepted. If the " title be a collegiate church, they then preſide over the chapter, and have a right " to collate to ſeveral canonries, prebends, and other benefices. They aſſiſt, with the " rochet on, in ſuch offices as are perform'd on the moſt ſolemn feſtivals in their " churches, where they bleſs the people in a ſolemn manner, and are ſeated under a " canopy in an eaſy chair raiſed in form of a little throne.

" Such cardinals as are in greateſt credit with the reigning pope, have certain " kingdoms, ſtates, republicks, and religious orders, under their protection. They " have the privilege of conferring what is call'd the four minor orders, that of " door-keeper, reader, exorciſt, and acolyte, on their domeſticks, and the ſubjects of " their titles. They are exempt from the ſucceſſion of clergymen, devolv'd to the " apoſtolical chamber in all Italy, and may bequeath eccleſiaſtical wealth in the

" ſame manner as patrimonial. They have likewiſe ſome other very conſiderable " privileges; ſuch as a power of reſigning their penſions, by particular grants from " popes; to be exempt from the examination of biſhops, when they are put into " ſees; to be believed in a court of juſtice upon their bare words, without being " obliged to take an oath, and their ſingle teſtimony is equal to that of two " witneſſes. They are conſider'd as citizens of whatever city the pope reſides in, " and don't pay any taxes. They grant an hundred days indulgence to whom- " ſoever they pleaſe, and acknowledge no one but the pope for their judge or ſupe- " rior, particularly in criminal matters; for as to civil, their cauſes are heard before " the auditors of the apoſtolick chamber.

" They have ſeveral other prerogatives, ſuch as the wearing of purple * habits, " a mantle royal with a train ſix ells long, a red hat, an epiſcopal mitre, tho they " be no more than prieſts, deacons, or clerks." Urban VIII. in order to add freſh ſplendor to the cardinalate, order'd that the title of eminence ſhould be given them.

Whenever the pope intends to raiſe any perſon to the dignity of cardinal, he makes a declaration thereof in a ſecret conſiſtory. This declaration is made after the extra-omnes, his holineſs ſaying to the cardinals aſſembled, habemus fratres, we have brethren. At the ſame time the pope pulls out the liſt of the new cardinals, when the cardinal-patron, or the moſt antient cardinal of the ſacred college, reads the liſt aloud. † The eve of the promotion, the cardinal-patron gives the new cardinals notice to wait upon the pope, in order to be admitted to audience of him. The cardinals elect kneel down there: the pope puts the red coiff on their heads, and making the ſign of the croſs on them, pronounces theſe words, eſto cardinalis, be thou a cardinal; after which the cardinal elect takes off his cap, and kiſſes his holineſs's feet. This is the private manner of making cardinals; but whenever they are made with pomp, the cardinal-patron ſends for the candidates in their coaches; after which they are conducted to the above-mention'd cardinal's apartment, in the apoſtolical palace. There the pope's barber ſhaves their crowns after the manner of cardinals; the cardinal's valet de chambre clothes them with the veſtments of a cardinal; which being done, the cardinal-patron preſents them to the pope, who puts the coiff on their heads in the manner above-mention'd. The cardinals elect return this honour by a compliment, as a teſtimony of their gratitude and humility.

Whenever any perſon out of Italy is created cardinal, he is not allow'd to put on the ſcarlet veſtments, till ſuch time as his holineſs has ſent him the coiff; but he is nevertheleſs allow'd to aſſume the title of cardinal. The coiff is brought him by one of the pope's chamberlains, with a brief from his holineſs. The cardinal elect is obliged to make the meſſenger a preſent of an hundred ducats at leaſt, this is the ‡ fix'd ſum.

The

* Cardinals wore only the common veſtment of prieſts, which was like the monkiſh habit, till the time of Innocent IV. The red hat was given them in 1243, in the council of Lions. Innocent IV. was deſirous of gaining their friendſhip by this honourable badge, and to win them over to his intereſt, upon account of the difference he had with the emperor. Under Boniface IX. they were clothed in ſcarlet, and even in purple, and their veſtments were the ſame in that age as in ours. According to other writers, they were not clothed in ſcarlet till the pontificate of Paul II. Others pretend that their veſtments were of that colour as early as Innocent III. and others again, that they wore the purple under Stephen IV. Paul II. diſtinguiſh'd them by the embroider'd ſilk mitre, and the red cope and coiff; red houzings for their mules, and gilt ſtirrups. Gregory XIV. order'd that all ſuch cardinals as were monks, ſhould have the red skull-cap, but that their veſtments ſhould be of the colour of their order; that they ſhould have no rochet, nor wear a cloth caſſock.

‡ This preſent amounts frequently to one, three, five thouſand, and ſometimes more ducats.

The coiff is given him by the pope's nuncio; but in caſe there be no nuncio upon the ſpot, then an emperor, a king, an arch-biſhop or a biſhop, performs the ceremony of putting the coiff on the head of the cardinal elect. This is perform'd after high-maſs.

When a cardinal goes to Rome to receive the hat from the pope in perſon, he muſt be dreſs'd in a rural habit, that is, a ſhort ſuit of clothes of a purple colour. The moment he is arrived at Rome, he muſt go and pay his devoirs to the holy father; but muſt put on the long veſtments when he goes to audience: and at his return from thence muſt go directly home, and not ſtir abroad till a publick conſiſtory is held. During this interval, the new cardinal receives the viſits of thoſe who come to congratulate him upon his exaltation; but he never waits on any perſon farther than the door of his anti-chamber. On the day of the publick conſiſtory, the new cardinal goes thither in his coach of ſtate, attended by his friends, in order to receive the red hat. In caſe the candidate be an arch-biſhop or a biſhop, he muſt wear the black pontifical hat, as Lunadoro, &c. relates, ubi ſupra. " He ſtops * at Sixtus V's. chapel, when the ceremony " is to be perform'd in the Vatican; and in a chamber, in caſe 'tis at Monto-cavallo. " In the mean time the eldeſt cardinals walk two and two into the hall of the con- " ſiſtory, when after having paid obeiſance, or kiſs'd the pope's hand, two cardinal- " deacons advance forward towards the cardinal elect, and lead him to the pope, to " whom he makes three very low bows; the firſt at the entrance of his holineſs's " apartment, the ſecond in the middle of it, and the third at the foot of the throne. " He then goes up the ſteps, kiſſes his holineſs's feet, who alſo admits him ad oſculum " oris, or to kiſs his mouth: this being done, the cardinal elect performs the oſculum " pacis, which is done by embracing all the ſenior cardinals, and gives them the " kiſs of peace.

" This firſt ceremony being ended, the choir chaunt the Te Deum, when the car- " dinals walk two and two to the papal chapel, then march round the altar, with " the cardinal elect accompanied by one of the ſeniors, who gives him the upper- " hand for that time only. This being done the cardinal elect kneels on the ſteps " of the altar, when the chief maſter of the ceremonies puts the cowl on his " head, which hangs behind his cope, and whilſt they are chaunting the Te Ergo of " the Te Deum, he falls proſtrate, as is ſeen in the plate, on his belly, and continues " in this poſture, not only till this anthem is ended, but alſo till the cardinal-deacon, " who is then ſtanding at the altar on the epiſtle ſide, reads certain prayers inſerted " in the pontifical.

" Theſe prayers being ended, the new cardinal riſes up: his cowl is lower'd, after " which the cardinal-deacon, in preſence of two heads of orders, and the cardinal " Camerlingo, preſents him the bull of the oath he is to take. Having read it, he " ſwears, he is ready to ſhed his blood for the holy Romiſh church, and for the main- " tenance of the privileges of the apoſtolick clergy, among whom he is incorporated.

" All the cardinals return afterwards into the chamber of the conſiſtory, in the " ſame order as they came out from thence: the newly elected cardinal goes thither " alſo, having that ſenior cardinal on his right hand who had accompanied him to " the chapel. He then kneels down before the pope; one of the maſters of the " ceremonies draws the cowl over his head, when his holineſs puts the red velvet hat " over the cowl, repeating certain † prayers at the ſame time.

Then

* Aimon's deſcription of the court of Rome.

† " Ad laudem omnipotentis Dei, & ſanctæ ſedis apoſtolicæ, &c. receive in honour of almighty " God, and the holy ſee-apoſtolick, this red hat, the mark of the cardinalate. By this hat you are " to learn, that you muſt defend till death, to the laſt drop of your blood, the exaltation of the holy " faith, the peace of chriſtianity, and the holy Roman church."

" Then the pope withdraws, and the cardinals, as they go out of the conſiſtory, " ſtop in the hall, where they make a ring; whereupon the newly elected cardinal " comes and ſalutes them in the middle of it, and thanks them one after the other, " for the honour they have done him in receiving him as one of their brethren. " His compliment being ended, the ſenior cardinals come one after another, and con- " gratulate him on his promotion. Afterwards they all return to their reſpective " homes; but when the reigning pope has a nephew in the ſacred college, the car- " dinal nephew invites his new collegue to dine with him in his palace."

The red hat which was given the cardinal, is carried to his palace, in a large ſilver baſon gilt, which one of the privy chamberlains of his holineſs delivers to ſome uſher or door-keeper; and the new cardinal gives this uſher, thirty crowns of gold, which is his fee. It were needleſs to inſert here the tax, which ſhews the perquiſites the newly elected cardinal is obliged to give to the chamberlains and other officers or domeſticks of his holineſs.

" The ſame day that the cardinal has received the red hat, he begins his viſits " by that of St. Peter's church; he thence goes to the cardinal-deacon of the ſacred " college, and afterwards waits on the crown'd heads, in caſe any happen to be at " Rome at that time: as for the other cardinals, the embaſſadors, princes, princeſſes, " and ladies of the court, he viſits them as he has opportunity, and is not obliged " to obſerve either rank or precedency.

" In the firſt ſecret conſiſtory after the affairs which lie on the table have been ter- " minated in preſence of the newly elected cardinal, the pope performs the ceremony " of ſhutting his mouth; the meaning of which is, that he forbids him to reveal to " any perſon the leaſt circumſtance of what has paſs'd among them." Antiently the ſenior cardinals pretended, that thoſe cardinals whoſe mouths the pope had ſhut, could neither have an active, or a paſſive voice in the conclave; i. e. that if the pope ſhould happen to die during that interval, they could neither give their votes for the election of another pontiff, nor be themſelves elected by other cardinals: but Pius V. declared by a bull dated the 26th of January 1571, that the cuſtom practiſed by the pope of laying his hand on the mouth of the cardinal elect, is no more than a bare ceremony, to teach them that they ought to be very circumſpect in their diſcourſe; and, that it does not exclude them from thoſe privileges enjoy'd by ſuch as have both an active and paſſive voice.

In the ſecond or third conſiſtory, the pope opens the mouth of the new elected cardinals, * but they are firſt deſired to leave the conſiſtory for a moment; which being done, his holineſs propoſes to the antient cardinals the opening the mouths of the new elected ones. They are then re-admitted; upon which the pope addreſſes an exhortatory diſcourſe to them, aſſigns them their titles, puts on the ring-finger of their right hand, a gold ring, in which a ſaphir is ſet, for which each cardinal pays five hundred ducates to the college of the congregation of the faith. " This ring, " according to a bull of Gregory XV. is given to the newly elected cardinal, to ſhew " that the church is now his ſpouſe, and that he muſt never abandon it."

The pope, in opening the cardinal's mouth, ſays to him; In the name of the Father, &c. we open your mouth, that you may give your opinion in our conferences and councils; in all neceſſary caſes, or in ſuch as relate to the cardinals, or their functions; in our conſiſtory, out of the conſiſtory, at the election of a ſovereign Pontiff. In giving them their titles, or churches, he ſays to them; To the honour of almighty God, &c. we commit the church of * * * to thy care, together with the clergy, the people, &c. belonging to it, &c. His holineſs, at repeating theſe laſt words, puts the above-mention'd ring on the cardinal's ring-finger.

" Formerly

* Sacr. Ceremon. Eccleſ. Romanæ. lib. i.

" Formerly the pope uſed to ſend the hat to cardinals, but ever ſince Paul II. " gave them the red cap, which is a kind of coiff, they are obliged to go in perſon " to Rome for it. However, to preſerve the remembrance of the carrying the hat " antiently to all ſuch perſons as at the time of their creation were not in Rome, " four confederate-privy chamberlains always carry four red hats on ſo many maces, " in the papal cavalcades, to denote that it was formerly their office to carry them " to the cardinals elect.

" When the pope, by a ſpecial favour, is pleaſed to ſend the hat to an ab- " ſent cardinal, the following ceremonies are obſerved: the hat, in this caſe, is " carried by an honorary chamberlain, or a gentleman of the pope's houſhold, " together with a brief directed to the nuncio, or the biſhop of the place where the " cardinal elect reſides. As ſoon as the latter hears of the approach of the cham- " berlain who brings the hat, he ſends his houſhold to meet him, and as many of " his friends as he can get together for that purpoſe, to do him the greater ho- " nour, when they all make their entry together in cavalcade, if allow'd by the " cuſtom of the place. Then the pope's chamberlain holds the red hat aloft on " the mace, in order that it may be ſeen by all the ſpectators.

" On a ſunday, or ſome high feſtival, the pope's envoy, and the prelate who is to " perform the ceremony, meet at the newly elected cardinal's with their domeſticks, " and as many friends as they can get together, and go in cavalcade to the principal " church of the place in the following order.

" The march is open'd by the drums and trumpets; then the livery-ſervants. The " ſoldiers upon guard, in caſe there be any, or the inhabitants of the town under " arms march before the gentlemen, and afterwards the pope's chamberlain in a " purple habit, holding the red hat aloft, and uncover'd. Immediately after fol- " lows the newly elected cardinal, with his cope on, his cowl on his head, and over " all a black hat. On the right hand the prelate marches who is to perform the " ceremony, and on his left ſome other perſon of quality; ſuch as the chief noble- " man of the place, and behind him the coaches of the cardinal, and of all ſuch " perſons as are proud of doing him honour with a great train. When this ceremo- " ny is perform'd in any place where a king or prince reſides, their guards always " attend on the newly elected cardinal.

" When the cavalcade is come to the church, maſs is ſung in it, and 'tis uſual " for the king or prince of the place, as alſo the chief lords and ladies, to be " preſent at it. Maſs being ended, the prelate who is to perform the ceremony " puts on his cope and mitre; then, being ſeated in an eaſy chair which ſtands on " the ſteps of the altar, with his back turn'd to it, the perſon who brought the hat " lays it on the altar, and preſents the pope's brief to the prelate, who gives it to " his ſecretary, when this latter reads it with an audible voice, ſo as to be heard by " the whole congregation. Immediately after the prelate makes an oration in praiſe " of the newly elected cardinal, and at the concluſion declares, that he is ready to " deliver the hat to him, according to his holineſs's order.

" Then the cardinal elect advances towards the altar, and kneeling down takes " the ſame oath before the prelate, which the newly created cardinals take before " the pope. Then the prelate riſes from his ſeat, and taking off his mitre ſays ſome " prayers over the new cardinal, whoſe head is covered with the cowl; after which " the prelate puts his hat on, and at the ſame time repeats a prayer out of the " Romiſh pontifical. He afterwards gives him the kiſs of peace, upon which " the Te Deum and ſome prayers are ſung, which concludes the ceremony. " Then the newly created cardinal returns in cavalcade, with the red hat on his " head."

This pompous ceremony concludes with feſtivity and noble banquets, but it happens ſo ſeldom that we ſcarce have one example of it. The Romiſh ceremonial ordains, that it muſt never be practiſed except on ſuch occaſions as are of great importance to the holy ſee, at which times the apoſtolical legate muſt have all imaginable honours paid him.

The manner in which the newly created CARDINAL takes poſſeſſion of his TITLE.

* " When a cardinal takes poſſeſſion of his title, he goes under the portico of " his church, and there puts on the cope of a colour ſuitable to the ſolemnity " of the day, and afterwards kneels down on a cuſhion laid on a carpet in the " middle of the great gate. Then the moſt dignified prieſt of the ſaid church, ha- " ving his cope on his ſhoulders, preſents him the croſs to kiſs; after which the " cardinal advances three or four ſteps into the church, and immediately an acolyte " preſents him the navicula, out of which his eminence takes ſome incenſe, and " bleſſes it as he throws it into the thurible. After this he takes off his cap, and " having received the ſprinkler from the ſame prieſt who gave him the croſs to kiſs, " he puts ſome drops of holy water on his forehead; immediately after he ſprinkles " the clergy and the people about him therewith. He then gives the thurible to the " prieſt who has the cope on, and ſtanding up, with his cap on, receives the incenſe " which this prieſt offers him thrice ſucceſſively.

" This being done, Te Deum is ſung; then the chapter of the church in pro- " ceſſion, attend on the cardinal to the high altar, where he kneels till the Te Deum " is ended; then the prieſt who introduces him, ſtanding up on one ſide of the " ſaid altar, ſays the firſt and laſt words of the Lord's prayer aloud, and the reſt to " himſelf; after which he ſings ſeveral prayers without raiſing or falling his voice; " which being ended the cardinal riſes up, and goes and ſeats himſelf under a canopy " on the goſpel ſide. All the congregation come and kiſs his hand, the officiating " prieſt excepted, to whom he gives the kiſs of peace on his right cheek.

" Then the bull is read which inveſts the cardinal with the title in queſtion, and " the benefice he has now taken poſſeſſion of. In caſe it be in the morning, a pri- " vate, or ſolemn maſs is ſaid, as the cardinal thinks proper; but when the ceremony " is perform'd in the afternoon, veſpers are ſung. If it be in the evening, they " only ſing compline. After this the cardinal goes to the middle of the altar, when, " having put his cowl over his head, he gives his bleſſing to the people, and grants " them an hundred days indulgence. He then goes down to the foot of the altar, " and after having taken off his cope, and put his lunula over the rochet uncover'd, " he walks in the middle of the church, and as he paſſes, gives his bleſſing on both " ſides of him. Being arrived at the ſacriſty, he viſits the relicks, and when he " goes out and returns to his palace, he puts on his camail, or purple ornament, and " his lunula over his rochet.

" If the cardinal who takes poſſeſſion of his title is only in deacon's orders, i. e. " if his church has only the title of a deaconry, notwithſtanding he be a biſhop or " prieſt, he in this caſe does not go to the altar, and bleſs the people from thence; " nor when he goes from the altar to the ſacriſty, nor in any part whatſoever of his " church.

" A cardinal who aſſiſts at maſſes, veſpers, proceſſions, and other ſolemn offices " of the church, the title whereof he is put in poſſeſſion, is allow'd to wear the red " cope,

* Aimon's deſcription of the court of Rome.

" cope, whereas the other cardinals who aſſiſt at the above-mention'd ſervice, are " permitted to wear only the purple cope, with a proviſo, however, that it be not on " a day when the wearing of that colour is prohibited.

" On the day of the ſaint tō whom the titular church of a cardinal is dedicated, " the incumbent goes thither in red veſtments, and a cope of the ſame colour, tho " it be in advent, ſeptuageſima, and lent, and celebrates the office there himſelf. He " then gives the pontifical bleſſing; but in caſe he himſelf does not officiate, he " goes and ſits down on the pontifical ſeat which is cover'd with red cloth, and " under a canopy. If during his aſſiſting at the office, any cardinal ſhould happen " to come to it, his chamberlain and other gentlemen, muſt go and receive him, " and accompany him, at the ſame time making him an excuſe in their maſter's " name; and when he has ended his devotions, they muſt conduct him to his " coach.

" In caſe the titular cardinal is not buſy, he himſelf muſt go and receive the car- " dinals who come into his church; wait upon them to the deſk, and reconduct " them: but if the cardinals are deſirous of hearing maſs or veſpers, which they ne- " ver do when the throne or rather pontifical ſeat is raiſed, the titular cardinal muſt " ſeat them in the moſt honourable place, tho he himſelf be a ſenior cardinal; ſeat- " ing himſelf in the loweſt place, as being in his own church. However, there are " two caſes in which this rule is not to be obſerv'd, viz. when either the pope or a " cardinal aſſiſt ſolemnly at maſs, or at the funeral of a cardinal; in this caſe the " incumbent, tho in his own church, ſtands according to his rank, and muſt be " cloathed in veſtments of the ſame colour with the reſt of the cardinals, without " any other formality.

" To conclude: we are to obſerve that the three arch-prieſts of the great churches " of St. John of Lateran, of St. Peter's, and S. Maria Maggiore's, enjoy the ſame " privileges in their reſpective chapters, as the titular cardinals in their churches.

The Interment of CARDINALS.

" * When a cardinal dies, he is embalm'd, and the following night is carried in- " to the church, where his obſequies are to be ſolemniz'd. One of the largeſt chur- " ches is generally made uſe of for this purpoſe, in order that the greater concourſe " of people may aſſemble in it. 'Tis hung all over with black velvet, and adorn'd " with eſcutcheons, on which the arms of the deceaſed are repreſented. A great " number of white tapers are lighted up on both ſides of the nave.

" In the middle of the church a kind of very high and large bed of ſtate is ſet, " cover'd with black brocade, with two pillows of the ſame colour, both which be- " ing put one above the other, are laid under the head of the deceaſed cardinal, " whoſe corps lies in the middle of the bed, and in ſuch a manner that his feet point " towards the great gate, and his head towards the high altar.

" The corps of the deceaſed cardinal is clothed in pontifical veſtments, viz. the " mitre, the cope, if he were a biſhop; the chaſuble, if a prieſt; and the tunick, " if a deacon. The ſix maſters of the ceremonies aſſiſt in this church, clothed " in caſſocks of purple ſerge; and all the pope's couriers in long robes of the ſame " colour, trailing on the ground, with ſilver maces in their hands. There are like- " wiſe two of the deceaſed's tall lacqueys, each holding a wand on which purple " taffety ſtreamers with the arms of the deceaſed cardinal, are fix'd; with theſe they " are continually fanning his face, in order to keep off the flies.

" On

" On the morrow after veſpers, the religious mendicants meet together in a chapel " of that church, where they ſing the mattins of the deceaſed, each order repeating " alternately a nocturnum, and the pope's muſick the laudes. In the mean time the car- " dinals arrive clothed in purple, and at their coming into the church they put on a " cope of the ſame colour, and then advance forwards before the high altar, on " which the hoſt lies, where they offer up their prayers, and adore upon their knees. " They afterwards go one after another to the feet of the deceaſed, when they re- " peat the pater-noſter, &c. to which they add certain verſes out of the ſcripture, " and the prayer abſolve, from the office of the dead.

" They then make the uſual ſprinkling with holy water, and go and ſeat them- " ſelves in the choir, where they hear the office of the deceaſed, ſung by ſeveral " monks and prieſts with great ſolemnity. Others repeat it to themſelves, not ſtirring " out of their places till it be ended; ſuch as the cardinal-prieſts and biſhops on the " epiſtle ſide, and the reſt of the clergy in the loweſt ſeats, which ſtand round the " choir; the cardinals being ſeated on the higheſt, or on high benches.

" This being done, the congregation return to their reſpective homes, without any " farther ceremony. At night the corps is ſtript, and laid in a leaden coffin, which " is put in another of cypreſs wood cover'd with black cloth. The corps is carried " in a coach, accompanied with the rector and the chaplains of the deceaſed, who " go by torch-light to the church where he is to be interr'd.

" Moſt cardinals who die in Rome are generally buried in the church of their " title, unleſs he were a Roman of an exalted condition, and had deſired to be " interr'd in the ſame vault with his anceſtors; or ſome foreign cardinal who chuſes " to be buried in the church in Rome belonging to the clergy of his nation.

" Four of the cardinals are always buried with great pomp and magnificence, viz. " the dean of the apoſtolick college, the grand penitentiary, the vice-chancellor, and " the camerlingo. The following order is obſerved at this ceremony:

" After that the office of the dead has been ſung in preſence of the cardinals, they " withdraw, and the proceſſion begins. It opens with the orphans call'd illiterati; " after them ſeveral fraternities march, the penitents whereof have lighted tapers in " their hands. They are covered with their cowls, and clothed in large party-co- " lour'd robes, according to their inſtitution: ſome are red, others black, white, " purple, blue, yellowiſh, of an olive colour; and ſeveral others of the moſt odd " and fantaſtick colours.

" After theſe fraternities come the religious mendicants, and others, according to " their rank. Afterwards the ſecular clergy belonging to the pariſh of the deceaſed " cardinal, and thoſe of the church where he is to be buried, when they are not " regulars.

" If the deceaſed cardinal was arch-prieſt of one of the three great churches of " Rome, the chapter aſſiſts at it; as alſo at the interment of a titular cardinal of " St. Laurence in Damaſo, or S. Mary's on the other ſide the Tyber.

" After this proceſſion, the corps advances forwards, dreſs'd in pontifical veſt- " ments according to the rank the deceaſed held in the ſacred college; but, tho he " were only a cardinal deacon, he nevertheleſs has a mitre on his head. In this " manner he is carried on the ſhoulders of his tall lacqueys, ſurrounded by his " houſhold all in mourning, viz. his footmen, who walk before the corps; and his " almoners, gentlemen and officers following after. On each ſide of the corps two " files of the pope's Swiſs guards walk, with halbards in their hands; and in the " rear, part of the pope's houſhold in cavalcade, the captain of the Swiſs guards, " the pope's mace-bearers, a maſter of the ceremonies with his major-domo, the " aſſiſting biſhops, the apoſtolical prothonotaries, the chaplains, the apoſtolical equer- " ries, and the chamberlains without the walls.

" When

" When a cardinal who is a prince, or of a very illuſtrious family, dies, the pope " generally ſends all his houſhold to grace the funeral, as alſo at the obſequies of the " four cardinals in the exalted ſtations above-mention'd.

" When the corps of the cardinal is carried into the church where it is to be " interr'd, the next morning a ſolemn maſs is ſung, in the preſence of the whole ſacred " college, for the repoſe of his ſoul; and on this occaſion all the ceremonies are " obſerv'd which are uſed at the interment of a pope; excepting, that for the ſove- " reign pontiff, there are five aſſiſtant cardinals clothed in their pontifical veſtments; " but at that of a cardinal, five biſhops perform the ceremony of ſprinkling, of in- " cenſing, and the uſual prayers ordain'd in the ritual for this office.

The Romiſh * ceremonial takes notice of the nine-days devotion which is made for the deceaſed cardinals. The firſt and laſt days, an hundred and fifty maſſes muſt be ſaid, when a little piece of money and two ſmall candles are given to each officiating prieſt. The other ſeven days an hundred are ſaid. As the reſt of the ceremonies are the ſame with thoſe uſed at the common maſſes of the dead; we ſhall not here repeat what has been already ſaid with regard to the maſs of the dead, and of the burials, &c.

The INTERMENT of a POPE.

We are now going to ſee his holineſs laid in his grave. † He, who by his power and dignity is ſuperior to the reſt of mankind; who binds and looſes every thing upon earth, is yet too weak to break the bands of death when his fatal hour is come. 'Tis in theſe moments the holy father muſt call to mind, that when he was raiſed to the holy ſee, all the glories of the ſublunary world were repreſented to him as the ſmoke which vaniſhes away. We ſhall not give the particulars which relate to the preliminaries of his death. He muſt recollect himſelf, examine his conſcience, make his confeſſion, ‡ deſire his confeſſor to give him a plenary indulgence; make ſome reparation to thoſe he has offended in his life-time; afterwards receive the Viaticum, aſſemble the ſacred college, make his confeſſion of faith before them, and beſeech their eminencies to forgive him || for all thoſe things in which he may have offended any of them during his pontificate. The Romiſh ceremonial, among other particulars, enjoins his holineſs when he finds his laſt hour approaching, to recommend to the cardinals the chuſing a worthy paſtor for his ſucceſſor; but this is ſuperfluous, ſince the cardinals never aſſemble to elect a ſovereign pontiff but they firſt beſeech the Holy Spirit to aſſiſt them in their choice.

 " When the pope is at the laſt gaſp, his nephews and domeſticks ſtrip the " palace of all its furniture. Immediately after his holineſs is expired, the officers " of the apoſtolick chamber come and ſeize his goods; but the pope's relations take " care that they find nothing but bare walls, and the corps lying on a ſtraw bed, " with an old wooden candleſtick, in which the ſnuff of a taper is burning.

" At the ſame time the cardinal camerlingo comes in purple veſtments, accom- " panied with the clerks of the chamber in mourning, to ſearch the pope's corps: " He calls him thrice by his chriſtian name; and as he gives no manner of " anſwer, or diſcovers the leaſt ſign of life, he cauſes an inſtrument of his death " to be drawn up by the apoſtolical prothonotaries. He takes from the maſter

" of the pope's chamber, the fiſherman's ring, which is the pope's ſeal, made " of ſolid gold, and worth an hundred crowns. He breaks it to pieces, and gives " them to the maſters of the ceremonies, whoſe perquiſite they are. The datary " and ſecretaries, who have the reſt of the ſeals of the deceaſed pope, are obli- " ged to carry them to the cardinal camerlingo, who cauſes them to be broke in " preſence of the auditor of the chamber, the treaſurer, and the apoſtolick clerks, " and none of the other cardinals are allow'd to aſſiſt at this function.

" After this, the cardinal-patron and the pope's nephews, are obliged to leave " the palace in which he died, which is generally the Vatican, or Monte Cavallo, un- " leſs he happens to die ſuddenly. The cardinal camerlingo takes poſſeſſion of " theſe palaces in the name of the apoſtolick chamber; and after having entred " it with the formality above-mention'd, he takes a ſhort inventory of the re- " maining moveables; but there is ſeldom any thing left, as was before obſerved.

" In the mean time, the penitentiaries of St. Peter, and the almoners of the " deceaſed pope, after having cauſed the corps to be ſhaved, have it immediately " embalm'd. The dead pontiff is then clothed in his pontifical veſtments, ha- " ving his mitre on his head, and the chalice in his hand. Immediately the " camerlingo ſends a body of guards to ſecure the gates of the city, the caſtle " of St. Angelo, and other poſts. The caporioni or captains of the diſtricts, patrol " night and day with their guards, to prevent thoſe who are caballing for the electi- " on of a new pope from raiſing any ſedition.

" After the camerlingo has thus provided for the ſecurity of Rome, he comes " out of the apoſtolical palace, and goes round the city in his coach, accom- " panied with the Swiſs guards, and the captain of the guard, who uſually at- " tended upon the deceaſed pope. When this march begins, the great bell of " the Capitol is rung, which is never heard but at the death of the pontiff, to " give notice thereof to the citizens.

" At this ſignal, the Rota and all the tribunals of juſtice are ſhut up, as " likewiſe the Datary, purſuant to the bull of Pius IV. in eligendis. No more " bulls are now given out; the ſeveral ordinary congregations are likewiſe ſuſpen- " ded, inſomuch that none but the cardinal camerlingo, and the cardinal grand " penitentiary continue in their ſeveral employments.

" But when his holineſs declares by his laſt will, or by word of mouth, that " he chuſes not to be buried in St. Peter's, but in ſome other church he names, " then his body muſt not be tranſlated till after it has lain a year in ſome of " the chapels of that church; and in this caſe the corps cannot be removed till " a large ſum of money is paid to the chapter of St. Peter; it ſometimes coſts " upwards of a million, in caſe the pope whoſe corps they are deſirous of re- " moving, was famous for his piety, and that there are any grounds to preſume he " will one day be canoniz'd.

SUPPLEMENT

TO THE

Hierarchy of the Church.

In which an ACCOUNT is given of the Spiritualities of the POPE's COURT.

IN the firſt part of this diſſertation we mention'd the pope as the head of the church militant: we have deſcribed the ceremonies of his election; we have alſo conſider'd him as the chief miniſter of the church, which engaged us in the deſcription of ſeveral auguſt ceremonies, by which he appears to be the ſovereign monarch of the kingdom of Chriſt, rather than the ſervant of ſervants. In the latter part of the ſaid diſſertation we have ſeen him deſcend from our Saviour's throne to the grave. We muſt once again conſider him with regard to his exalted dignity, but ſhall not touch upon the temporalities thereof. We ſhall repreſent him to the reader only in his ſpiritual reign, and ſhall mention only ſuch particulars thereof as have already been taken notice of by writers of known veracity.

The POPE's Vicar-general.

The pope conſider'd as a biſhop, has a dioceſe ſubordinate to him; in this quality he appoints for his * vicar-general a biſhop, who, ever ſince Pius IV. is always a cardinal. This employment of vicar-general is for life, and he is by his office the judge of all eccleſiaſticks both ſecular and regular, of both ſexes, as alſo of all the Jews and curtezans at Rome, and its dependencies. He confirms, and confers all ſacred orders. He is impower'd to inſpect and viſit all churches, monaſteries, hoſpitals, and other pious houſes, thoſe of foreign nations excepted, which are all exempt. He has a vice-gerent, who is always a biſhop, to aſſiſt him in his epiſcopal functions. He has likewiſe a lieutenant, who is a prelate, but under the rank of biſhop; a referendary of both ſignatures, who takes cognizance of all civil cauſes heard in his court; and a judge criminal, who is a layman, to judge all crimes committed by clerks and regulars: but that which makes the poſt of grand-vicar very conſiderable and profitable, is the power he has of deciding all differences that ariſe in marriage.

The apoſtolick chamber pays him proviſionally, excluſive of the profits ariſing from his courts, twelve hundred crowns of gold annually. He has four notaries, or regiſters, a provoſt, and a company of bailiffs and ſergeants.

As we have already taken notice of the penitentiary, we ſhall not mention him in this place.

* Aimon's deſcription of the court of Rome, quoted from Lunadoro relazione, &c. We have contented our ſelves with copying the former with ſome reſtrictions; ſo that whatever is quoted in the ſupplement is taken from Aimon.

The Pope's Chancellor and Vice-Chancellor.

The chancellor wrote formerly, in the pope's name, all the reſcripts, doubts and ſcruples with reſpect to faith, which biſhops and others propoſed to him; inſomuch that he executes the office of ſecretary of ſtate, of the briefs, and that of chancellor. The firſt mention we find made of this officer, is in St. Jerom's epiſtle to Gerontius; and 'tis ſuppoſed that he himſelf exerciſed that office under pope Damaſus.

This office, till the pontificate of Gregory VIII. in 1187, had always been conferred either on a biſhop or a cardinal; but this pope, who himſelf had exerciſed it before he was raiſed to the pontificate, tho he was only cardinal of Santa Ruſina, cauſed it, after he was raiſed to the popedom, to be exerciſed by a canon of St. John's of Lateran, who aſſum'd the title of the pope's vice-chancellor, as did alſo five or ſix other canons of the ſame church, who exerciſed it after him. But Boniface VIII. having reſtored it to the college of cardinals, thoſe who have exerciſed it ſince that time, have contented themſelves with the title of vice-chancellors, tho they are in reality chancellors, and act much after the ſame manner as the chancellors of France, and thoſe of the other potentates of Europe.

This dignity is purchaſed, and coſts an hundred thouſand crowns; it yields about * ten thouſand crowns per annum to the incumbent, and is for life. The juriſdiction of the cardinal vice-chancellor extends to the iſſuing out all apoſtolical letters and bulls, as alſo to all petitions ſign'd by the pope, except thoſe expedited by brief, under the fiſherman's ring. All the officers of the chancery, whereof mention will be made hereafter, aſſemble thrice a week, viz. on tueſdays, thurſdays, and ſaturdays, in the vice-chancellor's palace.

We find, in the bulls iſſued out by the pope's chancellors and vice-chancellors, ſeveral titles which ſavour very much of pride: as for inſtance, we read in a reſcript of pope Nicholas III. quoted in the 96th diſtinction of the canon law, that 'tis manifeſt the Roman pontiff cannot be judged by any perſon, becauſe he himſelf is God. And in a bull of pope Gregory IX. inſerted in the decretals under the title of primacy, we there read the following words; God has made two great lights for the firmament of the univerſal church; i. e. he has inſtituted two dignities, viz. the pontifical authority, and the royal prerogative; but that which preſides over the day, i. e. over ſpiritual affairs, is greater; and that which preſides over material things, leſs: whence we muſt confeſs, that there is as much difference between pontiffs and kings, as between the ſun and moon.——— We affirm that every human creature is ſubject to the Roman pontiff; and that, by virtue of his plenitude of power, and ſovereign authority, he may diſpenſe with laws both human and divine. As we find it expreſs'd in the gloſſary in the ſame place.

The Regent, Prelates, and Regiſters of the Pope's Chancery.

The regent of the apoſtolick chancery is eſtabliſh'd by the vice-chancellor's patent, by which he is impower'd to commit all appeals to the referendaries, and auditors of the rota; and theſe he diſtributes to them by order, purpoſely that each of them may be imploy'd, and get money in their turns: There are twelve referendaries, who who are all prelates, and are call'd regiſters of the high court; they are clothed in a long purple robe. Theſe employments are purchaſed, and the vice-chancellor has the nomination of ſix, the others being in the pope's gift. The poſt of regent is purchaſed at thirty thouſand crowns, and the annual produce amounts to three thouſand. Thoſe of the prelates referendaries of both ſignatures who are regiſters of the high court, ſell for thirteen thouſand crowns, and produce each twelve hundred crowns annually. Theſe thirteen prelates have ſeats when the pope aſſiſts ſolemnly at the office, but the regent never appears there in that quality, to prevent any diſputes about precedency.

The regiſters of the high court draw up the minutes of all bulls, from the petitions ſign'd by the pope, and collate them after they are written in parchment; they afterwards ſend them to the regiſters of the lower court, who, with the regiſters or apoſtolical writers, tax them. All theſe employments would not be worth ſo much, nor produce ten per cent. profit, were the bulls which collate to rich benefices iſſued out gratis; but nothing is ever purchaſed from the apoſtolick chancery, without paying ſums proportionable to the value of the benefices, or other grants.

The POPE'S Secretary of State, and Under-Secretaries.

The cardinal-nephew, if the pope has any, or another in his default, is always the pope's principal ſecretary of ſtate, for this is never given to any perſon under the dignity of cardinal; and notwithſtanding there are ten other ſecretaries of ſtate, between whom the provinces of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate are divided, they nevertheleſs are in ſuch ſubordination to him, that they do nothing without his participation, ſo that, properly ſpeaking, they are no more than under-ſecretaries of ſtate.

The cardinal ſecretary ſigns, by the pope's order, all letters directed to princes, nuncios, vice-legates, governors, prefects; and the patents of all thoſe who are appointed for the government and adminiſtration of juſtice, in the whole territory of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate; but proviſions of governors of cities, and large towns ſurrounded with walls; thoſe of legates, vice-legates, and preſidents, are drawn up by brief, under the fiſherman's ring or ſeal: and all thoſe who are raiſed to theſe employments, cardinals excepted, take an oath before the cardinal camerlingo, in preſence of a notary of the chamber, and ſwear on their own briefs, and the abſent do the ſame by proxy.

All the ambaſſadors of princes, after having had audience of the pope, come and viſit the cardinal-ſecretary, before they wait upon any of the magiſtrates of Rome; becauſe the poſt of ſuper-intendant of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, is annexed to his ſecretaryſhip. Theſe two poſts are for life, and the pope generally beſtows them gratis; but ſometimes, in caſe he be in an urgent neceſſity for money, he ſells them; they produce fifteen thouſand crowns annually.

The under-ſecretaries are, by their office, obliged to draw up all the minutes which the cardinal-ſecretary may want, and to write over fair all the letters and patents he is to ſign. Theſe employments are frequently given to the ſecretaries of the conſultation, or of the congregation of good government; as alſo to the maſter of the chamber, and the pope's auditor, who take in memorials and petitions by which the pope is deſired to do juſtice, (or any other favour) when the magiſtrates eſtabliſh'd for that purpoſe refuſe to do it. All theſe employments are in the pope's gift, who turns out any perſon whenever he thinks proper: they produce above fifteen hundred crowns annually, without reckoning the by-profits, which ſometimes amount to four or five hundred.

The ſecretary, whom we may call the pope's particular confident, is generally a cardinal; but ſometimes the pope chuſes another prelate, who has more or fewer under-ſecretaries, according to the expence the reigning pope is willing to be at, and the court he is deſirous of keeping. They wear purple habits, and aſſiſt at the pope's chapel with the camail and rochet; they have apartments in the Vatican, as alſo in Monte-cavallo when the pope reſides there for any time, which he never fails to do in ſummer, to avoid the violent heats and unwholſome air of the lower city. Theſe ſeveral employments, which the pope beſtows on none but ſuch prelates as he judges capable of keeping inviolably whatever ſecrets he ſhall entruſt them with, are neither purchaſed, nor for life; and nevertheleſs, thoſe who are raiſed to them gratis are never diſpoſſeſſed of them, unleſs it be to be removed to a higher poſt; becauſe that in caſe the pope were to turn them out with the leaſt ignominy, or even under any pretence whatſoever, they would take occaſion from thence to reveal a great many particulars, which might do his holineſs the utmoſt prejudice.

There are none of theſe ſecretaries but have at leaſt twelve hundred crowns a-year, and are obliged to ſix months attendance only, and then they have very little trouble, their whole employment being to write a few little notes in the pope's cloſet; to tranſcribe a few letters, the minutes whereof they receive from him; and to keep certain regiſters, being a kind of journal of all the pope ſays or does in preſence of any perſon; and whatever he meditates or reſolves upon in private, which he is deſirous of committing to paper. 'Tis from theſe journals that the famous Platina compiled his hiſtory of the lives of the popes; and from thence all the intrigues of the ſeveral conclaves are taken, and afterwards publiſh'd.

Every pope has not the ſame number of ſecretaries to draw up the tax'd briefs, or letters ſo call'd, when they are iſſued out under the fiſherman's ring, which is one of the pope's three ſeals. Sometimes twenty-four ſecretaries are employ'd in writing theſe briefs, one of whom the pope chuſes for his domeſtick prelate and referendary; he likewiſe allows him an apartment in his palace, and a table in the ſame manner as his private ſecretaries.

Theſe twenty-four employments are all purchaſed, for nine thouſand crowns each. Every ſecretary makes eight hundred crowns at leaſt annually; but as they are vacant at the deceaſe of a pope, and that the incumbent can exerciſe them no longer, nor ſell them; it ſometimes happens that there is no perſon found who will diſburſe eight thouſand crowns, ſince they are to enjoy the profits of their poſts no longer than the pope lives, who is always old, and daily threatned with death; for this reaſon, all who offer to purchaſe theſe employments, are allow'd to tax the briefs which they draw up, in ſuch a manner that they not only ſoon get the money they lay out for the purchaſe, but alſo a very handſome profit.

No briefs are purchaſed ſo dear as thoſe by which the pope grants plenary indulgences, and altars privileg'd for ever, which is granted only to thoſe chapels where ſeven maſſes are ſaid daily. Hence it is, that moſt of ſuch churches as have not prieſts ſufficient for the ſaying of ſo many maſſes, enjoy a privilege only for certain days in the week, during a term of years; at the expiration of which, the titulars or patrons of chapels whoſe indulgences are expired, are obliged to * have recourſe to the pope in order to renew them.

The ſecretary of the briefs diſpatches ſuch as are given him by the cardinal-nephew, and in his default by the cardinal-patron, who is firſt miniſter; or by the ſecretaries of ſtate. Theſe are call'd ſecret briefs, becauſe the minutes which are made made of them, are frequently not perus'd by any body, nor ſign'd by the cardinal-prefect of the briefs; but the extracts thereof, which are given to thoſe whom they concern, by the grants which are made them therein, are ſign'd and ſeal'd by the cardinal-patron, who keeps the minutes thereof, till the pope's death; and the moment the pontifical ſee is vacant, he ſends them to the archives of the Caſtle St. Angelo, together with all the regiſters and memorials that have paſs'd thro' his hands during his adminiſtration. The other ſecretaries and miniſters of the deceaſed pope, are alſo oblig'd to ſend at the ſame time to the archives, all writings and papers which relate to the affairs of ſtate that came under their cognizance.

The poſt of ſecretary of the ſecret briefs is in the pope's gift, and the perſon who is collated to it depends on no one but the pope; and he communicates his minutes to ſuch perſons only, as his holineſs commands him to do: he has an annual penſion of eleven thouſand crowns. Theſe ſecret briefs conſiſt uſually of ſuch diſpenſations or privileges as the pope grants to princes, or other illuſtrious perſons, for whom he has a peculiar regard.

The Prefect of aſſeſs'd briefs, the Prefect of the ſignature of Grants, the Prefect of the ſignature of Juſtice, the Prelates referendaries of both ſignatures.

The prefect of the briefs is always a cardinal, which poſt is purchaſed, and is for life: it coſts twenty thouſand crowns, and produces annually two thouſand five hundred crowns, excluſive of the extraordinary perquiſites which he receives from all thoſe whoſe briefs he diſpatches. By his office, he is obliged to review all the minutes, and ſign all the copies of aſſeſs'd briefs; but he is neither impower'd or commiſſion'd to view the ſecret briefs. He is generally deputed by his holineſs, with other prelates (of whom mention will be made in the ſequel) to aſſiſt at the ſignature of grants which is made in the pontifical palace. His poſt is very honourable and profitable; for he has a ſeat in the pope's palace near the datary; and when he reviſes the briefs, he may add or cut off any clauſes; whence the ſecretaries, who all in their ſeveral turns aſſeſs theſe briefs, rate them either higher or lower according as they are deſirous of favouring thoſe who are to have them diſpatch'd; for which reaſon, all who come on theſe occaſions, aſſiduouſly make their court to this prefect, and endeavour to bribe him to their intereſt by ſome preſent, proportionable to the advantages granted by thoſe briefs.

The office of prefect of the ſignature of grants, is never given to any perſon under the dignity of cardinal; who receives from the apoſtolical chamber a yearly penſion of twelve hundred crowns, ſo long as, by the pope's favour, he enjoys this poſt, who removes him when ever he pleaſes. The chief employment of the cardinal prefect, is to preſide over all thoſe prelates who aſſiſt at the ſignature of grants made every tueſday before the pope, or every ſaturday, in holy-day time, all vacations excepted. He likewiſe ſigns all the petitions which are preſented to this aſſembly, in which twelve cardinals at leaſt, always meet by his holineſs's order, one of whom, together with the pope, and the prefect of the ſignature of grants, is generally the cardinal-prefect of the ſignature of juſtice.

There are likewiſe in this aſſembly, twelve prelates referendaries, who have each their vote, in the ſignature of juſtice; the auditor of the cauſes of the apoſtolick chamber goes thither likewiſe, with one of his lieutenants, and another lieutenant civil of the cardinal-vicar; and after theſe the treaſurer-general, an auditor of the rota, an aſſiſtant apoſtolical prothonotary, a clerk of the chamber, a regiſter of the

the high court, and the regent of the chancery. All the laſt mention'd have no active voice in ſuch affairs as relate to the ſignature of grants, but are the deputies of ſeve_ral judicatures or chambers of juriſdiction, each of whom come hither to preſerve and defend therein, the rights of his reſpective tribunal.

The juriſdiction of the prefect of the ſignature of juſtice, extends to judge the cauſes of ſuch perſons as complain of any ſentence given by the ordinary judges. Every thurſday twelve prelates aſſemble at his houſe, and theſe are the moſt antient referendaries of the ſignature, and have an active voice. All the other referendaries are allow'd to aſſemble there alſo, and propoſe two litigious cauſes each ſeſſion, but they have not an active voice. The reſt who enjoy that privilege with the cardinal-prefect, are always exactly inform'd of the grievances of the appellants before they come thither. Four are to examine the inſtruments and other writings produced in this proceſs; four others are acquainted with the facts diſputed about; and the remaining four are well acquainted with the laws by which thoſe ſuits are to be judged.

There is likewiſe in this aſſembly an auditor of the rota, and the cardinal-vicar's lieutenant civil, to maintain the rights of their tribunal; but theſe have no active voice. I have no more to add with regard to this prefect of the ſignature of juſtice, except that his holineſs never fills up this poſt with any perſon under the dignity of cardinal, to whom the apoſtolical chamber allows a yearly ſalary of fifteen hundred crowns.

As his decrees are diſpatch'd by letters ſign'd under his hand, and others by briefs, there are two officers employ'd for that purpoſe, the one call'd the prefect of the minutes, who after having drawn them up, and ſign'd them, gives them to the other call'd the maſter of the briefs, becauſe he draws up the briefs from the minutes he has receiv'd; and afterwards ſends thoſe which are tax'd to be ſign'd by the ſecretary of the briefs. The firſt of theſe offices is worth twelve thouſand crowns, and produces about twelve hundred annually. The ſecond is purchaſed for thirty thouſand crowns, and produces yearly three thouſand at leaſt, and ſometimes more. The popes have, within theſe twenty years, likewiſe annex'd to theſe offices, three employments of reviſers of the commiſſions of the ſignature of juſtice, which are ſold to prelates for ſix thouſand crowns each, and each produces five hundred crowns yearly.

The college of the prelates referendaries is not limited as to number, and the employments of it are not purchaſed, but is only a title of honour which the pope beſtows on perſons of high birth and learning, and is a ſtep to the moſt conſiderable employments of the court of Rome. A perſon before he can be promoted to it, muſt firſt have the nomination of the cardinal-patron, and the pope's conſent. The cardinal-prefect of the ſignature of juſtice, orders afterwards one of his officers to make the proper informations and inquiries, purſuant to the conſtitution of Sixtus V. by which it is enacted, that every candidate muſt prove he is doctor of both laws, that he has been an inhabitant of Rome for two years, that he is twenty-five years of age, and that he has wealth ſufficient to ſupport the prelature with honour.

Theſe formalities being over, the cardinal-prefect gives to the candidate who has the above-mention'd qualifications, a commiſſion to report two ſuits of proceſſes in ſignature, and in caſe he acquits himſelf of it in a proper manner, his nomination is approv'd, and he is received in manner following: the cardinal prefect having made him take an oath that he will adminiſter juſtice according to his conſcience, clothes him with the veſtments of the prelature, i. e. with the caſſock trailing on the ground, and a ſhort cloke that deſcends a little lower than the girdle, and has a ſlit in it, to put the arms thro'. Theſe veſtments are black; for according to the grant of

Paul V. none but the twelve moſt antient referendaries are allow'd to wear them of a purple colour, like thoſe of all other prelates.

The twelve moſt antient referendaries are call'd votanti di ſignatura, becauſe they have an active voice in all aſſemblies, and the others are call'd proponenti, i. e. relaters or reporters, and theſe have not an active voice; which is alſo obſerved in the other tribunals of Rome, where the relaters lay down only the juſt pretenſions of each party, without declaring their opinion concerning them.

The referendaries are impower'd to propoſe commiſſions and litigious petitions to the ſignature of juſtice, and to that of grants; and to take cognizance of ſuch cauſes as daily come on, not exceeding the ſum of five hundred crowns of gold, for thoſe of larger ſums are tried at the Rota.

The Pope's Datary, and other officers of that court.

The pope's datary and chancery were formerly one and the ſame thing, but the multitude of affairs to be tranſacted obliged him to divide it into two tribunals, which are ſo nearly related to one another, that the chancery does no more than diſpatch all that has paſs'd thro' the datary.

The datary is a prelate, and ſometimes a cardinal deputed by his holineſs to receive all ſuch petitions as are preſented to him, touching the proviſions of benefices. By this poſt the datary is impower'd to grant, without acquainting his holineſs therewith, all benefices that don't produce upwards of twenty-four ducats annually; but for ſuch as amount to more, he is obliged to cauſe the proviſions thereof to be ſign'd by the pope, who admits him to audience every day. In caſe there be ſeveral candidates for the ſame benefice, he is at liberty to beſtow it on whomſoever of them he thinks proper, provided he has the qualifications requiſite. The datary has a yearly ſalary of two thouſand crowns, excluſive of the perquiſites which he receives from thoſe who addreſs him for any benefice. The reader, in order to have a perfect idea of this office, muſt read what follows.

The pope's ſub-datary is a prelate whoſe employment is given him in the ſame manner as the datary, and has almoſt as much credit with the ſovereign pontiff, who allows him a yearly penſion of a thouſand crowns; but he is not allow'd to confer any benefice, without firſt acquainting him or the cardinal-datary of it. In order to give a better idea of theſe two employments, we ſhall deſcribe regularly the formalities which are obſerv'd in iſſuing out a bull, or diſpenſation.

When any benefice is vacant by the death of the incumbent, the candidate muſt addreſs himſelf to the per obitum, who is as it were the datary's ſubſtitute by commiſſion, whoſe poſt alſo produces a thouſand crowns per annum. In all other caſes, and for all other grants of that nature, ſuch as reſignations, permutations, gaining of benefices, and ſuch like, the datary, and ſub-datary muſt be addreſs'd; but the beſt way to ſucceed in any affair of this nature, is to preſent the petition to the pope himſelf, by the mediation of ſome cardinal or embaſſador, a relation or friend of the reigning pontiff, who afterwards ſends it to the datary, and orders him to diſpatch the petitioner.

After he has got the pope's conſent, and that the datary has ſubſcribed the petition in manner following, annuit ſanctiſſimus, i. e. the moſt holy father conſents to it; a ſecond petition muſt be drawn up in due form, with the cauſes and reſtrictions which any perſon may deſire to be inſerted and expreſs'd at length in the bull: after this has been duly perform'd 'tis carried to the ſub-datary, who writes at the bottom in few words, the ſummary of the whole, and gives it to the datary, to whom he gives a freſh and perfect account of the ſtate of the whole affair.

This

This being done, the datary carries the petition to the pope, who ſigns it, and gives his conſent by the following words, fiat ut petitur, i. e. let the terms of the petitions be granted. Then the ſaid datary, or his deputy conſigns the ſame petition to the prefect of the compoſitions.

The prefect of the compoſitions is an officer whoſe buſineſs it is to aſſeſs the petitions, which pay more or leſs, according to the quality of the matter and importance of theſe caſes. When the ſum agreed upon has been paid, or the aſſeſſment which has been made on the petition, at the bottom of which the prefect of the compoſitions muſt write a diſcharge; 'tis given to an officer of the petty-dates, whoſe buſineſs is to know the day it was ſign'd, and to ſet it down underneath. This officer muſt likewiſe be paid a certain ſum per cent, according to the value of the benefice. He who ſigns it does not put any date, in order to give another perſon an opportunity of gaining ſomething alſo, by going to enquire of him who omitted it, in order to get cuſtom to the officers of the petty-date. This petition being ſign'd and dated in manner above-mention'd, goes afterwards thro' the hands of the reviſers, and other perſons.

There are four reviſers belonging to the datary, nominated by the pope, who are diſmiſs'd at pleaſure, they exerciſing their employments only by commiſſion. The chief of the reviſers, erazes and corrects whatever he thinks proper in ſuch petitions as are tranſmitted to him by the maſter of the petty-dates. From the chief reviſer they paſs to the ſecond, who alters, corrects, and ſometimes retrenches what the chief reviſer had writ, in caſe it be not in due form.

The buſineſs of the third reviſer is to get all petitions ſigned for diſpenſations within the degrees of conſanguinity and affinity, and to correct matrimonial diſpenſations. The fourth reviſes all petitions by which monitories are deſired, and excommunications for getting any thing reveal'd.

After theſe petitions have been corrected and reviſed, they are carried to the regiſters, who inſert them in the regiſter, and afterwards conſign them to the chief regiſter, who collates them word by word, and afterwards puts his name on the back of each in the center of a large R, to ſhew it has been regiſter'd.

There are twenty regiſters, who each purchaſe their employments for four thouſand crowns, and it produces about three thouſand five hundred crowns annually, excluſive of the extraordinary profits.

After the petitions have been regiſter'd, they are again carried to the datary, who dates it, and afterwards writes theſe words, datum Romæ apud S. &c. given at Rome in the pontifical palace, &c. expreſſing at the Vatican or Monte Cavallo, or wherever the pope reſides, with the day and date of the year, which is ſet down on each petition; and thence is the name of datary.

Theſe petitions are afterwards put into the hands of an officer call'd de miſſis, or of diſpatches, who carries them up to the chancery, whence they cannot return, unleſs by grant, into the hands of the officers of the diſpatches.

All diſpatches of the datary are put into the hands of the regent of the chancery, who is impower'd to diſtribute the petitions to one of the prelates call'd regiſters of the high court, in order to have the minutes of the bull drawn up; and he alſo gives leave to correct them if erroneous, and to direct the execution thereof whereſoever he thinks proper.

This prelate draws up, or cauſes to be drawn up by his deputy, the minutes of the bull, which is ſent to one of the hundred apoſtolical writers, who writes it at length on a ſkin of parchment with his own hand; and the whole body of writers aſſeſs the ſum that is to be paid to them, according to the value of the benefice, or the importance of the affair. Their aſſeſſment ſerves as a ſtandard to the reſt that follow them; them ; then the bull is carried to other officers, who have no other power, and make no farther uſe of this bull than to band it about to one another, in order to ſqueeze the petitioners. The number of theſe extortioners is ſo great, that it would require a volume to mention the particulars relating to them, and the affairs they are employ'd about ; for which reaſon we ſhall content our ſelves with giving a liſt in this place of the ſeveral employments that are purchaſed by hundreds.

The bulls which are iſſued out of the datary go thro' the hands of upwards of a thouſand perſons, who have fifteen different offices, where money muſt be carried them in proportion to the ſum given the hundred apoſtolical writers. Theſe offices are eſtabliſh'd under the names of

An hundred apoſtolical grooms, or gentlemen of the bed-chamber, which poſt is purchaſed for 1700 crowns, and produces annually to each 170 crowns.

An hundred apoſtolical eſquires ; the employment purchaſed for 1300 crowns, and yields annually to each 130 crowns.

An hundred knights of St. Peter ; each poſt valued at 1500 crowns ; yearly produce to each 150 crowns.

An hundred knights of St. Paul ; each employment purchaſed for 1600 crowns ; yields an annual ſum of 160 crowns.

An hundred knights of the Lilly ; each poſt purchaſed for 1500 ; the annual produce 150 crowns.

An hundred knights Laurerani ; each employment ſells for 1400 crowns, produces annually 140 crowns.

An hundred janizaries ; each poſt purchaſed for 1700 crowns, and produces yearly 170 crowns.

An hundred writers of briefs ; each employment valued at 1200 crowns, and yields every year 120 crowns.

Fourſcore regiſters of the high court ; each office valued at 2000 crowns, produces annually 200 crowns.

Eighty regiſters of bulls ; each employment worth 3400 crowns, produces 340 crowns annually to twelve of them, who have no other ſalary ; but the twelve ſenior regiſters have almoſt half as much more ſalary. And theſe officers regiſter all bulls after they have gone thro' the ſeveral offices above-mention'd.

After this there are ſix maſters in chancery, whoſe buſineſs is to collate theſe bulls, and each employment is purchaſed for 6000 crowns, and produces annually 600.

Theſe ſix maſters are ſubordinate to the maſter of the rolls, who keeps the regiſters of all bulls. This place is purchaſed for 2000 crowns, and produces yearly 300.

Finally, there is an accomptant and a receiver whoſe buſineſs is to draw up the extracts of all bulls, to which he puts the leaden ſeal. This place is purchaſed for 3000 crowns, and produces yearly 600, excluſive of the extraordinary profits, which ſometimes amount to double that ſum.

Every one of the officers above-mention'd, gains twice his ſalary by the by-profits : theſe poſts are always bought for ten years purchaſe. The reader may judge by this, how much every bull coſts before it has gone thro' ſo many hands ; and the great ſums that go into the office of the datary, particularly when the proviſions are iſſued from thence for ſeveral biſhopricks, and other rich benefices.

The Maſter of the Pope's Palace, and other chief Officers of his Household.

A Dominican friar of the order commonly call'd the preaching brothers, is always maſter of the pope's palace, ever ſince their founder, who was canoniz'd by the name of St. Dominic, was raiſed to that dignity by Honorius III. in 1216. He preaches preaches once a month in the publick chapel of the palace, or appoints one of his brethren to officiate for him. He has a ſeat in the pope's chapel next to the deacon, or moſt antient auditor of the rota. He has no fix'd ſalary, becauſe, by the ſtatutes of his order, he is not allow'd to have any money he can call his own; but he is allow'd a table at court with his companions and ſervants, and a coach is kept for him.

He is the judge in ordinary of all printers, engravers, and bookſellers, who are not permitted to publiſh or ſell any work without his permiſſion firſt obtain'd. All books that come to Rome are examin'd by him, or his officers, who confiſcate all that are prohibited by the index of the council of Trent; however, ways are found out to import great numbers without their knowledge.

The other chief officers that reſide in the pontifical palace, and near his holineſs's perſon, are the major-domo, or maſter of the houſhold; which officers, in the courts of other princes, are call'd high-ſtewards. The pope's maſter of the houſhold ſuper-intends all the domeſticks of the apoſtolical palace, but the pope won't allow the perſon who exerciſes that function in his palace to bear the title of high-ſteward. Beſides, the major-domo or grand maſter above-mention'd, he employs the chief ſteward of the hoſpital of the Literate Orphans, to furniſh him with proviſions, and the hoſpital has the fees allow'd to it.

There are always two gentlemen near the pope's perſon, who have the title of maſters of the chamber. The chief cup-bearer, who is call'd coppiero, becauſe he preſents the glaſs to his holineſs, with a ſalver, which he holds before him, kneeling on both knees when the pope drinks. The officer whoſe buſineſs it is to have the diſhes brought upon the pope's table, is call'd in Italian ſcalco. The carver who cuts up the victuals before the ſovereign pontiff, and the chief harbinger who regulates the apartments of the pope's houſhold, and all the other officers above-mention'd, are prelates, who wear purple veſtments, and have each two deputies to officiate in their abſence.

There are likewiſe ſeveral privy-chamberlains, all prelates, who are clothed in long purple caſſocks with ſleeves trailing to the ground, but have no cloke. Among theſe, eight are declar'd partakers, and divide among themſelves whatever preſents are made them; and of theſe the pope chuſes one to be his privy-treaſurer, whoſe buſineſs it is to diſtribute ſuch alms as his holineſs beſtows privately.

Another of theſe privy-chamberlains is appointed maſter of the wardrobe. He is entruſted with all the plate, whether of gold or ſilver; all the jewels and ſhrines for relicks, as alſo the Agnus Dei, which he diſtributes daily to pilgrims and ſtrangers at a certain hour. The pope's phyſician in ordinary is alſo made a privy-chamberlain, but not the other two, who are phyſicians of his houſhold.

The fix'd penſion of each privy-chamberlain amounts to a thouſand crowns annually; and the partakers have at leaſt double that ſum, ariſing from the preſents made at the creation and death of every cardinal. The chamberlain who diſtributes the Agnus Dei, receives more than all the reſt, particularly when any extraordinary ſolemnity draws foreigners to Rome, ſuch as the years of the jubilee, an embaſſy, a holy canonization that makes a great noiſe in the world; any famous miracle, and ſuch like; for in that caſe he has ſeveral thouſand crowns given him, for thoſe little conſecrated images of wax.

The pope's privy-chaplains have the ſame ſalary as the chamberlains. 'Tis they who aſſiſt him in ſaying the office of the breviary, and wait upon him at maſs, when he celebrates it in private. One of theſe carries the croſs before his holineſs when he goes abroad, and in caſe he goes on foot, another of them ſupports his train.

When the pope aſſiſts at the maſs and in proceſſions, his chaplains carry the mitres and triple crowns enrich'd with precious ſtones, which they diſplay in a very pompous pous manner, holding them aloft with both their hands, to ſhew them to the people as his holineſs walks along. There are alſo chaplains belonging to the guards and grooms, who ſay maſs every morning in the guard-room, &c. theſe are call'd common chaplains; their yearly ſalary amounts to no more than fifty crowns, but then they are paid over and above that ſum for whatever maſſes they celebrate.

The pope's aſſiſtants and valet de chambres have five hundred crowns a-year, and ſeveral other very conſiderable profits; not to mention that as they have a freer acceſs to his holineſs than the reſt of his domeſticks, they never fail of benefices.

There are likewiſe honorary chamberlains, who are prelates of the firſt quality, among whom the pope generally makes choice of a Frenchman, a German, and a Spaniard. The chamberlains of the bouſſole, who are as ſo many uſhers, becauſe they always keep guard at his holineſs's chamber-door. The chamberlains without the walls, are ſo call'd, becauſe they follow the pope without the Vatican, and attend upon him in all publick cavalcades, with the chamberlains eſquires, clothed in red cloth, and cover'd with a large cope of the ſame colour, furr'd with ermin. Each of theſe do duty in the apoſtolical palace, and have their diſtinct office; but the honorary chamberlains never mount the guard, nor appear in the pope's anti-chamber but whenever they pleaſe; and theſe generally are employ'd by the pope to carry the red coiff to any newly elected cardinals, who are not in Rome at the time of their being raiſed to that dignity; and upon theſe occaſions they have always a conſiderable preſent made them.

The pope has alſo another maſter of the houſhold, or ſcalco, in the Vatican, and on Mount Cavallo, and another carver different from the above-mention'd, whoſe office it is to prepare the banquet he ſometimes makes for cardinals, on certain extraordinary occaſions, and on ſolemn feſtivals; another ſcalco, and carver for the ambaſſadors, and other diſtinguiſh'd foreigners, whom the pope entertains in a ſplendid manner; laſtly a fourth ſcalco whoſe office is to prepare the dinner given to the thirteen poor pilgrims; to ſerve up the firſt diſh at their table; and to treat them in a magnificent manner every day, in imitation of pope Clement VIII. who reſtored this cuſtom, firſt introduced by Gregory the great, and which has ſince been follow'd by all the popes. Theſe officers are cloth'd in purple.

The pope always makes choice of a native of Rome, for the maſter of his ſtables; he not allowing any perſon to bear the title of maſter of the horſe, as other princes: for which reaſon this officer bears the name of cavalarizzo; to denote that he ſuper-intends all the horſes in the pope's ſtable.

The harbingers above-mention'd, who aſſign the apartments to the pope's houſhold, have deputy-harbingers and their aſſiſtants, who are entruſted with the hangings, ornaments, and other furniture of the pontifical palace. They are likewiſe employ'd to adorn the apartments when either a conſiſtory, ſignature of grants, or congregation is held.

There are likewiſe footmen call'd grooms, who keep guard in the halls of the pope's palace, and are very numerous, becauſe the pope beſtows this place on all thoſe who were his grooms when he was cardinal; and moreover, he likewiſe gives thoſe places to all the chief of the grooms that are in the ſervice of the cardinals and embaſſadors who are preſent at Rome at the time of his creation. Their clothing is a red flower'd ſattin; and whenever they go out, they have a blue cloth cloke and a ſword, the hilt whereof is of ſilver gilt.

The pope has twelve officers, who have each a red ſtaff, and twelve others, who carry ſilver maces, and walk before in a ceremonial habit, every time he appears in publick, with his mitre and cope on. When the conſiſtory is held, they guard the door, wait upon his holineſs upon his going in, or coming out from thence. Theſe twenty-four poſts are all purchaſed, and each for 600 crowns, and produce about fifty annually.

The Prefect of the POPE'S Sacristy.

The pope's sacristan, who takes the title of prefect, is always a friar of the order of the hermits of St. Austin: he is made a bishop in partibus infidelium, as he is styl'd in Italy, i. e. he has an honorary title of one of those antient bishopricks in Asia which existed formerly, but are now possess'd by the infidels. This prefect is entrusted with all the ornaments, gold and silver vessels, crosses, cups, thuribles, shrines for inclosing relicks, and other valuable things belonging to his holiness's sacristy.

'Tis he prepares the host, and essays the bread and wine, when the pope celebrates mass pontifically, or in private. Whenever his holiness assists solemnly at mass, his sacristan places himself among the assisting bishops, above the dean, or the senior auditors of the rota; and observes to take off, or put on the pope's mitre, as often as is required by the rubrick of the Romish pontifical.

He distributes the relicks, and signs the memorials of those indulgences which pilgrims desire for themselves and relations. We shall make two remarks on this head; the first, that indulgences are never granted to any pilgrims but such as are actually upon a journey, and appear personally before the pope's sacristan.

The second particular observ'd with regard to those indulgences which persons who go to Rome desire for their relations, is not to grant them to them but when they are in their expiring moments, i. e. that the pope grants by briefs, address'd to certain persons, for whose names blanks are left, a power of making choice of what confessor soever they shall think proper, when at the point of death, to cause themselves to be absolv'd from all their sins in general, and particularly all reserv'd cases, of what nature soever; with a full power to this confessor, of remitting to the person to whom this brief is given, all the punishments which God might otherwise have inflicted on him for his sins, whether in this life or after his death; in hell or in purgatory.

There are other briefs importing, that whosoever shall, in his expiring moments, have this patent sign'd by the pope in his hands, and shall not have time or opportunity to confess himself, in case he pronounces thrice the name of JESUS and MARY, all his sins shall be remitted to him, with the punishment due to them; so that his soul shall, without going a round-about-way, be immediately wafted into paradise. The two particular clauses following are inserted in it, in order that the prefect of the sacristy may sell a greater number of them; by these briefs the pope declares expresly, that whoever has obtain'd this privilege, may either keep it for himself, in case of an urgent necessity, or give it to any other person; but in case a third touches it; that it is put into such person's hand, or given to him, it can be of service to that person only; and in case it is given to another person, 'twill be of no manner of service to any person at all. The second clause imports, that whoever has once made use of it in any fit of sickness, or when he was in danger of dying, and has procur'd his absolution by virtue of this brief, or by pronouncing the names of Jesus and Maria, with an intention to apply this plenary indulgence of the sovereign pontiff to himself, cannot make use of it any more when dying, in case he should happen to recover from that fit of sickness in which he had employ'd it.

Formerly the chancellor super-intended the pope's library; but in latter ages 'tis an office a-part, which yields twelve hundred crowns of gold a-year to the possessor. The pope never bestows it on any person under the dignity of a cardinal, who assumes the the title of librarian of the Vatican. He has two ſub-librarians, whereof the firſt is generally one of the pope's domeſtick prelates; and has ſix hundred crowns a-year, with an allowance of bread and wine for the whole year. The ſecond has four hundred crowns, and the ſame proviſion as the former.

We may with truth affirm, that theſe three places are always fill'd with perſons of very great learning, and who to the knowledge of other tongues, add the oriental languages in particular. This librarian has the direction of a noble printing-houſe, where nothing is printed without his permiſſion firſt obtain'd: It abounds with types of all the known tongues in which the learned are converſant.

The Pope's Maſters of the Ceremonies.

His holineſs has ſix maſters of the ceremonies, whereof two are call'd aſſiſtants, and the other four ſuper-numerary. The two aſſiſtants receive of every newly created cardinal two hundred and twenty four crowns of gold, which they divide equally among themſelves; and of the heirs of thoſe who die, an hundred crowns, each of whom has alſo half. Their employments bring them in, beſides the ſum above-mention'd, ſeven hundred crowns each yearly. The other four ſuper-numeraries have forty-eight gold crowns to divide among themſelves, from each newly created cardinal; and four hundred crowns of the apoſtolick college, where they are employ'd certain days of the year. The ſenior of theſe four laſt mention'd, and the two aſſiſtants, have alſo over and above what we before mention'd, a table allow'd them in the Vatican, whereof they are reputed domeſticks; however, they are all ſix conſider'd as maſters of the pope's ceremonies. They have an equal authority to ordain the pontifical functions, acquaint the cardinals with their duty, and have authority over all perſons belonging to the court.

They all have admiſſion into the conclave, and likewiſe in the congregation of rites, but one only goes to the ceremonial congregation. Whenever the pope ſends any cardinal à latere out of Rome, he deputes one of theſe ſuper-numerary maſters of the ceremonies to attend upon him. They are generally clothed in purple caſſocks, with black buttons and facings, and ſleeves trailing on the ground; theſe wear, in the papal chapel, a red caſſock as the reſt of the cardinals, and the rochets like the prelates. When they appear in this ceremonial habit, they don't give precedency to any of the pope's officers or domeſticks, the major-domo, the maſter, or firſt gentleman of the bed-chamber, and the chief cup-bearer excepted.

The Camerlingo, or treaſurer of the college of cardinals, the national Secretary and clerk, and the Comptroller.

The cardinals elect annually one out of their body, who reſides at Rome, for the camerlingo or treaſurer of their body, which differs from the pope's camerlingo, the latter being for life, and the former for a year only, at the end of which he is ſucceeded by another, who enjoys it for the ſame term; the election is made according to ſeniority, and none but thoſe who actually reſide in the pope's court, are allow'd to be candidates for it. The perſon who enjoys this poſt of camerlingo, has a right of receiving all the revenues which belong in common to the college of cardinals; and to diſtribute them at the end of the year, by equal portions, to the cardinals who are then in Rome; for all thoſe who are abſent have no ſhare therein, after they have been ſix months from court.

There is a comptroller who alſo keeps an exact account, and a counter-account or check of all the camerlingo receives for the cardinals, eſpecially of annates, biſhopricks, and other benefices whereof the greateſt part of the revenues of the college conſiſt; and in caſe this comptroller receives any money in the abſence of the camerlingo, as he is impower'd to do, he gives him an account thereof at reſigning his poſt, which he enjoys a year in the ſame manner as the treaſurer.

The cardinals have a ſecretary whoſe office is for life, who is always an Italian; and an annual under ſecretary, call'd the national clerk, becauſe he is alternately a Frenchman, a German, and a Spaniard. By his poſt he is oblig'd to ſupply for the ſecretary in his abſence, and to be in the conſiſtory, and in the congregations of the cardinals, in red veſtments like thoſe of the ſecretary, who will be mention'd hereafter. The national clerk receives from each cardinal, upon his creation, fifty crowns of gold, and the like ſum from the heirs of a cardinal deceaſed.

The ſecretary of the college of cardinals, is, by his employment, obliged to enter into the conclave whenever the ſee is vacant, and to write the ſeveral letters diſpatch'd in the name of the ſaid college, and ſign'd by three cardinals, heads of orders, who each give him a ſeal with which he forms them. He aſſiſts likewiſe at the general congregations of the cardinals, and at thoſe which are made at the three ſeniors of each order, i. e. biſhops, prieſts, and deacons, where he ſets down all the reſolutions in writing, all the decrees of their eminences, as likewiſe all the propoſals and debates which are made in the conſiſtories both private and publick, whereof the cardinal camerlingo furniſhes him with all the minutes, becauſe he is oblig'd to leave the conſiſtory at the extra omnes, i. e. when all, who are not cardinals, are commanded to leave it. When he enters into the conſiſtory, he is clothed in a red robe that trails upon the ground, made of a woollen ſtuff, either heavier or lighter according to the ſeaſon.

The Tribunal of the Rota of Rome, and its particular Magiſtrates, compoſing together a kind of papal Parliament.

The Rota is one of the moſt auguſt tribunals of Rome, and is compoſed of twelve prelates, whereof one muſt be a German, another a Frenchman, and two Spaniards. The ſovereigns of theſe three different ſtates name each a prelate, who bears the name of his crown. The other eight are Italians, three whereof muſt be Romans, one a Bologneze, a Ferraran, a Milaneze, a Venetian, and a Tuſcan. Each auditor has four notaries or regiſters, and the ſenior auditor performs the function of preſident.

They meet in the apoſtolical palace every monday and friday, except during vacations, but when the pope reſides in the palace of Mount Quirinal, their aſſemblies are held in the chancery.

They take cognizance of all ſuits in the territory of the church, by appeal, as alſo of matters beneficiary and patrimonial: this tribunal does not judge a cauſe at once; but pronounces as many ſentences, call'd deciſions, as there are points conteſted in a ſuit. And after theſe ſentences are given, the party may get his cauſe reviſed again by the pope himſelf, at the ſignature of grants above-mention'd, which is a kind of civil petition. The place of theſe auditors produces but a thouſand crowns yearly to each, and they receive no fees; but then they are generally created cardinals by way of reward for the pains they have been at.

The vacation of this tribunal begins the firſt week in July, and when they aſſemble for the laſt rota, the pope gives them a magnificent dinner in the apoſtolical palace, and preſents to each of them an hundred crowns of gold, and two hundred

to

to the dean. The vacation continues till the firſt of October, when the rota opens with great magnificence, becauſe the two laſt auditors of this tribunal, go thro' the city mounted pontifically on mules, and follow'd by a very numerous cavalcade; all the cardinals, embaſſadors, and princes, ſending to each of them two gentlemen mounted on the fineſt horſes in their ſtables, to do them honour; and theſe are join'd by all the counſellors, notaries, regiſters, attorneys, and other practitioners.

The name of Ruota comes from the latin rota, which ſignifies a wheel. This tribunal has been eſtabliſh'd by the popes, in imitation of that which the antient Romans had in an open place, on a round terraſs ſurrounded with a rail, and ſupported by two great circles of metal, which form'd a gallery, whence the orators uſed to ſpeak, and the magiſtrates publiſh laws.

The ſeveral auditors of the rota have a right of conferring doctors degrees in both the canon and civil law, to all thoſe whom they judge qualified for it.

The poſt of judge of private contracts of the rota is purchaſed, and coſts four thouſand crowns, which produce ſeven or eight per cent. yearly. This officer is impower'd to take cognizance, whether in any reſignations or permutations of benefices, there be any confidence, i. e. any ſimoniacal covenant or agreement; and condemns or abſolves the incumbents, according as they may have acted. He ſometimes ratifies permutations, and frequently annuls reſignations; but whenever he finds that the parties have entred into ſimoniacal contracts, he confiſcates their benefices, in caſe it is lawfully, and clearly prov'd againſt them; and whenever there are not proofs ſufficient according to law; as when there is but one evidence, he condemns the perſon who is thus accuſed to pecuniary fines, which are raiſed on the revenues of the benefice in queſtion.

This judge wears the purple habit of prelates, with the rochet, and has a ſeat in the papal chapel under the aſſiſting prothonotaries.

The poſt of auditor of the objections of the Rota is of conſiderable antiquity. 'Tis purchaſed for four thouſand crowns, tho it produces nothing; but then it has ſeveral very conſiderable privileges and exemptions annex'd to it, and is always a ſtep to the moſt exalted dignities; for this auditor may hold ſeveral benefices at the ſame time, and alſo permute, or reſign them to whomſoever he thinks proper, and have his option with regard to others, without being liable to be proſecuted by the judge of the confidences or private contracts, or have any charges or affidavits made to the ſaid judge againſt him, in order to convict him of ſimony. This poſt gives him an honourable rank among the prelates, when the pope aſſiſts ſolemnly at maſs, and in cavalcades.

The corrector of the objections of the rota, purchaſes his place for twelve thouſand crowns, and it produces him at the rate of ten per cent. and ſometimes more; by which means it yields twelve hundred crowns at leaſt yearly.

He has the ſame honours paid him as the auditors whoſe deputy he is, and places himſelf, in purple veſtments, between the prelates, in all publick ſolemnities. His buſineſs is to correct ſuch bulls as have gone thro' the hands of the auditor, and to reviſe exactly all the proceedings and pleas of the contending parties; as likewiſe to take care that all acts, and other pieces which are to be admitted as proofs before the judge, are authentick; and whether there be not ſome ſatisfaction, gratuity, or ſomething in the matter or form, that may make them juſtly ſuſpected. He takes very particular informations on all thoſe heads, and annexes them to the reſt of thoſe pieces that are to be ſubſervient to the definitive judgment of the principal fact.

The tribunal of the Rota gives four hundred crowns to a counſellor, and two hundred and fifty to a lawyer, who, for that penſion, are obliged to write, plead, give counſel, and do every thing that may be neceſſary for ſupporting all cauſes in forma pauperis; and alſo of thoſe perſons, who, tho not poor, are never-nevertheleſs obliged to carry on ſuch ſuits, as would entirely ruin them, were they oblig'd to pay the counſellors and ſollicitors according to the rates fix'd for that purpoſe.

This counſellor and ſollicitor are alſo oblig'd to write gratis, to defend and carry on all cauſes in forma pauperis, before all the other tribunals of Rome; but thoſe who are oblig'd to employ theſe people, and have not money to fee them, find their affairs move on very heavily, and ſeldom ever ſee an end of their ſuits; for as theſe deputies have a multitude of affairs upon their hands, they never fail of one pretence or other, and indeed often give very good reaſons, why they cannot anſwer the expectations of the many indigent perſons who are continually ſolliciting their aſſiſtance. The greateſt abuſe that is crept into this charitable inſtitution, is, that oftentimes poor and miſerable wretches, who are naturally of a wrangling temper, are made plaintiffs in an action by ill-deſigning knaves, who oblige them to take out an action againſt any perſon whoſe ruin they are meditating, by the great charges ſuch perſons muſt be oblig'd to be at to carry on their ſuits, while they themſelves are but at a trifling expence, which is defray'd by the perſon for whom they clandeſtinely carry on the ſuit, who takes advantage of the ſervice which the counſellor and ſollicitor above-mention'd are obliged to do gratis for thoſe who plead in forma pauperis.

The apoſtolical Chamber and its Officers.

This council has the direction of all the pope's demeſnes, the finances whereof conſiſt in what is call'd the revenues of the apoſtolick chamber. It conſiſts of the cardinal great chamberlain, who is at the head of it, of the governor of the Rota, who is the vice-chamberlain, of a treaſurer-general, an auditor, a preſident, an advocate-general, a ſollicitor-general, a commiſſary, and twelve clerks of the chamber; whereof four are, firſt the prefect of the plenty of grain; a ſecond the prefect of proviſions and ſuch like commodities; the third the prefect of the priſons; and the fourth the prefect of the ſtreets: the remaining eight are deputed to take cognizance of various cauſes, each privately in his chamber.

Formerly the pope uſed to depute ſix clerks of his houſhold for the direction of his revenues, whence thoſe who have the management of them receive their names. Sixtus V. order'd that their employments ſhould be purchaſed, and increaſed their number to twelve. They meet every monday and friday in the pope's palace; and their juriſdiction extends to all things relating to the pope's temporal demeſnes.

Each clerk of the chamber takes immediate cognizance of all cauſes that are ſent up to his chamber by appeal. None of the places of clerk of the chamber is purchaſed for leſs than fourſcore thouſand crowns, nor yield leſs than eight or ten per cent. and conſequently ſeven or eight thouſand crowns annually.

The vacation of the apoſtolical chamber is at the ſame time with that of the Rota, i. e. from the beginning of July to the firſt of October. The laſt friday in June, which is the laſt day that the magiſtrates of this chamber meet, the pope entertains them very ſplendidly at dinner. The cardinal great chamberlain entertains them alſo the firſt of Auguſt. They aſſemble in the apoſtolical palace the eve of St. Peter, to receive the tributes of the ſeveral feudatories of the church, and they apply to the profits of the chamber, all duties paid in ready money; but thoſe duties that are paid in plate, in what manner ſoever wrought, belong to the treaſurer-general; and the clerks of the chambers divide among themſelves thoſe which are paid in wax. Upwards of twenty millions comes that day into his holineſs's coffers.

The arch-deacon, or chief of the deacons, had antiently the direction of the temporalities of the church, and this continued till anno 1100; when the popes thought themſelves oblig'd to take that employment from them; becauſe it inveſted them with too great a power, and even made them formidable to his holineſs himſelf. Inſtead of theſe, a cardinal was ſubſtituted, call'd the great chamberlain, and coadjutors were appointed him call'd clerks of the chamber; and ſome difference happening afterwards to ariſe, they added to them a treaſurer, an auditor, and a preſident.

The treaſurer-general takes cognizance of all cauſes relating to the ſucceſſion of prieſts, and of revenues unjuſtly receiv'd; as alſo of all unlawful traffick. He has the immediate direction of the exactions of the rents and revenues of the chamber. He inſpects the accompts of the miniſters and officers; preſides at all the ſums total that are made, both of the chamber, and of particular lords; he only being impower'd to make the extractions when debtors are for paying their whole debts, or a part only, by reimburſing the annuitants. In a word, he aſſiſts in all affairs wherein the intereſts of the apoſtolick chamber are concerned.

The poſt of treaſurer is purchaſed at ſeventy thouſand crowns, which produces annually about ten or twelve thouſand: the pope beſtows it on whatever prelate he thinks proper.

The power of auditor of the apoſtolical chamber is very great, for he is immediate judge in ordinary of the court of Rome, viz. of all the curtezans ſubject to the pope, and of foreigners, ſuch as cardinals, patriarchs, biſhops, princes, embaſſadors, barons, and others perſons of quality. He is alſo judge of all merchants, and of all cauſes belonging to the territory of the church; when he is appeal'd to. He has a right, excluſive of the reſt, to diſtrain the goods of thoſe who are indebted by bond to the apoſtolick chamber. He has the ſame power, jointly with the officers of the chamber, over every thing that relates to the apoſtolick letters; all inſtruments paſſed authentically, and bare promiſes made between man and man.

The auditor has alſo a great authority, and the right of prevention in all criminal cauſes, and has under him a provoſt with ſeveral ſergeants. Subordinate to him are two lieutenants civil, who are always prelates, and a lieutenant criminal with two judges or aſſeſſors. He employs ten ſecretaries or regiſters, and they purchaſe their places at fifteen or twenty thouſand crowns. Theſe have their ſeveral offices apart, and have each twenty young clerks under them at leaſt.

The poſt of auditor of the chamber is purchaſed at fourſcore thouſand crowns, and yields a fix'd annual penſion of thirteen thouſand, beſides three or four thouſand from extraordinary profits.

The poſt of preſident of the apoſtolical chamber, is the ſame with that call'd in moſt other ſtates of Europe, the comptroller-general.

This officer audits all the accompts relating to the pope's revenues, and is impower'd to ſettle them; this place is purchaſed for thirty thouſand crowns, and yields annually two thouſand five hundred. 'Tis never ſold to any but a prelate who wears purple veſtments, and enjoys a very honourable rank in the papal chapel, and in the publick ſolemnities, in which he precedes the commiſſioner we are now going to mention.

Such as are acquainted with the nature of the employment of attorney-general in the parliaments of France, may frame to themſelves an exact idea of that of the commiſſioner of the apoſtolical chamber, becauſe theſe two poſts are almoſt the ſame; for the above-mention'd commiſſioner gives his concluſions in all things relating to the apoſtolical chamber, and defends all matters which concern the pope's intereſt, before all the tribunals of the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, in all civil affairs relating relating to the revenues: moreover, he aſſiſts jointly with the treaſurer-general at the reviſal of all accompts, whereof he is a kind of comptroller, notwithſtanding that there is an accomptant for the ſame purpoſe; but both of them are no more than the pope's deputies, and their places are not purchaſed. That of accomptant yields about a thouſand crowns annually, and that of the commiſſioner twelve hundred, excluſive of what he gains by proving the accompts of gabels and impoſts, thoſe of the granaries of annona or abundance; and by keeping a regiſter of whatever comes in or iſſues out of the chambers where money is coin'd, in the pope's name. The three laſt-mention'd employments yield the commiſſary of the apoſtolick chamber as much, at leaſt, as all his other places; ſo that his ſalary is generally worth two thouſand four hundred crowns annually, excluſive of the extraordinary profits, which are as great as thoſe of any employment in the revenue.

The advocate and fiſcal-attorney defend, the former according to law, the latter to fact, all the intereſts of the apoſtolick chamber, in all kind of matters, and in all courts, in conjunction with the commiſſioner, the treaſurer, and accomptant above-mention'd.

The poſts of advocate and fiſcal-attorney are purchaſed; the rate fix'd by the pope is fifteen thouſand crowns each, and they produce at leaſt eight per cent. annually. Beſides this fix'd ſum, there is no place in the chamber, or apoſtolick chancery, that yields more extraordinary by-profits, and that becauſe of the chief diſputes concerning fiefs, relating to the emperor of Germany and the princes of Italy.

We ſhall refer the reader to the ſecond part of this diſſertation, for thoſe ceremonies which relate to the manner of appointing and holding the conſiſtory. There are never more than twelve conſiſtorial advocates in Rome; theſe are nominated by his holineſs, who either gives away, or ſells theſe places as he thinks proper. Theſe advocates plead in conſiſtories, whether publick, private, or half publick. The apoſtolical chamber pays them twelve ducats for every ſpeech. They ſupplicate the pall for all newly created archbiſhops, in the ſecret conſiſtory, in a kind of plea, for each of which they are allow'd ten ducats, which are paid them by thoſe who receive the arch-epiſcopal mantle.

They have the privilege of creating doctors in the canon as well as civil law, when aſſembled in their college della Sapienza. They wear a long robe of black wool, the tail whereof is purple, lined with red ſilk, and a cowl falling down between the ſhoulders, of the ſame colour, and lined with ermin: but their ordinary habit is a caſſock bound with black ſerge, and a cloke of the ſame, trailing on the ground, with ſlits to put the arms thro'.

One of theſe is rector of the college della Sapienza; he is to receive all the rents which are appropriated to it; and to pay the penſions of the publick readers, whoſe chairs are fill'd by a congregation of cardinals deputed by the pope for that purpoſe.

The ſeven ſenior conſiſtorial advocates have each a yearly penſion of ſeven hundred crowns, and the five laſt but three hundred; but the preſents they receive from the doctors they create, make their poſt as profitable as that of the chief advocates of the college della Sapienza.

Apoſtolical Prothonotaries, aſſiſtants to the Pope's conſiſtory; call'd Participanti.

The college of apoſtolical prothonotaries is fix'd to twelve; their place is purchaſed for ſeven thouſand crowns of gold, and yields about ten per cent. per ann. excluſive of the extraordinary profits, which are ſometimes very conſiderable, ſo that they have at leaſt twelve hundred crowns yearly. Theſe pretend to be the ſucceſſors of the notaries, eſtabliſh'd by pope Clement I. and afterwards by pope Fabian, who appointed them to record the acts of the martyrs.

They are prelates, and very often referendaries of the ſignature of grants, and of juſtice, whereof mention has been already made. They are clothed in purple, with the camail, the rochet, and a doctor of laws ſleeve. They have a ſeat in the pope's chapel, a place in cavalcades, and other publick ceremonies, immediately before all abbots, and eccleſiaſticks both ſecular and regular under the dignity of biſhops. Theſe prothonotaries have the name of participanti, to diſtinguiſh them from the apoſtolical prothonotaries ad honores, who are created by the favour of cardinal-legates, and who are not allow'd to perform the office of participanti, nor wear a purple veſtment, or the camail, but in thoſe places only where they uſually reſide, and in the territory of the church, where they are ſpecially deputed for ſome extraordinary affair, whereof his holineſs is deſirous of keeping an authentick inſtrument in his archives.

All the apoſtolical prothonotaries, as well participanti as ad honores, are impower'd to receive the laſt wills of cardinals; to make all informations and proceedings neceſſary for the canonization of ſaints, and all ſuch acts as are of great conſequence to the papacy, and the territory of the church; and for this purpoſe they have the right of entrance into all conſiſtories, whether publick or half-publick. They attend on the pope whenever he performs any extraordinary ceremony out of Rome; as when Clement VIII. went to Ferrara, to pronounce the nuptial bleſſing to Philip III. of Spain, and Margaret arch-dutcheſs of Auſtria.

The CONGREGATIONS.

Several cardinals are obliged to aſſemble in theſe congregations, ſome of which conſiſt of twenty-four. Each congregation has its chief or preſident; its particular ſecretary, who regiſters all the debates, and writes letters to all places where it may be neceſſary, agreeable to the decrees of the congregation he ſerves. The inſtruments which are diſpatch'd, and the letters that are writ in the name of any congregation, are ſign'd only by the cardinal who is at the head of it, or who preſides in it; and the ſecretary only ſets the ſeal of the perſon who has ſubſcrib'd his name.

Pope Sixtus V. inſtituted this congregation; they are to prepare the moſt difficult beneficiary matters, which are afterwards to be debated in the conſiſtory, in the pope's preſence; for which reaſon it is call'd the conſiſtorial congregation.

The cardinal-deacon, when he reſides at Rome, is chief of this congregation, and when abſent from it, the pope chuſes whomſoever he thinks proper out of the apoſtolical college, to preſide therein pro tempore; that is, for a certain determin'd time; after the expiration of which, he either makes choice of another, or confirms this a-new.

This congregation is compoſed of ſeveral other cardinals, and of ſome prelates and divines elected by the pope, whoſe number is not fix'd, no more than the time and place where they are to meet; tho it is uſually held ſome days before the conſiſtory, at the dean's palace, or that of ſome other of the ſenior cardinals of this congregation.

The affairs generally treated in it, are the erecting of new arch-biſhopricks and cathedral churches; re-unions, ſuppreſſions, and reſignations of biſhopricks; coadjutorſhips; the alienations of the church-wealth; and laſtly, the taxes and annats of of all benefices to which the pope collates. The other matters relating to religion, or the affairs of the territory of the church, are examin'd in the other congregations, of which mention will be made in the ſequel.

The Congregation of the holy office.

The congregation call'd the holy office, was inſtituted by pope Paul III. at the deſire of cardinal Caraffa, who being afterwards raiſed to the pontificate by the name of Paul IV. enlarged the privileges thereof, to which Sixtus V. added ſtatutes, by which means this tribunal became ſo powerful and formidable, that the Italians declared openly at that time in Rome, il ſommo pontifice Sexto, non la pardonnareb' a Chriſto, i. e. Pope Sixtus would not pardon Chriſt himſelf.

This congregation conſiſts generally of twelve cardinals, and ſometimes many more, as alſo of a conſiderable number of prelates and divines of different orders, both ſecular and regular, who are call'd conſulters, and qualificators of the holy office; whereof one is a long-ſleev'd Franciſcan, and three Jacobins, viz. the maſter of the ſacred palace, the commiſſary of the holy office, and the general of the order of the above-ſaid Jacobins, founded by the name of St. Dominic. There is alſo a fiſcal of the holy office, with his aſſeſſor, whoſe buſineſs is to make a report of cauſes; he is generally a domeſtick prelate, or one of the pope's honorary chamberlains.

This congregation takes cognizance of hereſies, and ſuch new opinions as claſh with the doctrine of the catholick church; as likewiſe of apoſtaſy, magic, witchcraft, and other kinds of incantation; the abuſe of the ſacraments, and the condemnation of pernicious books. For this purpoſe an aſſembly is held every wedneſday at the Minerva, at the general of the Jacobins, and every thurſday before the pope, who is the head thereof; the ſenior cardinal of the holy office is always ſecretary thereof, and its ſeal is in his cuſtody.

None but cardinals have an active voice in this congregation; and when they vote in the Minerva, and in the pope's palace, they cauſe all ſuch as are not of their college, or come to conſult them upon any affair, to withdraw. It is proper to obſerve in this place, that the judges of theſe tribunals are not ſo formidable as they are ſuppoſed to be, by thoſe who know them only by hear-ſay; and that they are neither ſo rigorous, nor ſo ſevere at Rome as in Spain, Portugal, and all other countries where the inquiſition is eſtabliſh'd.

The palace of the holy office is inhabited by the aſſeſſor, the commiſſary, the notary, and other officers of the ſame congregation. In it likewiſe are impriſon'd all ſuch as are accuſed or ſuſpected of crimes whereof this tribunal takes cognizance, till the proſecution is ended; when, if they are declared innocent, they are ſet at liberty; but in caſe they are found guilty, they are deliver'd over to the ſecular arm: but this ſeldom happens unleſs they are found obſtinate, or have relapſed; for they ſeldom go farther than the puniſhing them with perpetual impriſonment, as was obſerv'd at the cloſe of the laſt century, in the ſentence pronounced againſt the famous Michael Molinos, who has made ſo much noiſe in the world by his hereſy of Quietiſm; for which he received no other puniſhment than to be deprived of all civil commerce with his diſciples. There is another maxim obſerved by the judges of this tribunal, which is, that they abſolve all thoſe who come and accuſe themſelves of whatever might otherwiſe make them be conſider'd as criminals, and they are clear'd for a ſlight penance, without being depriv'd in any manner of their liberty; ſo that from that time, no man is allow'd to moleſt them in any manner upon that account: but if any perſon defers to do this till he is accuſed and impriſon'd, he is treated with the utmoſt rigour.

All

All officers and commenſals of the holy office, whoſe number is very great, recognize no other judge, either natural, civil, or criminal, but their aſſeſſor firſt; and by appeal, ſuch cardinals as have employments in the inquiſition.

There is another congregation held in the palace of the holy office every monday, to prepare all matters on which the cardinals are to pronounce a deciſive ſentence in their aſſembly of the inquiſition. None of their eminencies aſſiſt in this preparatory congregation, and it is compoſed only of divines and conſulters, or qualificators of different orders.

The Congregation de propaganda fide.

The college of the congregation of the propagation of the goſpel having been founded by Gregory XV. this pope inſtituted a congregation to ſuper-intend it. 'Tis compoſed of eighteen cardinals, one of the pope's ſecretaries of ſtate, an apoſtolical prothonotary, a referendary, an aſſiſtant or judge lateral, and a ſecretary of the holy office.

All theſe prelates and officers meet the firſt monday in every month in his holineſs's preſence, and ſeveral times every week, when the affairs of the congregation for the propagation of the goſpel make it requiſite, in order to examine whatever may be of advantage to religion; to ſearch out expedients for the bringing over thoſe of a different communion; and to weigh and conſult all ſuch methods as can be thought of, or are propoſed by the miſſionaries and others, who labour under the direction, and at the expence of this college in all parts of the world, where it ſends commiſſioners, whenever any controverſies, diſputes, &c. are to be determin'd.

The Congregation for explaining the council of Trent.

After the ending of the council of Trent, pope Pius IV. deputed certain cardinals who had aſſiſted in it, and conſequently were acquainted with the ſpirit with which it was actuated, to put an end to the doubts which might ariſe touching the execution of that council; moreover, commanding that it ſhould be obſerv'd in the literal ſenſe, and prohibiting all gloſſes that might be made on the tenets eſtabliſh'd therein, he reſerved to himſelf all ſuch interpretations thereof as might afterwards be neceſſary.

Sixtus V. fix'd this congregation, and impower'd it to interpret all points of diſcipline, but not thoſe relating to faith without firſt acquainting him with it.

This congregation meets once a week, on thurſday or ſaturday, at the palace of the ſenior cardinal, (the whole aſſembly being compoſed of perſons of that dignity) but he is not the chief or prefect thereof; for this poſt is given by his holineſs to ſome perſon in their body, to whom he is willing or deſirous of procuring a large penſion, without derogating from the honour he would always have paid to the ſenior cardinal of that aſſembly, in cauſing it to meet at his houſe.

Every inſtrument is diſpatch'd from this congregation gratis, and is ſign'd by the head thereof, who alſo cauſes the ſeal, whereof he is the keeper, to be ſet to it; and this employment with that of prefect, is worth to him twelve hundred crowns of gold yearly; which are paid him out of the monies of the apoſtolick chamber. The other cardinals have no fix'd ſalary for aſſiſting at this congregation, but 'tis an honour to them to be made choice of for explaining the moſt important matters relating to religion.

The fathers of the council of Trent, conſidering the great number of pernicious bóoks publiſh'd ſince the invention of printing, and thoſe which claſh with the true doctrine, whether written in the primitive ages and the ſucceeding ones, or ſince Calvin's reformation; deputed certain cardinals, with ſeveral other prelates and divines, to examine ſuch of theſe books as wanted correction, or others which ought not to be read indifferently by all catholicks; or laſtly, ſuch as either deſerv'd the flames, or to be entirely ſuppreſs'd.

Theſe deputies drew up a liſt thereof, divided into ſeveral claſſes; and the council gave orders afterwards for the correcting, in a ſecond impreſſion, whatever had been expung'd by theſe examiners in the books of the claſs, where they diſtributed theſe works which had been alter'd. 'Tis here to be obſerv'd, that at that time, they only mark'd on the tables of the books thoſe paſſages, which in the body of theſe writings, contain'd any thing contrary to the tenets and worſhip of the catholick church; all which was done by a dele.

Several books were inſerted in the claſs of thoſe they were reſolv'd to ſuppreſs entirely; however, great numbers of theſe continue unalter'd to this day; as likewiſe ſome copies which have not been revis'd purſuant to the reſolution of this council: and that, becauſe 'twas impoſſible for the deputies of this congregation of the index to get them all into their hands, or to perſuade or force ſuch as had them already in their libraries, to make the ſame additions or dele's: whence ſeveral editions, of the ſame authors, differ very much from one another.

Such books as by this council were forbid to be read, were as numerous as thoſe of all the other claſſes; and theſe fathers made a decree, by which they pronounced anathema againſt all who ſhould read them, or keep them without their expreſs leave firſt obtain'd, which is now given in writing to all whom this congregation thinks fit to grant it, either with certain reſtrictions, or without any, either of time or place: wherein there is this difference between the permiſſion which the maſter of the ſacred palace gives alſo to read theſe prohibited books, viz. that the latter grants it to none but ſuch as live actually in Rome, and can grant it to no other perſons; but the deputies of the congregation of the index, are impower'd to grant it to all members of the catholick church, in any part of the world.

Pope Pius V. confirm'd the eſtabliſhment of this congregation, and impower'd it to examine all ſuch books as were ſuſpected to contain any ſeditious tenets, written ſince the council of Trent, and all ſuch as ſhall be publiſh'd hereafter; by which the power of that congregation is greater than that of the inquiſition, which is authoriz'd to condemn ſuch books only as are written againſt the faith, but not thoſe which relate to manners, the diſcipline of the church, or civil ſociety, which the deputies of the index have a privilege to do.

This congregation is compoſed of ſeveral cardinals, and a ſecretary of the order of St. Dominic. Several divines are alſo admitted into it, under the name of conſulters, each of whom have books given them in order for examination, the reſult of which they afterwards report to the congregation, but have no active voice therein. Theſe are ſometimes held before the pope, and at other times before the ſenior cardinal; but it ſeldom aſſembles, except on affairs of the higheſt importance.

The

The Congregation of Immunities.

This was eſtabliſh'd by pope Urban VIII. in order to obviate the difficulties and diſputes which aroſe in the judgments of ſuch ſuits as were carried on againſt churchmen for various matters, whether civil or criminal, the cognizance whereof might belong equally to the ſecular and eccleſiaſtical magiſtrate, and conſequently create diviſions among them, which was frequently of very fatal conſequence.

This congregation is compoſed of ſeveral cardinals nominated by his holineſs, the number whereof is not fix'd. They have alſo an auditor of the Rota, a clerk of the chamber, and ſeveral prelates referendaries, one whereof is the ſecretary of this aſſembly.

This court takes cognizance of all eccleſiaſtical immunities and exemptions; of all tranſgreſſions in prejudice of the clergy, and the knights of Malta, whether from ſecular magiſtrates, or the biſhops themſelves, which is a kind of appeal. It is held at the palace of the ſenior cardinal, on all tueſdays. The prefect and keeper of the ſeals, receives two thouſand crowns annually for his table, from the apoſtolick chamber.

Before pope Urban VIII. made this inſtitution, the cognizance of eccleſiaſtical immunities belong'd to the congregation of regulars, which we ſhall now mention.

The Congregation of the Biſhops and Regulars.

Pope Sixtus V. in the beginning of his pontificate, reunited two congregations under the name above-mention'd. It was compoſed of a certain number of cardinals at his holineſs's pleaſure, and of a prelate who is the ſecretary thereof, and has ſix writers under him.

This congregation is impower'd to regulate all ſuch diſputes as ariſe among biſhops and their dioceſans, and the regulars of all monaſtick orders. The cardinals of this aſſembly are alſo obliged to give their opinion vivâ voce, or in writing, whenever it may be neceſſary, to all biſhops, abbots, prelates, and ſuperiors of churches, or monaſteries, who have recourſe to them; and to anticipate them, in caſe of neceſſity, by wholeſome counſel, in order to prevent their taking any falſe ſtep in the exerciſe of their employments, and their miniſterial functions.

The writers and ſecretary of this congregation, are maintain'd at the expence of the apoſtolical chamber, becauſe they diſpatch every thing gratis for the churchmen above-mention'd; and thoſe cardinals who dictate them in a full aſſembly, every friday at the cardinal's palace, who is the chief thereof, are not allow'd any thing for it.

The Congregation for the examination of Biſhops.

Gregory XIV. being at the council of Trent, ſome divines ſhew'd him the neceſſity there was of ſetting ſuch paſtors over churches, as were capable of governing them well. He was no ſooner raiſed to the pontificate, than he inſtituted this congregation, to examine all ſuch churchmen as were nominated to biſhopricks.

'Tis compoſed of eight cardinals, ſix prelates, ten divines of different orders, both ſecular and regular, ſome of whom muſt be doctors of the canon law. Theſe examiners are choſen by the pope, who cauſes them to aſſemble in his palace every tueſday or friday, when any affair is to be examin'd.

All

All Italian biſhops are obliged to ſubmit to this examination before they are conſecrated, and for this purpoſe they preſent themſelves upon their knees before his holineſs, who is ſeated in an eaſy chair, and continue in this poſture on a cuſhion at his feet; during which, the examiners ſtanding round him, interrogate them on ſuch heads of divinity and the canon law, as they think proper; to all which the candidates are obliged to make categorical anſwers.

The examination being ended, ſuch as are judged capable, are order'd by the pope to give in their names to the ſecretary, who inſerts them in the regiſter, and afterwards gives them an extract of the debates of the examiners, in order for their making uſe of them whenever they are tranſlated to another ſee, or have the archbiſhop's or patriarch's pall given them; for when once a perſon has paſſed examination by this congregation, he may not only be tranſlated from one ſee to another, but to all the reſt of the chief dignities of the church, without being obliged to undergo any other examination.

Such as are raiſed to the cardinalate before they are created biſhops, are diſpenſed from this examination whenever they are conſecrated, in order to qualify them for taking poſſeſſion of a biſhop's ſee, or patriarchate, and even if they ſhould happen to be raiſed to the pontificate. All cardinal-nephews are likewiſe exempt, which is a very diſtinguiſhing favour, and worthy of remark.

The Congregation of the morals of Biſhops.

As doctrine alone is not ſufficient to render a churchman worthy of the epiſcopate, unleſs it be heightned by virtue and the ſoundeſt morals, pope Innocent XI. obſerving that favour and intereſt had too great a ſhare in the election of biſhops, inſtituted this congregation of ſound morals, in order that no churchmen who had not led a virtuous and regular life, might be raiſed to the epiſcopal, or any other eminent dignity in the church.

This congregation is compoſed of three cardinals, two biſhops, four prelates, and a ſecretary who is the pope's auditor. It is held in the palace of one of theſe three cardinals alternately, and ſometimes in the apoſtolical palace; but in what place ſoever theſe deputies aſſemble, they examine very exactly the certificates of the life and manners of the candidates for a biſhop's ſee; and never come to a determination, till ſuch time as it is evidently proved, that the whole conduct of their lives has been irreproachable, otherwiſe they are not admitted to the epiſcopacy. Several are nevertheleſs made biſhops, notwithſtanding they have led irregular lives, and that becauſe they frequently find an opportunity to elude the examination of this congregation; none being obliged to appear in this court but thoſe whoſe promotion is oppoſed by perſons of great probity and diſintereſtedneſs, who either make their complaints, or give their oppoſitions in writing, in purſuance of the three bans, which are publiſh'd in thoſe places, where ſuch churchmen as are raiſed to the epiſcopal dignity have laſt reſided for ſeveral years; to the end that ſuch perſons as have been eye-witneſſes of their conduct, may make a ſincere declaration thereof, and tranſmit it to the deputies of this congregation; and this is the ſtandard by which biſhops examine all ſuch clerks as come for prieſts or deacons orders, as alſo all miſſionaries.

The cardinal who is the pope's vicar-general, is generally the prefect of this congregation, which is impower'd either to force or diſpenſe, as may be expedient or neceſſary, all biſhops in Italy, and to oblige all abbots to reſide in their ſeveral communities.

In

In this congregation there are three cardinals, three prelates, and a ſecretary. They aſſemble at the prefect's palace, but having very little buſineſs, they meet but very rarely, and that only at the requeſt of ſuch biſhops and abbots as deſire to abſent themſelves from their churches, for certain reaſons or affairs mention'd in their petitions. This congregation anſwers them, by granting the requeſts of thoſe they judge to have a juſt occaſion to abſent themſelves for a time limited by them, at the expiration whereof they indulge them a longer time, when ſuppoſed neceſſary; but whenever they refuſe any perſon the liberty of abſenting himſelf, in caſe ſuch perſon infringes their order, he is deprived of all his benefices, during the time he abſents himſelf; and if any biſhop or abbot refuſe to return to his dioceſe or chapter, immediately after this congregation has order'd them ſo to do, it may ſuſpend them from all their functions, till ſuch time as they are reſtored by his holineſs or his vicar-general; who never do it without the conſent of the deputies of this congregation.

The Congregation for ſuch Monaſteries as are to be ſuppreſs'd.

Among the great number of rich monaſteries in Italy, in caſe the temporalities of any of them happen to be ſunk, or ſo far diminiſh'd, that the remainder is not ſufficient for the maintaining of ſix religious, they ought to be ſuppreſs'd, or, at leaſt, united to others that have revenues ſufficient for maintaining a greater number of friars than thoſe of their community.

Pope Innocent X. obſerving that theſe poor monaſteries grew every day more burdenſome to the publick, firſt inſtituted this congregation; and commanded the deputies thereof to inquire into the ſtate of theſe monaſteries, and to name ſuch as were to be ſuppreſs'd. One would imagine that after this inquiry was ended, this congregation would have been aboliſh'd; but as ſome difficulties have always ariſen on that head, the ſucceſſors of Innocent X. have preſerv'd it to this day.

'Tis compoſed of eight cardinals, and of ſuch fryars of all the orders, as the provincials, on whom ſuch monaſteries depend, depute to take care of their intereſt. This aſſembly regulates the pretenſions of founders and benefactors, and thoſe of their heirs, who require reſtitution to be made of ſuch monies as had been bequeath'd to thoſe houſes or abbies, inaſmuch as the cauſe for which ſuch legacies had been left ſubſiſts no longer. But this congregation does not always cauſe ſuch wealth to be reſtored to the ſucceſſors of the legatees; they often finding their demands unjuſt, eſpecially when there is any likelihood of their being one day rebuilt: however, they order that what remains of the temporalities of ſuch abandon'd or ruin'd houſes, ſhall be employ'd for the moſt important exigencies of the church; and, among other things, to aſſiſt the chriſtian armies that fight againſt the infidels.

The ſaid congregation examines alſo the petitions of ſuch communities and cities, whoſe inhabitants deſire liberty to rebuild, or found a-new any monaſtery, for reaſons alledged by them, and on which they judge in this aſſembly, on all that is to be granted to the petitioners, by making ſuch ordinances as are conformable to the concluſions there taken by plurality of voices; and inſtruments thereof are given gratis, ſign'd by the prefect, and ſeal'd by the ſecretary, to deliver them to all who want them.

The pope, without any way derogating from the dignity of univerſal biſhop, is poſſeſs'd in a particular manner of the archbiſhoprick of the City of Rome, and in that quality is oblig'd to make the paſtoral viſitation of ſix biſhopricks, ſuffragans to this metropolis of his patrimony. But as he is inceſſantly employ'd in a multitude of ſtate affairs, of the greateſt importance to the chriſtian world, he has inſtituted this congregation of the apoſtolical viſitation, which nominates commiſſioners to viſit churches, and monaſteries of both ſexes, both in city and country; and theſe viſitors at their return, give in a written report to the congregation, concerning the good ſtate, or the irregularities they meet with in them, in order that they may be remedied.

This congregation is compoſed of the ſame cardinals and prelates, as thoſe of the monaſteries to be ſuppreſs'd, mention'd in the preceeding chapter; but this has over and above the pope's vicar-general, and the cardinal-vicegerent, without whoſe conſent the deputies of the congregation for the monaſteries of regulars, never ſend any commiſſioner, to make the apoſtolical viſitation of ſuch churches, as are within the juriſdiction of the patriarchal archbiſhoprick of Rome.

The Congregation of Relicks.

The congregation of relicks is compoſed of ſix cardinals and four prelates, among whom are the cardinal vicar, and the prefect of the pope's ſacriſty. Theſe deputies united, ſuper-intend the relicks of thoſe antient martyrs, that are frequently found in catacombs, and other ſubterraneous places in Rome.

When theſe ſeveral cardinals and prelates are met together in their congregation, they examine the informations given in by ſuch of them as went upon the ſpot, to ſee whether there were any certain marks to diſtinguiſh the bones, ſhrines of tombs of martyrs, from thoſe of the heathens, or other perſons who were buried undiſtinguiſh'd, in theſe ſubterraneous caverns.

* There are three tokens which are generally look'd upon as ſo many infallible teſtimonies of the martyrdom of thoſe in whoſe graves they are found, viz. Firſt, Little glaſs phials, in which there are any drops or marks of blood left, which thoſe who buried the bodies of martyrs obſerved always to put into ſuch glaſſes. Secondly, Any pieces of the inſtruments which had been employ'd in their execution; as for inſtance, of a ſcimitar, a lance, a ſword, or knife, &c. And, thirdly, Some inſcription engraved on bricks, flints, or ſtones.

Whenever there are any of theſe marks, and they are allow'd to be antique and genuine, according to the ſeveral circumſtances expreſs'd in the informations made on the ſpot by commiſſioners deputed for that purpoſe; all the prelates of the congregation give their votes thereupon, and in caſe there is no perſon to prove and demonſtrate that theſe marks are falſe and ſuppoſititious; the prefect of the aſſembly declares the relicks in queſtion, worthy the honour and veneration of the faithful: he gives whatever names he thinks proper to ſuch bones as cannot be known by any inſcription, or particular circumſtance of the moſt antient martyrologies, in which very few martyrs are named, and thoſe only who were moſt eminent. The form of words generally uſed in the above-mention'd martyrologies is as follows: the ſame day ſeveral other faithful chriſtians were martyr'd and buried with theſe, and ſuffer'd death upon the ſame account.

After the congregation has pronounced ſentence on the validity of any relicks, and has given ſuch names as it thinks proper, the congregation conſigns theſe relicks to the vicar, and the pope's ſacriſtan, who diſtribute them to ſuch as deſire them; and at the ſame time gives them certificates, or authentick letters of their being genuine, by making all ſuch as they favour with any portion of this inexhauſtible treaſure, to ſign a kind of receipt, and a compliment of thanks, at the bottom of their regiſters.

The Congregation of Indulgences.

This congregation, the number of whoſe cardinals and prelates is not fix'd, muſt aſſemble in the palace of the ſenior cardinal, among thoſe deputed therein by the pope, and which the court of Rome has thought proper to have aſſembled, ever ſince the holding of the council of Trent, in order to examine whether the cauſes and motives of all thoſe who ſue for indulgences are juſt and lawful. All petitions are granted in this congregation in the pope's name only, who ſhews by all the formularies which the deputies of this aſſembly make uſe of, that he pretends to be the only depoſitory, and the ſovereign diſpenſer of what he calls the ſpiritual treaſures of the church. We refer our reader to what was obſerv'd on this head, where mention was made of tax'd briefs.

The regiſter of this congregation ſends the minutes and concluſions of petitions to the ſecretary of the briefs, who diſpatches them gratis under the fiſherman's ſeal, thoſe excepted which are deſired in perpetuum, and which are expedited by bulls, the leaſt of which coſt a piſtole, and others more, according as the clauſes are more or leſs beneficial, or the formalities obſerved in iſſuing out the inſtruments.

The Congregation of Rites or Ceremonies of the church.

Pope Sixtus V. founded this congregation to regulate the ceremonies and rites of the new offices of ſaints, which are added to the Romiſh Calendar, whenever any perſon is canoniz'd, whereof it takes cognizance, and conſequently the examination of all informations, and verification of all inquiries, acts and proceedings, relating to this matter.

It has the authority to explain the rubricks of the maſs-book and breviary, when any difficulties are ſtarted, or any perſon deſires any inſtruction on that head. Finally, its power extends to pronounce ſentence, from which there is no appeal, on all diſputes relating to the precedency of churches.

This congregation is compoſed of eight cardinals and a ſecretary, who is one of the college of the prelates referendaries. Two maſters of the ceremonies of his holineſs are likewiſe admitted into it. Theſe ſeveral deputies aſſemble once a month at the palace of the ſenior cardinal, who is the prefect thereof, and who is impower'd to call them together oftner, whenever a multiplicity of buſineſs requires it.

Whenever any ſaint is to be canoniz'd, the three ſenior auditors of the Ruota are preſent in this aſſembly, as perſons ſuppoſed to be well verſed in the canon law, together with an aſſiſtant apoſtolical prothonotary, and the proctor of the faith, who is generally the fiſcal advocate of the apoſtolical chamber. Several conſulters are alſo admitted into it, who are divines and monks profeſs'd of different orders, among whom is the maſter of the ſacred palace, and the prefect of the pope's ſacriſty.

All theſe judges aſſiſtants, together with the deputies in ordinary of this congregation, examine the proofs of the holineſs of thoſe who are to be canoniz'd; and in caſe they are found good and valid, his holineſs afterwards pronounces ſentence in their favour, on the judicial acts and proceedings of this congregation, by ordering their names to be inſerted in the catalogue of the beatified, in caſe it were not before; and if they have been canoniz'd by a ſentence anterior to this, then his holineſs's ordinance is made in form of an edict, by which he enjoins and commands, by his abſolute authority, that the names of theſe beatified ſouls be inſerted in the diptycks of the the ſaints, in order that they may be invoked by all chriſtians in the publick ſervice of religion, and that the ſacrifice of the maſs be offer'd in their honour.

The pope does not pronounce this edict till after he has made a previous declaration in a ſecret conſiſtory, and with the advice of all the cardinals, biſhops and abbots as are then in the city of Rome, and who together form a kind of council which differs very much from the general aſſemblies of the clergy, as they are uſually call'd.

The proofs which the ſeveral members of this aſſembly, or conſiſtorial congregation, look upon as valid and ſufficient, in the acts and proceedings of all canonizations are, martyrdom, undiſputed miracles, teſtimonies of a virtuous life, and the heroick virtues of thoſe who are to be canoniz'd.

The following maxim is now obſerv'd, tho it has not been follow'd in this congregation above a century, viz. Not to enter upon the inquiries prior to canonization, till fifty years at leaſt after the death of the perſon to be canoniz'd, or, in the ſtyle of the Vatican, to be declar'd a beatified ſoul; and the reaſon of their deferring it ſo long, is, in order to take away all ſuſpicions which might otherwiſe be entertain'd, that the relations of ſuch as are to be canoniz'd, would give falſe teſtimonies in their favour, either out of intereſt or ſelf-love, were any ſuch alive, and living in the places where thoſe inquiries and informations of the life and conduct are made; all which are circumſtances that ought chiefly to be conſider'd in proceedings relating to canonizations.

The Congregation for the Building of Churches.

Pope Clement VIII. founded this congregation, purpoſely that they might take a more immediate care of the building of St. Peter's church adjoining to the Vatican, which by this means is become the largeſt, moſt magnificent, and moſt wealthy church in chriſtendom. And notwithſtanding that this congregation has ſuperintended the building of the other churches in Rome, which are very beautiful and numerous, they are nevertheleſs employ'd to this day, in repairing and beautifying this cathedral of St. Peter's more than any other; for which reaſon this aſſembly bears only the name of that church.

There are eight cardinals and four prelates deputed to regulate all the concerns of this fabrick. Their aſſiſtants are the auditor and treaſurer of the apoſtolic chamber, an auditor of the Ruota, a ſteward, a fiſcal, a ſecretary, and ſome attorneys. All theſe aſſemble twice every month, at the palace of the ſenior cardinal of their congregation, on the monday or ſaturday neareſt to the beginning and middle of each month.

This tribunal takes cognizance alſo by appeal, of all diſputes that ariſe with regard to the building of St. Peter's, whether of ſuch tradeſmen as furniſh materials, the workmen, or other perſons; as alſo of all clandeſtine practices, frauds, or embezzlements, which may have been committed by thoſe who have the direction of it; and for this purpoſe they have a judge to take immediate cognizance of any thing of this nature. But the greateſt privilege theſe deputies are inveſted with, is the power of changing the laſt wills of thoſe who bequeath ſums to be employ'd in pious uſes; or made in favour of perſons unknown, of vagabonds, exiles or perſons deceaſed; and in general, of all ſuch as imply a contradiction, and which cannot be executed purſuant to the will of the teſtators; for in theſe caſes thoſe deputies apply it to the profit of St. Peter; and in caſe the heirs or legatees prevail to have the will of the teſtator executed, they then reſerve for the above-mention'd fabrick, whatever rents or intereſt may be due from the death of the teſtator, till the day that the decree paſt in their congregation.

Great numbers of people are, by way of penance for their ſins, to work very hard, and are employ'd in the above-mention'd fabrick; as for inſtance, to pound flints and ſeveral other things for the making of mortar. Several perſons of great quality work at poliſhing of marble, a certain number of hours daily; and in caſe they perform their work well, they receive abſolution at the time preſcrib'd them.

Theſe puniſhments are very much a-kin to thoſe of galley-ſlaves —— and are always enjoyn'd for a time, proportionable to the enormity of their crimes, but with this difference, that none are condemn'd to the gallies ——— but ſuch as are legally convicted of any crime; and that thoſe who are condemn'd by the above-mention'd churchmen, are not judged to deſerve the labours and puniſhments they are made to ſuffer, but as they have made a voluntary confeſſion of certain ſins to their confeſſor in the tribunal of penance, in order to receive the ſacramental abſolution for it.

We ſhall here conclude the deſcription of the ceremonies of the Romiſh church, and whatever relates to the hierarchy thereof.

BOOK I.

By way of PREFACE.

Wherein is ſhewn how widely the practice of the Church in antient times, with regard to Hereticks, differs from that of the tribunal of the Inquiſition in our days: a parallel between them; with the juſtice of the former, and the great injuſtice of the latter.

THE * ſpirit of Chriſt Jeſus and of his church being a ſpirit of charity, of gentleneſs, and moderation, that aims not at the death, but the ſalvation of a ſinner; nothing appears to be more oppoſite to it than the employing force, violence, tortures, and even death againſt thoſe who entertain ſuch notions as claſh with the purity of doctrine, or the precepts of the goſpel. Beſides, as the power of the church is merely ſpiritual in its own nature, the prelates thereof are no ways impowered to inflict puniſhment.

The keys which our Saviour has given to looſe and to unlooſe, have no other power than that of ſeparating believers from the communion of the church, in things of an eccleſiaſtical and ſpiritual nature, and not to deprive them either of life, or their temporal poſſeſſions. Thus we ſee that during the three firſt ages of the church, the apoſtles and their ſucceſſors employed no other methods than thoſe of exhortation, admonition, and cenſure, in order to bring back ſuch chriſtians as had wander'd from the paths of faith: and in caſe they perſiſted in their obſtinacy, they contented themſelves with ſeparating them from their communion, agreeable to that precept of St. Paul, Hæreticum hominem, poſt unam & alteram correptionem devita. But no ſooner were there emperors who profeſſed the chriſtian religion, but they laid it down as a duty incumbent on themſelves, not only for the ſecurity of their government, but for the better ſupport of the catholick religion, of which they aré the protectors, to enact laws againſt hereticks, and to puniſh them. The biſhops never arrogated this authority, but addreſſed themſelves ſometimes to the emperors to deſire that certain turbulent Hereticks might either be puniſhed, or a ſtop put to their proceedings by the dread of puniſhment. But then, agreeable to the dictates of the goſpel, they took the utmoſt care not to ſuffer Hereticks to be puniſhed with death; and all they deſired was, that they might be effectual in reclaiming them from their errors, but were not for having them put to death in a ſtate of impenitence. This they looked upon with ſo much horror, that notwithſtanding the Priſcillianiſts did, of all the Hereticks, moſt juſtly deſerve death; yet the church looked on thoſe biſhops that had accuſed them to Maximus the emperor, who had condemned them to die, as guilty of ſo great a crime; that the reſt of the biſhops thought it incumbent on them to join no longer with them in communion, nor with thoſe who did not ſeparate themſelves from it. And an antient author, tho he owns that the Priſcillianiſts had been juſtly puniſhed, he yet cannot forbear looking upon their condemnation, which had been procured by certain biſhops, as an example of a very dangerous conſequence; * Hi homines luce indigniſſimi, peſſimo exemplo necati, aut exilio mulctati. St. Auſtin himſelf ſhews plainly enough in his epiſtle to Donatus proconſul of Africa, that he was of the ſame opinion, when he declares to him, that in caſe he ſtill continued to put the Donatiſts to death, the biſhops were bound in duty to conceal them from him for the future.

Not but that Hereticks may be reſtrained by temporal puniſhments; but here, as in all other things, certain regards muſt be had, as well as ſome rules followed: And hereupon it may be ſaid, that the cauſes for which Hereticks may be puniſhed, are chiefly reducible to four.

The firſt is from a political reaſon, viz. for the peace of the government, in order to prevent and put a ſtop to, or even curb the diſorders or diſſenſions, that are almoſt inſeparable from diſputes on religious topicks, as is but too manifeſt from experience.

The ſecond reaſon is drawn from the duty incumbent on a chriſtian prince, who is obliged to guard religion with a vigilant eye, and to exert himſelf as much as poſſible to maintain it in its purity. And as this purity is ſullied by hereſies, corrupt opinions, and pernicious maxims; a prince muſt not, when theſe prevail, look upon them with an eye of indifference; but is bound to root out every thing that may have the leaſt tendency to deprave religion, with the ſame care and circumſpection, as he employs to ſee the laws put in execution.

The third reaſon for puniſhing Hereticks, is ſometimes drawn from the nature of thoſe hereſies which they profeſs: for it is certain that there are ſome who advance principles of ſo blaſphemous a nature, and entertain notions ſo highly injurious to the divine Being, and the myſteries of religion, that to tolerate, and not endeavour to ſuppreſs them, would be injuſtice. Can any thing be more equitable than to chaſtiſe ſeditious ſpirits, when they diſcourſe on topics injurious to the prince, and obnoxious to the ſtate? And ſhall we ſay that the divine Majeſty is to be leſs reſpected than that of kings and other earthly governors; and that men ſhall with impunity be ſuffered to break out into contumelious expreſſions againſt the former, and at the ſame time puniſh the licentious diſcourſes vented againſt the latter with the utmoſt ſeverity?

The laſt reaſon why Hereticks may be proceeded againſt with rigour, is not to force, but incline them, by the fear and dread of the laws, and the puniſhments inflicted, to acknowledge the truth, and to return to the church which they had left.

This would never once enter into their thoughts, were they not prevailed upon from a deſire of living in peace, and to eſcape thoſe puniſhments to which Hereticks are ſubject by the laws. This reaſon, which, perhaps, may appear to be the weakeſt, did nevertheleſs prevail ſo far with St. Auſtin, that it made him change the opinion he had once entertain'd, with reſpect to the puniſhment of Hereticks.

If we examine the firſt reaſon, it muſt be owned that all ſuch Hereticks as break in upon the peace of the ſtate, and raiſe ſeditions, may, and often ought to be puniſhed capitally, as their practices are more or leſs prejudicial to the tranquillity of the government. Thus the church in St. Auſtin's time, thought it ſelf impowered to implore the protection of the emperors againſt the Donatiſts; and 'twas from the ſame principle that theſe monarchs, upon the complaints made by the church, puniſhed ſome with pecuniary mulcts, others with baniſhment, and others again with death: and in all theſe proceedings they acted with the higheſt juſtice, as is manifeſt from hiſtory.

The ſecond reaſon may juſtly authorize a prince to puniſh Hereticks. St. Auſtin is of this opinion, and therefore ſpeaking of the Donatiſts, he ſays, "The tribune, "whom the emperor has ſent, is not commanded to put you to death, but only to re- "form you; but in caſe you reſolve upon the contrary, and perſiſt in your obſtinacy, "you ſhall be ſent into exile, to the end that you may not hinder the reſt from "becoming converts, and recanting their erroneous principles."

The third reaſon is but too ſufficient to impower a monarch to puniſh not only Hereticks, but even Schiſmaticks, Heathens and Jews, if any ſuch are in his dominions. The puniſhments inflicted ought to be either gentler or more ſevere, proportionable to the flagrancy and blaſphemy of the doctrine. Princes who were informed with a ſpirit of piety, as is manifeſt from the example of the emperor Juſtin and St. Lewis, never ſuffered blaſphemers to go unpuniſhed: ſince therefore, according to the divine law, they ought to be puniſhed capitally, it cannot be diſputed but that a chriſtian prince may in that particular regulate his conduct by the law of the Creator; tho at the ſame time it is certain, that he is at liberty to puniſh with a leſs ſevere hand if he thinks proper.

As to the fourth reaſon, viz. the bringing Hereticks over to the church, either by a dread of puniſhment, or from the puniſhments themſelves; it muſt be owned, that when this is the only reaſon for chaſtiſing them, they ought to be proceeded againſt with the utmoſt prudence and circumſpection. For, not to mention that a truly chriſtian prince does all that lies in his power to prevent the effuſion of his ſubjects blood; ſo on the other ſide, the converſion of Hereticks, which is the thing aimed at, cannot be effected by theſe means: for when once we have put a Heretick to death, we thereby cut off all farther hopes of his converſion. On this occaſion therefore, we are to employ negative puniſhments rather than poſitive ones, if I may ſo expreſs my ſelf; i. e. they may be excluded the enjoyment of thoſe honours, dignities and privileges, which the Catholicks enjoy; or ſuch burdens may be laid upon them, and they may be bound to ſuch ſervices, as the reſt are exempt from: Nay, farther, the places where they meet together for divine worſhip may be taken from them; they may be prohibited the publick exerciſe of their religion, and their paſtors may be ſent into baniſhment. For as nothing contributes more to foment and keep up a ſpirit of ſchiſm, and a diviſion in religion, than a variety of worſhips, and the diverſity of aſſemblies and paſtors; ſo on the other ſide, nothing can poſſibly weaken them more than to deprive them of all theſe advantages. This was the conduct of the chriſtian emperors in St. Auſtin's time; and the ſame ſaint who acquaints us with this circumſtance, approves and applauds it; and confeſſes that the happy effects which have reſulted from this conduct, have obliged him to change his opinion, and to own that Hereticks may, with great juſtice, as well as advantage to the ſtate, be puniſhed with gentlegentleneſs and moderation, provided their converſion is the only motive of ſuch a procedure. But how juſt ſoever it may be to puniſh Hereticks on certain occaſions, 'tis nevertheleſs certain, that as to corporal and civil puniſhments, the church had nothing to do with them, but that they were wholly inflicted by the prince and the ſecular magiſtrate. Tho we were to read an hundred times over all the old collections of canons, by which the church ſquar'd her conduct for ſeveral centuries together, we yet ſhall not meet with ſo much as one that inflicts corporal puniſhments, not even on eccleſiaſticks, tho theſe in all ages have been more immediately in ſubordination to the church than the laity; which is an indiſputable proof that the church was in thoſe days perſuaded ſhe was inveſted with no ſuch authority.

This authority or power therefore in the firſt ages of the church with reſpect to hereſies, was confined only to tenets; and this power has indeed been its peculiar prerogative in all ages. Princes and civil magiſtrates have never carried their pretenſions ſo far; or in caſe they happen to have done it, as Juſtinian with regard to St. Origen, it has either happened but very rarely, or in execution of the church's decrees. And if they ever attempted any thing of this nature from their own authority, they were of no great conſequence, and very little regard was paid to them, till ſuch time as they had a ſanction given to them by the ſentence which the church pronounced.

Her power extended indeed to the condemnation of Hereticks themſelves; but then the puniſhments which ſhe inflicted by virtue of her own authority, went no further than the excommunication of the laity, and the excommunication and depoſition of the clergy.

Whenever the church was perſuaded that weightier puniſhments were neceſſary for the reſtraining of Hereticks, or even ſuch catholicks as were incorrigible, ſhe was ſo far from ordering the execution of them, that on the contrary ſhe always addreſſed herſelf to princes and the civil magiſtrate for that purpoſe. Several antient biſhops of Africa uſed to follow this maxim, as is manifeſt from ſeveral teſtimonies of St. Auſtin: Thus the council of * Vernon decrees, that the king muſt be addreſſed in order to inflict the puniſhment of baniſhment. The ſame thing is enacted by the third council of † Tours, whenever civil and corporal puniſhments are to be inflicted.

The popes themſelves were once of the ſame opinion, tho their preſent conduct is ſo oppoſite to it. Pelagius I. enacts that recourſe ſhall be had to the civil magiſtrate, to reſtrain Hereticks and Schiſmaticks: ‡ He writes to this purpoſe to Narſes the patrician, commander of the emperor's forces in Italy; and in his letter to John the patrician, has words to the || ſame effect.

Altho Gregory IX. carried the authority of the church to a great length, he nevertheleſs acknowledges that it belongs only to the civil magiſtrate to impoſe pecuniary  fines; and Celeſtin III. is of the ſame opiinon *†.

And this has obliged Alcuinus, notwithſtanding he was a great ſtickler for the authority of the church in other caſes, to own, that there is this difference between temporal and eccleſiaſtical power, viz. that the former is wholly confined to the inflicting ‡‡ of corporal puniſhments, and the latter to ſpiritual ones *‡.

However, it muſt ſtill be owned, that ſeveral examples of conſiderable antiquity might be brought to prove that the church has the power of inflicting bodily puniſhments.

The fifth council of Rome held under pope Symmachus, condemns a clerk to baniſhment, and confiſcates all his goods * ||.

Adrian

* Canon 9. † Canon 4. ‡ 13. q. 5. can. Non Vos. || Ibid. can. Religionib.  Ibid. can. Religentes. *† De maled. can. ſtatuimus. ‡‡ De judic. can. cùm non ab homine. *‡ De authorit. eccleſ. cap. 2. * || Q. 5. c. Accuſatoribus.

Adrian V. ordains, that a falſe accuſer ſhall have his tongue cut out, nay, that he ſhall loſe his head, in caſe his accuſation be of ſo heinous a nature as to deſerve it *.

Urban III. ordains, that a clerk who ſhall have counterfeited the royal ſignatures, ſhall be depoſed, ſent into baniſhment, and ſtigmatized in the † face.

Alexander III. condemns all ſuch laymen as ſhall have ſeduced and drawn away women and young lads, to the ſcourge, and pecuniary mulcts ‖. Other examples might be quoted to ſtrengthen our aſſertion.

But it may be objected in the firſt place, that the ſeveral inſtances above-mentioned, do not any way relate to Hereticks. Secondly, that it is taken for granted in theſe determinations, that the eccleſiaſtical judges have received from princes, an immediate power for inflicting of civil puniſhments. And indeed Alexander III. manifeſtly makes ſuch a ſuppoſition, in the affair relating to the biſhop of Palermo, who had really a power devolved on him by the king of Sicily; by virtue of which he enacted civil puniſhments, even with reſpect to the laity.

It may be farther ſaid, that theſe decrees are made only to point out to the civil magiſtrate the puniſhment that is due to the crimes mentioned in them; which however does no way infer that it is not their buſineſs to exerciſe theſe puniſhments againſt thoſe criminals. In this manner does the very gloſs itſelf explain the decrees of Adrian V. and of Urban III.

In a word, in what ſenſe ſoever theſe particular decrees are underſtood, 'tis impoſſible for them to contradict the authority of the fathers, who are all unanimouſly agreed, that the juriſdiction of the church is wholly ſpiritual; that ſhe cannot make uſe of force; and that temporal puniſhments do not any way belong to her province.

This, however, is to be underſtood of the church, with regard to the power ſhe has received from our Saviour and his apoſtles; for in thoſe places where ſhe enjoys ſovereignty and temporal authority, as in Rome, and ſeveral other places, it is not to be doubted but that ſhe enjoys the ſame rights and privileges; and that they are as unlimited as thoſe of other ſovereigns.

From all that has been ſaid we may conclude, that nothing can poſſibly be ſo oppoſite to the ſpirit and practice of the church for upwards of a thouſand years, than what is now obſerved in thoſe countries where the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed.

For upwards of 600 years together the church behaved with the utmoſt gentleneſs and moderation towards all Hereticks in general, and thoſe in particular who never raiſed any commotions in the ſtate, or perſecuted the catholicks; whereas in thoſe countries where the inquiſition prevails, they are treated with the utmoſt rigour and ſeverity, the moſt ſtrict ſearch is made after them, and they never ceaſe proſecuting them till they have quite extirpated them. The utmoſt rigours of impriſonment, puniſhments, racks, tortures, in all their various ſhapes, are employed againſt them; and ſo inflexible are they in the puniſhments they inflict, that nothing can poſſibly ſoften or alleviate their ſeverity. And if the civil magiſtrate, whoſe aſſiſtance they implore when the puniſhment is capital, (which is ever the moſt rigorous, ſince it is no leſs than burning) ſhould go about to mitigate it, he himſelf would be ſuſpected to favour Hereticks, and would at leaſt incur the moſt rigorous cenſures of the church, and be entirely cut off from it by excommunication.

In thoſe days the church had neither judges, officers, tribunals, priſons, dungeons, executioners or tortures; the ſpirit of gentleneſs ſhe then breathed, did not ſuffer it ſo much as once to enter into her thoughts: ſhe left all thoſe terrible things to the tribunal of princes and the civil magiſtrate, who are juſtly impowered to imploy compulſion, and who are frequently obliged to make uſe of it for the peace and ſafety of governments; as alſo to reſtrain the wicked, who would otherwiſe fancy they might indulge in all manner of licentiouſneſs; and to force them to be virtuous, at leaſt in outward appearance, if they will not be ſo in reality.

But the inquiſition, on the contrary, is ever ſurrounded with all theſe objects of terror, and employs them indifferently againſt all kinds of Hereticks, and againſt all in general over whom its authority extends, tho of never ſo peaceable a character; no leſs than againſt the moſt ſeditious and turbulent.

In thoſe times, the biſhops and their officers were the only inquiſitors; and whenever it was neceſſary to employ rigorous penalties, and puniſh with ſeverity; they always addreſſed themſelves to the civil magiſtrate for that purpoſe, who in all ages had been inveſted with that right.

But in thoſe places where the inquiſition ſubſiſts, we find the very reverſe; biſhops have but the leaſt and moſt inconſiderable ſhare in the proſecution of Hereticks, but are themſelves ſubject to the tribunal of the inquiſitors. Theſe inquiſitors are generally, and in moſt places, not only churchmen, but Monks; whoſe profeſſion is of a very ſevere nature. As for the civil magiſtrate, how neceſſary ſoever it may be for him to take cognizance of the ſentences they pronounce, they nevertheleſs do not communicate any thing of them to him; and they have no more left of the authority they antiently enjoy'd, than to be mere witneſſes and executioners of ſuch ſentences as are pronounced by the inquiſition, but have no manner of right to examine them.

Antiently it was the cuſtom to judge Hereticks in the ſame manner as other criminals, there was no manner of difference in the formality, and the methods of procedure were exactly the ſame; they were allowed the ſame means of defending themſelves, and of challenging or excepting againſt, and an opportunity of clearing themſelves was indulged them the ſame as to other criminals.

But in the inquiſition 'tis the direct contrary; the methods of proſecution are different, and the formalities entirely new; 'tis very eaſy to ruin a perſon who ſtands impeached, but very difficult to juſtify one who is innocent.

In former days, whenever a Heretick repented of the errors he was fallen into, and ſubmitted to the penance and correction of the church, he was always received into her boſom, and reconciled to her with joy.

But in the inquiſition, when once a pardon has been granted, all future mercy is entirely cut off; and whenever a perſon has been ſo unhappy as to come twice into its clutches, the crime is never expiated but with life.

In all places, except thoſe where the inquiſition prevails, death puts an end to all proſecution, and terminates all the rigours that may be employ'd againſt a criminal.

But here it is quite otherwiſe; the proſecution extends even beyond death, and the inquiſitors are as cruel to the painted bones, the aſhes and images of the criminal, as they would have been to their perſons, had not death put an end to all their torments. Time cannot obliterate any circumſtance from the memory of the inquiſitors, and they ſhall as well remember the ſeveral particulars of a crime a great many years after its being committed, as tho it had been perpetrated but a few days.

In other countries, a ſon who ſhould have concealed his father, after whom ſearch was made in order to put him to death, would not have ſuch an action imputed to him for a crime. A wife who ſhould ſhelter her husband in a caſe of imminent danger, is not looked upon as criminal; ſo far from it, that all theſe good offices are conſidered as ſo many natural duties, the prohibition of which would be unjuſt.

In thoſe countries where the inquiſition prevails, all theſe duties are forbid, and no ſooner is a perſon ſo unhappy as to be impeach'd before its tribunal, but he is immediately abandoned by all. A ſon does not dare give refuge to his father, a father to his ſon, nor a wife to her husband; and if any one ſhould be convicted of doing doing this, he would immediately be profecuted by the inquifition as one who favoured Hereticks.

In all other places, any perfon who has been unjuftly accufed, has fuffered falfe impriſonment, or been undeſervedly tortured, is allowed to publiſh his innocence to the world, and by that means come off with honour; he is left at liberty to vent his complaints, which are far from being looked upon as a freſh crime, that may impower a court to call him again to account. On the contrary, the judges themſelves generally make no difficulty to own they were impoſed upon, and are the firſt to proclaim the innocence of thoſe who are really ſo.

But in the inquiſition 'tis quite otherwiſe, ſuch confeſſions are never made; they never own a miſtake, are always in the right, and that every thing has been done as it ought to be. And if ever an innocent perſon who has eſcaped its ſnares, ſhould preſume to proclaim his innocence to the world, and value himſelf upon it, he would certainly be again arreſted, and afterwards puniſhed for ſlandering the holy office.

Theſe particulars would ſcarce appear credible, eſpecially in France and the other kingdoms whoſe inhabitants are not ſubject to the rigours of that tribunal; but thoſe who have either inhabited or frequented thoſe countries where the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed, are fully perſuaded of the truth of all that is here aſſerted. The very inquiſitors themſelves do not mince the matter very much, prejudice and cuſtom have ſo far perſuaded them that they are in the right to act in this manner: And on the other ſide, they are of opinion 'tis ſo much their intereſt to be feared, and to overawe every one, not excepting even kings; that they are very deſirous theſe things ſhould be known, tho at the ſame time all that paſſes in the inquiſition itſelf, is kept inviolably ſecret.

Our publiſhing them in theſe Memoirs will be no very extraordinary affair, they being borrowed from ſeveral Roman catholick authors, whoſe principles were orthodox, and the greateſt part of whom were eye-witneſſes of all we ſhall here relate; which will be done with all imaginable exactneſs as well as ſincerity.

Mention will be made only of whatever relates to the hiſtory, the practices, and proceedings of the tribunals of the inquiſition, ſuch as it is in our days; the various employments of the inquiſitors, their manner of judging, how cruelly they treat thoſe who are ſo unhappy as to be ſeized and ſhut up in their priſons, the torments inflicted on thoſe who are accuſed, the pomp and ſolemnity with which they execute the ſeveral ſentences pronounced by the inquiſitors in their acts of faith; and to make all theſe ſeveral particulars ſtill more glaring, we have thought proper to annex to theſe Memoirs, ſome genuine relations of a very particular nature, which alone will be capable of raiſing the reader's abhorrence for a tribunal, from which one would imagine the managers had laid it down as a law, to baniſh every thing that has the leaſt appearance of juſtice or humanity.

But before we enter upon theſe matters, we beg leave to congratulate the happineſs and felicity of thoſe people that are not obliged to live under the governments of princes *, who under a pretence of maintaining the laws of this dreadful tribunal, are forced, as it were, to lend their authority to actions of ſo cruel a nature, that they are looked upon by all nations with horror, at the ſame time that their adminiſtration is had in the utmoſt deteſtation.

HISTORICAL MEMOIRS Relating to the INQUISITION.

BOOK II.

CHAP. I.

The origin, eſtabliſhment, and progreſs of the INQUISITION.

THE church, after the diviſion of the empire into eaſt and weſt, had enjoyed an uninterrupted calm in the weſtern parts of the world; or in caſe it had been ſome times diſturb'd, neither Hereticks or Hereſies had been the cauſe of it: but very few Hereſies had ſprung up, and ſuch as did, no ſooner peep'd abroad, but they either ſunk of themſelves, or were cruſhed by the vigilance of the ſovereign and the prelates. The harmony that had always ſubſiſted between the prieſthood and the empire, had not a little contributed to the maintaining of religion in its purity.

But this union being once diſſolv'd by the furious diſputes which aroſe about the middle of the eleventh century, between the emperors and the popes, both parties carrying things to the utmoſt length for upwards of fifty years, a door was by that means open'd to all kinds of Hereſies.

It was ſcarce poſſible for things to have taken another turn: for as the popes had a great number of adherents, who ſtretched the authority of the church beyond its due limits; ſo, on the other ſide, the emperors had their partiſans, who weaken'd it as much as poſſible, and confined it to much narrower bounds than it might juſtly claim. This it was that occaſion'd the ſtarting up of Hereſies, which afterwards gave riſe to the eſtabliſhment of the inquiſition. Hitherto they had all gone no farther than to attack the myſteries of religion; but afterwards, leaving the myſteries, they levelled all their obſtinacy againſt the morality, the diſcipline, and particularly the authority of the church.

The church being attacked in ſo tender a part, was far from over-looking ſuch dangerous enemies; but then they were ſo numerous, and the ſupport which moſt princes gave them clandeſtinely, ſwelled their authority to that height, that they were often reduced to the neceſſity of winking at them, for want of means ſufficient to cruſh them.

As the extirpating of theſe Hereſies concerned the popes more than any other potentates, ſo they did all that lay in their power to root them out; and for that purpoſe, purpoſe they left no ſtone unturn'd, but inſtigated all thoſe who were immediately ſubdordinate to them, and were continually writing to biſhops, to princes and magiſtrates, exhorting them to do their utmoſt to extirpate thoſe enemies of the church.

But whether it were that princes and civil magiſtrates were not willing to deſtroy a multitude of people, who ſeemed to weaken the authority of the church, from no other view than to heighten their own; or that they did not believe them to be ſo criminal as they were repreſented; or that policy, which ſometimes changes with the times, and aſſumes a face according to the variety of intereſts, made them of opinion that the tolerating them would be advantageous to the ſtate; it is certain that they were not very zealous in reſtraining them. On the other ſide, the biſhops, whether it were that they were not powerful enough to ſtem the impetuoſity of this torrent; or that buſied in the other branches of the miniſterial function, they had not time ſufficient to purſue this affair with the vigour it naturally required; it is certain that they did not at firſt oppoſe it with ſo much rigour, or at leaſt ſucceſs, as might have been wiſhed.

By this means theſe Hereticks grew at laſt ſo formidable as to find themſelves able to make head againſt the popes themſelves. The followers of Arnold of Breſcia who were of this number, reduced them to the loweſt ebb; they forced them more than once to leave Rome, and to ſeek an aſylum elſewhere, in order to ſhelter themſelves from their fury; and had it not been for the puniſhment which was inflicted on the ring-leader, who, having been executed publickly in Rome for hereſy and ſedition, ſtruck the whole party with dread and terror; it would have been impoſſible for the popes to have maintain'd their authority in that city.

The Vaudois, and the Albigenſes their ſucceſſors, were equal enemies to the authority of the church, and as vigorous in attacking it: and that which made them ſtill bolder, as well as formidable, was the protection they met with from Raymond count of Toulouſe, and the counts of Foix and of Comminges. It was therefore thought proper to employ more violent methods, than had hitherto been made uſe of againſt Hereticks.

Theſe methods reſulted at laſt in the publiſhing a cruſade againſt them, an expedient which the popes had formerly, on other occaſions, employ'd with ſo much ſucceſs. Pope Innocent III. a man of a bold and enterpriſing temper, and ſucceſsful in all his attempts, reſolved to try what this would do; however, he at the ſame time thought proper to apply lenitives, and to ſee whether preaching and diſputation would not prove effectual in converting theſe Hereticks; and for this purpoſe he ſent ſeveral miſſionaries into Languedoc, with St. Dominic, and the bleſſed Peter of Chateauneuf, at their head. But as theſe did not meet with a ſucceſs anſwerable to their zeal, and the above-mentioned Peter having been cruelly maſſacred near Toulouſe, anno Dom. 1200, the pope reſolved to employ temporal weapons againſt them; and having himſelf been a famous lawyer, he, by a quirk, made theſe Hereticks be conſider'd as Mahometans, becauſe they have this in common with them, viz. are both enemies to the church.

Upon this foundation the pope granted indulgences to St. Dominic, and his diſciples, were ordered to publiſh them in their utmoſt extent, in the following ſenſe: That all who either by their credit or money, ſhould contribute to the extirpation of Hereticks, ſhould obtain them as fully as tho they themſelves fought againſt them. Upon which a powerful army of choſen ſoldiers was levied.

As Raymond count of Toulouſe was the moſt powerful protector of the Albigenſes, they reſolved to fall upon him firſt *; but he not finding himſelf able to withſtand ſo formidable a power, ſubmitted himſelf to the pope, drew off his protection from the Albigenſes, and delivered up ſeven of the principal cities of Provence and Languedoc, by way of ſecurity for the performance of his promiſe.

Thus the army of the Cruſaders having done their buſineſs with the count of Toulouſe, who, as we juſt now obſerved, had ſubmitted himſelf; they turned off towards Beziers, where the Albigenſes had ſtrongly intrenched themſelves. They beſieged the city in form; but not being able to withſtand an hundred thouſand Cruſaders, it was taken, and burnt to the ground. They cut to pieces all the men, women, and children they found in the place; a general maſſacre enſued, wherein no regard was had to age or ſex: they did not pardon ſo much as one ſingle perſon; and the Roman catholicks themſelves, a ſmall number of whom were in that city, fell undiſtinguiſhed among the reſt.

This example which had been made of Beziers, tho a dreadful one, did not yet hinder the count of Beziers, who enjoy'd the ſame ſovereignty over Carcaſſone, from withdrawing into that city, which he defended to the laſt extremity. He himſelf was a Roman catholick; but whether it were that he was offended at the little regard that had been paid to his mediation, in the endeavours he had uſed to ſave Beziers; or that he could not bear to ſee his territories laid waſte, and his ſubjects, whom he thought it his duty to protect and defend, cut to pieces in this manner, under a pretence of religion; or that he could not perſuade himſelf that religion was the only motive for raiſing this bloody war, he made a reſolution to oppoſe the attempts of the Cruſaders, and to defend Carcaſſone; firmly reſolved either to ſave it, or bury himſelf under its ruins.

In this place he was ſoon hemmed in by the Cruſaders, whoſe army at that time conſiſted of three hundred thouſand men; for ſince the taking of Beziers, it was increaſed by a numberleſs multitude of people, who crouded to it from all parts; as alſo a great number of powerful noblemen, who were come thither on very different motives.

But this prodigious multitude of enemies could no way terrify the undaunted count of Beziers. He publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he declared he had no other intention, than to perſevere to the laſt gaſp in the profeſſion of the catholick faith; that this however ſhould not hinder him from protecting his territories and his ſubjects, of what perſuaſion ſoever, and that becauſe he thought himſelf obliged to it from the law of nature, which of all ought to be preſerved moſt inviolably, and by the mutual promiſe they had made not to abandon each other: that he did not look upon this as a religious war; but as a project concerted purpoſely to deprive him and the counts of Toulouſe, Foix, and Comminges, of their reſpective dominions: that he exhorted them to unite with him, and to be at laſt ſenſible of their true intereſts, which were inſeparable from his; that tho they ſhould not conſpire with his reſolutions, he was reſolutely bent to risk alone all the danger that might enſue from this war: that ſince they were reſolved upon his deſtruction, let him act how he would, it were better to die couragiouſly, ſword in hand, than to ſurvive the loſs of his poſſeſſions; the ruin of his ſtrong holds, and the ſlaughter of his ſubjects. And concluded with ſaying, that he called heaven and earth to witneſs his innocence of all the evils which the war muſt inevitably draw after it, ſince he would never have engaged in it but from the unavoidable neceſſity he was under of defending himſelf againſt thoſe who were reſolved to deprive him of his poſſeſſions by the moſt unjuſt methods.

However the Cruſaders made no manner of anſwer to this manifeſto; upon which a vigorous attack was prepared on one ſide; and on the other, a fixed reſolution was made to hold out to the laſt extremity.

The city of Carcaſſone was then, as in our days, divided into two parts; the firſt, which was called the city, ſtood on a hill that was ſtrongly fortified; the other was called the town, and was built at ſome diſtance from the city, which being weak was eaſily taken; when, as before had happened at Beziers, all were put to fire and ſword, and no diſtinction made of age, ſex, or quality.

This cruel treatment, ſo far from intimidating thoſe who fought in the upper town, with the count of Beziers at their head, as they had flattered themſelves it would, ſerved only to confirm them in the reſolution they had taken of ſelling their lives at the deareſt rate.

While matters * were thus carrying on, the king of Arragon arrived at the camp of of the Cruſaders, and immediately interceded for the count of Beziers; but all he could obtain from the pope's legate, who in reality was at the head of this enterprize, was, that the count himſelf ſhould have free liberty to retire whereſoever he ſhould think proper; but that all the inhabitants ſhould ſurrender at diſcretion, ſhould come ſtark naked out of the city, and in that condition ſubmit themſelves to the legate's mercy.

But the count de Beziers rejected the offer with the utmoſt deteſtation, and reſolved to ſuffer the worſt that might happen. The inhabitants following his example, fought like ſo many deſperadoes, and a great number of the Cruſaders loſt their lives under the walls of Carcaſſone.

At length the legate deſpairing to carry by force a place defended by ſo brave a man, and ſeconded by the inhabitants of equal intrepidity with himſelf, reſolved to make himſelf maſter of it tho by the moſt infamous methods. And imagining he might ſtop at nothing, provided he only came off victorious; he diſpatched a gentleman to the count, who prevailed upon him to come out of the city, ſwearing the moſt horrid oaths, that they would not hurt a hair of his head, and making the moſt ſpecious promiſes that the legate would enter into articles with him with the utmoſt ſincerity; but no ſooner was he come before him, than they ſeized him, and made him their priſoner.

The inhabitants of Carcaſſone, in the deepeſt affliction for the impriſonment of their count, loſt the courage they had diſplay'd all the time he had continued at their head, and which perhaps would at laſt have ſaved them. But now they thought only of ſecuring themſelves by flight, in which they were favoured by a ſubterraneous paſſage, one of the mouths of which extended to three leagues diſtance from the camp. In this manner they eſcaped the fury of the Cruſaders, who in all probability would have given them no better treatment than the inhabitants of Beziers, and thoſe of the lower town had met with from them.

The legate having made himſelf maſter of Carcaſſone, made it the place for their general rendezvous againſt the Albigenſes. Count Simon of Montfort had there the title of general of the church beſtowed upon him; and in order to engage him in her ſervice, count de Beziers dying in priſon of grief, or ſome other calamity, they gave him the ſeveral fine tracts of ground, of which they had diſpoſſeſſed de Beziers; and at the ſame time aſſured him, that whatever conqueſts he might gain over the Albigenſes, a conſiderable part of them ſhould be his own.

The new-created general of the church, altho animated by preſents of ſo valuable a nature, and by promiſes that flattered his intereſt and ambition, was, nevertheleſs, ſome time before he made any attempt; by which means the Albigenſes had an opportunity of recovering and fortifying themſelves. He was a brave man, had great experience, was active, and, to crown all, was attended by good fortune; but the Cruſaders, who had made a vow to ſerve only forty days, withdrew themſelves at the expiration of that time.

The † year following, his lady and his adherents brought a ſtrong body of Cruſaders to his aſſiſtance; theſe he employ'd with great conduct and ſucceſs, and by their help reduced all ſuch places as refuſed to ſubmit to him. The ſtrong caſtle of Menerbe, which had firſt dared to reſiſt the power of his arms, was firſt carried by force, and all its inhabitants were put to the ſword. The city of Lavaur met afterwards with the ſame fate; it was beſieged, taken, and ſacked, and the ſlaughter here was as general as at Menerbe. Count de Montfort ſucceeded in all his enterpriſes, victory followed him wherever he went, and all things ſeemed to conſpire the ruin of the Albigenſes, when two very unexpected events had like to have recovered them all they had loſt, and to ruin the catholick party.

Raymond count of Toulouſe was gone to Rome, in order to reconcile himſelf to the pope, which he effected. Among other conditions, they had required the following, viz. That he ſhould drive the Albigenſes out of his territories. This he gave his word to do; but being returned to his dominions, and called upon to perform his promiſe, he firſt had recourſe to delays; but afterwards finding he had no farther excuſe to make, he declared in expreſs terms, he could never prevail upon himſelf to do it, ſince he ſhould thereby be forced to depopulate his country.

Upon this refuſal the pope's legate excommunicated him, and commanded count de Montfort to declare war againſt him. Count de Foix was included in the ſame declaration, and promiſe was made to the general of the church, that he ſhould be inveſted with the demeſns of thoſe two princes, in caſe he could diſpoſſeſs them of them.

Count de Montfort encouraged by theſe mighty promiſes, the effects of which might have ſatisfied a yet more ambitious mind, ſince it was to make him the ſovereign of no leſs an extent of ground than the greateſt part of the ſouth of France, immediately took the field. Suddenly he ſeized every thing that was not capable of making a defence. He forced the two counts to quit the field, and to throw themſelves into the ſtrong holds, in order to defend them: but as the beſt fortified place muſt at laſt ſurrender when unaſſiſted by an army in the field, the ruin of theſe two princes was inevitable, had it not been prevented by an unforeſeen accident.

The king of Arragon, who hitherto had either endeavour'd to mediate a peace between both parties, or ſided with the Cruſaders; whether it were that he could not bear to ſee the count of Toulouſe his brother-in-law ſtript of his dominions, or that he thought it his duty not to ſuffer the count de Foix, who was his vaſſal, to be oppreſſed; or from diſcontent, he having been forgot in the diviſion they had propoſed to make of the ſpoils of theſe two princes; declared in their favour, at a time when it was leaſt expected, and abandoned count de Montfort.

This action of the king of Arragon put a ſtop to all the ſucceſſes of the Cruſaders, and happily reſtored the affairs of the Albigenſes; ſo that in a little time, they brought an army of an hundred thouſand men into the field, compoſed of Arragonois, Languedocians, and Provencals. And imagining themſelves ſtrong enough to attempt any thing, they did not ſtay for count de Montfort coming up to them, but marched forward to meet him, and boldly preſented him battle.

However count de Montfort was no way terrified, either by the multitude of the enemy, or the good order in which they advanced; but accepted of the battle that was preſented him. Both ſides fought with all the animoſity with which religion united to intereſt, is uſed to inſpire two oppoſite parties; but the king of Arragon having loſt his life in the heat of the engagement, the Albigenſes were ſeized with a panic fear. This threw them into a diſorder, which was unhappily followed by their defeat; for count de Montfort taking advantage of their ſurprize, fell upon them on all ſides with ſo much vigour, that he put them to flight, after having killed twenty thouſand of them upon the ſpot.

The Albigenſes being routed in this manner, count de Montfort employed all his thoughts in making the beſt advantage of the victory he had gained. He preſented himſelf himſelf before Toulouſe, which immediately ſurrendred at diſcretion. He next made himſelf maſter of Narbonne; and during the four years which count de Montfort ſurvived this victory, his arms were continually attended with ſucceſs.

But at laſt, by an unexpected turn of fortune, count Raymond recovered Toulouſe in 1415; towards which place count de Montfort advanced with an army of an hundred thouſand Cruſaders, and beſieged him in it. But now providence changing the ſcene, all the Cruſaders were routed; and count de Montfort, after having received a wound in his thigh with a ſword, was killed by a ſhot from a croſs-bow diſcharged from the rampart.

The death of this nobleman had like to have intirely ruined the affairs of the Roman catholicks; for the counts of Toulouſe, of Foix, and of Comminges, ſoon recovered all they had been diſpoſſeſſed of, and for ſome time preſerved all thoſe ſeveral advantages, when the death of count Raymond again changed the face of things.

Young Raymond, his ſon, having ſucceeded him in 1420, and continuing the war with a force inferior to that of his enemies, met with a continual ſeries of ill ſucceſs, ſo was at laſt obliged to ſurrender, and was afterwards carried priſoner to Pavia. To recover his liberty, he was obliged, in 1423, to agree to and ſign ſuch articles as his enemies were pleaſed to make, and, among the reſt, ſeveral very ſevere edicts againſt the Albigenſes.

On the other ſide, the counts of Foix and of Comminges, finding themſelves unable to oppoſe the power of ſo many enemies as were continually attacking them on all ſides, ſurrendred upon the beſt terms the enemy would grant them. Thus ended the war of the Albigenſes, which had coſt more blood and treaſure than might have been employed in conquering an empire.

CHAP. II.

The wars raiſed on account of the eſtabliſhment of the INQUISITION.

TO this war which had been carried on openly againſt the Albigenſes, ſucceeded that of the inquiſition, which completed the ruin of the unhappy ſurviving Hereticks. It had been eſtabliſhed ſome time before, by the authority of Innocent III. and the care of St. Dominic.

The pope conſidering, that how much ſoever the power of the Albigenſes might be weakned by open force, yet great numbers of them would ſtill ſurvive, who would perſiſt in the ſame opinions, and profeſs their doctrine in private, thought it neceſſary, in order to put a ſtop to this and every other kind of hereſy, to eſtabliſh a ſtanding remedy, viz. a tribunal compoſed of perſons whoſe ſole buſineſs ſhould be the detecting and puniſhing of Hereticks.

To effect this, it was abſolutely neceſſary that theſe perſons ſhould be wholly dependent on the court of Rome, and entirely devoted to its intereſt; that they ſhould not be diſtracted by other buſineſs, or taken off by other avocations; it was proper for them to be mean and inſignificant, in outward appearance, to the end that they might look upon an employment as honourable, which, in thoſe days, was wholly confined to the detecting of Hereticks; it was neceſſary they ſhould be perſons who did not know father or mother, ſiſter or brother, and bound by no manner of ties, to the end they might not have the leaſt regard or conſideration for any perſon whatever; that they ſhould be hard-hearted, inflexible, of a breaſt uninformed with pity or compaſſion; and that becauſe they intended to ſet up the moſt ſevere and rigorous tribunal that had ever been eſtabliſh'd. In a word, it was neceſſary they ſhould be very zealous for religion, of a mean capacity, but ſuch whoſe intereſt it might be to do all that lay in their power to extirpate Hereticks.

Pope Innocent being unſatisfied with the conduct of the biſhops and officers of their ſeveral courts, whoſe zeal againſt the Hereticks appeared to him faint and languid; thought he ſaw in the religious of the newly inſtituted orders of St. Dominic and St. Francis, all the qualities neceſſary for his purpoſe.

Theſe monks were inviolably attached to the intereſt of the court of Rome; the ſolitude and retirement they profeſſed, and which, as afterwards appeared, began to grow tedious to them, allowed them time ſufficient for purſuing this laudable work. The meanneſs of their dreſs and of their monaſteries, ſo different from what we find them in our days; and above all, the cuſtom of begging up and down, and the great humility they openly profeſſed, muſt naturally make them conſider the poſt of inquiſitor, as an employment perfectly well adapted to ſooth the ambition they might have ſtill left. The general renunciation they made, even of the families from whence they were deſcended, was a great ſtep towards their being inſenſible to all thoſe ſenſations, which the ties of nature, as well as thoſe of civil life, do uſually inſpire. Beſides, the auſterity of their rule, and the ſeverities which they practiſed on themſelves, was far from informing them with the leaſt compaſſion or ſenſibility for their neighbour, ſince they had not the leaſt tenderneſs for themſelves. In a word, they were very zealous, as all profeſſors of newly eſtabliſhed religions are generally found to be; learned, according to the genius of that age, i. e. very well verſed in the learning of the ſchools, and the knowledge of the new canon-law; not to mention that they were more immediately prompted to do all that lay in their power to extirpate Hereticks, becauſe theſe were eternally exclaiming againſt them, and left no ſtone unturned in order to ruin them in the minds of the people.

The pope therefore having found in theſe monks all the qualities he judged requiſite for thoſe he intended for inquiſitors of the faith, made no difficulty to confide that employment to them; and they on the other ſide acted their parts ſo well, as fully anſwered all the pope, or the court of Rome expected from them.

But as the moſt important eſtabliſhments do not immediately arrive at perfection; and that ſomething is continually adding, either from ſeaſons or occaſions, which at laſt carries them to the greateſt height; the inquiſitors were not at firſt inveſted with the great authority they have ſince enjoyed, and in which they now triumph. Their power was at firſt confined to labour only at the converſion of Hereticks, by the ſalutary method of preaching and inſtruction; to admoniſh princes and other magiſtrates, to puniſh all ſuch capitally as ſhould perſiſt obſtinately in their errors; to get information of the number and quality of Hereticks, and of the zeal which Roman catholick princes and magiſtrates might diſcover in proſecuting them; of the care and diligence which the biſhops and their officials uſed in ſearching after them. They uſed to ſend theſe informations to Rome, where they were ſubmitted to the judgment of the pope, who acted therein as he thought proper; and 'tis from theſe informations and inquiries, that the name of inquiſitor is borrowed.

Some time after, their authority was enlarged, and they were impowered to grant indulgences, to publiſh cruſades, to foment the ſpirits of the people and of ſovereign princes; to head the Cruſaders, and to lead them on to extirpate Hereticks: and for about fifty years, things continued in this ſtate, i. e. to anno 1250.

But in 1244, the emperor Frederick II. very much increaſed their authority, by four edicts publiſhed by his order in Pavia, by which he received the inquiſitors under his protection; impowering eccleſiaſticks to take cognizance of all matters relating to hereſy; and leaving to the ſecular judges the authority of proſecuting Hereticks, after that the churchmen had paſſed ſentence on their tenets. He commanded that all all obſtinate Hereticks ſhould be burnt, and even condemned to perpetual impriſonment all who ſhould repent of their errors.

The quarrels and animoſities between ſovereign princes and the Roman pontiffs have always, in the long run, proved fatal to Hereticks; whether it were that thoſe who engaged in thoſe diſputes, were really animated with a true zeal for religion; and that they themſelves, abſtracted from all political views, have from their own proper impulſe been inclined to protect it: or that their aim was, by theſe outward marks of their adherence to the Roman catholick faith, to keep the people in their duty, who are but too naturally apt to be ſcandalized on ſuch occaſions.

Frederick was ſo much the more obliged to ſhew himſelf zealous for religion, as the popes, his bitter enemies, in order to ruin him in the minds of the people, and to ſtir up all the chriſtians againſt him; had accuſed him in all the catholick courts of Europe with a deſign of quitting the chriſtian faith, and of turning * Mahometan. This probably might be the occaſion of his acting with greater vigour againſt the Hereticks than any of his predeceſſors had done; for before his time it was not uſual to condemn all Hereticks to death without diſtinction.

But whatever might be the motives that prevailed on that prince to act with ſo much ſeverity againſt them, it is certain that if he found his private advantage in it, it was of real prejudice to his ſucceſſors; and the authority he had devolved on the inquiſitors, has been ſince employed with great advantage in Italy, againſt the friends of the empire. Care was alſo taken to increaſe their authority, to render them more formidable; and to employ them ſtill more efficaciouſly, under a religious pretence, againſt thoſe who ſhould dare to oppoſe the temporal authority of the pope. This truth is ſo notorious, that it would be impoſſible to contradict it.

In 1322, John XXII. cauſed the inquiſitors to take out informations againſt Matthew Viſconti, ſovereign of Milan; accordingly he was declared a Heretick, and this declaration was followed by a moſt ſevere bull, by which he prohibited all princes of Italy from holding the leaſt correſpondence with either him or his ſubjects. It is nevertheleſs notorious, that the hereſy which they laid to his charge was only another name they gave to the zeal he had, and which it was his duty to have, in quality of vaſſal of the empire, for the emperor Lewis of Bavaria's party, whom the pope, tho on very ill-grounded pretenſions, had reſolved to oppoſe.

The ſame year Guy Rangon biſhop of Ferrara, and father Bon the inquiſitor, after having taken out an information againſt the princes of the houſe of Eſte, and declared them Hereticks; publiſhed a monitory, by which all perſons of what quality ſoever, were forbid to hold the leaſt correſpondence of what kind ſoever, with either them, their adherents, or ſubjects. And yet all their crime was for having recovered Ferrara, which the pope had ſeized.

In 1355, Innocent VI. gave no better treatment to the Matataſti, to Francis Ordelaſe, and William Manfredi. He went farther, and publiſhed a cruſade againſt them, as tho they had been ſo many infidels and hereticks; and that for no other reaſon, but becauſe the former had ſeized upon Rimini, and the latter upon Faenza, of which the pope pretended to be the only lawful ſovereign. However, without changing either their opinions or their doctrine, they at once ceaſed to be Hereticks, the moment they agreed to hold thoſe cities in quality of his holineſs's vicars.

But without going ſo far for examples, it is well known that towards the cloſe of the laſt century, ſo long as the diſputes between Paul IV. and Philip II. of Spain ſubſiſted, which were carried on merely from ſecular views, the pope did not make the leaſt ſcruple to declare publickly, both in the conſiſtory, in preſence of his embaſſadors, or upon any other occaſion; that the king of Spain and the emperor

* Math. Paris. ad ann. 1230.

Charles

Charles V. his father, were both Hereticks. But as he was not in a condition to prejudice ſo powerful a prince by this accuſation, theſe reproaches had no other effect than to prove, that whoever oppoſes the temporal intereſt of the court of Rome, is properly looked upon as a Heretick by all the pope's creatures.

'Tis from the ſame view of ſupporting and increaſing pretenſions merely of a civil kind, and no ways relating to religion, that the inquiſition is employed to cenſure as heretical all ſuch books as extend too far (according to the domineering ſpirit of the court of Rome) the rights and prerogatives of temporal princes. This, among other things, was done in the beginning of this century, when the diſpute broke out between Paul V. and the republick of Venice. Theſe diſputes, as every one knows, were founded only on temporal pretenſions, wherein religion was no ways concerned. For the ſupporting them ſeveral writers were employed on both ſides; but whatever was writ in favour of the republick, was cenſured as heretical by all the inquiſitions in Italy, notwithſtanding that the doctrine they advanced was pure and ſound, and approved by all learned men in the other ſtates of chriſtendom. It was even pretended, that all whom they ſuſpected to be the authors of thoſe pieces againſt the rights of the Roman pontiff, ought to anſwer for them before the inquiſition, i. e. be condemned by that tribunal as Hereticks; and indeed all thoſe were ſo who were ſilly enough to ſubmit themſelves to it.

In conſequence of theſe pretenſions, cardinal Bellarmine wrote about the ſame time in favour of the pope's authority. In this treatiſe he aſſerts, that all chriſtian princes are ſubject to the pope, not only in ſpirituals, but in matters purely temporal: and does not ſcruple to treat all thoſe as Hereticks, who maintain that princes, in whatever relates to temporal affairs, are ſubject to God only. There is room to believe, that the cardinal did not believe what he himſelf writ, ſince he had too much learning not to know that the doctrine which he condemned as heretical, was that of the antient church, and of all the Roman catholick churches in his time; thoſe excepted which were immediately ſubject to the eccleſiaſtical ſtate.

Hence it is evidently manifeſt, that Frederick II. when he increaſed the authority of the inquiſitors, did not know his true intereſts; or in caſe he knew them, that he neglected to purſue them.

Neverthèleſs this law which Frederick had enacted ſo much in favour of the inquiſitors, and ſo prejudicial to the Hereticks, had little or no effect for ſeveral years. This was owing to the diſputes that ſtill ſubſiſted between the pope and the emperor, and which both ſides carried to the utmoſt height.

They had laſted ever ſince the reign of Innocent III. who was Frederick's guardian, and continued under Honorius III. ſucceſſor to Innocent; but Gregory IX. ſucceeding Honorius, no meaſures were kept by either party. Frederick was excommunicated at three different times; all Lombardy, and part of Germany, were ſtirred up againſt him; ſuch a cruſade was publiſhed againſt him, that had he been an infidel prince, or a profeſſed Heretick, it could not poſſibly have been more terrible; nay, ſome * hiſtorians do not ſcruple to ſay, that they cauſed his own ſon to rebel againſt him.

But the emperor triumph'd over all theſe enemies; and Gregory IX. who had been as much his foe as Gregory VII. had been that of Henry IV. departed this life. Pope Celeſtine IV. his ſucceſſor, had ſo ſhort a reign, that he had not time to renew the quarrel. After his death the holy ſee continued vacant two years, and was at laſt filled by cardinal Sinibaldus, who aſſumed the name of Innocent IV.

It was now the general opinion, that his election would put an end to theſe great diviſions, and reconcile the papacy and the empire; becauſe the pope, when cardinal,

* Avent lib. 7.

had profeſſed the utmoſt friendſhip for the emperor; but ambition diſſolves the ſtricteſt ties: nor was it poſſible for them to be of the leaſt force, in intereſts that were of ſo delicate a nature, as thoſe between his holineſs and his imperial majeſty.

But Innocent would not give up the leaſt pretenſion which his predeceſſors had claimed of the emperor, and thereby plainly ſhewed, that the court of Rome always puſhes directly forward to the object in view, and that nothing can ever make them recede when they are once embarked in any enterprize, in which they think their glory and intereſts are the leaſt concerned.

On the other ſide, Frederick was reſolved not to give up the ſmalleſt of his rights, or do any thing derogatory to the majeſty of the empire. The diviſions broke out again with the utmoſt fury; as uſually happens when friends ceaſe to be ſo any longer, and that hatred ſucceeds to friendſhip.

At firſt matters were carried on very briskly, and with great ſucceſs on the emperor's ſide: and being perſuaded that the late acceſſion of this pope to the pontificate, was a circumſtance he ought to make his advantage of; that it would be proper to reduce him before he had amaſſed any conſiderable ſums, and raiſe up new enemies againſt him; he accordingly fell upon him with ſo much fury, that he forced him to abandon Italy.

But the pope, notwithſtanding the emperor's great ſucceſs, could not be induced to abandon the ſmalleſt of his pretenſions; but withdrawing to France, he ſtopt at Lions, becauſe of its advantageous ſituation, which furniſhed him with an opportunity of holding a correſpondence with Italy and the other ſtates of Europe; and there he ſummoned a general council, in order to debate upon excommunicating and depoſing the emperor.

The kings of France * and England ſollicited in his favour, but to no purpoſe; nor did Frederick himſelf, who plainly foreſaw the unhappy conſequences of it, leave one ſtone unturn'd in order to divert the ſtorm. He ſubmitted to ſuch conditions as could not poſſibly be more grievous to an emperor, or more ſatisfactory to a ſovereign pontiff; for he promiſed to march with a powerful army into the holy Land, and never to return from thence, provided he might only be ſuffered to enjoy the title of emperor unmoleſted.

However the ſollicitations both of France and England were fruitleſs and ineffectual, the emperor's offers were rejected, and he was ſolemnly excommunicated and depoſed from the empire.

The excommunication and depoſition of Frederick were attended with all thoſe fatal conſequences he had foreſeen, and which he had done his utmoſt to divert; for the greateſt part of Germany roſe up againſt him; his depoſition made in the council of Lions was ratified, and Henry landgrave of Turinge and of Heſſe was elected emperor in his room. However he did not enjoy the empire long, but loſt it ſome time after with his life, in a battle ſought againſt Conrard ſon of Frederick, who was carrying on the war in Germany, at the ſame time that his father was proſecuting it with great ſucceſs in Italy.

One would have thought that the death of the landgrave would have put an end to the ſchiſm in the empire, but it happened otherwiſe; for the pope had ſo much credit in Germany, that he got a ſucceſſor appointed to him, who was William count of Holland.

The new emperor was at firſt as unſucceſsful as the former had been; Conrard beat him wherever he came up with him, and always came off with advantage: but the death of Frederick, which happened ſome time after, viz. in 1250, and the indiſpenſable obligation which Conrard his ſon, who had now aſſumed the title of emperor, was under to leave Germany, in order to preſerve the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, of which his enemies were endeavouring to diſpoſſeſs him, gave count William an opportunity of enjoying the empire for ſome years, with a tranquillity altogether unexpected, and indeed much greater than the ſtate of affairs in Germany ſeemed to promiſe him.

After his death, the princes of the empire, whoſe intereſt it was to heal all former ſores, in order to give the Germans an opportunity of recovering their great and frequent loſſes, had freſh diviſions among themſelves. They elected two emperors, but theſe reigned very few years, and were indeed only nominally ſo. Their death was followed by an interregnum of about twenty years, whereof the princes of the empire were the occaſion; for they, during that time, were divided into different factions; and being very much exaſperated againſt one another, could never agree in the choice of an emperor.

It was impoſſible but ſo long a vacancy of the imperial throne, and at ſo unſeaſonable a juncture, muſt be attended with the moſt fatal conſequences: and indeed worſe could not have happened, for during all the time the interregnum laſted it was torn to pieces by the moſt bloody civil wars.

But whilſt the popes and emperors bent all their thoughts on proſecuting the war, and that the princes and biſhops of their reſpective parties had no longer the leaſt regard for religion, the Hereticks made their advantage of ſo favourable a juncture. The progreſs they made in a very little time ſurprized the pope, whom it affected more than all the reſt together. He therefore reſolved to apply ſuch a remedy to it as he thought the moſt effectual, and accordingly reſumed the deſign of the inquiſition, and of eſtabliſhing a perpetual and independent tribunal, whoſe only buſineſs ſhould be to take cognizance of heretical matters.

The interregnum ſtill continued, and the pope, who during the preſent unhappy poſture of affairs in Germany, was able alone to put an end to it by electing an emperor, was very far from attempting any thing of this nature, as he gain'd two very conſiderable advantages thereby. The firſt was, that during the vacancy of the imperial ſeat, he claimed ſo many rights in the empire, that it would have been impoſſible for the moſt juſtly elected emperor to claim more: the other was, that the interregnum gave him an opportunity of acting in Lombardy, as tho he had been abſolute ſovereign thereof; and gave him, in reality, the abſolute diſpoſal of all affairs in Italy. Innocent was too cunning not to make his advantage of ſo many favourable circumſtances; and the two orders of St. Dominic and St. Francis, had done him ſuch ſignal ſervice, and diſplay'd ſo much courage againſt the Hereticks, by expoſing themſelves to the greateſt dangers in the execution of their employments of inquiſitors, that it was natural for him to confide to no other perſons the tribunal of the inquiſition, which he was reſolved to ſet up in Italy, and in all other places; where he might have authority ſufficient to procure its eſtabliſhment.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

The difficulties that oppoſed the eſtabliſhment of the INQUISITION.

THIS affair being debated, the pope's council immediately foreſaw two obſtacles which it would be no eaſy matter to ſurmount: the firſt was, that all biſhops would not fail to oppoſe the erection of the inquiſition, ſince that could not be effected without bereaving them of the power of taking cognizance of heretical matters, which they juſtly claimed as their right, and of which they had always been, and were ſtill, in poſſeſſion. That they would not fail to aſſert, they were as fit to judge Hereticks, as a company of monks, whoſe inſtitution was of a very modern date, and who had neither their authority, nor the means of putting it in execution; and that ſufficient prejudice had been already done them in withdrawing thoſe friars from their juriſdiction, to which they were ſubject by all the antient canons, and the conſtant practice of the church; without going ſtill greater lengths, and eſtabliſhing them judges over their flock, and perhaps over themſelves, in an article of ſo delicate and extenſive a nature as that of doctrine and belief; that from all theſe conſiderations, they had ſcarce room to hope the biſhops would conſent to the ſetting up of this tribunal. That if an attempt ſhould be made to ſet it up againſt their wills, they ſhould be obliged to employ ſuch methods as would be too rigorous. That tho ſuch a reſolution ſhould be taken, and they be certain of the ſucceſs of it, it yet would be impoſſible for this eſtabliſhment to ſubſiſt, and that the biſhops would at laſt deſtroy it entirely. That indeed the greateſt veneration was paid to the holy ſee, but at the ſame time an equal reſpect was ſhewn to the epiſcopal function; an indiſputable proof of which was manifeſt from the ſupreme authority of the church, which all chriſtians in general aſcribed to oecumenical councils. In a word, that the ſee of Rome owed the greateſt part of its credit and authority to biſhops, they having known how to exert it on all proper occaſions; that they had given up part of their own authority for its ſake; and that as all things are commonly beſt preſerved by employing the ſame methods which have been uſed in acquiring them, it was of the greateſt importance to the holy ſee, to continue in the ſtricteſt union with the reſt of the biſhops; conſequently that the wounding them in ſo tender a part, would prove fatal to the pontificate.

The ſecond obſtacle, which was full as ſtrong and equally difficult to ſurmount, was, that it would be impoſſible to eſtabliſh the inquiſition in the manner projected, without depriving at the ſame time the lay-judges of the power they have always enjoyed of proſecuting Hereticks, and which had been confirmed to them by the laſt ordinances of Frederick II. And indeed this emperor, at the ſame time that he enlarged the authority of the inquiſitiors, and taken them under his protection, had nevertheleſs ordained, that the civil magiſtrate ſhould proceed to the condemnation and execution of Hereticks, after the inquiſitors had made their report to him.

Hence it was eaſy to conclude, that they would oppoſe with no leſs vigour than the biſhops, the ſetting up of a tribunal, which muſt inevitably ruin a part of their juriſdiction. Further, it was natural for them to imagine, that all the ſovereigns of chriſtendom would think it no leſs their intereſt to prevent the eſtabliſhment of the inquiſition, ſince on one ſide they were obliged to ſupport the magiſtrates in the authority they had devolved upon them; and on the other, that in caſe they conconſented to it, they would thereby yield to divide the ſovereign authority, to which the power of life and death, which the pope intended to beſtow on the inquiſitors, was inſeparably annex'd.

Theſe obſtacles, which at firſt ſight appeared inſurmountable, would have made them quite lay aſide the deſign of erecting the projected tribunal, at leaſt upon the foot it was then intended to have been ſet up, had not the pope, who was not eaſily prevailed with to lay aſide any deſign he had once taken in hand, and who was paſſionately deſirous of eſtabliſhing it, hit upon two expedients, which cleared up, at leaſt in outward appearance, the two difficulties that had been ſtarted.

The firſt of theſe expedients, was to declare that biſhops ſhould jointly with the inquiſitors be judges over Hereticks; that nothing ſhould be undertaken without their privity, and that they ſhould aſſiſt at theſe trials as often as they ſhould think proper; taking care at the ſame time ſo to manage matters afterwards, by expedients, which time never fails to furniſh, that the chief authority might be entirely lodged in the inquiſitors; and that the ſhadow of it only ſhould be left to the biſhops, who were to reſt ſatisfied with the bare name of judges. Whence it would come to paſs, that the biſhops, moſt of whom were more concerned for the honour, than the duties of their function, would either reſt ſatisfied with whatever ſhare ſhould be indulged them; or perceiving, that the ſmalleſt part of a juriſdiction was allowed them, the whole of which juſtly belonged to them, they would at laſt reſign it entirely to the inquiſitors, who by that means would be left at liberty to act in the moſt arbitrary manner, and be wholly dependent on the court of Rome.

That as to the ſecond obſtacle, viz. the ſeveral princes and magiſtrates to whom they were ſubordinate, they might ſo much the more eaſily be prevailed with not to oppoſe the deſign of the pope, as he enjoyed an almoſt abſolute authority in all Italy; that it was neceſſary, tho they employed the moſt vile methods, to make their advantage of ſo happy a train of circumſtances, which if let ſlip, might poſſibly be never recovered. However, that ſince to build this eſtabliſhment on a ſolid foundation, the prevailing on them not to oppoſe it, would not ſufficiently ſerve their purpoſe, but that their conſent would be neceſſary; it would conſequently be proper to ſatisfy them in outward appearance, in the ſame manner as the biſhops. In purſuance of this, they ſhould leave to magiſtrates the power of diſpoſing of the lower employments of the inquiſition, which ſhould not be allowed to make uſe of any but thoſe whom they ſhould appoint. That they ſhould have liberty to appoint an aſſiſtant to the inquiſitors, in their viſitations of all places within the juriſdiction of the civil magiſtrate; and that a third part of the confiſcated eſtates of all who had been condemned, might be applied to publick uſes. Laſtly, that according as they ſhould meet with greater or leſs oppoſition, with more or leſs difficulties, they might give up or refuſe ſeveral other points of little conſequence, by which the magiſtrates would ſeem to ſhare the authority of the inquiſition, but at the ſame time would be no more than the mere executioners of its orders.

Theſe difficulties being got over, a new one ſtarted up, which was ſo much the ſtronger, as intereſt was the object of it; and this was to find out ſome method for defraying the ſeveral expences of the inquiſition, ſuch as the ſalaries of the inquiſitors, the wages of the inferior officers, the guarding the priſons, the ſubſiſtence of the priſoners, the execution of the ſentences, and other matters, for all which it was abſolutely neceſſary to make a proper fund, to enable the inquiſition to ſubſiſt with honour, and in ſuch a manner as might anſwer the ſeveral ends of its eſtabliſhment, and the advantages they intended to draw from it.

Several methods were propoſed on this head; but at laſt it was reſolved, that the corporations in the ſeveral places ſhould be prevailed with to furniſh ſums for this purpoſe; and that in order to engage them to come more readily into it, they ſhould be allowed to diſpoſe of part of the monies ariſing from fines and confiſcations.

Matters being thus ſettled, they diſpatched crafty perſons of undoubted fidelity into the ſeveral provinces; whoſe buſineſs was, if poſſible, to engage their favour for the new eſtabliſhment they intended to ſet up in them; and the religious of St. Dominic were appointed inquiſitors in Lombardy, Romania and Marca Anconitana.

As it was impoſſible for them to have ſet the motives for eſtabliſhing the inquiſition in a more ſpecious light, the dire effects that would reſult from it not having yet been felt, or ſo much as foreſeen, it was received with very little difficulty. This furniſhed the pope, who knew admirably well to make advantage of any circumſtance that might forward his deſigns, with an opportunity of directing a bull to the ſeveral magiſtrates, heads of colleges, &c. and to the corporations of thoſe cities where the inquiſition had been ſet up.

This bull contained thirty one chapters, which were as ſo many ſtatutes for the ſettling of the inquiſition: to theſe the pope added two very expreſs orders; the firſt, that the ſtatutes ſhould immediately be regiſtred in all the publick offices where the rolls are kept, notwithſtanding any oppoſition to the contrary, reſerving to himſelf only the power of judging of the validity of thoſe oppoſitions. The ſecond impowered the inquiſitors to ſuſpend all ſuch places from having divine ſervice performed in them, and to excommunicate all perſons who ſhould refuſe to obey theſe ſtatutes.

However, as the pope, how daring ſoever he might be in all theſe attempts, was particularly careful not to endanger his authority; he, for that reaſon, eſtabliſhed the inquiſition in the above-mentioned provinces only. The reaſon he gave for it, was, that as thoſe provinces lay nearer to Rome; and farther, having a greater affection for them than the reſt, he was therefore bound in duty to preſide over them with a more than ordinary care. But the true reaſon was, that he had more authority in theſe provinces than in any other, as they were either ſubject to no other prince than himſelf; or being fiefs of the empire, the interregnum gave him an opportunity of exerting the ſame authority over them, as if he had been their lawful monarch: or laſtly, that as the cities of theſe provinces were independent on one another, and governed by their municipal laws; they were thereby ſo much the weaker, and leſs able to make head againſt ſo great a power as the Roman pontiff enjoyed at that time. Beſides, as in the laſt wars which the emperors had carried on in Italy, the pope had always ſided with moſt of thoſe cities; he therefore had a ſtrong party in each, who were inviolably attach'd to his intereſt, and were as able to put all his commands in execution as if he had been their immediate ſovereign.

Nevertheleſs, what authority ſoever the pope might enjoy in theſe provinces, yet the bull above-mentioned, was ſo much oppoſed both in his life-time, and after his death, that Alexander IV. his ſucceſſor, was obliged to revive it * ſeven years after, but not without ſeveral reſtrictions, which would never go down in the beginning. And yet, neither the lenitives or cenſures, which the inquiſition was impowered to thunder out againſt all offenders, or thoſe who ſhould oppoſe it, could not prevent its meeting with freſh oppoſition; which gave occaſion to Clement IV. to revive them † ſix years after, but with little better ſucceſs. The four popes, his ſucceſſors, ſet every engine at work to get them received; but the oppoſition ſtill continuing, they were at laſt obliged to moderate ſeveral particulars.

Thoſe oppoſitions were grounded on the exceſſive ſeverity of the inquiſitors, which was ſo much the more grievous, as people had never been accuſtomed to it. Complaint was likewiſe made of the uncommon rigour they ſhewed in levying the ſeveral revenues which had been aſſigned them; and theywere even accuſed of having extorted ſeveral ſeveral ſums of money under this pretence, inſomuch that the publick was reſolved to bear theſe impoſitions no longer.

Theſe complaints were ſeconded by a declaration of the ſeveral cities and corporations, by which they proteſted in expreſs terms, that they would no longer furniſh the ſums required for the ſupport of the inquiſition, its officers, &c. without which it would be impoſſible for that tribunal to ſubſiſt.

The ground of this proteſt was their inability to pay ſuch large exactions; and to corroborate it, they took notice of the wars they had been obliged to maintain in favour of the ſee of Rome againſt the emperors. They affirmed that thoſe wars had drained the publick treaſury; that they had even been obliged to mortgage part of theſe revenues to ſeveral private perſons, who otherwiſe would never have furniſhed the ſums, without which it would have been impoſſible for the war to be carried on; that it was abſolutely neceſſary, the money for which thoſe had been mortgaged, ſhould be firſt paid; that this could not be done without levying freſh taxes, to which the people would never have given their conſent, but for the advantage they hoped to reap by the recovery of the publick revenues; that to levy freſh ones, would infallibly alienate men's minds from the holy ſee, make them rebel againſt the inquiſitors, and perhaps againſt their own magiſtrates.

But whether it were that theſe oppoſitions, and the complaints on which they were grounded, were thought juſt; or that there was no other method left to ſupport the inquiſition, which the popes conſidered as their maſter-piece; it was reſolved they ſhould forego ſome things, the better to accuſtom the people by inſenſible degrees, to the new burden they were going to lay upon their ſhoulders.

It was therefore declared, that in all places where the inquiſition ſhould hereafter be received, as well as thoſe which had already admitted it, the inhabitants ſhould not be obliged to furniſh the ſums neceſſary for the ſupport of the inquiſition; but that it ſhould be maintained by other methods than at the publick expence; and that by this means the complaints which were made againſt the pretended extortions of the inquiſitors would immediately ceaſe.

And as to the complaints of the exceſſive rigour the inquiſitors uſed in the diſcharge of their imployments, a remedy was applied thereto, by allowing biſhops, in the proſecution of the inquiſition, a little more power than had before been indulged them.

The court of Rome drew two conſiderable advantages from their condeſcenſion on this occaſion: the firſt was, that as the inquiſitors depended no longer on the people for their ſubſiſtence, they conſequently would be more attached to the papal intereſt, and alienated from any other. The ſecond, which was of no leſs conſequence, was, that the inquiſition was by this means received without oppoſition in Lombardy, Romania, Marca Anconitana, Tuſcany, the ſtates of Genoa, and in all parts of Italy, the kingdom of Naples and the republick of Venice excepted.

But the Venetians did not abſolutely reject it; but foreſeeing they ſhould at laſt be forced to receive it in ſuch a manner as to be dependent on the inquiſition of Rome and the ſovereign pontiff, they thereupon ſet up one by their own authority. This inquiſition conſiſts both of eccleſiaſtical and ſecular judges; it enjoys its own particular laws, different from thoſe of the reſt of the inquiſitions of Italy, and is not near ſo rigorous; but as we ſhall treat of it in particular in the ſequel of this work, it would be needleſs to make any farther mention of it in this place.

As for the kingdom of Naples, the inquiſition has never been received therein; which was owing to the almoſt uninterrupted conteſts that happened between the popes and the ſovereigns of Naples. And ever ſince the kings of Spain have been maſters of this kingdom, tho there was the utmoſt harmony between them and the court of Rome;

Rome; things have always continued upon the ſame foot, and that for a very odd reaſon, viz. that the popes themſelves oppoſed it.

The pontiff's motive for this, was, becauſe the kings of Spain have at all times pretended, that the inquiſitors of the kingdom of Naples ſhould be ſubject to the inquiſitor-general of Spain, and ſhould no way depend on the general inquiſition of Rome, as all the inquiſitions of Italy do.

But this the court of Rome would never conſent to, and has always oppoſed it from a pretenſion of a quite contrary nature, viz. that as the kingdom of Naples holds of the ſee of Rome, conſequently the inquiſition which ſhould be eſtabliſhed in that kingdom, ought to be ſubordinate to that of Rome, and not to that of Spain. But both parties could never be brought to agree upon this head; ſo that the biſhops of this kingdom have ſtill the power of judging Hereticks. Nevertheleſs the pope, in certain caſes, deputes extraordinary commiſſioners into that kingdom, with power to take cognizance of heretical matters; but beſides that theſe caſes are very rare, the commiſſioners cannot take one ſtep in the proſecution, till after having firſt obtained the viceroy's leave for that purpoſe.

CHAP. IV.

The INQUISITION erected in ſeveral parts of Italy.

ANNO 1544, Don Peter of Toledo, viceroy of Naples for the emperor Charles V. attempted to ſettle the inquiſition in that country. But the people mutinied for ſeveral days; great numbers of the Spaniards were killed; and they would in all probability have been drove out of this rich kingdom, without any probability of their ever returning back into it, had they not ſecured themſelves in the caſtles of the country whereof they were maſters, and held out with vigour againſt the inhabitants, who did all that lay in their power to force them out. The mutineers were even reſolved to throw themſelves into the hands of the French, and for that purpoſe diſpatch'd an expreſs to du Mortier the embaſſador of Francis I. at Rome, deſiring him to ſend them a bold man to head them. Du Mortier, who was of a pacifick temper, like moſt of the gentlemen of the long robe, anſwered, that he would write to the king about it. Nevertheleſs he let ſlip the opportunity, and that of recovering the dutchy of Milan, an article his maſter had very much at heart. This ſhews how neceſſary it is for princes to make choice of military officers for embaſſadors; for had du Mortier been one, he himſelf might have headed the mutineers, as Termes the French embaſſador at Rome did afterwards. He quitted his character to go and defend Parma and Mirandola, which had declared againſt the emperor; and preſerved them, tho he was oppoſed by all the united forces of Spain and the ſee of Rome.

Since that time the fear of a freſh inſurrection, which would certainly break out and the repeated oppoſitions of the court of Rome, have prevented the Spaniards from ever attempting to re-eſtabliſh the inquiſition in that kingdom; however, they have not laid aſide all thoughts of ſucceeding in it one time or other; nor the court of Rome that of ſetting inſurmountable obſtacles in their way, unleſs the kings of Spain permit it to be ſubject to the general inquiſition at Rome, like that of the dutchy of Milan, notwithſtanding the king of Spain enjoys as great ſovereignty over this laſt place, as over Naples and the reſt of his dominions.

The example of the inquiſition at Milan has been often alledged, in order to perſuade the king of Spain that it would be no way diſadvantageous to ſet that of Naples upon the ſame foot; but as the inquiſition was eſtabliſhed there before he was maſter of it, and that he was obliged to leave things in the ſame ſtate in which he found them; there is not the leaſt room to hope, that this example will prevail with him, and make him conſent to its being ſettled at Naples after the ſame manner.

But after that the erecting of the tribunal of the inquiſition had been reſolved upon in the city of Milan, cardinal Charles Boromeo archbiſhop of that city, who was afterwards canonized, being upon his viſitation of certain places in his dioceſe, which were ſubordinate to him in ſpirituals, and to the proteſtant Switzers in temporals; he judged it highly neceſſary for him to make ſeveral ordinances for the good of thoſe churches, as is cuſtomary for biſhops to make in the courſe of their viſitations.

But the Switzers thought it but juſt for them to take umbrage upon that account; however, as they were perſuaded this pious cardinal would pay but very little regard to their remonſtrances, they ſent to the governor of Milan, deſiring him to reſtrain the archbiſhop from continuing his viſitation of thoſe places which were ſubject to them; and at the ſame time aſſured him, that in caſe he did not comply with their deſires, the good harmony which their maſters were ſo deſirous of preſerving, would certainly be interrupted.

The embaſſador upon his arrival at Milan, went and lodged at the houſe of a rich merchant of his acquaintance. This no ſooner came to the ears of the inquiſitor of Milan, than, regardleſs of the law of nations, and the fatal conſequences which would inevitably attend upon ſo outragious an inſult, he went to the embaſſador's lodgings at the head of all his officers; and commanding him to be put in chains in his preſence, he afterwards threw him into the priſon of the inquiſition. Tho every one was ſtruck with horror at this villainous attempt, yet no man dared oppoſe it. However the merchant did not abandon his friend, but waited upon the governor of Milan, and acquainted him with the ill treatment the embaſſador had met with. The governor ſent immediately for the inquiſitor, and obliged him to take the embaſſador out of priſon, after which he paid him the greateſt honours, and complied with all his deſires. So that the Switzers no ſooner heard of the impriſonment of their embaſſador, but news was brought of his being releaſed; which happened very à propos for the cardinal, for the Switzers were reſolved to arreſt him, and to treat him after the ſame manner they had done their embaſſador.

The governor of Milan wrote afterwards to the cardinal, and told him, that it was for the intereſt of his catholick majeſty, whoſe ſubject he was in quality of archbiſhop of Milan, that he ſhould diſcontinue his viſitation. The holy cardinal, who had art enough to ſuit his zeal to the peace of the ſtate, complied with all the governor's deſires. Thus the Switzers were appeas'd, and all things continued peaceable.

From this example it appears, that an ill-guided zeal may ſometimes occaſion great diſorders; conſequently, that 'tis the duty of every prince, who has the peace and tranquillity of his ſubjects at heart, to have a watchful eye over all things, and particularly ſuch wherein religion is concerned, ſince theſe naturally make a greater impreſſion on the mind, and are more eaſily abuſed.

The inquiſition is likewiſe ſettled in Sicily and Sardinia; but as this has been only ſince the uniting of theſe two iſlands to the crown of Spain, 'tis ſubject to the inquiſitor-general of that kingdom, and is no way dependent on the inquiſition of Rome.

After the inquiſition had been thus eſtabliſhed in Italy, the court of Rome, who were deſirous of introducing it into all the ſtates of chriſtendom, attempted to eſtabliſh it in Germany; but the exceſſive rigour of that tribunal not ſuiting the generous temper of the Germans, they oppoſed it with ſo much bravery, that the pope was obliged to lay aſide his deſign. However, the court of Rome were perſuaded, that time, and the artifices which might be uſed, would at laſt give ſucceſs to their endeavours.

endeavours. But time only taught them, that the Germans would never ſubmit to ſuch a yoke; and of this they had the ſtrongeſt proof, by the inquiſition's being baniſhed out of ſeveral cities, where the utmoſt pains had been taken to ſet it up; notwithſtanding that the inquiſitors had treated the inhabitants with much greater lenity, than they had ever exerciſed before in any other place.

Having therefore loſt all hopes of eſtabliſhing it in Germany, they attempted to ſettle it in France, and ſucceeded therein in part; for it was received in Languedoc, and ſome of the neighbouring provinces, upon account of the Vaudois and the Albigenſes, whom they imagin'd this tribunal only could extirpate. But they likewiſe found, that the free temper of the French, ſo abhorrent of violence and conſtraint, would no more ſubmit to the yoke than the Germans had done. Accordingly the inquiſition was baniſhed out of ſome cities by popular inſurrections, and the inquiſitors left ſeveral others for want of employment; or rather becauſe they, ſo far from meeting with reſpect which they are ſo vaſtly fond of, were, on the contrary, univerſally hated and abhorred, and juſtly ſuppoſed it would be impoſſible for them ever to overcome the averſion of thoſe people.

The houſes of the inquiſition at Carcaſſona and at Toulouſe are ſtanding to this day; and there are ſome Dominican friars in thoſe cities, who ſtill enjoy the title of inquiſitors; but then indeed it is no more than a mere title, nor have they any buſineſs. They nevertheleſs pretend, that in caſe a new ſect of Hereticks were to ariſe, to whom liberty of conſcience had not been granted, they would have a right to proſecute them; but it does not appear on what this right is founded, ſince the biſhops in France have an incontroulable power of judging Hereticks, and the civil magiſtrates that of condemning them, and putting their ſentence in execution.

Be this as it will, theſe are the only footſteps now remaining in France of the inquiſition; and there is not the leaſt reaſon to believe it will ever be re-admitted into that kingdom, ſince both king and people have an equal abhorrence of violence and conſtraint; not to mention that they have other expedients to preſerve and reſtore the purity of faith in that kingdom. Theſe expedients, tho of a more gentle nature, and better ſuited to the genius of the nation, and the ſpirit of the primitive church, are not leſs efficacious upon that account.

CHAP. V.

The eſtabliſhment of the INQUISITION in Spain.

AT laſt the inquiſition being baniſhed France, recovered more in Spain than it had loſt in that kingdom. The kings of Arragon received it, and eſtabliſhed it in the ſeveral dominions ſubject to that crown. This example, contrary to the pontiff's expectation, was not followed. Attempts were made to get it received in the other ſtates of this weſtern part of Europe, but to no purpoſe. It was oppoſed in all places with a reſolution, which, tho agreeable to the genius of the nation, was not in the leaſt expected. But it did not long preſerve its authority in Arragon, but became, as in France, the object of the contempt and averſion of the grandees and people; and in all probability would ſoon have been drove out of that kingdom with as much ignominy, had not Ferdinand of Arragon, and Iſabella of Caſtile, who had united almoſt all the ſtates of Spain under one monarchy, reſtored it to its priſtine authority in Arragon, and afterwards in all parts of Spain, Portugal excepted. Thus, properly ſpeaking, Spain was not wholly ſubject to the inquiſition till about the year 1484.

We may with juſtice affirm, that its eſtabliſhment here was entirely owing to John de Torquemada a Dominican, confeſſor to queen Iſabella, and afterwards cardinal: He had obliged that princeſs to promiſe him, before ſhe came to the crown, that in caſe heaven ſhould think fit to raiſe her to the throne, ſhe would do all that poſſibly lay in her power to extirpate hereticks and infidels; and indeed ſhe afterwards ſucceeded to the crown of Caſtile, which ſhe brought to Ferdinand king of Arragon for her dowry.

Such an increaſe of power made theſe princes reſolve upon the conqueſt of the kingdom of Granada, and to oblige the Moors, who had ſo often made Spain tremble, and had conquered the greateſt part of it, to return back into Africa.

This deſign met with better ſucceſs than had been even hoped for. The Moors were ſubdued, were diſpoſſeſſed of every thing they held in Spain, and were at laſt obliged to ſubmit themſelves, or to croſs back again into Africa. And ever ſince that time, they have been ſo taken up either with foreign or inteſtine wars, as has prevented them from ever being able to return again into Europe.

Nevertheleſs, altho the greateſt part of the Moors had been forced back into Africa, yet great numbers of them remained ſtill in Spain. What detained them in that kingdom, was either the marriages they had contracted, the various ſettlements they had in theſe kingdoms, their trade, or laſtly, the landed eſtates they poſſeſſed therein, which it was impoſſible for them to tranſport into any other country.

Ferdinand and Iſabella, who plainly ſaw they could not force them out of Spain, without depopulating the dominions they had lately conquered, conſented to their ſtill inhabiting it. However, they at laſt obliged both them and the Jews who were very numerous in Spain, to renounce their religion and embrace chriſtianity.

Theſe unhappy people being indiſpenſibly obliged to receive whatever laws the conqueror ſhould ſubject them to, conſented to every thing; that is, they turned chriſtians in outward appearance, tho the greateſt part of them ſtill adher'd in reality to the religion of their forefathers. But as it is no eaſy matter to ſeparate the inward ſenſations of religion from the worſhip thereof; they did not lay aſide, or refrain from the latter, whenever they judged they might do it with impunity.

Torquemada foreſeeing how prejudicial this hypocriſy would at length prove to religion and the government, took occaſion from thence to ſollicit the queen to perform the promiſe ſhe had made him, of perſecuting the hereticks and infidels, whenever ſhe ſhould be in a capacity to do it.

He repreſented to her, that ſhe was as much engaged to it from motives of policy as thoſe of conſcience; that ſo long as the Moors and Jews ſhould adhere to their old religion, they would preſerve a ſecret inclination for their former ſovereigns; that this ſecret inclination would at laſt be infallibly followed by their correſpondence with foreign powers, and inteſtine conſpiracies, and finally break out into open inſurrections, which would not fail to be ſupported by the Moors of Africa; that they had too much intereſt to return back to Spain, not to take advantage of any opportunity that might be favourable to it; that the means of making them irreconcileable, would be to oblige them to change their religion in good earneſt; that as there was no room to hope they would ever do it by their own impulſe, ſo on the other ſide it could not be doubted but violent methods would be neceſſary; that this indeed would leſſen the number of her ſubjects; but that it were better to have a few inviolably attach'd to her religion and government, than a greater number whoſe fidelity might be ſuſpected; that laſtly, the union between the church and the ſtate was ſo great, that whoever was wanting in affection for the one, muſt certainly have as little value for the other.

Theſe reaſons having made an impreſſion on the queen's mind, he remonſtrated to her, that the beſt means of giving ſucceſs to what he had propoſed, was to cauſe

the inquiſition to be received in all the ſtates that were ſubject to the crowns of Arragon and Caſtile: That this method was indeed ſlower than an open war, but then it was ſafer; that it would be a perpetual remedy to an evil, which in all probability would not be brought very ſoon to a period; that Italy was obliged to the inquiſition for the purity of its faith; laſtly, that the moſt glorious circumſtance of her reign would be, that ſhe had not only done her utmoſt endeavours, during her life-time, for the ſupport of the true religion, but had alſo left behind her the moſt infallible methods of preſerving it in its utmoſt purity, as long as the monarchy ſhould endure.

The queen won by theſe reaſons, promiſed Torquemada that ſhe would do all that lay in her power to perſuade the king to eſtabliſh the inquiſition in all his dominions; and indeed his reaſons wrought as much upon the king, as they had before done upon the queen: Inſomuch that they jointly obtained bulls from pope Sixtus IV. in 1483, for the ſetting up of the inquiſition in the kingdom of Arragon and Valentia, and the earldom of Catalonia. It was afterwards erected in Caſtile, and in all the dominions of Ferdinand and Iſabella. In Portugal it was not received before the year 1557, by John II. as will be ſhewn in the ſequel.

Torquemada had done too much ſervice in this affair not to be rewarded for it; accordingly the pope created him cardinal, and their catholick majeſties appointed him inquiſitor-general. He fully anſwered the opinion the people had of him, viz. that there was not a man in all Spain fitter for that important imployment, ſince that during his fourteen years adminiſtration in the inquiſition, he had proſecuted upwards of an hundred thouſand perſons, of whom ſix thouſand had been condemned to the flames.

Since theſe days the inquiſition roſe with the Spaniſh and Portugueſe names, and ſhared as it were in their conqueſts. And indeed the Spaniards and Portugueſe having gained very conſiderable ones in both the Indies, they ſet up the inquiſition in all thoſe places, after the ſame methods, and under the ſame regulations that it had been erected in their dominions in Europe.

Great Britain and the Low-Countries, were now the only places where they had not attempted to introduce the inquiſition. As for the former, the temper of its inhabitants, ſtill more abhorrent of all violent remedies, and more inclined to inſurrections than either the Germans or the French, appeared ſo oppoſite to the inquiſition, that they thought all endeavours for that purpoſe would prove ineffectual; and even that tho the pope, who had more authority there than in the reſt of the ſtates in chriſtendom, ſhould have intereſt ſufficient to get it received in that kingdom, it yet would be impoſſible for it to maintain itſelf long therein. They therefore laid aſide all thoughts of attempting it, but with the more reluctance, as the Engliſh, being a people who love moſt to deliver their thoughts freely and openly, and the moſt uſed to dogmatize, they were perſuaded they had ſo much the greater occaſion for ſuch an eſtabliſhment.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

The attempts made to ſettle the INQUISITION in the Low-Countries, occaſion wars and inſurrections.

AS to the Netherlands, the conformity of the temper of its inhabitants with thoſe of the Germans and French, between whom they are ſituated, having given occaſion to conclude that either it would be impoſſible to introduce the inquiſition among them, or that it would never be long ſupported therein; was the cauſe that no attempt was made for that purpoſe, or that they did not carry it to any great lengths. Thus the biſhops continued in poſſeſſion of the right of judging Hereticks, and the magiſtrates in that of condemning them, and putting their ſentences in execution.

But after the riſe of the Lutheran hereſy, a great number of Hereticks having ſettled in thoſe ſpacious provinces, under pretence of carrying on their traffick, the emperor Charles V. who was not loved by them, and who perhaps hated them in his turn, or at leaſt was afraid of them; was apprehenſive leſt they ſhould at laſt get the upper-hand in the hereditary countries. This apprehenſion added to the negligence of the magiſtrates, who had been obliged to ſlacken their proſecutions, becauſe of the great number of Hereticks that had ſheltered themſelves in thoſe provinces; occaſioned his publiſhing an edict in 1550, by which the inquiſition was ordered to be eſtabliſhed in all the provinces of the Low-Countries, in the ſame manner as in Spain.

This edict was promulgated; but Mary queen of Hungary, ſiſter to the emperor, and governeſs of thoſe provinces, having remonſtrated to him, that in caſe that edict ſhould be put in execution, all the foreign merchants, and great numbers of the natives of the country, would immediately abandon it, in order to ſeek for liberty of conſcience elſewhere; and their trade, which at that time was the moſt flouriſhing of any in Europe, would infallibly be ruin'd: this prevailed with the emperor to publiſh two declarations, by which all foreigners were exempted from the juriſdiction of the inquiſition, and the ſeverity of its proſecutions very much mitigated with reſpect to the natives of the country.

However, notwithſtanding the emperor's edict was publiſhed with theſe reſtrictions, it yet was not put in execution; whether it were that that monarch, who was not always for having thoſe things carried on, which he ſeemed, in outward appearance, to promote, was not urgent to have it put in execution; or that the people, the biſhops, and magiſtrates, whoſe intereſt being chiefly concerned therein, did therefore foreſee the conſequences that would reſult from it, better than any other perſon; and who moreover were very ſenſible that the emperor was not able to force them to ſubmit to this yoke againſt their wills, ſecretly oppoſed it. Be this as it will, the inquiſition was not eſtabliſhed in the Low-Countries during the reign of Charles V. and things continued in their former ſtate with reſpect to Hereticks.

After the death of this emperor, which happened in 1599, Philip II. his ſon, who was now ſovereign of the Netherlands, attempted all methods poſſible to ſet up as rigorous an inquiſition therein, as that of Spain. The ſtates at firſt oppoſed it by the ſtrongeſt, as well as moſt reſpectful remonſtrances. But Philip II. reſolving to be obeyed, had not the leaſt regard to them; upon which the people, who could not bear to be forced in an article of ſo extenſive and delicate a nature as that of religion, broke out into an open inſurrection.

This

This inſurrection in the Low-Countries, gave occaſion to the riſe and eſtabliſhment of the common-wealth of Holland. No inſurrection ever laſted longer, or was carried on with greater obſtinacy; for the war continued upwards of threeſcore years with unparallelled animoſity, but various ſucceſs. The king of Spain had frequent opportunities of eſtabliſhing a greater authority in thoſe countries, than any of his predeceſſors had ever enjoy'd; and on the other ſide, the Flemmings were in open rebellion; were frequently on the point either of changing their maſter, or of wholly recovering their liberty, by ſetting up a popular government, almoſt after the model of that of antient Rome.

At length both parties grew weary of a war, which had been carried on for ſo many years, coſt ſo much blood, and had ſo much weakned and drained them of ſo many ſums; and thereupon a peace was concluded: but it coſt the king of Spain the moſt valuable part of the Low-Countries, I mean that part of it which now forms the commonwealth of the ſeven United Provinces; and he found himſelf obliged to acknowledge it a free and independent ſtate. Nor would he have preſerved the reſt, had he not ratified and enlarged the privileges of the provinces, one of which was, that for the future no mention ſhould be made of ever eſtabliſhing the inquiſition therein; and that all heretical cauſes ſhould be judged by the antient laws, and in the uſual forms.

Thus ended the long war which had been carried on in the Netherlands, whereof the inquiſition was either the real or pretended cauſe. It has not made any progreſs ſince that time. Such places as had received it, are ſtill ſubject to it; and thoſe where it had been refuſed, have been ſo happy as to keep it out; inſomuch that it is now confined to Italy, and the dominions ſubject to the crowns of Spain and Portugal. However, its juriſdiction is not confined to ſuch narrow bounds but it ſtill flouriſhes in a greater tract of ground than all Europe.

CHAP. VII.

The INQUISITION ſet up in Venice.

NOtwithſtanding the city of Venice boaſts a great antiquity, and has from its infancy, by a particular favour of heaven, profeſſed the chriſtian faith; it yet preſerved itſelf unſullied with hereſy, till about the year 1232.

We need no other proof of this than the inſtrument itſelf by which James Thiepolo was raiſed to the dignity of doge. We here ſee the methods appointed to be made uſe of in the puniſhment of criminals; a great number of crimes, and of different ſorts, are there named, but no mention is made of hereſy; a proof that this city, and the places in its dependence, were at that time wholly free from it.

In the year 1232, the above-mentioned doge publiſhed a declaration on the ſame ſubject, viz. the puniſhments of various crimes, among which he mentions ſeveral which indeed are very near a-kin to hereſy, ſuch as witchcraft and incantations; but he does not make the leaſt mention of hereſy, which plainly proves it was not known in thoſe days; for otherwiſe he would certainly have enacted the puniſhments due to hereſy, as well as other crimes.

But after pope Innocent IV. had quarrelled with the emperor Frederick II. as has been already ſhewn in the ſecond book of this hiſtory, Italy being divided into two factions, whereof the one ſided with the pope, and the other with the emperor; the hereticks, under pretence of ſiding with his imperial majeſty, inſinuated themſelves every where. Venice was more crouded with them than any other place, and that becauſe as its government is leſs ſevere than any other, they flattered themſelves they ſhould be indulged a greater liberty in that city.

But the doge and ſenate juſtly fearing that ſo great a concourſe of perſons, infected with a variety of heretical tenets, would at laſt corrupt the religion which they had endeavoured for ſo many ages to preſerve in all its purity; they, in 1249, began to conſult upon methods how they might beſt preſerve themſelves from ſo great an evil.

In purſuance of this, ſeveral perſons of great ability, and zealous for the catholick religion, were impowered to ſearch after Hereticks. It was afterwards enacted, that they ſhould be impeached before the patriarch of Grado, and the other biſhops in the Venetian territories, whoſe right it was to judge Hereticks; and that all ſuch as ſhould be found guilty of hereſy by the biſhops, ſhould be put into the hands of the ſecular judge, and by plurality of voices be condemned to the flames by the doge and his council: theſe ſtatutes were made under the adminiſtration of the doge Moroſini, anno Dom. 1249.

But leſt the proſecution of Hereticks ſhould be ſuſpended by a biſhop's death, the doge James Contarini enacted, in 1275, that the vicar-generals, during the vacancy of the ſee, ſhould have the ſame authority as the biſhops in judging and condemning Hereticks.

The ſtatutes were executed in all the Venetian territories with the utmoſt exactneſs, eſpecially as they agreed in all points with the civil and eccleſiaſtical law, which had been practiſed from time immemorial in the empire; and each party was by this means fully ſatisfied in all their pretenſions, by the eccleſiaſtical judges being impowered to take cognizance of thoſe matters with reſpect to law, and the lay judges that of the fact, and the condemnation of them.

But neither the doge or his counſellors have ever pretended, as we ſhall hereafter find the court of Rome does, to be the mere executors of eccleſiaſtical ſentences: This is plain from the expreſs words of the law enacted by the doge Moroſini, viz. that all ſuch as ſhall have been convicted of hereſy by the ſentence of the biſhops, ſhall be condemned to the flames by the doge and his counſellors by plurality of voices; but this can be ſaid only of ſuch judges as have an active voice, which thoſe who only execute another's ſentence cannot be ſaid to have.

Things did not long continue in this ſtate, before the court of Rome, who have always a watchful eye over their intereſts, endeavour'd to get the inquiſition eſtabliſhed at Venice, as they had already done in moſt of the ſtates of Italy, by the methods above related.

But the Venetians, who are as ſenſible as any people in the world of their true intereſt, and ſo judiciouſly foreſee the conſequences of things, could never be prevailed with to conſent to it; Innocent, Alexander, Urban, Clement, and the ſeven popes their ſucceſſors, ſet every engine at work to compaſs their deſign; but to no purpoſe.

The inquiſition did itſelf contribute to the obſtinate reſiſtance it met with, when attempted to be ſet up in Venice; all places rang with the diſorders and tumults occaſioned by the ſermons, as well as the fiery and imprudent conduct of the inquiſitors. For theſe mock-zealots, would, upon the firſt whim that came in their heads, publiſh cruſades againſt the Hereticks, and theſe new made cruſaders, inſtead of being ſerviceable to religion, thought of nothing but revenging themſelves upon their enemies, and to diſpoſſeſs a numberleſs multitude of innocent perſons of their eſtates, upon pretence of their entertaining heretical principles, when at the ſame time all ſuch were the fartheſt from their thoughts.

Milan

Milan and Parma had like to have been ruined by the tumults which had been raiſed on theſe occaſions, and all Italy cry'd aloud againſt the inquiſition and its officers. The ſenate of Venice took advantage of theſe diſorders, by making it a handle to juſtify their having always refuſed to ſuffer the inquiſition to be erected in the territories of Venice.

However, all theſe fruitleſs attempts could not prevail with the popes to deſiſt from their deſign; and Nicholas IV. at laſt obtained what his predeceſſors had ſo long ſollicited in vain. The ſenate, in compliance with the requeſt of his holineſs, reſolved to receive the inquiſition; but then it was with all the precautions neceſſary for preventing the ſcandal and diſorder it had occaſioned in almoſt all the places where it had been hitherto received.

It was therefore agreed, that no other officers but thoſe of the republick, ſhould be ſuffered to execute the proſecutions of the inquiſition; that, in order to prevent all burdens and impoſitions, the revenues neceſſary for the maintainance of that tribunal ſhould not be raiſed by its officers; that the republick ſhould aſſign a fund for that purpoſe, and ſhould nominate a perſon to receive the monies ariſing therefrom; that it ſhould pay the ſalaries of the inquiſitors and their officers, and defray all the neceſſary expences; and that all fines, confiſcations, and all profits ariſing from the condemnation of Hereticks, ſhould be put into the hands of the inquiſitors, for which it ſhould be accountable to the ſenate, to be employ'd by them as they ſhould judge proper. All which is very different from the practice of the inquiſition in other places; where all the money goes to the inquiſitors.

The ſenate having thus reſolved to receive the inquiſition, an inſtrument was immediately drawn up for that purpoſe, in the moſt authentick manner, and ſent to the pope. And altho his holineſs was not pleaſed with the reſtrictions made by the ſenate, and would have been glad the inquiſition had been received at Venice without the leaſt limitation, as in the other ſtates of Italy; he nevertheleſs thought fit to agree to this inſtrument, and accordingly confirmed it by a bull dated the 28th of Auguſt. In this manner the tribunal of the inquiſition was eſtabliſhed at Venice.

Altho it was pretty much reſtrained in its authority, nevertheleſs the court of Rome thought they had done great matters in having procured its eſtabliſhment there; particularly as they flatter'd themſelves they ſhould at laſt force the Venetians to acquieſce in all things, and to ſuffer the inquiſition to reign as deſpotic there, as in all the other ſtates of Italy.

However, their hopes were afterwards blaſted; for the ſenate, who probably were perſuaded they had been too condeſcending in receiving the inquiſition, tho upon their own terms, were firmly reſolved not to ſuffer the leaſt innovation, and to keep things on the ſame foot in which they had been firſt eſtabliſhed. So far from giving their conſent to the repealing of any of the old ſtatutes, they have enacted new ones from time to time; all which together, compoſe the thirty nine famous chapters or ſtatutes, by which the inquiſition, in all the Venetian territories, is governed to this day.

BOOK III.

Of the Laws, Proceedings, and Magiſtrates of the INQUISITION.

CHAP. I.

A Deſcription of the INQUISITIONS of Rome and Spain.

ALL the Inquiſitions of Italy, thoſe of the republick of Venice, and of the land of the church excepted, wherever ſituated, are ſubordinate to that of Rome, whereof the pope is head. 'Tis he who nominates the cardinals that compoſe the congregation of the holy office; for by this name the inquiſition is called. He alſo appoints all the inquiſitors of the ſeveral inquiſitions in Italy, and the land of the church. Theſe inquiſitors are liable to be turned out of their places whenever the pope pleaſes; and that without his being obliged to proſecute them, or ſhew cauſe for their being diſmiſſed; however, they enjoy their employments as long as they pleaſe, if they have but intereſt enough to keep themſelves in.

The inquiſition of Rome, and the congregation of the holy office, which is the ſame thing, has a ſupreme authority over all particular inquiſitions; an account is given to them of all affairs of importance: they are always conſulted upon any conſiderable occaſion; and its orders and anſwers are obſerved with the utmoſt punctuality. It regulates the proceedings, preſcribes the forms of judiciary ſentences, aboliſhes old laws, and enacts new ones whenever it judges it neceſſary. As the inquiſitors are independent one on the other, it judges all diſputes that may ariſe between them; receives all complaints made againſt them; and when they find it impoſſible to conceal their faults and irregular proceedings, it appoints condign puniſhment, and from their judgment lies no appeal. In fine, the leſſer inquiſitions are as ſo many inferior courts, with reſpect to the ſuperior ones.

The inquiſition of Rome is compoſed of cardinals, who ſit as judges; and of conſulters, moſt of whom are doctors of the cannon law; and regulars or monks, theſe are as ſo many counſellors, whoſe buſineſs it is to examine the books, tenets, opinions, and actions of all perſons impeached to the tribunal of the inquiſition. 'Tis from their opinions that the cardinal inquiſitors form their ſentences and decrees. There are beſides, two ſecretaries, and a kind of attorney-general, who are the only perſons known to thoſe who are impeached. There is a prodigious number of inferior officers; officers; becauſe as all the officers of the inquiſition have very great privileges, and can be judged by that tribunal only, they by that means ſecure themſelves from the ordinary forms of juſtice, which is very ſevere.

In Spain and Portugal there is a ſupreme council of the inquiſition, which enjoys the ſame authority as that of the congregation of the holy office at Rome. All the leſſer inquiſitions eſtabliſhed in the countries ſubject to theſe two crowns, are ſubordinate to theſe, thoſe of the dukedom of Milan excepted, which are ſubject to the general inquiſition of Rome.

The ſupreme council conſiſts of the grand inquiſitor, who is nominated by the king of Spain, and confirmed by the pope. This is the only right the pontiff has over that of Spain, for when he has once confirmed him, he has no farther to do with that inquiſition. The inquiſitor-general being thus nominated and confirmed, is impowered to nominate all the officers of the inquiſition in the ſeveral dominions ſubject to the king of Spain; and conſequently muſt be one of the moſt conſiderable perſons in the government.

Beſides the inquiſitor-general, this ſupreme council conſiſts alſo of five counſellors, whereof one muſt be a Dominican friar, by the privilege granted by Philip III. of a fiſcal, or attorney-general; a ſecretary of the king's chamber; two ſecretaries of the council, and an algouazil or ſergeant-major, or a receiver; of two relators, and two qualificators: the number of familiars and inferior officers is, as at Rome, very great; and that becauſe they enjoy ſtill greater privileges, and are ſubject to no other tribunal than that of the inquiſition; which exempts them from the ordinary forms of juſtice, that is ſtill more ſevere in Spain than in Italy. Theſe privileges are ſo conſiderable, that the greateſt noblemen in Spain think it an honour to be officers of the inquiſition.

The ſupreme council of the Spaniſh inquiſition enjoys a plenary authority over the reſt of the inquiſitions, who cannot make an act of faith, or general execution, without its leave firſt obtained. Of all the tribunals of the inquiſition, this only has the privilege to have no appeals lie from its decrees. It may enact new laws whenever it judges them neceſſary; determines all law-ſuits of whatſoever nature, that are carried on between the inquiſitors; puniſhes all miniſters and officers of the inquiſition; receives all cauſes lodged by appeal: in a word, its authority is ſo great, that there is not a man in all the dominions of the king of Spain, but trembles at the bare mention of its name; nor would the king himſelf dare to interfere with its authority; and indeed, whoever has made any ſuch attempt has always ſmarted for it.

Every one has heard of the ſeverities which don Carlos, prince of Spain, don John of Auſtria, and the prince of Parma, met with upon this account: for Philip II. to pleaſe the inquiſitors, was forced to keep them a very long time from court, tho the firſt was his only ſon; the ſecond his brother, and ſon to Charles V. and the laſt his nephew, whom we ſhall have occaſion to mention in the ſequel. And when all came to all, their only crime was their having broke out into ſome paſſionate expreſſions againſt the inquiſition, tho upon a very juſt and lawful account.

Philip II. was ſo ridden by the inquiſition, as Turquet informs us in his hiſtory of Spain, P. 1405, that he did not preſume to undertake any affair without firſt asking their advice, never failing to follow it.

The leſſer inquiſitions ſubordinate to that of the ſovereign tribunal of Spain, are thoſe of Sevil, of Toledo, Granada, Corduba, Cuenca, Vallidolid; of Murcia, Lerma, Longrono, St. James, Saragoſſa; of Valentia, Barcelona, Majorca, Sardinia, Palermo, Carthagena, and Lima.

Theſe ſeveral inquiſitions conſiſt of three inquiſitors, three ſecretaries, an algouazil or ſergeant-major, and three receivers, qualificators or conſulters.

The leſſer inquiſitors of Italy, in each conſiderable city whereof there is one, have much the ſame officers; and indeed the inquiſition of Spain was formed after the model of that of Italy.

Theſe officers are an inquiſitor, a vicar, an attorney-general, a notary, ſeveral conſulters, one or more jailors, beſides a great number of inferior officers.

All the officers of the inquiſitor are obliged to give proofs of caſa limpia, i. e. of their being deſcended of antient chriſtians, and that none of their anceſtors have fallen under the cenſure of the inquiſition, either for infidelity or hereſy. Beſides this, they are bound to obſerve an inviolable ſecrecy with regard to the tranſactions of the inquiſition, upon any pretence whatſoever. Neither promiſes or threats are admitted as excuſes on this head; and whoever tranſgreſſes in this caſe is ſure to be obnoxious to its rigours.

CHAP. II.

Of caſes and perſons ſubject to the INQUISITION.

THESE are reducible to three heads. Firſt, To caſes and perſons ſubject to the inquiſition. Secondly, Its methods of proceeding. And, Thirdly, The manner of putting its ſentences in execution.

As to the firſt head: There are ſix principal caſes ſubject to the judgment of the inquiſition. The firſt, hereſy; the ſecond, ſuſpicion of hereſy; the third, protection of hereſy; the fourth, the black art, witchcraft, ſorcery, and inchantment; the fifth, blaſphemy, which either ſuppoſes ſome hereſy, or ſomething related to it; the ſixth and laſt, any reſiſtance made to the inquiſition, or to its members or officers, in the execution of its orders.

In this manner the inquiſition is impowered to judge ſix ſorts of perſons: Firſt, Hereticks; ſecondly, thoſe who have given any ſuſpicion of hereſy; thirdly, the promoters, or thoſe who protect or favour them in any manner ſoever; fourthly, magicians, wizards, conjurers, and thoſe who uſe incantations; fifthly, blaſphemers; ſixthly and laſtly, thoſe who reſiſt the officers of the inquiſition, and interfere with the juriſdiction thereof in any manner ſoever.

Antiently * the inquiſition uſed to judge of theſe ſix kinds of perſons only. But within theſe hundred years, Gregory XIII. Pius V. Clement VIII. and Gregory XIV. have enlarged its juriſdiction, and extended it to all Jews, Mahometans, infidels of what religion ſoever, and to all in general who any way prejudice the members and officers of the inquiſition, either in their perſons, honours, poſſeſſions, and any thing that belongs to them, tho abſtracted from the exerciſe of their ſeveral employments.

Theſe caſes which are ſubject to the inquiſition, are of greater extent than might at firſt be imagined. For in the firſt place, as to what relates to Hereticks, all are by the inquiſition comprehended under that name, who have either ſpoken, writ, taught or preached any thing contrary to the ſcripture, the apoſtles creed, the articles of faith, and the traditions of the church. Thoſe alſo who have abjured the chriſtian faith for the ſake of embracing any other religion whatſoever; or thoſe who, tho they don't go ſo far as to change their religion, do yet commend the cuſtoms and ceremonies uſed in others; or who practiſe ſome of theſe; or maintain that a man may be ſaved in any religion, provided he profeſſes it with a pure and ſincere heart.

If

* This is not to be underſtood of the Spaniſh inquiſition, ſince it was firſt immediately ſet up in oppoſition to Jews and Mahometans.

If the inquiſition went no farther, there would be nothing very extraordinary in all this; but as they likewiſe comprehend under the title of hereticks all who diſapprove any ceremony, uſage or cuſtom, received not only in the univerſal church (a circumſtance that would juſtly merit cenſure) but even in thoſe particular churches where the inquiſition is received. How difficult ſoever it would be to prove ſuch people Hereticks, from the principles of ſound theology, they are nevertheleſs looked upon by the inquiſition as perſons ſuſpected of hereſy.

They alſo include among theſe, all who hold, declare, or teach any principles contrary to thoſe received at Rome and in Italy, with reſpect to the ſovereign and unlimited authority of the popes; their ſuperiority over even general councils, and their power over temporal princes; as alſo thoſe who hold, declare, teach, or write any thing in oppoſition to the deciſions made by the pope on any ſubject whatever. In this ſenſe there would be a great number of Hereticks in France; and indeed 'tis certain that moſt of the French and Germans, not excepting the very Roman catholicks among them, are conſidered as Lutherans in thoſe countries where the inquiſition prevails.

The ſuſpicion of hereſy is of ſtill greater extent: for if a man happens only to advance any propoſition that offends thoſe who hear it, or even forbears to impeach thoſe who advance any ſuch, he is ſure to be obnoxious to it.

Thoſe are likewiſe ſuſpected of hereſy who abuſe the ſacraments, or any thing of a holy nature; who deſpiſe, inſult, or pull down images; who read, keep, or lend to read, any books condemned by the inquiſition.

'Tis alſo a ſufficient handle for falling under this ſuſpicion, to deviate from the common practice of catholicks in matters of devotion; ſuch as ſpending a whole year without either going to confeſſion or receiving the communion; the eating fleſh on prohibited days, and the neglecting to go to maſs on ſuch days as are appointed by the church.

Thoſe alſo are ſuſpected of hereſy who not being prieſts, are yet ſo wicked as to celebrate maſs, or hear confeſſions; or who, having that character, celebrate maſs without conſecrating it, or repeat ſuch ſacraments as are not to be repeated; or who, after having taken holy orders, or taken the habit in ſome religious order, attempt to marry; as thoſe likewiſe who marry two or more wives.

In fine, any perſon is ſuſpected of hereſy who has been preſent, tho but once, at any ſermon preached by a heretick, or any other of their publick exerciſes; to neglect to appear before the inquiſition when ſummoned, or to get one's ſelf abſolved within the year after one has been excommunicated; to receive a Heretick into one's friendſhip, to entertain him in one's houſe, to make him preſents, or even to pay him a viſit; and above all to prevent his being impriſoned in the inquiſition, or aſſiſt his eſcape from thence, tho grounded on the ſtrongeſt motives of friendſhip, duty, gratitude, pity, alliance or kindred.

And to ſo great lengths is this matter carried in the inquiſition, that the giving ſhelter to a Heretick is not only prohibited, but a perſon is even obliged to impeach any ſuch, tho it were a brother, father, husband or wife, and that upon pain of being excommunicated, or incurring one's ſelf the guilt of hereſy, and being expoſed to all the rigours of the inquiſition, as a favourer of Hereticks.

This is the third head ſubject to the judgment of this tribunal; under this name are comprehended all thoſe who any way favour, defend, or give advice, or any kind of aſſiſtance, to thoſe whom the holy office has begun to proſecute; thoſe alſo, who knowing a perſon to be a Heretick, or to have eſcaped from the priſons of the inquiſition; or who having been ſummoned, refuſe to appear before it; who either harbour, conceal, or furniſh any Heretick with advice or aſſiſtance, to prevent his being taken; or who, upon his having been impriſoned, aſſiſt him in breaking out of jail, jail, or furniſh him with any inſtrument for that purpoſe, or oppoſe, either by threats, or otherwiſe, the officers of the inquiſition in the execution of their office; or who, without perſonally oppoſing them, do yet aid and aſſiſt others in it. Thoſe likewiſe are looked upon as fautors of Hereticks, who ſpeak to ſuch as are impriſoned in the inquiſition without leave; or who write to them, either to adviſe them in any matter, or merely to comfort them in their misfortunes. Thoſe alſo who bribe the witneſſes with money or otherwiſe, to oblige them to hold their tongues, or favour the accuſed in their depoſitions; or who either conceal, ſteal, burn or get poſſeſſion, in any manner ſoever, of papers relating to the affairs of the inquiſition.

Finally, and which is the moſt extraordinary circumſtance, is, that all correſpondence in general with the Hereticks, tho upon account of traffick, is ſufficient to incur ſuſpicion of hereſy; nor can any perſon ſend them either goods, money, or any kind of thing; nor even write to, or receive any letters from them, without falling under this ſuſpicion. Nor is it poſſible for any man to eſcape it, who knowing a perſon to be a Heretick, or even ſuſpected of hereſy, does not go and impeach him in the holy office, whatever reaſons or motives he may have to the contrary.

The fourth head, which includes magicians, wizards, conjurers, ſoothſayers, and ſuch like, is ſtill of greater extent, particularly in Italy, whoſe inhabitants are very ſuperſtitious, and the female world more inquiſitive and credulous than in any other nation: not to mention that perſons of the greateſt underſtanding among them, eaſily give credit to all the ridiculous ſtories that are told of conjurers; the extravagancies of their nocturnal meetings, and the great power and influence which the devil is, by ſome, ſuppoſed to have over the actions of men. We ſhall not trouble the reader with the ſeveral accuſations that may be brought upon this head; ſince, that excepting certain enormous crimes, which, as they are the ſame in all countries, are therefore well enough known; the reſt conſiſt only of certain ridiculous ſuperſtitious practices, that flow from a crazy imagination and a groveling credulity, rather than a depraved will and a corrupt heart.

All we ſhall obſerve, is, that of the ſeveral caſes ſubject to the judgment of the inquiſition, none gives them a greater opportunity of filling their priſons with Women of all conditions; and that judiciary aſtrology, when employ'd to pry into futurity, is alſo ſubject to it.

Altho blaſphemy, which is the fifth head, be very common, and is one of the greateſt crimes a perſon can poſſibly be guilty of, yet the inquiſition takes cognizance of that kind of it only which comprehends ſome heretical tenet. Of this we ſhall not quote any inſtances, becauſe it is much better to be ignorant of theſe things than to know them.

And altho Jews, Mahometans, and other infidels, are not ſubject to the inquiſition in a great many reſpects, they nevertheleſs come under its cognizance with regard to all ſuch crimes as any way offend the chriſtian religion. Theſe crimes are, firſt, ſuch as a chriſtian may commit; as the favouring of hereticks, blaſphemers, conjurers, &c. or the oppoſing the officers of the inquiſition in the execution of their orders. All ſuch crimes are no more tolerated in Jews, and other infidels, than in chriſtians.

Moreover, all thoſe are likewiſe ſubject to the inquiſition, who either publiſh, write, or advance, in what manner ſoever, any principle that claſhes with the articles of faith which chriſtians hold in common with them. Thus, were a Jew or a Mahometan to deny the unity of God, or his Providence, the inquiſition would call him to account for it, and puniſh him as a Heretick.

They alſo are ſubject to the inquiſition, when they hinder any of their religion to turn chriſtians, or perſuade or prevail with a chriſtian to quit his religion and embrace their principles, or any way favour them in ſuch a change.

They

They are alſo forbid to ſell, put off, or even keep by them, the Talmud, and other books prohibited by the inquiſition, or any which pretend to refute the chriſtian religion, or treat it in a contemptuous manner.

In a word, the Jews are not allowed to have chriſtian nurſes, nor to perform the leaſt action in contempt of the chriſtian religion. The inquiſition takes cognizance of all theſe caſes, and puniſhes them with ſo much the more ſeverity, as theſe unhappy wretches are frequently prevailed with to change their religion, in order to eſcape the puniſhment to which they are condemned.

As one of the chief maxims of the inquiſition is to ſtrike terror into all, and to make itſelf dreaded by all who are ſubject to it, it puniſhes with great ſeverity ſuch as offend its agents or officers in any manner ſoever: and in this caſe nothing is looked upon as a ſlight offence, but every crime is conſidered as capital; nor can birth, character, employment, rank, or dignity, ſecure any perſon from its violence; and the leaſt threat againſt the moſt inferior officer of the inquiſition, its informers or witneſſes, would be puniſhed with the utmoſt rigour and ſeverity.

CHAP. III.

The manner in which the Tribunal of the INQUISITION proceeds againſt all perſons impeached.

THUS we have given in few words, an account of all ſuch caſes as are ſubject to the inquiſition. Theſe come generally under its cognizance by four different methods; either by publick report, by which a perſon is accuſed of one or more of the crimes above-mentioned; or by the depoſition of thoſe witneſſes by whom he is impeached; or by the diſcovery of the ſpies of the inquiſition, who are ſpread up and down in all places; or, laſtly, by the depoſitions of the criminals themſelves, who, for fear leſt others ſhould inform againſt them, and in the hopes of meeting with leſs ſevere treatment, ſometimes impeach themſelves of things, of which they know they might be convicted.

When the inquiſitors have diſcovered a criminal by one of the four methods above-mentioned, or even on a bare ſuſpicion, which often is very ſlight, he is thrice ſummoned to appear with the uſual formalities; after which, in caſe he does not come forth, he is excommunicated, and fined proviſionally in large ſums, which, however, does not exempt him from a more ſevere puniſhment, in caſe he be catch'd again.

The ſureſt method is to obey the firſt ſummons; for the longer this is delay'd, the greater guilt is incurred; nay, tho a perſon were really innocent, yet a refuſal to obey the orders of the inquiſition, is itſelf a crime: all delays and put-offs on this occaſion, only heighten the prejudice which may be entertained againſt a perſon impeached; and they take it for granted, they have proofs ſufficient againſt him, and that he is diffident of the merits of his cauſe, from the firſt moment he diſcovers the leaſt reluctance to appear before his judges. When this is the caſe of a perſon accuſed, he has no other way left to ſecure himſelf than by a voluntary and perpetual baniſhment. Nothing is forgot in this tribunal; no crime is wiped away by time, nor do they allow of any ſuch a thing as preſcription.

It is yet no eaſy matter to ſucceed in this violent extreme, and 'tis almoſt impoſſible to eſcape the ſearch of the inquiſitors; for no ſooner has an impeached perſon made his eſcape but all the inquiſitions have ſpeedy notice of it. They purſue him every way, and ſeldom fail to catch him again. The ſame is obſerved with regard to thoſe who break out of the priſons of the inquiſition; if they are catched again, they are utterly utterly undone, and the moſt gentle puniſhment they are to expect, is impriſonment for life.

'Tis ſtill more difficult for a perſon to make his eſcape in Spain; for, not to mention that the inquiſition is more ſevere and exact there than in any other country, the Hermandad is ſo vigilant in its purſuits, that 'tis impoſſible not to fall into its clutches. Theſe are a kind of ſocieties eſtabliſhed in all parts of Spain, whoſe cities, towns, and villages ſwarm with them. They are ſo many indefatigable ſpies, who liſten, and obſerve all that paſſes; but they are chiefly employ'd in purſuing ſuch criminals as fly from juſtice, and for this they ſpare neither care, labour or expence. Theſe fellows are at the heels of a criminal wherever he flies; and when they find him, in caſe they are not ſtrong enough to ſeize him openly, they ſet every engine at work in order to get him again; and for this purpoſe they ſtrike up a mock-friendſhip with him, invite him frequently to entertainments, make him preſents, and lend him money; they likewiſe aſſiſt in caſe of ſickneſs, or any other misfortune. They diſguiſe their ſentiments, and feign to have exactly the ſame notions with him: in a word, they ſwear a thouſand oaths that they have the ſincereſt friendſhip for him. Thus when they think they have worked themſelves into his confidence, they allure him to ſome place, where he is immediately ſeized and hurried away, by perſons ſuborned for that purpoſe. If the perſon who is thus purſued keeps, as ſometimes happens, ſo much upon his guard as to defeat all their ſtratagems; they then will find ſome opportunity to engage him inſenſibly in ſome party of pleaſure, either on board a ſhip, a boat, or in a coach in the country; when, to his great ſurprize, he ſhall find, that the people of the ſhip, of the boat, or coach, had been all bribed: and being thus enſnar'd, they immediately carry him off to Spain. In this manner ſeveral perſons have been decoy'd, even from Conſtantinople.

Altho the Hermandad is no way allied to the inquiſition, it nevertheleſs employs thoſe wretches to very good purpoſe, whenever any perſon refuſes to ſubmit to the ſentence of that tribunal, or endeavours to eſcape it by flight. And as the inquiſition is more eſteemed and reſpected than any other tribunal in Spain, ſo the Hermandad are inviolably devoted to its ſervice.

There is another body of men, called the Cruſade, or la Cruciata in Spaniſh, from whom the inquiſition receives no leſs ſervice. The buſineſs of this ſociety is not like the above-mentioned, to purſue criminals; but only to have an eye over the behaviour of all Roman catholicks, and to impeach them in caſe they omit any duties of the chriſtian profeſſion. This ſociety is vaſtly rich, and as powerful as wealthy; for the biſhops, the archbiſhops, and moſt of the grandees of Spain, are members of it. Theſe are another kind of ſpies, who are to be met with every where; they inſinuate themſelves into every body's affairs, and ſuffer nothing to eſcape them. The Spaniards are perſuaded, that had it not been for the inquiſition and the cruſade, their kingdom would have been over-run with Hereticks, who had like to have made themſelves maſters of the other kingdoms and ſtates of Europe.

It being therefore, as was juſt now ſaid, ſo difficult a matter to eſcape the claws of the inquiſition, 'tis certain that no wiſe man will ever attempt it, unleſs he is infallibly ſure of ſucceſs; and that, in caſe he be ſummoned, it will be beſt for him to be forth-coming as ſoon as poſſible.

It often happens that the inquiſitors, either when they have ſufficient witneſſes, or that the crime of which the perſon impeached is accuſed, is of an enormous nature; or, laſtly, when they are afraid of his eſcaping from them, and not ſtaying till they ſummon him in form: in theſe caſes, I ſay, they ſhall immediately give orders for his being arreſted whenever they ſhall meet with him. A perſon impeached has no aſylum nor privilege, nor can ſuſpend the proſecution one ſingle moment, or mitigate the rigour of it.

'Tis

'Tis ſurprizing to conſider the forlorn condition of a perſon who is thus unhappy. He is ſeized in the midſt of his friends, and in the very boſom of his family; a father ſtanding by his ſon's ſide, a ſon in the company of his father, and a wife in that of her husband; without ſo much as any one's daring to make the leaſt reſiſtance, or even to ſtop a minute, to ſettle any affairs tho of the utmoſt conſequence, or to ſpeak one ſingle word in favour of the perſon impeached.

But when the inquiſition have once got him into their hands, he is treated in a ſtill more rigorous manner. In this caſe no one is allowed either to viſit him, to give him advice; to write to, or ſolicit for him, or even to attempt to prove his innocence. In an inſtant he is cut off from all correſpondence, and the unhappy wretch finds himſelf friendleſs, without kindred, advice, ſupport, or even the leaſt conſolation; abandoned to his judges, and to himſelf, and frequently to his greateſt enemies, without being able to tell what will become of him. Even innocence itſelf, in theſe caſes, is a very weak ſupport, ſince nothing is eaſier than to ruin an innocent perſon, as will be ſhewn in the ſequel.

No ſooner have the inquiſitors got a perſon in their clutches, than they ſearch him very ſtrictly, in order, if poſſible, to find ſomething about him that may be of uſe to convict him; or for any inſtrument, with which he may kill himſelf, in order to eſcape the tortures of the inquiſition. We have inſtances of perſons who have laid violent hands upon themſelves on theſe occaſions, and a great many who were impriſoned in the inquiſition, have been drove to that deſpair, as either to poiſon, or to kill themſelves with ſtilletos which they had concealed in their hair, or the moſt ſecret parts of their body; or daſh out their brains againſt the walls, when they had no other way left to deſtroy themſelves.

The inquiſitor, accompanied by his officers, goes afterwards to the houſe of the accuſed, where a very exact inventory is taken of his books, papers, effects, and every thing they find in it, which they annex to that they had before taken of the things found upon him. No perſon dares to oppoſe them therein, or conceal the leaſt trifle. To this inventory they often add an attachment or ſeizure of all, or part of the goods, to ſerve, in caſe it be needful, as a ſecurity for the coſts and fines which the perſon impeached may be condemned to pay; for it very ſeldom happens that a perſon gets out of the inquiſition without being half ruined, unleſs he happens to be very rich.

Things being carried on thus far, the proſecution immediately begins, but is carried on very ſlowly; for a criminal is frequently impriſoned for ſeveral months, and not one word is mentioned about carrying him to audience.

Theſe priſons are dreadful, and nothing can be more capable to ſtrike a priſoner with terror, and diſpoſe him for appearing before the moſt dreadful tribunal in the world, than the diſmal dungeons into which theſe unhappy wretches are immediately thrown.

The dungeons are under ground, and ſtink wretchedly; they are ſituated in places far remote from all human communication; the way to them is by a great many turnings and windings, for fear leſt the cries and complaints of the miſerable tenants of thoſe places ſhould be heard, and move any perſon with compaſſion. Day-light is for ever ſhut out from theſe gloomy habitations, to hinder thoſe who are impriſoned therein from reading, or any employment but the reflection on their puniſhment, and the ſad thoughts of the evils which are prepared them. In this diſmal condition they are not allowed either to ſee or ſpeak to any perſon. And in caſe the proximity of one dungeon to another ſhould give the priſoners an opportunity of converſing together, they are abſolutely forbid to attempt it; and in caſe they happen to be over-heard, either ſpeaking to one another or to themſelves, the officers immediately ruſh in upon them, and whip them with the utmoſt ſeverity. We are told, that theſe unhappy wretches, not daring to converſe with one another from their ſeveral dungeons, have invented a method of ſpeaking with their fingers, by ſtriking a certain number of times upon the wall, according to the numerical order of the letter which they would expreſs, in the alphabet. As for inſtance: Suppoſe they had a mind to expreſs the word bread, as the firſt letter thereof is the ſecond letter in the alphabet, they ſtrike two blows on the wall, and in the ſame manner for the reſt. This gives them ſome employment; for converſation muſt neceſſarily be carried on but very ſlowly by ſuch methods, and a conſiderable time is taken up in expreſſing only a few ſentences. 'Tis certain, that were it in the power of their jailors to deprive them even of this ſad conſolation, they would not fail to do it.

After a criminal has ſpent ſeveral days and ſometimes months in this manner, without ſo much as knowing either the crime of which he is accuſed, or the witneſſes who have depoſed againſt him, the jailor is ordered to acquaint him, he may deſire to be admitted to audience; but this he ſeems to do from his own proper impulſe, and out of compaſſion, and not by order of the judges; for 'tis a fixed rule in this tribunal, that the priſoner muſt always petition for every thing.

The firſt time the priſoner appears before his judges, they ask him, juſt as tho they did not know him, or had had the leaſt information of his crime, who he is? or, what he wants? and, if he has any thing to ſay? The ſafeſt, at leaſt the leſs dangerous method, is for a perſon to plead guilty, notwithſtanding his innocence, of every article that is laid to his charge. A priſoner is never put to death the firſt time of his being impeached to the inquiſition. However, this ſtamps the whole family with infamy, and this firſt ſentence diſables all ſuch perſons from enjoying any employments either in church or ſtate.

There is another method for a perſon to get out of the hands of the inquiſition the firſt time he is impeached therein, which is always to affirm he has nothing to ſay, and is not conſcious of the leaſt guilt; for in this caſe, if the proofs are not very ſtrong, the priſoner is acquitted.

But this generally is of little ſervice; for the inquiſitors ſet two or three of their ſpies, who are called familiars at his heels. 'Tis ſcarce poſſible to expreſs how cloſe theſe fellows will ſtick to him; they follow him wherever he goes, obſerve every ſtep he takes, all he ſays or does, nothing can eſcape them; and indeed they generally pretend to be his friends, and ſet every engine at work to inſinuate themſelves into his confidence; nay, they are ſometimes his own ſervants, or his neareſt relations.

Upon the leaſt hint, or the ſlighteſt ſuſpicions they again lay hold of him, when all things are carried on as before, except that they now proſecute him with greater rigour. Then indeed it may be truly affirmed, the unhappy wretch is inevitably loſt; for the inquiſition never grants a pardon twice.

Every one has heard of the treatment Mark Anthony de Dominis met with upon this occaſion. This gentleman was deſcended from a very illuſtrious family in the Venetian territories: he was firſt a jeſuit, and was afterwards made biſhop of Segni, then archbiſhop of Spalatro and primate of Dalmatia. This dignity, tho very great in itſelf, was not yet what gain'd him univerſal reſpect both in church and the publick. Mark Anthony de Dominis was looked upon as the moſt learned man of any of his age, particularly in divinity, and hiſtory both ſacred and profane. No man in the world had read more, or forgot leſs. He was conſulted on all kinds of ſubjects, and anſwered each ſingle one in ſuch a manner, as if he had never applied himſelf to any other.

Yet his unbounded knowledge could not ſecure him from being tainted with the tenets of the Lutherans and Calviniſts. He maintained them with the utmoſt vigour in his voluminous work of the eccleſiaſtical Republick; and at the ſame time diſcovered ſo great a ſpirit of rancour againſt the pope and the court of Rome, that it would have have been impoſſible for its greateſt enemies to write more ſharply againſt them.

The ſtrong deſire he had of publiſhing this work in his life-time, and the little likelihood there was of his being able to continue in Italy after its publication, engaged him to withdraw into Germany firſt, and afterwards into England, whither he had been invited, with promiſe of great preferment, by king James I. As that monarch was himſelf very learned, he employ'd all his endeavours to engage perſons, from every part of Europe, as were famous for genius and learning, to come over into his kingdom. Dominis met with the moſt obliging reception from the king, he provided him an honourable ſubſiſtence ſuitable to his dignity, and did all that lay in his power to engage him to break off intirely from Rome and the Roman catholick church.

On the other ſide, the court of Rome, whether it were that they were reſolved not to ſuffer a perſon of his character to continue among their enemies, or were unwilling to be oppoſed by a man of his learning and talents; or rather, as afterwards appeared, that they were bent upon revenge, and reſolved to make an example of him: be this as it will, they left no ſtone unturned to make him return to his former principles; and for that purpoſe got all his beſt friends and neareſt relations in Italy to write to him; and at laſt don Diego Sarmiento de Acuna, the Spaniſh embaſſador at the Engliſh court, made him ſuch advantageous offers, as firſt ſhook his former reſolutions, and afterwards prevailed on him to accept them.

This unhappy prelate, to his utter ruin, forgot on this occaſion, the maxims he had ſo often repeated in his works, viz. That whoever offends the court of Rome, is ſure not to eſcape being puniſhed for it; that they don't know what it is to pardon an affront; and that when a man has once drawn his ſword againſt them, he muſt immediately throw the ſcabbard away.

He ſet out for Rome in ſpight of all the arguments his friends in England could uſe to diſſuade him from it; they were continually ſetting before his eyes the ill fate that would inevitably attend him, and which he ought to have foreſeen better than any body elſe. But no ſooner was he arrived in Italy, than he was thoroughly ſenſible, but too late, of the error he had committed. They did not keep their word with him in one ſingle circumſtance; but forced him to abjure publickly the ſeveral heretical tenets that were ſpread up and down his writings. However, they gave him his liberty in outward appearance, but at the ſame time ſet ſo many perſons over him, who watched him ſo narrowly, that they either really diſcovered, or pretended to have diſcovered, that he held a ſecret correſpondence with the Engliſh. Upon this the inquiſition immediately laid hold of him; but as the proſecution of this great man was carried on very ſlowly, he died in priſon, either thro' grief for the wrong ſtep he had taken, or from his dread of the ſhameful and cruel puniſhment he knew he could not poſſibly eſcape; or, as is the opinion of many, by poiſon, which had been ſent him by ſome officious friend or relation, who knowing he was inevitably loſt, was willing to reſcue him from the infamy and rigour of a puniſhment which would attend his illuſtrious family.

But to return to my ſubject: When a perſon is fallen a ſecond time into the clutches of the inquiſition, after having languiſhed ſeveral months in priſon, in the rigorous manner above-mention'd, they again inſidiouſly prompt him to beg to be admitted to audience as before, which, after ſome days delay, he obtains.

Altho all the houſes of the inquiſition are very magnificent, and that no coſt is ſpared either for marble or rich ornaments of architecture, yet the priſoners ſee none of theſe, and every object they behold ſtrikes them with terror: the ſeveral places where they appear have an air of dreadful gloom; and the inquiſitors, and their officers officers put on ſo ſad and ſevere a countenance, as does not leave the priſoner the leaſt hopes of moving his judges to compaſſion.

When the priſoner is brought before the inquiſitors, they tell him, the jailor had informed them that he deſired to be heard. The priſoner anſwers, he deſires to be heard, in order that he may be cleared, in caſe he be found innocent. Upon this the inquiſitors preſs him earneſtly to confeſs his crime. If he denies it, they remand him back to priſon; and tell him they do ſo in order to give him time to reflect upon it, and to recollect every circumſtance thereof. After he has continued a long time in this manner, in caſe they cannot prevail with him to make any confeſſion, they oblige him to ſwear on the crucifix and the holy goſpels, that he will ſpeak the truth to all the queſtions that ſhall be put to him. If he refuſes to take the oath, they immediately pronounce ſentence upon him, without any other formality; becauſe they, by this, either ſuppoſe he is not a chriſtian, ſince he refuſes to perform ſo authentick an act as that of an oath required of him by thoſe who are his lawful judges; or, that he is afraid of forſwearing himſelf, and conſequently is guilty of all they lay to his charge.

But in caſe he takes the oath, they queſtion him in numberleſs circumſtances of his paſt life, from his birth to that time, and even that of his anceſtors, in order to ſift out of him, whether ſome of them may not have come under the cenſures of the inquiſition. Tho crimes of this nature are merely perſonal, they yet prejudice the judges very ſtrongly againſt him; they ſuppoſe he has imbibed the notions of his progenitors with their blood; and that, as he had been educated by them, it was impoſſible but he muſt have imbibed their erroneous tenets, a circumſtance they imagine they muſt neceſſarily have had moſt at heart.

Hitherto he is not ſuffered to know the crime of which he is accuſed, nor the perſons who have ſwore againſt him. They, as yet, are only endeavouring, by a thouſand ſtratagems and artful windings, to get ſomething out of him, that may ſeemingly authorize them to pronounce his condemnation.

This ſnare is laid with prodigious cunning, and can hardly be eſcaped; for, as on the one ſide, people are arreſted on vain and idle reports, or on proofs inſufficient to condemn them, 'tis certain that the judges themſelves would frequently be very much puzzled, if the priſoners did not by their own words pronounce their condemnation.

But on the other ſide, as the inquiſitors promiſe to treat them with greater gentleneſs, and ſometimes to pardon them, if, before they are condemned, they acknowledge their crimes, and give, by ſuch a confeſſion, the moſt ſenſible tokens of a ſincere repentance; theſe unhappy people, not knowing whether they really have, or have not, circumſtances ſufficient to convict them; and, moreover, flattered with the agreeable hope of being ſoon ſet at liberty, they by that means often acquaint them with more than they either do, or poſſibly could ever know, had they not made thoſe haſty and imprudent confeſſions.

But in caſe the priſoner either is innocent, or too cunning to fall into their ſnares, and ſtill continues to deny what they alledge againſt him, his accuſation, compoſed by the inquiſitors, is delivered to him; in which they intermix a great number of pretended crimes, and of the moſt enormous nature, with thoſe whereof he is juſtly accuſed.

This compoſition of truth and falſhood, is another trap for this unhappy wretch; for as he ſeldom fails to exclaim againſt the horrible crimes they lay to his charge, they take an occaſion from thence to conclude, that thoſe of which he makes but little complaint are true. Altho ſuch a kind of proof is a very equivocal one, it nevertheleſs is fatally ominous to a priſoner.

After having in this manner delivered the accuſation to the priſoner, they allow him a counſellor, that is, they nominate certain perſons to him, of one of whom he makes makes choice to defend his cauſe. This counſellor does him but very little ſervice; for he is not only forbid giving the priſoner any advice, but is not even allowed to ſpeak to him but in preſence of the regiſter and the inquiſitors, or to make uſe of him to defend his cauſe. For as all citations in this tribunal are perſonal, and that no one is allowed to appear by proxy; ſo a priſoner is forced to defend himſelf againſt unknown accuſers, for they never tell him ſo much as the names either of his accuſers or witneſſes. The proſecutor is indeed known well enough, ſince it is always the attorney-general of the inquiſition; but informers are never allowed to proſecute, becauſe they always appear as witneſſes.

Some days after they have given the priſoner a copy of his indictment, he is ſent for to audience, with his counſellor; but he might as well be without him, ſince the counſellor is not allowed to ſpeak, or, in caſe he does ſpeak, muſt firſt adviſe with the inquiſitors what it will be proper for him to ſay, and only be very urgent with the priſoner to make a confeſſion of a crime whereof he is often innocent.

'Tis to no purpoſe for him to inſiſt upon knowing the names of the perſons who have depoſed againſt him, for they are ſure to keep him in the dark in that reſpect; all they allow him, is to gueſs if they are not ſuch and ſuch perſons; but to this they either make no anſwer at all, or ſuch an one as they pleaſe, but never right. They afterwards go on with the examination, and in caſe he ſtill continues to plead not guilty, he is remanded back to priſon.

At laſt, after having thus carried an unhappy wretch, for ſeveral years together, from the jail to audience, and from audience to jail, his trial is prepared in good earneſt. It opens with his appearance before the inquiſitors; then they give him, for the firſt time, the true depoſitions (for the former indictment which had been put into his hands, had been drawn up by the judges, and was made up both of true and falſe accuſations.) Then the true depoſitions which the witneſſes had made, but very much curtailed, are ſhewn him; for all ſuch circumſtances relating to places and perſons are ſuppreſſed, as might inform the priſoner who thoſe were that had ſwore againſt him.

Moreover, in caſe there are any circumſtances in the depoſitions of the witneſſes, which may contribute to the priſoner's being acquitted, they indeed are not razed from the original, but then they are not inſerted in the copy they put into his hands; ſo that theſe depoſitions, ſuppoſing they were true, are after of no other uſe but to perplex and confound the priſoner.

After theſe depoſitions have been thus communicated to the priſoner, in caſe he will not, or cannot except againſt his witneſſes, and give in his anſwers immediately, they allow him three or four days to conſider of it, and remand him back to jail.

Upon this he muſt fall a queſtioning, and endeavour to hit upon the perſons who have been his accuſers and enemies; for they perſiſt in refuſing either to let him ſee them, or even to tell him their names.

When the time which had been allowed him for challenging his witneſſes is expired, he is recalled; and is heard in whatever he has to except againſt perſons, whoſe names and qualities are equally concealed from him; conſequently, if he happens to gueſs their names, and makes any juſt exceptions againſt them, ſo much the better for him; but then the judges ſhall give them what weight they pleaſe in the trial, and often reject them, tho very juſt; or, to explain this farther, nothing that a priſoner may alledge in challenging of witneſſes is of any effect, but the proving them to be profeſſed enemies. This however does not invalidate their depoſitions, but then it weakens them; for any exceptions with reſpect to crimes, tho of the blackeſt dye, ſignify nothing.

It may not be improper to take notice of certain particular rules with regard to witneſſes, which are obſerved in the inquiſition, and in no other tribunal. 1. A priſoner ſoner is ſeldom or never told the names of the witneſſes, who have ſwore againſt him, which is done either to prevent his bribing or terrifying them, or to take from him the opportunity of hitting upon the exceptions he might otherwiſe make; or, laſtly, that the promiſes which are always made to witneſſes, of never having their names divulged, may encourage impeachments. 2. For the ſame reaſons witneſſes are not obliged to prove their depoſitions. 3. For the ſame reaſon alſo, witneſſes are ſeldom or never confronted. 4. In this tribunal, all witneſſes, becauſe of the heinous nature of hereſy, are accepted, whence ſoever they come, and how black and ſcandalous ſoever their characters may be; the depoſitions of foreſworn wretches, people of the vileſt reputation, Hereticks, Jews, or Mahometans, are all received as valid on theſe occaſions; and the teſtimonies of ſuch miſcreants as theſe, tho ſo unworthy of the leaſt credit, are yet ſufficient to ruin a man, and to cauſe him to be condemned to the flames. 5. Two witneſſes by hear-ſay, are equivalent to one who is both an ear and eye-witneſs, and ſufficient to make a perſon be put to the torture, which is extremely ſevere in the inquiſition. 6. Informers themſelves are received as witneſſes, which is the reaſon why they are not ſuffered to proſecute. In ſhort, a ſon is allowed to appear as evidence againſt his father, a father againſt his ſon, a ſervant againſt his maſter, a husband againſt his wife, a wife againſt her husband; by which means the laws are overturned, and a door opened to a numberleſs multitude of actions of the moſt treacherous and revengeful nature.

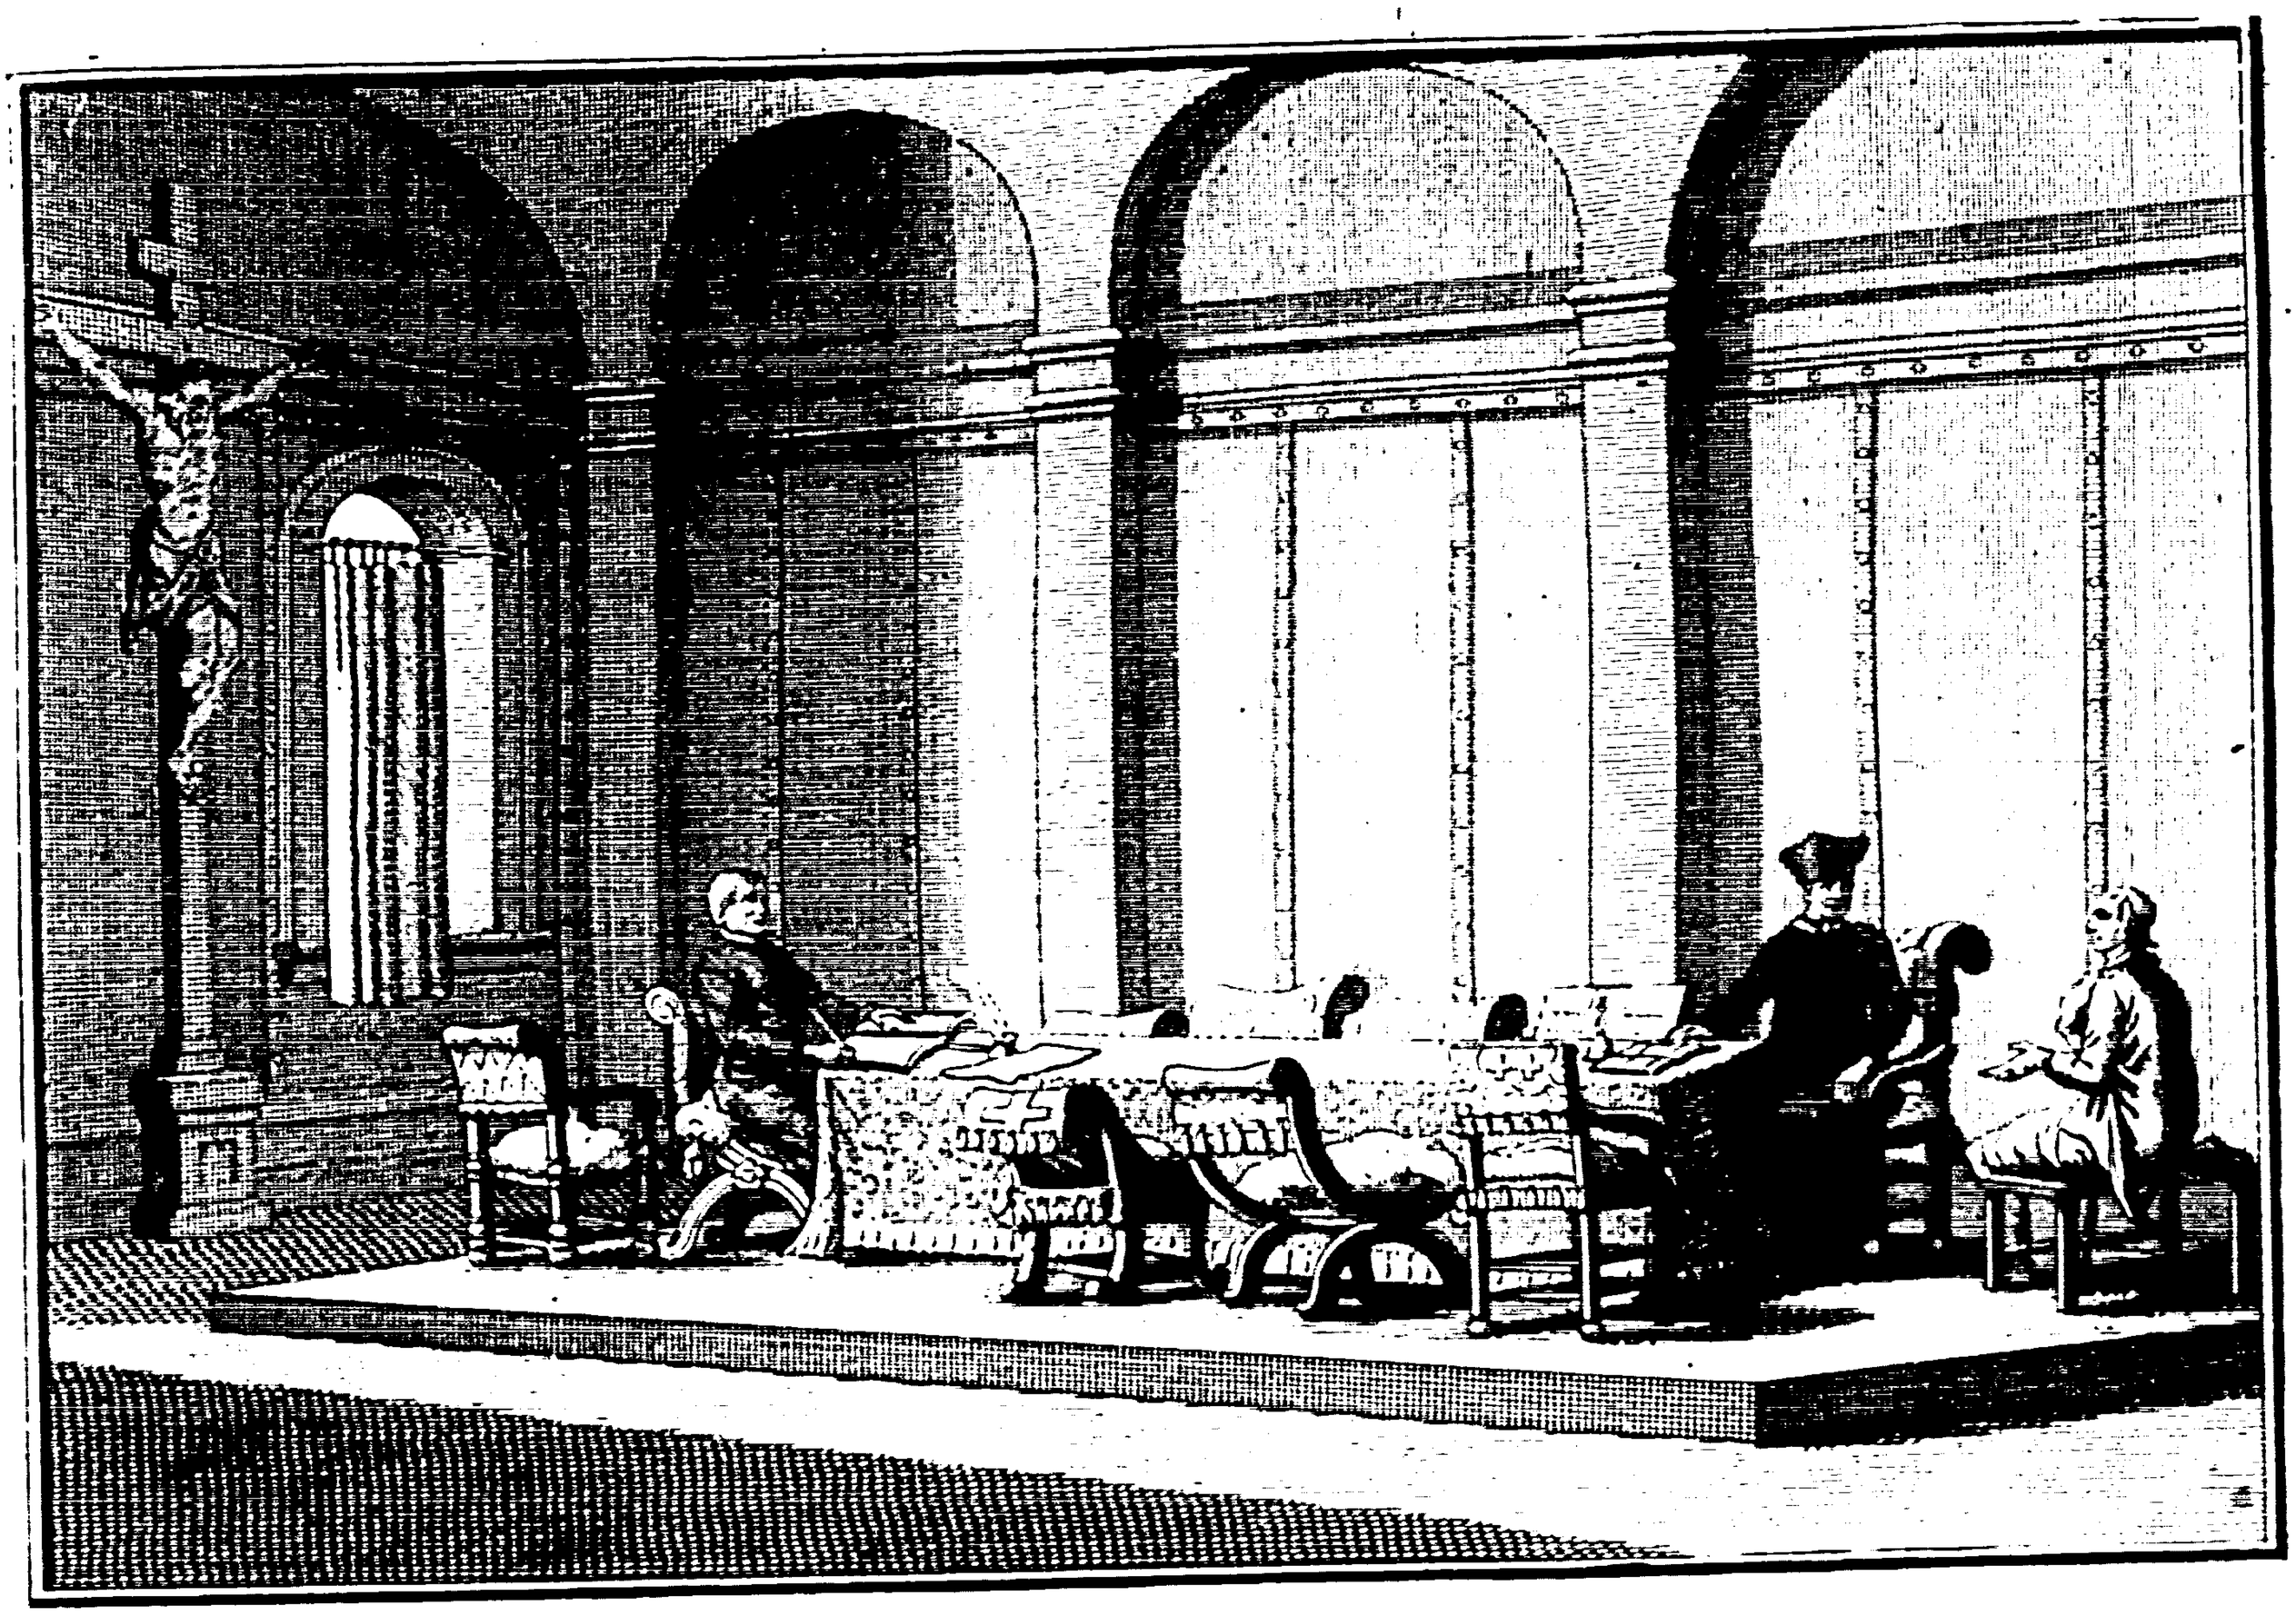
CHAP. IV.



In what manner priſoners are put to the torture in the INQUISITION.

AFTER a priſoner has made his exceptions, and given in his anſwers; if they are not ſatisfactory, or that his crimes be not ſufficiently proved, he is condemned to the torture. Of theſe there are three kinds, all which are extremely ſevere and cruel. The firſt is that of the rope, the ſecond that of water, and the third that of fire.

In the torture with the rope, the priſoner has his hands bound behind him with a rope; after which he is raiſed from the ground to the top of the cieling by means of a pulley; when, letting him hang for ſome time in this manner, they let him fall within half a foot of the ground, but with ſuch ſudden jerks as put all his limbs out of joint, and force him to cry out in a moſt dreadful manner. In this manner he is tortured for an hour, and ſometimes more, according as the inquiſitors, who are preſent, think proper; or the vigour and ſtrength of the unhappy ſufferer.

But if this kind of torture does not prevail, they then have recourſe to that of water, which is done in this manner: They force the priſoner to ſwallow down a great quantity of water; after which he is laid along a form or bench that has a cavity in it, which ſhuts up, and ſqueezes at pleaſure. A ſtick or piece of wood runs croſs this bench, which keeps the priſoner's body ſuſpended, as it were, and breaking his back bone, puts him to incredible pain.

But the moſt rigorous torture is that of fire: For a great fire being lighted, the ſoles of the priſoner's feet are rubbed with bacon, or ſome other unctuous or combuſtible ſubſtance; which being done, he is laid on the ground with his feet turned towards the fire, and is held down in that poſture, till ſuch time as he has confeſſed all the inqui-inquiſitors deſire to know. The two laſt mentioned kinds of torture continue, as the firſt, for the ſpace of an hour, and ſometimes more.

When therefore a priſoner is condemned to the torture, he is carried to the place appointed for that purpoſe, which is called the place of torments. This is a ſubterraneous cavern, to which one goes down by a numberleſs multitude of turnings and windings, in order to prevent the dreadful cries of thoſe miſerable wretches from being heard. In this place there are ſeats only for the inquiſitors, who are always preſent when any one is put to the torture, and for the biſhop of the place, or his great vicar, or his deputy. It has no other light than that of two torches, which burn but faintly, but ſtrong enough to let the priſoner ſee the inſtruments with which he is to be tortured, and one, two, or more executioners. Theſe executioners wear a habit very much like that of penitents, i. e. thoſe who do penance, being a long robe made of black buckram; their heads and faces are covered with a kind of black cowl, having holes in it at the eyes, noſe, and mouth.

Immediately the priſoner is ſeized by one of theſe ſpectres, who ſtrips him ſtark naked, the pudenda excepted. The inquiſitors, before he is put to the torture, ſtrongly exhort him to confeſs the crime whereof he is accuſed. But if theſe prove ineffectual, and he perſiſts in proteſting his innocence, he is put to the torture to which he had been condemned in one of the three manners above-mentioned. This is ſometimes ſo violent, that it reduces the ſufferer almoſt to his laſt gaſp; on which occaſion they ſend for the phyſician of the inquiſition, to know whether it will be poſſible for him to bear up any longer under it.

After that, by the violence of the torments, they have forced from the priſoner's own mouth all they deſired to know, i. e. things whereof he is wholly innocent, and others of which he is guilty, they yet do not ſtop here; for he muſt be put a ſecond time to the torture, in order to force him to declare the motives which had induced him to commit the crimes whereof he owns himſelf guilty. As for inſtance: In caſe a man has married two wives, or a wife two husbands; or a monk, or nun, have entred into the marriage-ſtate after their taking the habit; thus after a criminal has, by the violence of the torture, owned himſelf guilty of ſome crime, tho it appear never ſo evident that he was excited to the commiſſion of them, from a deſire of gratifying ſome violent paſſion, or out of intereſt, he yet is put to the torture a ſecond time, in order to make him confeſs whether he did not believe marriage to be a ſacrament; whether vows are not binding; or, that it is not poſſible to lead a life of perfect continence. Thus after the unhappy wretch, who generally is more actuated upon from the violence of the torture than reaſon, has confeſſed more than he really knows, he is forced to ſubmit to the torture a third time, to force him to reveal his accomplices, or thoſe who had either aided or aſſiſted him in his crimes.

Thus, after they have extorted from him all they deſire to know, the only conſolation the poor wretch receives, is to be carried back to thoſe horrible dungeons we before deſcribed; where he is left in prey to his deſpair, and all the gloomy reflections that may ariſe from the pain which the torments may have left behind them.

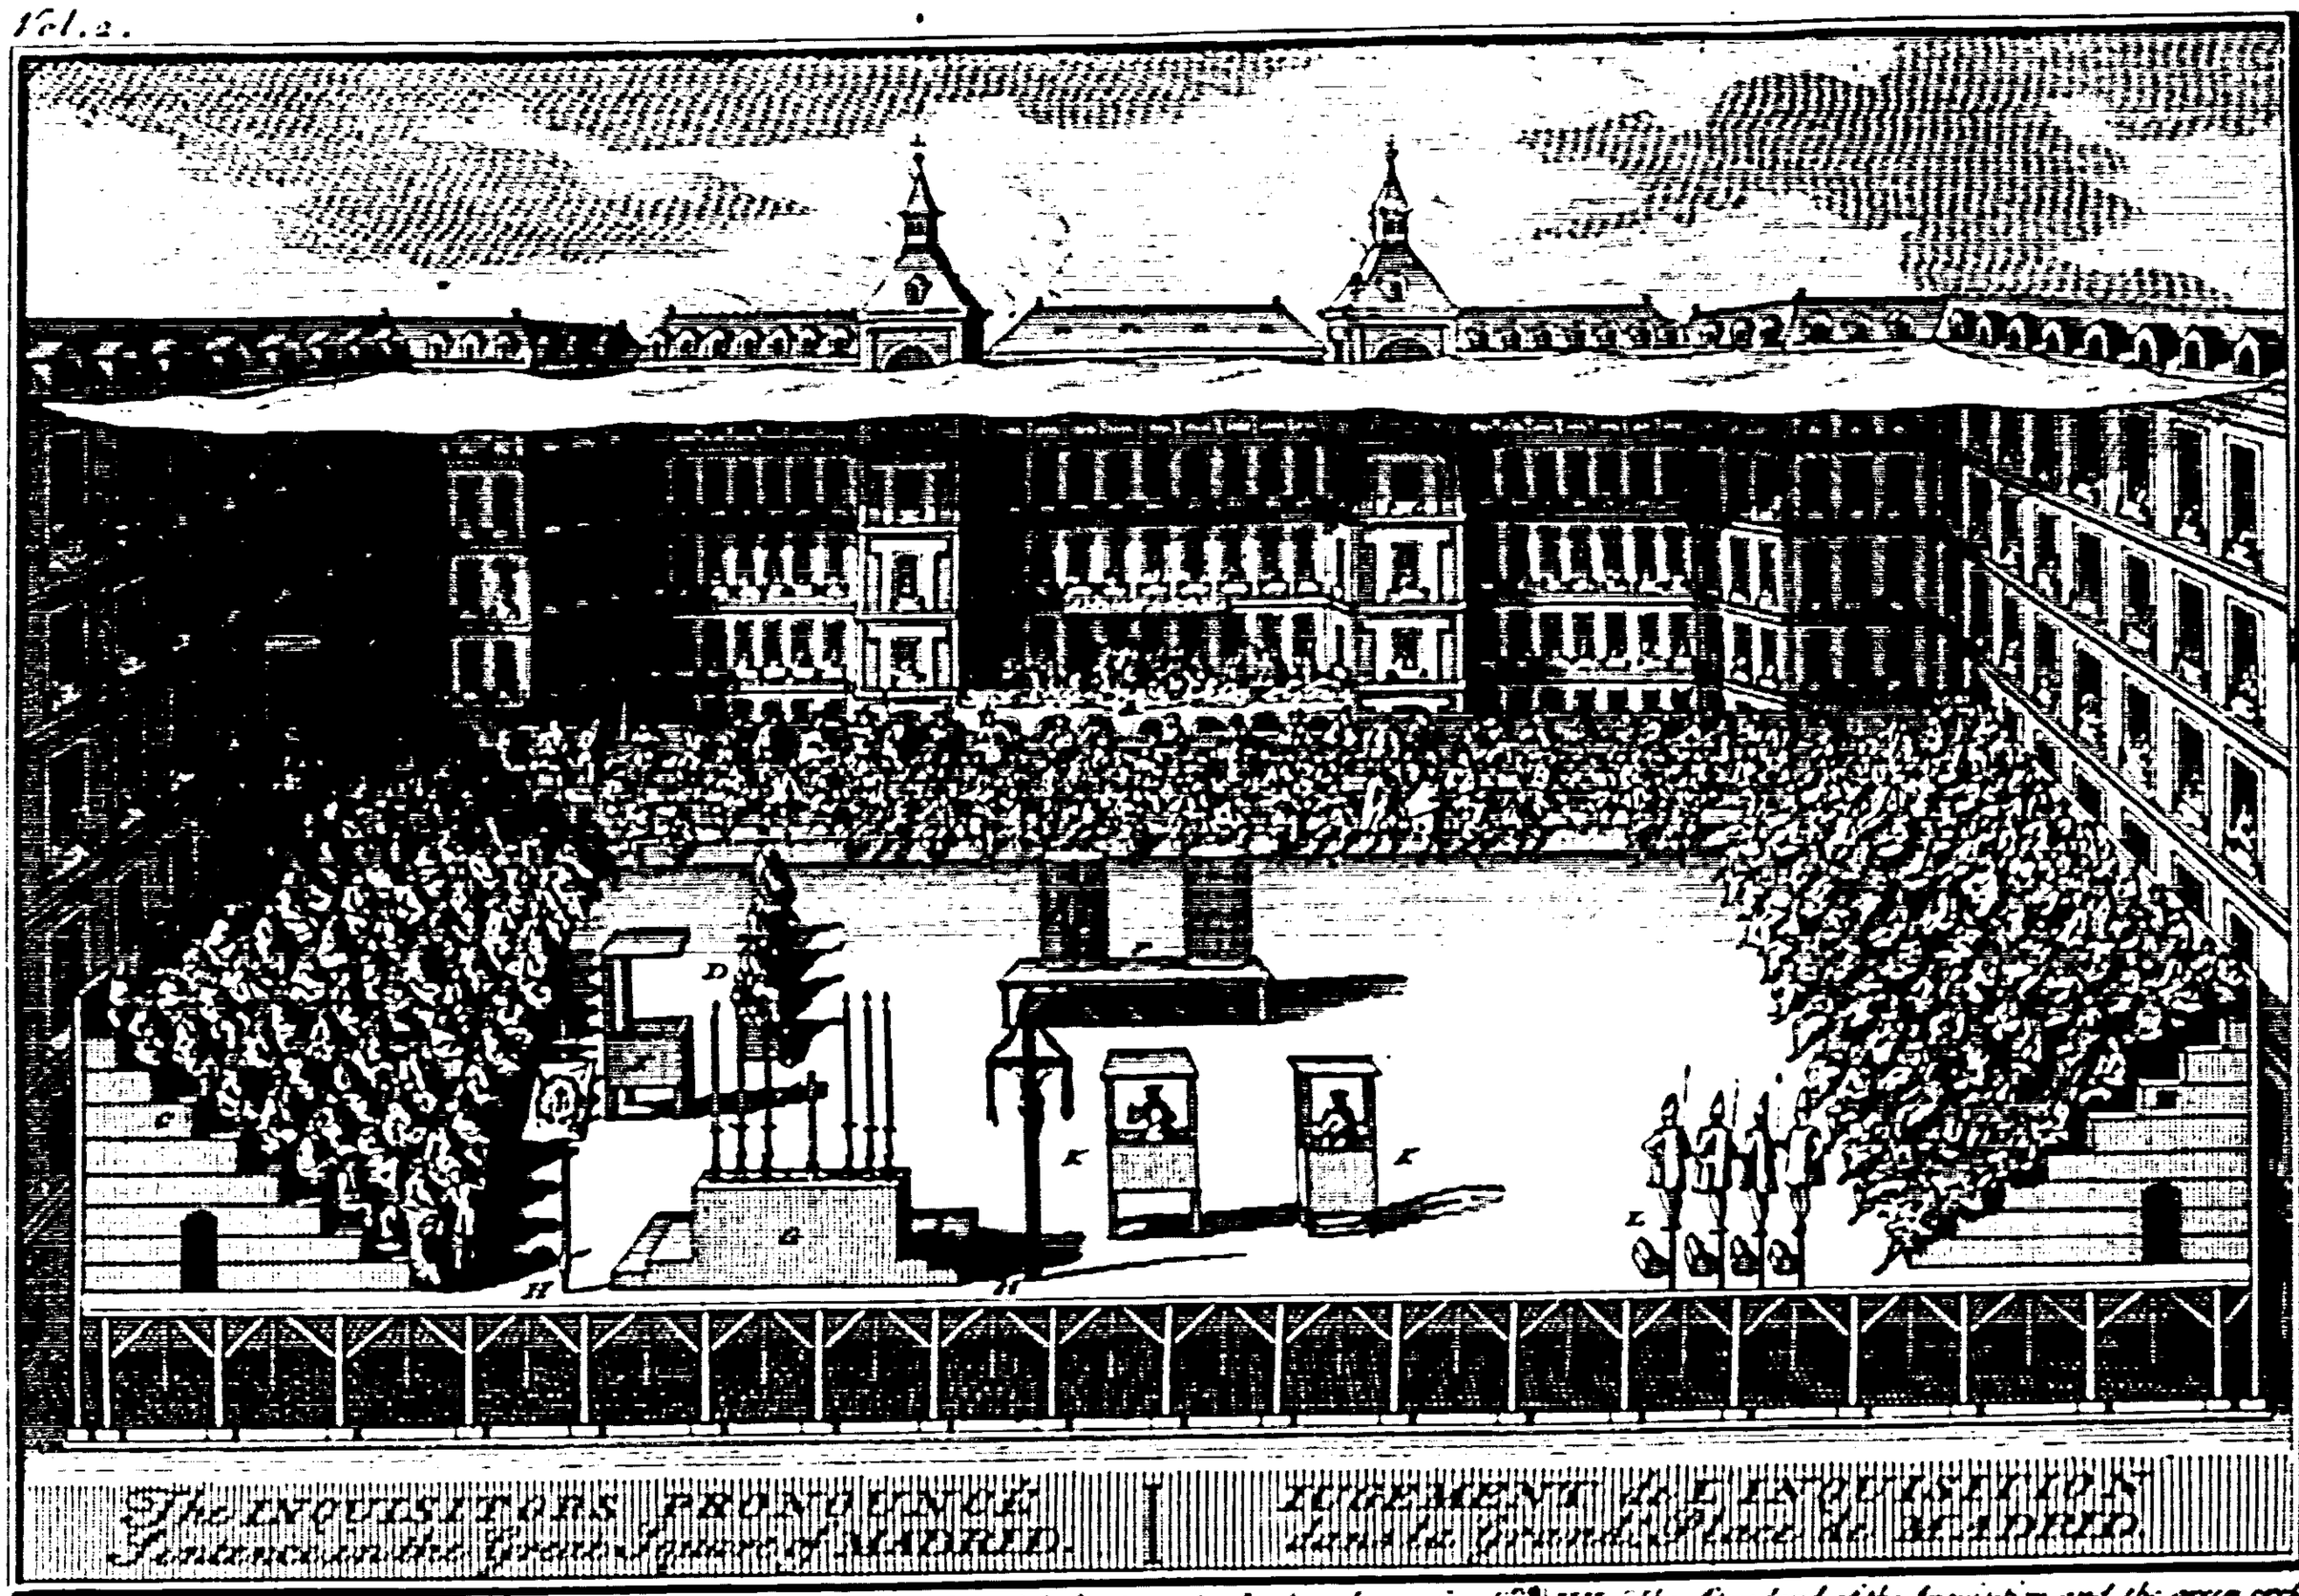
But in caſe the violence of theſe tortures cannot extort any confeſſion, he is carried back to priſon, when the inquiſitors have recourſe to artifices and ſnares. Accordingly, ſeveral fellows ſuborned for that purpoſe are ſent to him, who under a pretence of comforting and aſſiſting him, or telling him that they are priſoners and criminals as well as himſelf, theſe miſcreants exclaim againſt the inquiſition, affirming it to be an inſupportable tyranny, and the greateſt ſcourge that ever God afflicted mankind with; and by this means draw him into the ſnare, which is ſo much the more unavoidable, as it is very difficult for a perſon in diſtreſs, to guard againſt pretended friendſhip or compaſſion, when masked with the appearance of ſincerity.

The inquiſitors themſelves ſecond theſe inhuman artifices to the utmoſt of their power, by adminiſtring conſolation to the unhappy priſoner, and pretending to be touched with his misfortunes; that they don't intend his ruin, but converſion; and that the ſmalleſt confeſſion to them in private, which at the ſame time they promiſe never to reveal, would ſecure him from any torture, and reſtore him to his liberty.

The reſult of all this is, that in caſe the priſoner ſtands convicted either by the ſentence of the inquiſitors, by the depoſitions made againſt him, or by his own confeſſion, he is condemned purſuant to the heinouſneſs of his guilt, either to death, to perpetual impriſonment, to the gallies, to be whipped, or ſome ſuch puniſhment.

But when the inquiſitors are reſolved to put him to a cruel and ignominious death, the ſooner he ſuffers it the better, ſince the ſeveral moments which paſs between condemnation and execution, are ſo many deaths; which tho it be only in imagination, is yet not leſs ſevere upon that account: and for this reaſon the moſt ſevere tribunals have always taken care to make the time between the condemnation and execution as ſhort as poſſible.

But this indulgence, how weak ſoever it may be in its own nature, is yet never practiſed in the inquiſition, and the execution ſhall often be ſuſpended a year or more, after ſentence of condemnation has paſſed; and the reaſon of this cruelty, is, that by putting to death a great number of criminals at the ſame time, the execution may be the more dreadful, and conſequently a greater example. The ſight of ſo many criminals condemned in this manner to die, without any regard to age, ſex or quality, is thought to confirm the people in the Roman catholick religion; and the inhabitants of thoſe countries where the inquiſition prevails, are perſuaded, that this alone has prevented the ſpreading of thoſe hereſies among them, at a time when they infected all other parts of Europe. This is one reaſon why that tribunal is called the holy office, and has obtained ſo unbounded an authority in all thoſe countries where it is eſtabliſhed.



CHAP. V.

The ceremonies uſed in executing the ſentences of the tribunals of the INQUISITION; extracted from a narrative publiſhed at Madrid the 30*th of* May 1680, and executed the 29*th of* June of the ſaid Year; printed at Paris, au bureau d'Adreſſe, the 22*d of* Auguſt 1680.

THE general acts of the inquiſition, which in all other countries are conſidered only as a mere execution of criminals, are, in the places where it is eſtabliſhed, looked upon as a religious ceremony, in which they pretend the moſt illuſtrious and publick proofs of a religious zeal are given; and are therefore called acts of faith. Theſe are generally exhibited in Spain at the acceſſion of their monarchs to the throne, at their coming to age, upon their marriage, or at the birth of a ſucceſſor to the crown; in order to give them a more ſolemn air. The laſt was ſolemnized the year his catholick majeſty Charles II. was married, before which there had not been one ever ſince the year 1632, viz. in the beginning of the reign of Philip IV.

The PROCESSION of the INQUISITION at GOA.

La PROCESSION de L'INQUISITION à GOA.

C. Du Bosc. sc.

But as there are always perſons condemned from time to time, we thence may judge how many years theſe unhappy wretches ſpend in the moſt miſerable manner before their execution. And as the ceremonies practiſed on theſe occaſions are pretty near the ſame in all places, I ſhall therefore relate only thoſe of the laſt act or general execution of the inquiſition, the year that Charles II. of Spain was married.

A month before the general execution, the officers of the inquiſition, preceded by their ſtandard, rode with great ſolemnity from the palace of the holy office to the open ſquare, where, in preſence of a numberleſs multitude of people therein aſſembled, they proclaimed, by ſound of trumpet and kettle-drums, that on that day month, an act of faith or general execution of the inquiſition would be exhibited.

As there had not been one for fifty years before, great preparations were made to make theſe ceremonies as ſolemn and magnificent as poſſible.

A ſcaffold fifty foot in length was erected in the large ſquare at Madrid, which was raiſed to the ſame height with the balcony made for the king to ſit in. At the end, and along the whole breadth of this ſcaffold, at the right of the king's balcony, an amphitheatre was raiſed, to which they aſcended by twenty-five or thirty ſteps; and this was appointed for the council of the inquiſition, and the other councils of Spain. Above theſe ſteps, and under a canopy, the great inquiſitor's roſtrum was placed, that was raiſed much higher than the king's balcony. At the left of the ſcaffold and the balcony, a ſecond amphitheatre was raiſed of the ſame extent with the former, for the criminals to ſtand in.

In the midſt of the great ſcaffold, another very ſmall one was built, in the ſhape of a long ſquare, which ſupported two little places made like cages, and open at top, wherein the priſoners were to be placed while ſentence was pronounced upon them.

Three pulpits were alſo erected on the great ſcaffold, two whereof were for the relaters, or thoſe who read the ſentence, and the third for a preacher; and, laſtly, an altar was raiſed not far from the amphitheatre, where the ſeveral councils ſat.

The ſeats on which their catholick majeſties ſat, were ranged in ſuch a manner, that the queen was at the king's left hand; and at the right of the queen-mother. The reſt of the whole length of the balcony on each ſide, was filled with the ladies of honour of both the queens. Balconies were likewiſe erected for the ambaſſadors, the lords and ladies of the court, and ſcaffolds for the people.

A month after proclamation had been made of the act of faith, the ceremony opened with a proceſſion, which proceeded from St. Mary's church in the following order. The march was preceded by a hundred coal-merchants, all armed with pikes and muskets; theſe people furniſhing the wood with which the criminals are burnt. They were followed by Dominicans, before whom a white croſs was carried. Then came the duke of Medina-Celi, carrying the ſtandard of the inquiſition, a privilege hereditary in his family. This ſtandard is of red damask, on one ſide of which is repreſented a drawn ſword in a crown of laurels, and the arms of Spain on the other.

Afterwards was brought forward a green croſs cover'd with black crape, which was followed by ſeveral grandees and other perſons of quality, familiars of the inquiſition, with clokes powder'd with white and black croſſes, edg'd with gold wire. The march was cloſed by fifty halbardiers, or guards belonging to the inquiſition, clothed with black and white garments, and commanded by the marquiſs of Pouar, hereditary protector of the inquiſition in the kingdom of Toledo.

The proceſſion having marched in this order before the palace, proceeded afterwards to the ſquare, when the ſtandard and the green croſs were placed on the ſcaffold, where none but the Dominicans ſtayed, the reſt being retired. Theſe friars ſpent part of the night in ſinging of pſalms, and ſeveral maſſes were celebrated on the altar from day-break to ſix in the morning.

An

An hour after the king and queen of Spain, the queen-mother, and all the ladies appeared in the balconies.

At eight a-clock the proceſſion began in like manner as the day before, with the company of coal-merchants, who placed themſelves on the left of the king's balcony, his guards ſtanding on his right. Afterwards came thirty men carrying images made of paſte-board as big as the life. Some of theſe repreſented thoſe who were dead in priſon, whoſe bones were alſo brought in trunks, with flames painted round them; and the reſt of the figures repreſented thoſe, who having eſcaped out of the hands of the inquiſition were outlawed. Theſe figures were placed at one end of the amphitheatre.

After theſe came twelve men and women with ropes about their necks, and torches in their hands, with carocas's or paſte-board caps three foot high, on which their crimes were either written or repreſented in different manners.

Theſe were followed by fifty others, having torches alſo in their hands, and clothed with a yellow ſan-benito, or great-coat without ſleeves, with a large St. Andrew's croſs of a red colour, before and behind. Theſe were Jews, who, (this being the firſt time of their impriſonment) had repented of their crimes; theſe are uſually condemned either to ſome years impriſonment, or to wear the ſan-benito; each criminal of the two orders were led by two familiars of the inquiſition.

Next came twenty Jews of both ſexes, who had relapſed thrice into their former errors, and were condemned to the flames. Thoſe who had given ſome tokens of repentance were to be ſtrangled before they were burnt, according to the uſual practice; but the reſt, for having perſiſted obſtinately in their errors, were to be burnt alive. Theſe wore linen ſan-benito's, having devils and flames painted on them, and caps after the ſame manner: five or ſix among them, who were more obſtinate than the reſt, were gagged, to prevent their uttering any blaſphemous tenets.

Such as were condemned to die, were ſurrounded, beſides the two familiars, with four or five monks of different orders, who were preparing them for death as they went along.

Theſe criminals paſſed in the order above-mentioned, under the king of Spain's balcony; and after having walked round the ſcaffold, were placed in the amphitheatre that ſtood to the left, and each of them ſurrounded with the familiars and monks who had attended upon them. Some of the grandees who were familiars, ſeated themſelves on two benches which had been prepared for them at the loweſt part of the other amphitheatre.

The clergy of St. Martin's pariſh coming forwards, placed themſelves near the altar; the officers of the ſupreme councils of the inquiſition, the inquiſitors, the qualificators, the officers of all the other councils, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction both ſecular and regular, all of them on horſe-back, with great ſolemnity arrived afterwards, and placed themſelves on the amphitheatre towards the right hand, on both ſides the roſtrum, in which the grand inquiſitor was to ſeat himſelf. He himſelf came laſt of all, in a purple habit, accompanied by the preſident of the council of Caſtile; when being ſeated in his place the preſident withdrew.

Then they began to celebrate maſs, in the midſt of which the prieſt who officiated went down from the altar, and ſeated himſelf in a chair which had been placed for him. The grand inquiſitor came down from his ſeat, and having put on his cope, and ſet the mitre on his head, after having ſaluted the altar, he advanced towards the king's balcony; he there went up the ſteps that ſtood at the end of the amphitheatre, together with certain officers of the inquiſition who carried thither the croſs, the goſpels, and a book containing the oath by which the kings of Spain oblige themſelves to protect the catholick faith, to extirpate hereſies, and to ſupport all the proſecutions of the inquiſition to the utmoſt of their power.

The king of Spain ſtanding up and bareheaded, having on one ſide of him a grandee of Spain holding the royal ſword with the point upward, ſwore to obſerve the oath which a counſellor of the royal council and that of the inquiſition, had juſt before read. He continued in this poſture till ſuch time as the grand inquiſitor was returned back to his ſeat, where he took off his pontifical veſtments.

Then one of the ſecretaries of the inquiſition aſcended a pulpit appointed for that purpoſe, and read an oath in the ſame tenor, which he adminiſtred to the ſeveral councils and the whole aſſembly; after which a Dominican went up into the ſame, and preached a ſermon ſtuffed with praiſes of the inquiſition, and againſt hereſy.

About twelve a-clock they began to read the ſentences of the condemned criminals: that of the criminals who had died in priſon, or were outlawed, was firſt read. Their figures in paſteboard were carried up on the little ſcaffold, and put into the cages; then they went on to read the ſentence to each criminal, who thereupon were put into the ſaid cages one by one, in order for all men to know them.

Of theſe twenty perſons who had been condemned to the flames, ſix men and two women could never be prevailed with to confeſs, or repent of their errors. A young woman was remanded back to priſon, becauſe ſhe had always made the utmoſt proteſtations of her innocence, and that they thought proper to re-examine her proſecution.

Laſtly, they read the ſentences which had been pronounced againſt thoſe who were convicted of bigamy, of witchcraft, of having profaned holy things, and of ſeveral other crimes, as likewiſe againſt the penitent Jews: all which laſted till nine at night.

After this they finiſhed the celebration of the maſs, and the grand inquiſitor, clothed in his pontifical veſtments, pronounced a ſolemn abſolution to all who ſhould repent. Then the king being withdrawn, the criminals who had been condemned to be burnt, were delivered over to the ſecular arm, and being mounted upon aſſes were carried in this manner thro the gate called Foncaral. At three hundred paces diſtance from it, they were executed after midnight: thoſe who perſiſted obſtinately in their errors were burnt alive; but ſuch as repented were ſtrangled before they were thrown into the fire. Thoſe who had been ſentenced to be whipt, being alſo mounted on aſſes, were the next day carried up and down the ſtreets; and were whipt thro' all the chief ſtreets and places of moſt publick reſort.

Beſides theſe general executions of the inquiſition, there are ſeveral other private ones yearly about the end of Lent. The inquiſition on theſe occaſions are accompanied by the magiſtrates, the officers of juſtice, and thoſe of the king; by the governor, the nobility, the biſhop, and the whole body of the clergy both ſecular and regular; and the whole is performed with almoſt the ſame ceremonies.

There is likewiſe performed about this time every year, i. e. every good-friday, in Spain and Portugal, a ceremony, which, for its ſingularity, the reader will permit me to mention in this place. This is a proceſſion of penitents, compoſed of all the religious orders, both regular and ſecular, of the ſeveral pariſhes of the city, and their fraternities; of all the tribunals and corporations; of the ſeveral bodies and companies of tradeſmen in the city. The players are alſo obliged to aſſiſt at it, and to bear a part with the reſt.

The king is alſo often preſent at it, attended with his whole court, which is very numerous. The penitents walk each with a ſword by his ſide, and a wax taper in his hand. Every nobleman is followed by a great many footmen with torches in their hands. An air of gloom appears in every part of this ceremony; the ſeveral companies of the king's guards have their arms in mourning; and the horſes are led by the grooms of his ſtable. There are alſo men clothed in black, and maſked, holding various muſical inſtruments in their hands, ſuch as trumpets, drums, flutes, &c.

The drums are covered with black, and beat the dead march, as at the death of a general; and the trumpets ſound in mournful notes. The croſſes and banners of the ſeveral pariſhes are alſo covered with black crape. Heavy and cumberſome machines raiſed on ſcaffolds, are drawn along, being painted with figures repreſenting the myſteries of our Saviour's paſſion. At this ſolemnity all the ladies appear at their windows and balconies, dreſſed as on their wedding day, and leaning on rich and ſumptuous carpets. All the penitents or ſelf-ſcourgers of the city, never fail of making a part in this proceſſion. They wear on their heads a long lawn cap, three foot long and ſlop'd like a cone, on which a piece of linen cloth is fixed that falls down before and covers their faces.

It may indeed be ſaid, that ſome of theſe aſſiſt at this devout exerciſe from a true ſpirit of piety; but then great numbers of them do it only to pleaſe their miſtreſſes, which is a new ſpecies of gallantry unknown to other nations. Theſe penitents or ſelf-ſcourgers have white gloves and ſhoes, and wear a waſtcoat, the ſleeves of which are faſtened on with ribbons. One of theſe ribbons is fixed in their caps, or tied to their ſcourges, and of the colour which is moſt pleaſing to their miſtreſſes. They whip themſelves in cadence, with a ſcourge made of whip-cord, at the ends of which are ſmall round pieces of wax, ſtuck full of pointed bits of glaſs. He who ſcourges himſelf with the greateſt courage and dexterity, is look'd upon as the braveſt man; and ſuch as do otherwiſe are hooted by the women, who are ſo uſed to this cruel and bloody ſpectacle, that they cannot forbear breaking out into injurious expreſſions againſt thoſe who do not whip themſelves as ſeverely as they would have them; and theſe penitents have ſo little devotion in them that they generally return the reproaches that are caſt upon them, and even inſult the ſpectators as they paſs along. Whenever they obſerve a fine woman, they are ſo dexterous at ſcourging, that they ſhall make the blood ſpurt juſt upon them; and the ladies who are thus diſtinguiſhed, never fail to thank their gallants for the honour. But they carry the joke much farther when they are got before their miſtreſs's houſes, for then they lay on with ſo much violence and fury, that they almoſt tear the fleſh from their back and ſhoulders; and the lady who ſees this from her balcony, and knows that it is all done for her ſake, is highly pleaſed with it, and is ſure never to forget the favour: Theſe penitents are perſons of all degrees and conditions, from thoſe of the higheſt quality to the meaneſt plebeian; and it is obſerved, that whenever ſuch of them as have been annually uſed to theſe exerciſes, lay them aſide, they ſeldom fail of falling ſick. Some of theſe penitents practiſe auſterities of a much more ſevere nature than thoſe above-mentioned. Theſe go barefooted, and have a mat tied on tight about them, which covers their arms, and part of their body to the waſte. Some of theſe draw after them a croſs of a prodigious weight; others carry drawn ſwords fixed in the back and arms, which make very deep wounds every time they happen to ſtumble. Others being ſtript to their ſhirts, have themſelves tied to a croſs, at the church-doors, where they break out into long and doleful lamentations. The perſons who practice theſe auſterities are always maſked, as are the ſervants who attend upon them, and who ſupport them in the proceſſion, during which they often meet with ſweetmeats and other refreſhments. However, whether theſe penitents or ſelf-ſcourgers whip themſelves from a ſpirit of penance or mere gallantry, 'tis certain that theſe mortifications are the death of a great many of them every year *.

But to return to the inquiſition: Notwithſtanding theſe proceſſions and dreadful executions, the priſons are but very little thinn'd of its tenants, but are ſtill ſtock'd with perſons of both ſexes, and of all conditions. Theſe are either ſuch whoſe crimes crimes could not be proved againſt them, or others who do not deſerve corporal or publick chaſtiſements. Theſe, before they are ſuffer'd to go out from the priſons of the inquiſition, are all obliged to abjure de levi or de vehementi, i. e. of a ſlight or ſtrong ſuſpicion of hereſy. Thoſe who after having abjured de vehementi, happen to fall again under the ſame ſuſpicion, are conſidered as perſons relapſed, and are ſure to be put to death. But ſuch as relapſe de levi only, are not liable to be puniſhed capitally, tho they ſhould again relapſe.

In fine, all who abjure, particularly de vehementi, are condemn'd, either to wear the ſan benito, as long as they live, or only for a certain limited time. This is the blackeſt mark of infamy that perſons, or even families, can poſſibly be expoſed to.

Thoſe who have not been quite plunder'd of their eſtates by the inquiſition, employ it, when ever they meet with an opportunity, to redeem themſelves from the neceſſity of wearing ſo ſhameful a habit.

But theſe kind of diſpenſations are ſeldom granted; for, not to mention the great difficulty there is to obtain them, they are purchaſed at an exceſſive rate; and the leaſt misfortunes that can befal a man who falls into the hands of the inquiſition, is the confiſcation of all his goods and chattels; for in the firſt place, they confiſcate all the goods, &c. of thoſe who are condemned to die; and as for the reſt, as their eſtates are ſeized the moment they are impriſoned, the greateſt part of which is conſumed, either by the roguery of the ſequeſtrators, or by fines and confiſcations.

CHAP. VI.

Maxims of the INQUISITION and of the Inquiſitors.

SUCH are the methods of proceeding in the inquiſition. But before we conclude, it may not be improper to take notice of ſome of its principal maxims, by which we ſhall be as well enabled to judge of its ſpirit and conduct, as by any thing we have before related on that head.

'Tis an inviolable maxim with the inquiſitors, That a Heretick muſt never be diſputed with upon religious matters, eſpecially in publick; ſo that they are to be inſtructed by compulſion, and not by arguments. That all who either conceal, or favour, a Heretick, in what manner, or in what methods ſoever, ought to be excommunicated, and cannot be received into the number of penitents, without firſt paſſing thro' the hands of the inquiſition. This tribunal always conſiders ſuch perſons as thoſe who may juſtly be ſuſpected of hereſy, and that too in the ſtrongeſt manner, as tho it were impoſſible to aſſiſt a perſon, and at the ſame time preſerve one's ſelf from their errors. A Heretick, tho abſolved by the pope himſelf, is nevertheleſs ſtill ſubject to the inquiſition, and may be condemned to die. When a Heretick has been once condemned, he muſt never be ſuffered to ſpeak before the people. A Heretick, notwithſtanding he retracts his former errors, muſt yet not be pardoned, becauſe otherwiſe there is no Heretick but would ſave himſelf by a pretended Recantation. The inquiſitors in their examination of a priſoner who is impeached, muſt never interrogate him as tho they were doubtful of his crime, but muſt always ſuppoſe his crime to be matter of fact, and examine him only with reſpect to the circumſtances. In the examination of a Heretick, death muſt always be ſet before his eyes; nor muſt they hope, nor ever attempt to convert him either by ſcripture, or by argument. A promiſe muſt be made him in ambiguous terms, that in caſe he confeſſes his crime, he ſhall be pardon'd; but that they muſt not keep it after he has made a confeſſion.

To

To theſe maxims we may add the following: That the poſſeſſions of a Heretick devolve by right on the inquiſition, in prejudice even of his children, and the reſt of his catholick heirs.

That death does not prevent a criminal from being ſubject to the inquiſition. That he muſt be proſecuted after his death, and be executed in effigie. That a perſon becomes ſuſpected of hereſy, and thereby ſubject to the inquiſition, tho he only happens to advance ſome heretical tenets in a jocoſe way, or may have mimicked the Heretick merely for jeſt ſake. That in matters of hereſy and apoſtacy, there is no pleading preſcription. That no perſon ought to employ friendly advice before he impeaches another to the inquiſition. That no conſideration, either of kindred, alliance, gratitude, tho even for having ſaved a perſon's life, ought to prevent a man from impeaching a criminal who is become ſubject to the inquiſition. That a perſon who is known to have favoured Hereticks, ought after his death to be denied church-burial.

That whoever has advanced any heretical tenets, tho it were thro' ignorance, and without knowing them to be ſo, does nevertheleſs by that means become ſubject to the inquiſition; and that, becauſe it is the duty of every good chriſtian to know whatever has been condemned by the church. That the civil magiſtrate is bound to aſſiſt the inquiſition upon pain of excommunication. That in caſe a magiſtrate, after having been excommunicated for refuſing to aſſiſt the inquiſition, delays to get himſelf abſolved, he ſhall be condemned as a Heretick.

In a word, the inquiſition are perſuaded, that a mental Heretick, who does not reveal his errors, and conſequently hurt no one but himſelf, ought to be impeached to the inquiſition, and be condemned. That one who has relapſed, tho he repent afterwards, ought nevertheleſs to be condemned to die. That a Heretick, who after having abjured his errors, falls afterwards into another hereſy, ought to be conſidered as one relapſed. That a mental Heretick, who was not looked upon as ſuch during his life time, and is not diſcovered to be one till after his death, ought to be condemned and executed in effigie. And that a perſon impeached, who owns that he formerly embraced ſome heretical principle, imagining it to be orthodox, ought nevertheleſs to be put to the torture, in order to ſqueeze out of him, whether his aſſertion be true.

If to all this we add, that the proſecutors and informers are allowed as witneſſes; that they are never named, or diſcovered to the priſoner, in order to incapacitate him from excepting againſt them; that perſons are ſcarce ever confronted; that perjured perſons and miſcreants of the blackeſt character are there received as witneſſes; that wards and minors, at the age of fourteen years, may, without the conſent of their guardians or truſtees, depoſe as witneſſes: if theſe things, I ſay, are conſidered, we ſhall be forced to own, that the inquiſition is the moſt ſevere, the moſt barbarous, and moſt formidable tribunal upon earth.

The inquiſitors themſelves own, that the procedure of the inquiſition is ſuch, that it is ſcarce poſſible but a great number of innocent perſons muſt ſuffer with the guilty; but this does not once give them the leaſt uneaſineſs; for 'tis alſo one of their chief maxims, that it were better to put to death an hundred catholicks of unblemiſh'd reputation, than to let one Heretick eſcape. The following reaſon which they give for it is neither valid nor convincing, viz. that by putting an innocent catholick to death, they only aſcertain him the joys of paradiſe; whereas was an Heretick ſuffered to eſcape, he might deſtroy and infect a great number of ſouls.

Nor are ſuch innocent perſons as are unjuſtly oppreſſed, allowed to complain of the injuſtice that may have been done them: to do this, would be a freſh crime, which the inquiſition would puniſh with ſo much the greater ſeverity, as it would be a means means of caſting a ſtain on its reputation, not to mention that the inquiſitors never allow hemſelves to have been miſtaken in their verdict.

They muſt therefore content themſelves with the conſolation which the directory of the inquiſition gives them in the following words: Let no one ſay he has been unjuſtly condemned, or complain of the eccleſiaſtical judges, or of the judgment of the church; but in caſe he be unjuſtly condemned, let him rejoice that he ſuffers for the ſake of juſtice.

They pretend that this ſad conſolation ought to ſatisfy a man tho he may have been diveſted of all his poſſeſſions, or condemned to the gallies, to baniſhment, to perpetual impriſonment, or even to the moſt cruel and infamous death. It muſt indeed be owned, that what renders it ſomething the more tolerable, is, that the wretched condition to which theſe unhappy perſons are reduced, does not allow them to entertain any other. However, we may juſtly ſuppoſe, that the inquiſitors themſelves would not be ſatisfied with them, tho in occaſions of a leſs cruel nature.

CHAP. VII.

The troubles and difficulties that are met with in the INQUISITION. The inhumanity, injuſtice, and cruelty which this tribunal exerciſes againſt all who are ſubject to it, not excepting their kings.

WE may juſtly ſuppoſe that ſo ſevere a tribunal as that of the inquiſition, forces the people among whom it is eſtabliſhed to live in the utmoſt conſtraint. Mariana, the moſt celebrated Spaniſh hiſtorian, relates, that when it was firſt ſet up in Spain, the inhabitants conſidered the freedom they were deprived of either of ſpeaking or hearing, (becauſe of the ſpies called familiars of the inquiſition, who are diſperſed up and down the cities, the towns, and the countries) as the greateſt ſlavery.

Time, which makes the greateſt evils ſupportable, has not yet been able to make theſe people ſit eaſy under this dreadful tribunal. They look upon thoſe nations with envy who are not ſubject to it; and tho religion is apt to make the ſtrongeſt impreſſion on the mind, 'tis nevertheleſs certain they would give all they are worth in the world to rid themſelves of it.

It muſt be owned, that the preſerving religion pure and unſullied is a great happineſs, and that 'tis as much the concern of politicks as piety, to prevent the growth of all erroneous doctrines from ſpreading. And further, it cannot be denied but that jealouſies, diſtruſts, treacherous actions, and the moſt cruel revenge which is exerciſed under a pretended ſhew of zeal and religion; and the ruin and deſperation of a numberleſs multitude of innocents, are all of them evils which cannot be too much guarded againſt.

It might, however, be ſaid, that theſe would be in ſome meaſure ſupportable (for the moſt holy and moſt uſeful inſtitutions have been ſubject to ſome inconveniencies) if at the ſame time that religion is preſerved from that impurity it might otherwiſe contract, by being incorporated with pernicious opinions; were people but better inſtructed in the faith, and the maxims exhibited in the morality of the goſpel. But experience plainly ſhews, that there are no countries in the world where the inhabitants live more diſſolutely, than thoſe in which the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed; where the people are leſs inſtructed in matters relating to the faith; where more hypocrites are to be found, or where leſs ſincere and ſolid piety, which is the true characteriſtick of a chriſtian, is met with.

It cannot be denied, but that the inquiſition is the occaſion of all theſe evils; ſince 'tis certain, that the dread people are under, leſt ſome word ſhould eſcape them that might be conſtrued in a wrong ſenſe, and which would thereby give an opportunity of impeaching them to the inquiſition; is the reaſon why they never diſcourſe upon any religious topick, nor ever employ their thoughts upon it: and the reaſon of this is, becauſe the connexion between the thoughts and expreſſions is ſo great, that it would inſenſibly engage them to diſcourſe upon it, in caſe they were to beſtow any ſerious reflections on that ſubject.

Another circumſtance that renders the inquiſition ſtill more formidable, is, that whereas in all other countries, princes, and thoſe who by their birth, their character, and the enjoyment of the principal dignities either in church or ſtate, are raiſed above the common level, and therefore exempt from all publick proſecutions; or in caſe they ever are proſecuted, 'tis always done with the utmoſt tenderneſs and circumſpection: this tribunal, on the contrary, in order to render itſelf more formidable, affects to ſpare nobody, and to ſtrike at perſons of the moſt exalted rank, not excepting crown'd heads.

'Tis well known that the inquiſition of Rome, has often condemned cardinals, altho their character is there looked upon to be of ſo ſacred a nature, that 'tis pretended kings themſelves cannot condemn ſuch of their ſubjects to die, as are inveſted with that dignity. But Henry III. having acted otherwiſe with relation to the Cardinal de Guiſe, tho he had the moſt cogent, as well as moſt indiſpenſable reaſons for ſo doing, ſince he might eaſily have convicted him of high-treaſon: nevertheleſs Sixtus V. took an occaſion from hence to excommunicate and depoſe him. We before related how he treated Mark-Anthony de Dominis, tho an archbiſhop and a primate, and the moſt learned man of his age.

The inquiſition of Arragon went much farther; for it had the impudence to arraign don Carlos prince of Vienna, eldeſt ſon of John II. king of Arragon.

But that of Caſtile went ſtill farther; for it attempted to arraign the memory of Charles V. and to condemn his laſt will and teſtament to the flames as heretical, together with all thoſe who had had the greateſt ſhare in his confidence and friendſhip.

As this is an aſtoniſhing incident, the reader will undoubtedly be very well pleaſed to have it at full length; I ſhall therefore give it him on the authority of three writers of great credit, viz. Meſſieurs de Thou, Aubigné, and le Laboureur.

Among the ſeveral reports which had been ſpread concerning the abdication of the emperor Charles V. the moſt ſurprizing was, that the continual correſpondence he had held with the proteſtants of Germany, had inclined him in ſome meaſure to their tenets; and that the motive of his concealing himſelf in that ſolitude, was, in order to enjoy the liberty of ending his days in ſuch exerciſes of piety as agreed with the ſecret diſpoſition of his mind.

It was ſaid, that he could not forgive himſelf for the ill treatment of thoſe brave princes whom he had conquered. Their virtue, which in their diſtreſs tarniſh'd all his laurels, had inſenſibly engaged him to have ſome eſteem for their tenets.

This eſteem manifeſted itſelf by the choice he made of perſons ſuſpected of hereſy for his ſpiritual guides; ſuch as Doctor Caculla, his preacher; of the archbiſhop of Toledo; and, above all, of Conſtantius Pontius biſhop of Dreſſe, and his ghoſtly father.

After his death, the cell in which he died at St. Juſtus, was found hung round with papers written with his own hand, upon the topicks of juſtification and grace, and in terms that differed very little from the notions of the proteſtants.

But

But nothing corroborated this opinion ſo much as his laſt will. He left but very few pious legacies, or foundations for maſſes; and the purport of it differed ſo widely from thoſe made by zealous catholicks, that the inquiſition thought they might juſtly take offence at it.

However they did not dare to diſcover their reſentments till the arrival of Philip II. his ſon, becauſe they were not yet ſufficiently acquainted with his temper, and the ſpirit with which he might be actuated. But this prince having ſignalized his arrival in Spain, by putting all thoſe to death who favoured the new opinions. Thus emboldned, the inquiſitors, by the example he ſet them, firſt fell upon the archbiſhop of Toledo, primate of Spain; Caculla, the emperor's chaplain; and, at laſt, on Conſtantine Pontius, his ghoſtly father.

The king having ſuffer'd all theſe three to be caſt into priſon, the Spaniards looked upon this inſtance of his patience as the higheſt teſtimony of his zeal for religion; but 'twas with horror the reſt of the world ſaw the emperor's confeſſor, in whoſe arms he had reſigned his breath, and who, as it were, had received that great ſoul into his own boſom, delivered up to the moſt cruel and moſt ſhameful of all puniſhments; and that too by the hands of the king his ſon.

And indeed the inquiſitors indicting theſe three great perſonages for having had a hand in the emperor's will, had afterwards the unparallel'd arrogance to condemn both them and the laſt will to the flames.

This ſentence made ſo much noiſe in the world, that the king began to make ſome ſerious reflections on it. At firſt indeed the jealouſy he had of his father's glory, made him take ſome pleaſure in ſeeing his memory thus injured; but afterwards conſidering the conſequences of this inſult, he prevented the execution thereof, by the moſt gentle as well as moſt ſecret methods; in order not to anger the inquiſitors, or any way wound the authority of their tribunal.

Don Carlos, the king's only ſon, did not act with ſo much temper; his reſentment upon that account roſe proportionably to the love he bore to the emperor his grandfather, and the extreme veneration he had for his memory.

As he was too young to know, that the moſt abſolute monarchs have no rights ſo ſacred in the minds of the people as thoſe of religion, he openly blamed the king's weakneſs, and afterwards ſpoke publickly of the arrogance of the inquiſition, with a warmth natural to his youth and intrepid bravery, and to an inſult which was not to be parallel'd in hiſtory. He even threatned to extirpate the inquiſition one day or other, and the agents of ſo cruel a tribunal, that arrogated to itſelf the higheſt titles. This heat, as we ſhall afterward ſee, proved fatal to him; and the inquiſitors were ſo highly offended at it, that nothing would ſatiate their revenge but the death of that generous prince.

However, this mighty quarrel was made up; Caculla was burnt alive, with the paſteboard image of Conſtantine Pontius, who had died ſome days before in priſon. The archbiſhop of Toledo appealed to Rome, and got clear of the inquiſition by large ſums of money and great friends; and this being done, there was no further talk of the emperor's will.

But notwithſtanding that the reſentments of the prince were mitigated by this reconciliation, the inquiſitors were far from being appeaſed. As it is one of their maxims never to forgive, they raiſed ſo much uneaſineſs in the minds of the people, that the king was obliged to ſend him from court, as alſo prince John his brother, and the prince of Parma his nephew, who had joined with prince Carlos in the juſt indignation he had ſhewn againſt the inquiſition.

But the cruel revenge of this tribunal did not ſtop here; for ſome years after, making a handle of the troubles which had happened in the Low-countries, they imputed the compaſſion this prince had ſhewn to theſe unhappy wretches, as a crime.

Religion, according to their uſual cuſtom, was here brought in by head and ſhoulders, and made a part in their reſentments: they ſuppoſed, that as thoſe people were Hereticks, 'twas impoſſible prince Carlos ſhould have formed a deſign of protecting them, without becoming an accomplice in their guilt. In ſhort, they had ſo great an aſcendant over king Philip's mind, as to prevail with this unnatural father to condemn his ſon to die. The only favour they granted him, was the choice of what death he would die. He choſe the hot bath, where the veins of his legs and arms being opened, life went from him by inſenſible degrees.

Michael de Montſerrat, in his treatiſe de * cæna domini, reproaching the Spaniſh inquiſitors, among other crimes, with abuſing the privilege of the holy office to that degree, as to caſt into its priſons all ſuch wives and maidens as refuſed to indulge them in their criminal paſſions; and to have the cruelty (after having carnally abuſed thoſe innocent victims, under a pretence of ſaving them) to condemn them to death, addreſſes himſelf to them as follows: Amas eſſo mal hechores, come ne teneys verguença ni honra, que deſpues de aver gozado las mugeres y donzellas que entran en vueſtro poder, deſpudes de averlas gozado las entregays al fuego: O impios peores que los viejos de Suſanna! "You are worſe than the moſt wicked criminals: are you not aſhamed "to abuſe and ſeduce all ſuch wives and maidens as come into your clutches; and "not contented with this, to condemn them afterwards to the flames! O abominable! "O impious wretches! more wicked than the old lechers who accuſed the chaſte "Suſanna!" We meet with words to the ſame effect in the works of Cypriano de Valera.

Theſe inſtances have ſufficiently manifeſted, that the unjuſt and arbitrary power of the inquiſition is almoſt unlimited: it extends not only over all the ſubjects, not excepting thoſe of the moſt exalted rank, of thoſe princes in whoſe dominions it is eſtabliſhed, but even over the kings themſelves; and the following example will ſuffice to ſhew, to how great a pitch of inſolence this tribunal dared to carry its authority. Under the reign of Philip III. king of Spain, two Cordeliers or Franciſcan friars, either from a deſign of oppoſing the new doctrines, which then were diffuſed in ſeveral parts of chriſtendom, or from other motives, having perhaps proceeded too far in the points controverted between the proteſtants and Roman catholicks; were accuſed by the inquiſitors, with having a deſign to leave their order and habit, and to turn proteſtants, and as ſuch were ſeized and carried to the priſons of the inquiſition; where, after having been tried according to the uſual cuſtom, that is, without being heard in their own defence, they were condemned to be burnt, as being guilty of holding heretical opinions. This affair made a great noiſe in the world, and the people did not think them ſo guilty as the officers of the inquiſition pretended them to be. The day of auto da fè, or act of faith being come, the proceſſion paſſed along before the king's palace at Madrid, as was the uſual cuſtom. The two Cordeliers, as they were going to execution, gave glory to God for enabling them to ſuffer martyrdom for the confeſſion of his goſpel, and ſung pſalms and prayers with ſo loud a voice as reached the king's ears. He was in his balcony, and being melted to compaſſion at the ſight of them, he cried out: Surely thoſe two men are very unhappy, to die for a thing of the truth whereof they are perſuaded. He had no ſooner uttered theſe words, than a familiar haſted and acquainted the inquiſitors with them, who immediately ſent a meſſenger to the king, and declared, that the words he had repeated, having given offence to ſeveral perſons, and to the holy office in particular, it was neceſſary he ſhould expiate this crime by ſome exemplary puniſhment. The king did not at firſt take much notice of it; but the inquiſitor going up to him, told him, in a very ſerious tone, that he muſt abſolutely ſubmit himſelf to ſome puniſhment.

puniſhment. They were a long time conſidering what kind of penance to enjoin the king, when at laſt it was agreed he ſhould ſuffer a porringer of blood to be taken from him, which ſhould be burnt by the hands of the common hangman; and accordingly it was executed in preſence of the great inquiſitor and his officers. This ſtory is related in the Memoirs of the count de Rouſſy, quoted in the picture or hiſtory of the popes, printed at Collen in 1714, page 335.

'Tis plain from theſe dreadful examples, that the inquiſition is a horrid tribunal, and that perſons of the greateſt credit and rank, dread its power as much as the meaneſt of the people. And indeed, when the enemies of Duke Olivarez, (who had as much power and authority in Spain, as cardinal Richelieu in France) had conſpired to deſtroy him, they thought the beſt expedient would be to impeach him to the inquiſition. Notwithſtanding the favour and prodigious credit of the firſt miniſter of ſo formidable a monarchy, they had the impudence to ſeize upon his perſon. Among the great numbers whom he had loaded with riches, and whoſe intereſt was inſeparable from his, not one of them dared to make the leaſt declaration in his favour; inſomuch that this great man died, after having been univerſally abandoned.

CHAP. VIII.

BUT as the inquiſition is ſo rigorous againſt perſons, 'tis no leſs ſevere with reſpect to books, this being one of the principal branches of its authority.

As there are always, among the agents and familiars of this tribunal, a great number of indolent, lazy fellows, the ſame as in monaſteries, whoſe monks are as much devoted to the inquiſition as their own agents, the moment a book is publiſhed, 'tis read and examined; but ever with the prejudices which prevail in thoſe places, and which frequently are received as ſound maxims by all the world beſides. If they diſlike but the moſt trifling circumſtance in a book, the inquiſition has immediate notice of it, where 'tis examined a ſecond time, but ſeldom without being cenſured. They are exceſſive rigorous in this country on the article of books, and they often cenſure them for the moſt trifling circumſtance.

This cenſure may be conſidered under three heads: ſometimes a book is abſolutely condemned to all intents and purpoſes. At other times it is condemned only till ſuch time as it ſhall be corrected. Laſtly, an extract is ſometimes made of the ſeveral propoſitions condemned, all which are expreſly ſtigmatized.

An index or table is publiſhed annually, containing a catalogue of all the books which have been condemned that year. Here all the books are met with which have been cenſured in any of the three manners above-mentioned. This index is afterwards paſted or hung up in the moſt publick places of reſort; after which no perſon is allowed to keep them by him. One of the caſes which ſubjects a perſon to the inquiſition, is either the reading or keeping ſuch pieces by him; and if any man ſhould be found to have one of theſe ſtigmatized books, that alone would bring him into great trouble.

Hence we may judge what treatment the authors of them would meet with, were they to be diſcovered. For this reaſon thoſe people take the utmoſt care not to write any thing that may be obnoxious; or in caſe a man is over-run with the itch of ſcribbling, he never ſuffers any perſon to be privy to it; and a writer who cannot reſiſt the impulſe of his genius, is often obliged, for his own ſecurity, to baniſh himſelf for ever from his own country.

As to the printer or publiſher of ſuſpected books, ſuch an one would think himſelf very happy, could he clear himſelf by a large fine, or the confiſcation of all the copies. But he does not meet with the leaſt favour on theſe occaſions, no compoſition is allowed, and they never leave him till they have completed his ruin. It even often coſts him his liberty, and he ſees himſelf reduced to ſpend a great many years, and ſometimes his whole life in the priſons of the inquiſition.

Nay, they are ſo rigorous in the inquiſition upon the article of books, that they have not even ſpared the fathers of the church. There are ſeveral of theſe extant, printed by the inquiſition, wherein we find whole pages caſtrated, becauſe they contained ſentiments or paſſages different from thoſe which are received in the countries where the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed.

We cannot comprehend what excuſe can be brought for ſo extraordinary a liberty, to give it the ſofteſt name: however we may affirm, that were it to be practiſed in thoſe countries which are not ſubject to the inquiſition, we ſhould thereby ſoon loſe all thoſe proofs of antiquity and tradition ſo uſeful to prove Hereticks guilty of innovations in matters of religion; at leaſt we ſhould have none left but ſuch as might be juſtly ſuſpected. Could it be poſſible for the greateſt enemies of the church to give her a more dangerous wound? Thus zeal when unaſſiſted by knowledge, has frequently an effect quite different from what it propoſed to itſelf.

We muſt own, that as nothing can be of worſe conſequence than the peruſal of ill books; ſo, on the other ſide, to prevent the ſale of ſuch as may corrupt either the faith or morals of people, cannot but be of the utmoſt ſervice.

One of the moſt eſſential duties of all chriſtian princes and magiſtrates, is, to have a watchful eye on theſe things; and ſuch governments as have ſuffered themſelves to be deprived of this branch of their authority, have never perceived the loſs it was to them till it was too late to remedy it.

The commonwealth of Venice is the only republick that has ever had a juſt notion of the importance of this maxim, and has not ſuffered the leaſt diminution of its antient rights. She ſtill aſſerts them with her uſual ſpirit and reſolution; and her miniſters, to this day, enjoy the right of examining whatever books are printed, to prevent their inſtilling any pernicious doctrines. And as for thoſe which were formerly printed, occaſioned by the too great remiſſneſs of the cenſors, ſhe prevents their being reprinted, in order to put a ſtop to the evil.

Spain, for many years, follow'd what is ſtill practiſed at Venice. The right of examining all books written in oppoſition to religion and the ſtate, was lodged in the prince's miniſters, who alſo uſed to cenſure them; but the court of Rome, ever upon the watch to extend the limits of their power, got poſſeſſion of this right in a very artful manner, upon the following occaſion. In the beginning of the laſt century, cardinal Baronius, in order to improve upon all the attempts which had hitherto been made to enlarge the juriſdiction of the court of Rome, writ a letter dated the 13th of June 1605, to Philip III. king of Spain; in which he complained that his miniſters hindered the ſale of the eleventh volume of his annals, in his dominions of Naples and Milan. He advances boldly in his letter, that the pope is the ſole lawful judge of books; and that princes, and their miniſters, have no power to condemn any book that has once had his holineſs's ſanction.

The king of Spain immediately perceived what would be the conſequence of theſe maxims; but as he was unwilling to condemn what his officers had done, who had acted by his orders, or at leaſt agreeable to his intentions: nor did not care to fall out with a cardinal of Baronius's character, (which would inevitably have happened, had he anſwered Baronius's letter) he took a reſolution to take no notice of it; but as his ſilence in ſo important a juncture was not ſufficient, he ſuffered the prohibitions which his miniſters had iſſued out to continue, and be obeyed.

The

The cardinal, vexed at the ill ſucceſs his letter had met with, and joining his particular reſentments to the pretenſions of the court of Rome, which he had engaged himſelf to maintain, tho he thereby endangered the character he had in the world of being an able man, a circumſtance that affected him very much; he yet improved upon the firſt maxims he had publiſhed in the twelve volumes of his annals, printed in the year 1607. He there ſays in expreſs terms, in a diſcourſe written purpoſely on that ſubject, that it was ſcandalous and impious, for the royal judges (princes) to preſume to cenſure ſuch books as had been approved by the pope, and to prohibit all bookſellers in their dominions, to vend them; that this was robbing Peter of thoſe keys which Jeſus Chriſt had given him, viz. that of diſcerning between good and evil; and laſtly, that the only reaſon why the miniſters of Spain had prohibited his book, was, becauſe he therein reproved the unjuſt actions and uſurpations of their ſovereigns.

But if the cardinal got no advantage by this diſcourſe, ſo injurious to the dignity of all Roman catholick kings, princes, and chriſtian magiſtrates, it plainly diſcovered the fiery and paſſionate temper of the court of Rome, who think they may lawfully offend crowned heads, and, under a religious pretext, exclaim againſt their government in the ſharpeſt invectives; while at the ſame time, they will not allow thoſe princes to prevent the ſale of ſuch writings in their own dominions.

But there is no one but ſees the miſchiefs that would enſue, in caſe the approbation which the popes, for their own advantage, indulge to books written purpoſely to invalidate the moſt lawful authority of kings, ſhould oblige ſovereigns to permit the diſpoſing of them in their ſeveral dominions.

Can any thing be poſſibly more unjuſt, than to pretend that a book, in which a king is inſulted with the opprobrious name of uſurper and tyrant, or the memory of his anceſtors defamed, and wherein his ſubjects meet with nothing but arguments in favour of diſobedience and rebellion, ſhould be publickly read and ſold in the territories of ſuch a prince?

However Baronius pretended to all this, who after having written in very harſh terms againſt ſeveral kings of Arragon, and Ferdinand the catholick in particular, in his diſcourſe of the monarchy of Sicily, Volume the eleventh of his eccleſiaſtical annals, thought that Philip III. did him a high injury, in prohibiting the ſale of a work which abounded with calumny and reproaches againſt his predeceſſors and anceſtors; and who, as if all his aſſertions had been juſt, applied to himſelf theſe words of the goſpel, bleſſed are thoſe that ſuffer for righteouſneſs ſake. This conſolation, which was only in his imagination, came very ſeaſonably; for the kings of Spain have always been of opinion, that he merited no other conſolation.

However, as 'tis certain that any work relating to the catholick faith, which has been approved by the pope, cannot be condemned by the laity; ſo, on the other ſide, 'tis equally certain that all ſecular princes and magiſtates may prohibit any hiſtorical or political piece, tho all the prelates in the world had approved it.

As for the expedient propoſed by Baronius, viz. that recourſe ſhould be had to the biſhops, for the ſuppreſſing any work which the miniſters of the prince were apprehenſive would occaſion either diſorder or ſcandal: we have already ſhewn that ſuch a remedy would be worſe than the diſeaſe, ſince it would hereby give the clergy an opportunity of ſetting up for judges in a thouſand things, the cognizance whereof does not any way belong to them.

To this we might add, that a government that had not authority ſufficient in itſelf, to provide for whatſoever might be neceſſary for its well-being, would ſcarce merit the name of a government; or ſuch an one as ſhould be obliged to wait till ſuch time as a remedy ſhould be adminiſtred by thoſe, whoſe intereſt it was to protract the evil; or who even would never provide againſt it, but in ſuch a manner as might beſt advance their own private views, abſtracted from the exigencies of the ſtate, and the particular advantage of the monarch.

For this reaſon a ſovereign ought never to depend upon the diligence and care of others, in affairs wherein the happineſs of ſubjects are concerned, ſince God has given him the authority, and put ſuch methods into his hands as are effectual for performing the ſame. And in fact, he only has a juſt idea of what may be fitting and advantageous to his people, and therefore has no buſineſs to borrow thoſe things from Rome which he has in his own dominions.

This made John de Monluc biſhop of Valentia to ſay, ſpeaking of the wars that had been carried on in France upon a religious account, " that it was very ridiculous, " when the city of Paris was on fire, to wait for the waters of Tyber to extinguiſh it, " when thoſe of the Seine were ready for that purpoſe."

The policy of kings in particular, is directly oppoſite to that of popes; things that are advantageous to the territories of the church, are not ſo for the dominions of another prince; and tho ſuppoſing it were, no one could juſtly maintain, that ſuch a government would be obliged to conform to it: thus a ſet of tenets might be uſeful at Rome, which at Paris, Vienna, Madrid, Venice, and in all other parts of the world, would be of pernicious conſequence. The reaſon of this is, becauſe the views and intereſts of princes are different; conſequently the pope's approbation could not deprive princes of the power of condemning ſuch books as might occaſion any troubles in their reſpective dominions.

Let us now take notice of good books. As the ſtudying of ſuch muſt neceſſarily be extremely uſeful, one cannot be too careful in diſtinguiſhing them from thoſe of a pernicious tendency, nor be too cautious how we condemn them in common with bad ones.

'Tis indeed true, that to be able to pronounce juſtly on their ſeveral merits, a man muſt be endued with learning, penetration, a good taſte, and above all, a certain extent of underſtanding, a circumſtance ſeldom met with, and particularly in thoſe who are any way related to the inquiſition. The ſeveral members of this tribunal have very little notion of learning, and are vaſtly confined in their ideas; a good taſte is quite out of the queſtion; they are wholly ignorant of antiquity; in a word, they judge intirely from the prejudices they have received, whether good or bad; and they boaſt of no other learning than that of ſchool-divinity, or the new canon-law. Whatever does not agree with the lights which theſe two laſt mention'd branches of knowledge are able to give, and which are confined within pretty narrow bounds, is ſure of being diſapproved. What muſt be the fate of a valuable book, when ſuch perſons as theſe are the cenſors of it? Notwithſtanding this, the inquiſition pretends to be judges in every part of literature; but then their cenſure is generally advantageous to the ſale of a book; and if it thereby becomes more ſcarce, 'tis the more valued upon that account.

But of all the countries where the Roman catholick religion is eſtabliſhed, there is none where the cenſure of the inquiſition againſt a book is leſs regarded than in France; nay, the French profeſs openly, that they will never ſubmit to it. A book does not ſell the worſe for having been prohibited by thoſe tyrants, nor do the writers ſuffer in their reputation upon that account.

Four circumſtances contribute to the little regard that is paid to theſe kinds of cenſures. 1. 'Tis ſaid that the inquiſition, not excepting that of Rome, notwithſtanding the empty title it aſſumes of univerſal, has no manner of authority in that kingdom. 2. There are a great number of maxims in France, directly claſhing with thoſe of the inquiſition; and as the French maxims have been often condemned by the inquiſitors, they have accuſtomed themſelves to deſpiſe whatever ſentences they pronounce. 3. The French are certain, that policy, intrigue, and intereſt, are very often often the chief motives that occaſion cenſure. And as the politicks of France do not always agree with thoſe of Rome, this is another motive not to ſubmit to its cenſures. 4. They are perſuaded of the bad taſte that prevails in the inquiſition; and the genius and qualities of the members of it, are not unknown in that kingdom. France, on the contrary, abounds with learned men; the handſome reception they there meet with, and the generous reward that is commonly beſtowed on them, engages perſons of all nations to go thither. A great penetration and a good taſte, ſeem to be ſpread univerſally in France. The French have a value for antiquity, they apply themſelves continually to the ſearch of it; and ſo far are they from caſtrating the fathers in the above-mentioned manner, (an article of the moſt dangerous conſequence,) that they enlarge them daily by new diſcoveries, all which they communicate to the publick, and with ſo much fidelity, that the moſt ſevere and eagle-eyed criticks have not yet been able to contradict them.

The liberty the French enjoy of ſpeaking or publiſhing their thoughts, is as far different from the unbounded licence that prevails in ſome neighbouring countries, as from the tyrannical conſtraint to which perſons ſubordinate to the inquiſition are ſubject. 'Tis a well regulated liberty, which, by the wiſdom and vigilance of the monarch, is kept within ſuch bounds as prevents its being any way prejudicial to the publick. As it is a difficult matter to form the ſame judgment, with qualities of ſo oppoſite a nature, we need not wonder that what is condemned by the inquiſition, is often approved in France; and, on the other ſide, that the French pay ſo little regard to its cenſures.

CONCLUSION.

SUCH was the riſe and progreſs of the inquiſition. Policy had at firſt as great a ſhare in its eſtabliſhment, as a zeal for the preſervation of religion in its purity. As it owes its original to politicks, this has always been its ſupport ſince that time, and raiſed it to that height of power and authority, which make it ſo formidable at this day. The court of Rome conſiders the inquiſition as the maſter-piece of its invention, and the moſt ſubſtantial ſupport of its power both ſpiritual and temporal.

There is nothing it attends to more, than the preſervation of its authority in both and indeed the inquiſition have brought matters to that paſs in thoſe countries that ſubmit to their authority, that tho they offer to ſtretch their prerogative never ſo far, every one favours their pretenſions, or at leaſt no man dares to contradict them. And indeed on theſe occaſions they go what lengths they pleaſe; nothing is able to ſtop them, but all muſt ſubmit; the moſt extravagant maxims are looked upon as indiſputable, and the moſt ill-grounded claims, as juſt ones: hence infallibility with reſpect to actions, the ſuperiority of popes over general councils, his right to all the poſſeſſions of the ſeveral churches in the world, a power of diſpoſing of them at pleaſure, his pretended power over the temporality of ſovereigns, the unwarrantable right which he aſſumes of depoſing them, of abſolving their ſubjects from their oaths of allegiance, and diſpoſing of their dominions to whomſoever he things proper, are all maxims, which if any perſon preſumes to doubt of their validity, in thoſe countries where the inquiſition prevails, they yet dare not oppoſe them, ſince they would thereby expoſe themſelves to the ſevereſt rigours of this dreadful tribunal.

The blind and paſſionate attachment of the inquiſition, for all that concerns the intereſt of the court of Rome; the warmth and eagerneſs with which it ſupports all their pretenſions, and its uninterrupted endeavours to enforce the unlimited authority which the popes arrogate to themſelves; to theſe it owes its prodigious authority and privileges; 'tis this has rendred it ſo formidable, as to be even dreaded by thoſe very princes that have received it in their dominions.

The court of Rome are paſſionately deſirous of having it received in all places that are yet free from it, and would ſpare no pains, had they the leaſt hopes of ſucceeding in ſuch attempts; and indeed, could they once bring this to bear, we might juſtly affirm their buſineſs would be done.

But as the world is perſuaded, that religion is able to ſupport itſelf as it has hitherto done, and ſtill continues to do in many countries, without employing ſuch violent expedients; and that ſo powerful a body as the inquiſition, that has ſo great a number of agents and perſons in its dependance; ſo many maxims which interfere with the rights, and ſo many engagements directly oppoſite to the intereſts of ſovereigns; and which moreover binds the people with the ſtrongeſt and moſt indiſſoluble ties, viz. thoſe of religion and conſcience, would not fail, whenever opportunity offer'd, to interrupt the tranquillity of a government. All theſe things conſidered, 'tis highly probable it will not make a farther progreſs.

To this it may be anſwered, that it were an eaſy matter to preſcribe laws to it, to limit its authority in ſuch a manner, and to take ſuch juſt meaſures as to render it ſerviceable to religion, and at the ſame time incapable of prejudicing the ſtate.

But experience ſhews, that on what condition ſoever it may be received, and whatſoever laws may be preſcribed to it, it at laſt obtains an unlimited power. The court of Rome, whoſe intereſt it is to have it flouriſh, never fails to ſide with it, and are ever ſure to favour the inquiſition, in oppoſition to ſovereign princes: the moſt wiſely eſtabliſhed laws, the due execution whereof is of ſuch mighty conſequence to the peace of kingdoms, are, in the hands of the inquiſition, ſo many inexhauſtible ſources for quarrels and diviſions; and theſe they never fail to make uſe of to curb the authority of ſovereigns.

EXTRACT of a Voyage to Spain, printed at Paris in 1669, relating to the tribunal of the INQUISITION, and the prerogatives of the familiars of the holy office.

THERE are ten tribunals of the inquiſition in Spain, viz. thoſe of Toledo, Granada, Sevil, Corduba, Murcia, Cuença, Le Gronno, Lerena, Vallidolid, and the principal which is at Madrid. Mariana in his 24th book, chap. 17. ſays, that when theſe inquiſitions were firſt eſtabliſhed, they were looked upon by multitudes as very cruel and unjuſt; and D. Fernand del Pulgar, a writer of that age, proves, in his illuſtrious men, that thoſe crimes whereof the inquiſitors had arrogated to themſelves the cognizance, ought not to be puniſhed with death; but as the greateſt part of the Spaniards are very illiterate, and never read either the ſcriptures, or the fathers, and conſequently are uninformed with the true faith, or a ſolid piety, and have only a languid and hypocritical faith, which, according to them, conſiſts wholly in the ceremonies of the church, and in outward worſhip, they give the utmoſt ſcope to their imaginations and irregular paſſions. As the dread of the inquiſition deprives them of all opportunities of inſtructing themſelves fully in their religion, 'tis thereby become a very neceſſary curb to their paſſions; and was the liberty now indulged them, of examining into things, they would imitate the Moors, who turn chriſtians as often as they are ſeiz'd, and return to Mahometiſm the moment they recover their liberty; or in other words, they are no more more able to give a reaſon why they profeſs chriſtianity, than the Moors why they are Mahometans: and it may be juſtly ſaid of theſe people, that the only reaſon of their being Roman catholicks is, becauſe their mothers and nurſes are ſo.

The preſident of the inquiſition is called Inquiſidor-general, and the counſellors Inquiſidores. And as they have nothing elſe to do, but to get information of the wicked lives and principles of perſons, and that every one of theſe inhuman wretches endeavours to make the moſt of his place, they have their ſpies in all places. If they ſpare foreigners, 'tis certain they more than make amends for it, by the cruel uſage of the natives. The methods they employ, and their manner of preparing trials, are directly contrary both to the formalities uſually obſerved in all well regulated governments, and to natural equity, as well as laws both divine and human. When informations have been made againſt any man or woman, (which I will ſuppoſe have not been given credit to, till after they have been confirmed in a moſt authentick manner) they are immediately ſeized; and whereas in all crimes, of what nature ſoever, a priſoner is told what his judges have to lay to his charge, and that a criminal who accuſes himſelf is never believed; here, on the contrary, 'tis expected a priſoner ſhould declare his guilt. And tho he does not accuſe himſelf of any crime, they yet keep him in priſon, nay ſometimes torture him, and put him to death.

As it frequently happens that the witneſſes, who give in their evidence, are prompted to it from a ſpirit of hatred, or ſome private grudge, and that the priſoners might challenge them provided he knew their names, the utmoſt care is taken never to mention them to him, or to have the witneſſes confronted. By this means a man finds himſelf arreſted, accuſed, tortured, condemned and burnt, without being allowed to make his defence.

This cruel treatment extends itſelf even to the children, who are puniſhed for the diſſoluteneſs, or other pretended crimes committed by their parents; for all their goods and chattels are confiſcated, and afterwards ſold for the profit of the inquiſition. Thus by depriving children or others of their lawful inheritances, the inquiſition ſeizes the goods and chattels of whomſoever it pleaſes.

In order to induce the nobility to ſupport theſe horrid proceedings, great privileges have been beſtowed on ſuch of them, as would ſo far degrade themſelves as to become familiars of the inquiſition. The king himſelf is the protector thereof, and aſſumes that title. The buſineſs of theſe familiars is, to aid and aſſiſt in the ſeizing all ſuch perſons as are impeached, and to carry them to priſon; and one remarkable circumſtance in theſe caſes is, that a perſon is neither fetter'd, or any way bound when he is carried either to priſon or execution; but then he is ſurrounded with ſuch a multitude of theſe officious gentlemen, that there is no poſſibility of his eſcaping out of their hands.

And indeed theſe gentlemen who condeſcend to be familiars of the inquiſition, find their account in their cruel employments; for they are allowed to commit the moſt enormous actions: they may kill, aſſaſſinate, debauch, &c. without being once reprimanded for it. In caſe they happen to be proſecuted for any ſuch crime, they either call upon the inquiſition to aſſiſt them, or their cauſe is compromiſed, and immediately the other courts ſtop their proceedings, for fear of offending the holy office.

In this caſe the inquiſitors undertake the proſecution, and immediately the familiar enters himſelf as their priſoner; after which he has the liberty to go wherever he pleaſes, and to act in all things as tho' he were free.

In the mean time the proſecution is ſpun out to a great length, purpoſely that it may be made up. Such as have money and have got into an ugly ſcrape, think themſelves happy to continue ten years, and ſometimes all their lives, priſoners of the inquiſition; when they meet with better treatment than the reſt, and enjoy more liberty. This was the caſe of a gentleman of Corduba, named don Diego de Cabrera

y ſoto Mayor, chevalier del habito de Calatrava or de Santiago, who tho a priſoner of the holy office, was nevertheleſs at the expedition of Elvas under D. Lewis.

Another gentleman, a familiar of the holy office of the above-mentioned city of Corduba, happened to kill a man who had great credit at court, and was related to perſons of the firſt quality. Upon which he withdrew to the priſons of the inquiſition. The inquiſitors were ſollicited ſo ſtrongly againſt him, that they could not help condemning him purſuant to the laws; but the reſt of the gentlemen familiars, getting a horſe ready for him, and a ſum of money, let him privately out of priſon. After this he kept himſelf concealed a long time; the relations of the deceaſed were addreſſed to in his favour; and the affair having been ſpun out for a great many years, was at laſt made up.

Another gentleman of a very good family, was ſeized and impriſoned in the inquiſition de lo Grano, for having diſputed on free-will and grace. He had ſtudied thoſe ſubjects ſo much, that he underſtood them much better than the inquiſitors, who at laſt ſet him at liberty, after having admoniſhed him never to argue any more upon religion, for that otherwiſe he would certainly be reprimanded and puniſhed by the inquiſition. 'Tis certain, that the ſtudy of religion is very much neglected in thoſe countries where the inquiſition prevails, and all their boaſted virtue and goodneſs is but mere hypocriſy; and indeed moſt of thoſe who are impriſoned in the inquiſition are accuſed of being either Moors or Jews; and ſuch as have been convicted, are carried, after ſentence has paſſed upon them, thro' the ſtreets with a carocha upon their heads, which is a kind of cap of a great length, pointed at the top, and made of a red and yellow paper, whence they are called encarocados. The council and the officers of the inquiſition walk firſt with ſlippers on their feet, and are followed by the familiars, having the criminals in the midſt of them. They are carried in this manner to the church of the Dominican friars, where a long ſermon is preached to them: Some of theſe are whipt thro' the ſtreets as Hereticks relapſed; others clothed in a ſan-benito, a kind of ſtole, which they wear about their necks, whence they are called ſan-benitos. The names of all thoſe perſons who have been taken and puniſhed thro'out the year, are written on the walls of the church, and marked with a St. Andrew's croſs; and indeed moſt of the churches are covered with them.

There is likewiſe another tribunal called ſanta cruzada, i. e. of the holy cruſade, which is compoſed of a commiſſioner-general who is preſident thereof, and of ſix counſellors. It was firſt created in 1509, under the pontificate of Julius II. The Cruſade, or the war which the kings of Spain waged againſt the infidels, was made uſe of as a pretence for its eſtabliſhment; and tho the king of Spain is not at war with the Turks or the African powers, he nevertheleſs takes from the revenue of the archbiſhoprick of Toledo, which is very conſiderable, the ſum of fifty thouſand ducats annually, to defray the expences of the gallies which are to be employ'd againſt the infidels, and proportionably from all the other benefices of his kingdom. This council takes an account of all ſubſidies which the pope allows the king to levy on the clergy and laity; and in conſequence thereof, allows them to eat during the whole ſeaſon of Lent, de la groſſura, i. e. the pluck, the entrails, the feet, wings, and that which in French is called abatis, of all thoſe animals whoſe fleſh is generally eaten.

This cuſtom is authorized by a bull of pope Julius, and publiſhed in order to animate the Spaniards againſt the infidels. 'Tis fill'd with indulgences, and is printed annually. It ſells prodigiouſly, every perſon being obliged to buy it for fear of being looked upon as a Jew or a Heretick, which would render him obnoxious to the inquiſition. It is of no value after the year is expired, for which reaſon an incredible number are ſold off, all which goes to the profit of the king, and brings in a very conſiderable revenue. The loweſt price it goes at, is three rials de Vellon, and ſo in proportion to the rank or dignity of the purchaſer.

A bull of the Cruzada granted by pope Calixtus, is alſo ſold in Spain; and Mariana in the 18th chapter of his 22d book, relates after Alonzo de Palencia, that the pope ſent this bull at the time that the Spaniards were engaged in war with the Moors; it was ſaid to be of prodigious ſervice both to the living and the dead. Its virtue conſiſted in this, that whoever gave two hundred marevedis towards carrying on the war in which the Spaniards were then engaged with the Moors, and carried that bull about them; altho they ſhould be ſeized with even a mortal diſtemper; or that their ſpeech ſhould be taken from them, ſo that they could not confeſs their ſins; or, laſtly, tho they were juſt expiring, they yet might be abſolved by the firſt prieſt that ſhould come in their way, and depend upon eſcaping the torments of purgatory.

Relating to the

INQUISITION.

BOOK IV.

Containing the eſtabliſhment of the INQUISITION in the kingdom of Portugal; extracted from Dellon's Voyages.

CHAP. I.

The INQUISITION is introduced into Lisbon, but is oppoſed by Don John. Its re-eſtabliſhment after his death, and his excommunication pronounced by the holy office. His corps is abſolved. Diſpute between the parliament of Lisbon and the officers of the INQUISITION; with the rigours and cruelties of that tribunal.

THE inquiſition was introduced in Portugal under the reign of John III. before 1557, by a certain monk, who, as 'tis pretended, having procured a bull or fictitious brief, managed matters ſo well, that he ſucceeded in the deſign he had formed of eſtabliſhing the formidable tribunal of the holy office in that kingdom. However, his fraud was at laſt detected; and 'tis univerſally agreed that he was condemned to the gallies for life upon that account; which accordingly was executed.

But this did not hinder the inquiſitors from carrying on their proceedings: however, as their maxims and their inflexible ſeverity towards thoſe unhappy people called chriſtianos novos or new chriſtians, ſtruck the candid part of mankind with horror; there were found ſome miniſters at court, who had ſo much probity and humanity, as to repreſent to their ſovereign the great prejudice which accrued to his ſubjects from this unprecedented tribunal, and its frequent and bloody executions.

The king after having juſtly reflected on theſe remonſtrances, procured privately a brief from Rome, by which his holineſs granted a general pardon to all perſons accuſed of judaiſm; with orders to the inquiſitors to ſet open their priſons, and to diſmiſs all ſuch as ſhould be confined in them, without the leaſt exception.

The officers of the inquiſition were obliged to ſubmit to this command; however they ſoon found a pretext to ſet their engines at work again, by which means the priſons of the inquiſition were as much crouded as they had been before the injunction.

The

The duke of Branganza being raiſed to the throne of Portugal by the name of John IV. would, undoubtedly, have aboliſhed the inquiſition in his dominions, had he either enjoy'd a longer or more peaceable reign. This judicious prince was thoroughly ſenſible of the abuſes which were committed under the ſhadow of the inviolable ſecrecy that is obſerved in the holy office: beſides, he knew that the inquiſitors were byaſſed by pride and avarice, inſtead of following the dictates of piety and juſtice; and knowing that of the numberleſs confiſcations which were made by the inquiſition, but a very trifling ſhare came into his treaſure, the overplus being diſtributed among the officers of the inquiſition; he ordered that the goods and chattels of thoſe who ſhould be taken up, ſhould not be confiſcated for the future.

This declaration aſtoniſhed and alarmed the inquiſitors, as it took from them the moſt conſiderable advantages of their employments. This made them have recourſe to every expedient, in order to ſet things upon their former footing; and they play'd their cards ſo well, that they at laſt obtained a brief from the pope unknown to the king; by which his holineſs ordained, that all confiſcations ſhould be made to the benefit of the inquiſition, in the ſame manner as before the king's declaration was publiſhed; upon pain of excommunication to be incurred by all ſuch as ſhould oppoſe the execution of this brief.

The inquiſitors having prevailed thus far, waited in a body upon the king, as he was juſt returning from receiving the paſchal communion; when one of them in the name of the reſt, beſought him to give them leave to read his holineſs's brief before his majeſty, and in preſence of his whole court.

Don John having liſtened to them with great attention, immediately inquired, who was to have the benefit that would ariſe from the ſeveral confiſcations? The anſwer was; himſelf. Since 'tis ſo, replied the king, and that there is no room to doubt but I may diſpoſe of my own in whatever manner I ſhall judge proper; as a teſtimony of my obedience to the pope's orders, and the great reſpect I have for his commands, I conſent that you confiſcate the goods and chattels of thoſe who ſhall be ſeized by order of your tribunal; provided, however, that an exact inventory be taken of ſuch ſeizures: but I declare from this inſtant, that I freely beſtow all ſuch confiſcated effects on the perſons ſo ſeized, and their families; and my will and pleaſure is, that they ſhall be reſtored to them with the utmoſt fidelity and care, to what puniſhment ſoever you may condemn them.

Tho the inquiſitors were enraged at this order, they nevertheleſs were obliged to ſubmit to it; and ſo long as don John reigned, all goods and chattels confiſcated, were either reſtored to the perſons to whom they belonged, or their lawful heirs.

But no ſooner was the king dead, than the heads of the inquiſition repreſented to the queen his widow, that as the late king her conſort, had acted in direct oppoſition to the pope's orders, he had thereby incurred the ſentence of excommunication, with which all ſuch were threatned in the pope's brief, who ſhould oppoſe the execution of it. This princeſs, who was not informed with ſo much reſolution as the king her conſort, was ſo weak as to conſent that the inquiſitors, clothed in their ſacerdotal veſtments, ſhould perform the ceremony of abſolving the dead body of don John from the pretended excommunication; and that too in preſence of don Alphonſo and don Pedro, her ſons.

The reader will eaſily ſuppoſe, that whatever was done by the inquiſitors with regard to the abſolution of the king's body, was but a mere trick, to frighten the grandees of the kingdom and the common people, and to ſupport the authority of the holy office with all its train of terrors: for don John had paid the utmoſt ſubmiſſion to the pope's briefs, and the generous reſolution he had taken while it was read, to remit to his ſubjects all ſuch of their goods and chattels as ſhould be confiſcated to his uſe, as he had really given orders; ſo far from deſerving ſo ignominious a puniſhment as was inflicted inflicted on him after his death, ought rather to have procured him the everlaſting thanks of all his ſubjects; and have made the cruelty of the inquiſitors odious to the whole world.

But the inquiſitors, encouraged by the impunity they met with upon this occaſion, continued to exerciſe their rigours, or rather cruelties, under the reign of don Alphonſo and part of that of don Pedro, in whoſe regency, about anno 1672, one of the churches in Lisbon was robbed. The thieves ſtole away the pyx, and the reſt of the ſacred veſſels, and ſcattered the conſecrated wafers up and down.

This horrid ſacrilege was ſcarce known in the morning, but the people flock'd in crouds to the church, and there was ſcarce one of the old chriſtians but were firmly perſuaded that the new chriſtians had committed this execrable action.

The lords of the Relaçam or parliament of Lisbon, immediately iſſued out an order for ſearching the houſes of all ſuch as could be ſuſpected of guilt on this occaſion; and this order was executed with ſo much ſeverity, that they would know where all perſons had been who had lain out of their houſes that night; the reaſons they had to abſent themſelves; and the company they had been in. A numberleſs multitude of people of both ſexes, and of all ages, were ſeized upon the moſt trifling ſuſpicion, inſomuch that the priſons of the parliament were crouded; theſe perſons were examined with the utmoſt ſtrictneſs. However all their care was ineffectual, and they found it impoſſible to diſcover who had perpetrated this horrid action.

But the inquiſitors were very much exaſperated againſt the ſecular judges for taking cognizance of this affair; very luckily for the new chriſtians, who would undoubtedly have ſuffered infinitely more, had the inquiſitors carried on the proſecution.

Such as hated the new chriſtians, made this a freſh handle to raiſe the averſion of the people againſt them, who were before but too much prompted to hate and perſecute them. The diſorder was carried to that height, that ſcarce one of thoſe unhappy perſons dared to appear in publick; nay, 'twas debated in council before the king, whether it would not be proper to baniſh at once all the new chriſtians out of the kingdom.

In this juncture, the inquiſitors, who are the profeſſed perſecutors of all thoſe who are called new chriſtians, ſeemed to have ſuddenly ſuppreſſed their hatred and mock zeal; inſomuch that they, ſo far from voting for their baniſhment, oppoſed it as much as poſſible.

The reaſon they gave for this extraordinary behaviour, which ſurprized every one, was, that they could not in conſcience ſend into foreign countries, where every man lives as he thinks proper, perſons who were weak and unſtable in their faith; who, as they would have no farther curb to keep them in their duty, would ſoon quit the chriſtian profeſſion.

However, all men of ſenſe plainly perceived that the heads of the inquiſition would not have acted in this manner, had they not apprehended their power would have ſunk, in caſe the new chriſtians were drove out of the kingdom; and would thereby have loſt the opportunity of ſatiating their abominable avarice; theſe unhappy wretches being their moſt uſual prey, and almoſt the ſole object of their perſecutions.

Be this as it will, the inquiſitors gained their ends, ſo that there was no farther mention made of the expulſion of the pretended Jews. They ſatisfied themſelves with impriſoning a great number of them daily, and examining them with the utmoſt rigour.

Whilſt the parliament was thus employ'd in ſearching out the wretch who had perpetrated the crime above-mentioned; a thief, one of the old chriſtians, was ſurprized as he was robbing in a village near Lisbon. He was immediately impriſoned in the city; and ſearching him, they found upon him the crucifix of the pyx which had had been ſtolen ſome months before. He was examined about the theft, when the miſerable wretch confeſſed that he only was guilty of it; that he had broke open the pyx, of which he had only kept the crucifix; and that as he had always carried it about him, it had by that means diſcovered him.

This ſacrilegious wretch being thus diſcovered, at a time when 'twas leaſt expected, he was tried, and puniſhed in a manner ſuitable to his guilt. Immediately all the new chriſtians, who had been impriſoned by the parliament upon that account, were releaſed; whereby one would have concluded, that this accident would have ſuſpended for ſome time the perſecution which had been carried on againſt them. But as this incident had almoſt cured the people of the prejudice which they entertained againſt the new chriſtians, and that the averſion they had hitherto bore to them, now diminiſhed; the inquiſitors, who had pretended to act in their favour, when it was debated in council whether they ſhould be baniſhed the kingdom, now finding they had no reaſon to apprehend any thing of that nature, they therefore began to perſecute them more than ever.

Thoſe whom the parliament had ſet at liberty, and declared innocent, were firſt expoſed to the fury of the inquiſitors; inſomuch that theſe unhappy wretches ſeemed to have got out of Scylla into Charybdis.

The cruelty and rigour of the inquiſitors, prompted ſeveral of the prime nobility, as well as many perſons of the greateſt virtue about the court, who were greatly concerned to ſee the new chriſtians perſecuted with ſo high a hand, to make their moſt humble remonſtrances to don Pedro upon that account.

Theſe were chiefly the marquiſſes de Gouca and de Marialva, don Anthonio de Mendoça, then archbiſhop of Lisbon, don Chriſtopher d'Almeida, biſhop of the Martyrs; the lord Ruſſel, biſhop of Portalegro; the marquiſſes of Tavora and de Fontes, count de Villaflor, don Sanches Manoel, and ſeveral other eminent divines and religious of different orders. All theſe repreſented to the king, the irreparable injury which the inquiſitors did to his ſubjects; and told him, that it would inevitably be followed with the utter ruin of the kingdom. The king was ſo ſtruck with the reaſons they gave, that he commanded his ambaſſador at Rome to ſollicit a brief at that court; by which the new chriſtians ſhould have leave granted them, to lay before his holineſs the reaſons they had to complain of the proceedings of the inquiſition. This brief being granted, and notice thereof given to the ſeveral inquiſitions in Portugal, the executions of that tribunal were ſuſpended; and the new chriſtians had leave to appoint counſel to plead in their name, both in Rome and in Portugal, and to pray his holineſs to reduce the formalities of the inquiſition, to the regulations preſcribed by the canon and civil law.

Accordingly, their counſel drew up ſeveral petitions and memorials, which they preſented to his holineſs, praying him to order that the originals of ſome antient proſecutions of perſons who had been condemned to the flames by the inquiſition, ſhould be ſent to Rome, particularly of ſuch as were put to death by the name of negative convicts; in order that as his holineſs would, by the peruſal of theſe inſtruments, be fully convinced of the juſtice of their complaints, he might therefore apply ſuitable remedies.

His holineſs liſtened attentively to their grievances, and was greatly afflicted upon that account: whereupon he immediately gives orders for diſpatching a brief, by which he commanded the inquiſitors, to ſend to him immediately the originals of four antient proſecutions.

The chief inquiſitors plainly ſaw, that in caſe they ſhould be forced to ſend this brief, they would inevitably be expoſed to the greateſt danger; ſince in caſe it ſhould work its effect, their authority would either be loſt, or at leaſt conſiderably impaired.

In this dilemma, they at laſt took the reſolution not to obey the pope's orders: upon which his holineſs, by a new brief, ſuſpended the inquiſitor-general from his employment, and excommunicated the reſt. He likewiſe commanded them to give up the keys of the ſeveral priſons of the inquiſition into the hands of the ordinaries; but this they refuſed: and how urgent ſoever the pope might be in his demands, he was obliged, inſtead of the four copies of proſecutions, to be contented with thoſe which the inquiſitors ſent him; and thoſe were ſuch as they were pleaſed to chuſe out, and as beſt ſuited their purpoſe. However, his holineſs abſolved them, upon their making him this ſlight ſatisfaction; and tho ſome regulations were made, in order to ſoften the rigours of this tribunal, matters have nevertheleſs always continued on the ſame foot. Whatever is here advanced, is more than juſtified by a brief of pope Innocent XI. dated Auguſt 22, 1682.

The methods the inquiſitors made uſe of to divert the ſtorm which threatned them, were firſt to repreſent to his majeſty, that the only motive of the court of Rome's demanding the above-mentioned copies, was to get an opportunity thereby of aſcribing to themſelves the cognizance of matters relating to Portugal; that after the pope had obtained ſo far, as that appeals might be made to him from all affairs relating to the inquiſition; the conſequence would be, that he thenceforwards would alſo take cognizance of all cauſes eccleſiaſtical and even civil; that this procedure of the court of Rome, ſtruck viſibly at the rights and privileges of the crown; and that it was of the utmoſt conſequence, as well as incumbent upon him, if he had any regard to his political character, not to give the pope a handle on this occaſion to infringe in time to come the rights of the ſovereign, who ought to acknowledge no other ſuperior but God himſelf.

Don Pedro, who in the beginning of his reign had been very favourable to the new chriſtians, but was now no longer prompted and ſupported by the advice of thoſe faithful miniſters who had inſpired him with compaſſion and tenderneſs, with regard to thoſe who were oppreſſed by the inquiſition, was now impoſed upon by theſe ſpecious reaſons which the inquiſitors had laid before him; and therefore, ſo far from continuing his indulgence for that party which he had before protected, he ſent freſh injunctions to his embaſſador at Rome, with orders to ſet every engine at work, in order to hinder the court from proceeding on the deſign it had formed, to procure the original of certain proſecutions.

The inquiſitors having obſerved from the very beginning of that affair, that the firſt embaſſador whom the king had nominated to ſue for ſatisfaction at the pope's hands, with regard to the grievances whereof his ſubjects complained, acquitted himſelf very exactly of the commiſſion with which he had been entruſted; were of opinion, that it was abſolutely neceſſary they ſhould either bribe him to their intereſts, or in caſe that fail'd, to get him removed.

Immediately they tried to corrupt that miniſter, but finding their endeavours fruitleſs, they inſinuated to the king that it would be proper to recal him; which having obtained, they procured in his room don Lewis de Souſa, then biſhop of——— afterwards archbiſhop of Braga, immediately after don Veriſſimo d'Alencaſtro had reſigned that eminent dignity for that of inquiſitor-general.

This new embaſſador, who was a creature of the inquiſition, pretended to ſerve his king and his country, but in reality betrayed both; for he ſecretly oppoſed the good reſolution the holy father had taken, of putting a ſtop to the horrid injuſtice of the inquiſition. He either concealed or weakned the reaſons which the new chriſtians alledged; gave notice to the inquiſitors of all that was doing at Rome; and invented artifices, by which they might elude whatever the pope enjoined. In fine, they gave his holineſs to underſtand, that ſuch of the Portugueze who were men of honour and honeſty, were highly offended to find that the ſanctity and integrity of the inquiſition in their proſecutions, ſhould be ſo much as ſuſpected; and that in caſe the court of Rome ſhould inſiſt upon ſeeing the originals of the proſecutions, 'twould tacitly introduce judaiſm in the kingdom of Portugal.

That in caſe the people ſhould mutiny, as there was but too juſt reaſon to believe they would, the king would perhaps be forced to ſeek for ſuch a remedy, as might not be agreeable to the court of Rome; ſince matters might be brought to that paſs, that they ſhould be obliged to create a patriarch in Portugal; eſpecially ſince the difficulty which the pope had ſo long made, of granting his bulls to ſuch biſhops as were named by his majeſty, had already but too much prompted the people to a change in that particular.

The embaſſador, by theſe and ſuch like artifices, quite traverſed the pope's good intentions; who therefore was obliged to remain ſatisfied with two proſecutions, and thoſe ſuch as the inquiſitors themſelves had made choice of, inſtead of four, which his holineſs had deſired; inſomuch that matters, notwithſtanding all the pope's endeavours, have continued upon near the ſame foot they were before.

CHAP. II.

'TIS no eaſy matter to diſcover the proceedings of the inquiſitions in Portugal, or the cruelties which are inflicted on thoſe who are impriſoned in them; in a word, 'tis vaſtly difficult to exhibit the ſeveral circumſtances of it. The inviolable ſecrecy that is obſerved in the holy office, and which indeed is the only ſupport of it, prevents thoſe who are the victims of it, from knowing exactly the ſeveral particulars thereof. However, we ſhall ſincerely inform the reader whatever our own unhappy experience may have taught us in this matter, as well as what may be reaſonably conjectured concerning that tribunal.

We muſt firſt obſerve, that ſuch as have undergone theſe ſad trials, are undoubtedly beſt able to give light into this affair. One may naturally ſuppoſe, that whatever is ſo zealouſly concealed, muſt certainly be of a horrid nature; and that this dreadful ſecrecy which is obſerved, is the greateſt obſtacle to thoſe remedies which might otherwiſe be applied to ſo many evils with which the unhappy wretches are oppreſſed; who being by that means almoſt abſolutely deprived of knowing thoſe methods by which they might procure their releaſe, are ſo dreadfully confuſed, that they are obliged to proceed inceſſantly blindfold, as it were, without being ſcarce ever able to gueſs the real cauſe of their misfortune. We are to obſerve, that perſons are impriſoned on the oaths of one, two, or three witneſſes, who diſagree intirely in their evidence; and who, at the ſame time, bluſh with indignation to think that any credit ſhould be given to their affidavits, ſince they themſelves are priſoners, who have no other method to extricate themſelves, but by accuſing their pretended accomplices: and indeed their depoſitions are ſeldom found to agree.

When a perſon is impeached, and the indictment drawn up againſt him is approved by the inquiſitors, orders are iſſued out for ſeizing him; which being done, he is immediately treated as tho he were found guilty of the crimes which are laid to his charge: ſo that his wife and children, in caſe he has any, are immediately thruſt out of doors; his houſe is ſhut up, and an inventory is taken of all his effects, by which means his family is in an inſtant reduced to beggary.

Tho a perſon happens to be releaſed from the priſons of the inquiſition, he ſeldom recovers any of his effects, or but a trifling part of them. His creditors loſe all their debts; and the royal treaſury has but a very ſmall portion of theſe confiſcations, the inquiſitors having uſurped the right of diſpoſing them as they ſhall think proper; which indeed they generally do to their own profit.

When a man and his wife are ſeized, their children, in caſe they have any, are reduced to ſuch a deplorable condition, that thoſe of not above three or four years of age, are ſometimes obliged to beg from door to door, and to ſhelter themſelves in a church-porch, &c. but the moſt melancholy circumſtance is, that 'tis but too common for virtuous young women, of a liberal education, to proſtitute themſelves; forced to it either by neceſſity, or the injurious treatment they meet with upon theſe occaſions. A numberleſs multitude of married women, of the ſtricteſt virtue, have fallen into the ſame guilt, after the impriſonment of their huſbands. There are but too many inſtances to confirm the truth of what is here advanced, in all the towns and cities of the kingdom, which it would be an eaſy matter to name; but humanity obliges us to conceal the names of thoſe afflicted perſons, that we may not be thought to inſult their miſery; nor fill a great number of fathers, mothers, and husbands with confuſion.

When a familiar, who has been appointed by the inquiſitors to ſeize a criminal, has found him, he bids him follow him. All the way they go, the officer does whatever lies in his power to perſuade the priſoner to make an immediate confeſſion of his guilt, in order that he may return to his family, and experience the mercy which the inquiſitors extend (as he ſays) to thoſe who diſcover the ſincerity of their repentance by a ſpeedy and voluntary confeſſion: but that if, on the contrary, he does not accuſe himſelf, he muſt not expect to be releaſed out of priſon till after a very long confinement, and then only to be burnt alive.

The delinquent being come to the inquiſition, is accoſted by the ſecretary, who delivers him up to the goaler, called in Portugueze Alcaide; who, with two followers, carries the priſoner into the moſt retired part of the inquiſition; when they all exhort him a-new to make a ſpeedy confeſſion, in caſe he expects mercy; is deſirous of preſerving his life, and of obtaining his liberty.

This artifice of the officers of the inquiſition, prompts a numberleſs multitude of innocent perſons, to accuſe themſelves of crimes which they never committed.

The priſoner being come in, he is ſearched, and all the gold and ſilver he has about him is taken away, not excepting a medal, or image of our Saviour or of any ſaint. His books, in caſe he has any about him, are alſo taken away: nor will they ſo much as allow a layman to have his prayer-book, or a clergyman his breviary, purely to deprive them of every temporal and ſpiritual conſolation Tho any of theſe unhappy wretches, which is very often the caſe, beg even with tears, to get their prayer, and other holy books reſtored to them, in order to ſooth their affliction by the peruſal of theſe ſpiritual exerciſes; (it not being reaſonable, that as they are deprived of the ſacraments of penance and the Lord's-ſupper, and the conſolation of hearing maſs, they ſhould be denied the innocent ſatisfaction of ſaying their uſual prayers; or that they ſhould be treated like Turks and infidels when they are chriſtians:) the only anſwer they obtain, is, that in theſe priſons no one has occaſion for books; and that ſuch as are confined in them, ought to employ their whole time in examining their conſciences, and revealing their errors. That in caſe a delinquent anſwers, that he acknowledges himſelf to be a grievous ſinner, and deſires a confeſſor * may be ſent for, in order that he may cleanſe his conſcience by the ſacrament of penance; in this caſe no anſwer is made him, and no manner of regard is had to his intreaties: he is never allowed to confeſs himſelf, or to receive the leaſt inſtruction; he is deprived prived of every conſolation, and is not ſuffer'd to hear maſs, or receive the ſacrament, for ſix, eight, or ten years: in a word, he is treated like an infidel, and not like one who was redeemed by the precious blood of Chriſt. 'Tis true indeed, that when a priſoner is dangerouſly ill, he is allowed a confeſſor, after the phyſician has given him over: but then the ghoſtly father ſtays but a ſhort time in the cell, becauſe of its filth and horrid ſtench; beſides as the Alcaide, the turnkeys, and the priſoners, who accompany the ſick perſon, wait at the door; the confeſſor cannot allow half the time that is neceſſary for making a confeſſion ſuitable to the exigencies of the ſick perſon, who frequently has ſpent many years without once approaching the holy table. It ſometimes happens on theſe occaſions, that weak and ignorant perſons confeſs themſelves guilty of ſacrilegious crimes; fearing, that in caſe they accuſe themſelves of having confeſſed crimes they never committed, purely to ſave their lives, that the confeſſor ſhould divulge it to the inquiſitors; and that this ſhould be a prejudice to them in caſe they ſhould recover.

* 'Tis almoſt incredible, that a ſinner ſhall be refuſed a confeſſor when he deſires one, eſpecially before he is convicted or pronounced an heretic; nay, tho he were ſo, ſuch treatment as this is very extraordinary.

I know the reader will naturally ſuppoſe, that 'tis ſcarce poſſible for a priſoner to make a proper confeſſion, ſince he is viſited by the prieſt but once, and that for a very ſhort time: beſides, the ghoſtly father has not the power to abſolve him from thoſe cenſures which 'tis pretended he has incurred, unleſs he be dying; that the ſick priſoner is not allowed a prieſt to aſſiſt him in his dying moments, nor is the crucifix preſented to him to comfort him, and excite him to contrition in his dying moments.

Notwithſtanding that theſe unhappy wretches ſuffer ſuch dreadful hardſhips, yet moſt of them diſcover ſo lively a faith, that they daily draw croſſes with a coal on the walls of the dungeons in which they are confined, and when they are at their laſt gaſp, their companions, as they are not allowed a prieſt, aſſiſt them as well as they can; pray fervently, and ſhed floods of tears; and are continually exhorting them to contrition, and to repeat the holy names of Jeſus and Mary till they expire. But why are not the antient chriſtians, and all the faithful in general, allowed admittance into theſe dreadful priſons upon theſe mournful occaſions? Theſe undoubtedly would edify very much, by the virtue and piety of theſe unfortunate victims of the inquiſitors, and be fully convinced, that the greateſt part of thoſe Perſons in Portugal who are reputed Jews, are, in reality, zealous chriſtians; who, after having led a ſober and religious life, and adhered ſtrictly to the principles of the catholic church, end their days in ſuch a manner, ſuitable to thoſe who call themſelves her dutiful ſons; and have no other motive or reaſon to accuſe themſelves falſly, but merely in order to free themſelves from their miſerable captivity, and eſcape the cruel and infamous death with which they are continually threatned.

It may be proper to obſerve here, that theſe poor ſick creatures who are treated with ſo much inhumanity, are looked upon by the inquiſitors either as Jews or chriſtians. But if they look upon them as Jews, ſhould not chriſtianity prompt them to convince them, if poſſible, of their crimes? But on the other ſide, if they ſuppoſe them chriſtians, does not our Saviour forbid their being abandoned in their laſt moments; or what is worſe than all, to be left to the mercy of three or four Jewiſh fellow-ſufferers, who in all probability will endeavour to corrupt their principles?

How laudable, how great would it be for an inquiſitor, prompted with a truly apoſtolical zeal, to perform the office of a paſtor, by viſiting thoſe gloomy habitations, purely to exhort the priſoners to finiſh their courſe piouſly! Did thoſe officers conduct themſelves in this manner, numbers of thoſe unfortunate creatures would then go to death with the utmoſt reſignation; and in their laſt moments, give the moſt unſuſpicious tokens of a pure and lively faith, and poſſibly by that means lay aſide the prejudice they might have imbibed, ſince death generally ſhews truly what a man is, and is a very unfit ſeaſon for hypocriſy. Poſſibly the inquiſitors may object, object, that as they judge theſe unhappy wretches, it would derogate from their dignity to condeſcend ſo far; but to this it may be anſwered, that the quality of judge does not exclude that of father in an eccleſiaſtick, whoſe ſole aim ought to be the converſion of ſouls, and not the deſtruction of the body: and tho it were to be allowed, that it would not be proper for them to viſit the priſons, yet ſurely they ought to let their priſons be viſited by pious and charitable perſons, and ſuch as are capable of inſtructing, comforting, and ſtrengthning their ſouls in virtue.

CHAP. III.

THE ſecretary of the inquiſition having received the priſoner from the familiars at the gate, he delivers him into the cuſtody of the Alcaide and two turnkeys, who carry him into the dungeon. Here two ſtrong doors are ſhut upon him, when he is confined in a room about twelve foot long, and ten wide. This cell is generally very dark, the light coming in only thro' a very ſmall window at the top of the room. This glimmering light is ſo unchearing to the priſoner, that he ſpends the whole day in wiſhing for night, purely to enjoy the dim light of a ſmall lamp which the inquiſitors allow him. However, the expence of the lamps and the waſhing of their linen, are both deducted from the five pence per day, which is allowed them for their ſubſiſtence.

The reader will excuſe our not giving a particular deſcription of the naſtineſs and ſtench of theſe priſons; however, as it may be proper to give a juſt idea of whatever is done in this place, we ſhall be obliged to enter into a more exact detail. The whole furniture of theſe miſerable dungeons is four earthen pots to make water in, and one larger than the reſt, to eaſe the other neceſſities of nature, all which are emptied but once a-week.

From this circumſtance it may be judg'd how great the ſtench and how unwholeſom theſe places muſt be, as the priſoners are obliged to ſpend week after week in the midſt of ſo much naſtineſs. And indeed the ſtink is ſo horrid, that frequently, eſpecially in ſummer, worms are ſeen crawling up and down the dungeon; and the ſtench is ſo nauſeous, that 'tis next to a miracle how theſe poor wretches can live ſo long in the midſt of it. Hence it is that thoſe priſoners, who go in proceſſion in the acts of faith, are generally ſo pale and wan, that their moſt intimate acquaintance ſcarce know them; they looking like ſo many dead bodies that are made to move with ſprings, rather than living creatures. In each of theſe dungeons is a bed, that fills half the cell, on which the priſoners lie; and theſe cells are ſo exceſſively moiſt, that their mats and mattreſſes are ſoon rotted. Four or five perſons, and ſometimes more, are generally confined together in one of them, in which caſe ſuch of them as cannot lie upon the bed, (it being not large enough to hold them all) are forced to ſtretch themſelves upon the bare boards in the midſt of the filth. How terrible muſt it be for five perſons to be coop'd up in ſo ſmall a place, in the midſt of ſo many veſſels full of naſtineſs; for the inquiſitors ſcarce allow the living ſo much ground to lie upon, as are indulged the dead for their graves.

We have now deſcribed the dungeons of the priſons of Coimbra and Evora; for thoſe of Lisbon are a little larger, and not ſo dark.

Sometimes there is but one priſoner in a cell, which is crouded according to the number of the priſoners, or the time ſince the ſolemnizing the act of faith. One can-cannot ſay whether the priſoners are happier in having company, or in being alone. If they are alone, their ſolitude is dreadful, and in caſe they have company, they are obliged to bear with their ill humours, their infirmities and errors. But the moſt dangerous companion a priſoner can have, is a perſon who has confeſſed himſelf; for ſuch a one is perpetually perſuading others to do the ſame, by aſſuring them they have no other way left them to ſave their lives; and that they ought not to be aſhamed to do what ſo many good people, and which they themſelves, who give them ſuch advice, have done before: ſo that a chriſtian muſt have a dreadful time of it, ſince beſides his own torments, his ears are continually grated with thoſe of others. Beſides, the priſoner himſelf has juſt reaſon to ſuſpect whether thoſe who adviſe him in this manner, are not his accuſers; and whether their depoſitions are not an obſtacle to his releaſe.

Thus do the moſt malicious and crafty priſoners endeavour to perſuade ſuch of their companions as are more ſimple, or leſs upon their guard, to accuſe thoſe in their confeſſions who endeavour to get out of the clutches of the inquiſitors; all which accuſations or impeachments occaſion inexpreſſible confuſion, inaſmuch as when a perſon who is unjuſtly impeached finds he has forfeited his goods and chattels, he will endeavour to make others as unhappy as himſelf.

But this happens becauſe the inquiſitors do not require ſuch witneſſes as agree in the circumſtances of times, places and perſons; for if all who give their depoſitions were obliged to this, few would run the hazard of accuſing themſelves falſly, much leſs to name accomplices, ſince it would be impoſſible for them to agree in all the circumſtances of a pretended crime.

We muſt obſerve that it very often happens, when a priſoner has juſt given in his depoſition againſt another, who, in order to procure his releaſe, has pleaded guilty, the informer is confined in the ſame cell with the perſon againſt whom he ſwore; and when the perſon indicted is told in the audience, that there is a new evidence, and a freſh impeachment lodg'd againſt him, he immediately ſuppoſes that this additional misfortune came from without doors, whereas in reality 'tis the very man who is confin'd with him under the ſame roof, that has brought it upon him. We ſhould find numberleſs inſtances of this nature, did the inquiſitors ſuffer the trials to be inſpected.

We are farther to obſerve, that in the inquiſitions of Portugal, the priſoners are frequently removed out of one cell into another, and thereby frequently change their companions. 'Twould be no eaſy matter to gueſs why they are ſhifted in this manner; however, 'tis certainly a misfortune to the innocent, becauſe as the priſoners get acquainted with one another by this means, they naturally ſuppoſe that their fellow-priſoners employ the ſame methods to get their diſcharge; and being in this manner induced to think, that they are impeach'd by their fellow-priſoners, they thence are alſo prompted to impeach all thoſe with whom they have any acquaintance. 'Tis aſtoniſhing to think, that ſince the inquiſitors boaſt ſo inviolable a ſecrecy, they ſhould ſuffer the priſoners to have any communication one with another. May we not juſtly ſuſpect that the ſole motive of their proceeding in this manner is purely, that they may have the better opportunity of ruining all thoſe who fall into their clutches?

Perſons who are thus confined have not the ſad conſolation allowed them of bewailing their misfortunes; to theſe, ſighs and tears are forbid, tho they have the ſtrongeſt reaſons for both; and if any one happens to make a little noiſe, or ſpeak ſo as to be heard in the next cell, he is gagg'd and whipt very cruelly. This is done to frighten the reſt, who, while the priſoner is puniſhing in this manner, hear a kind of herald, who cries aloud, that the priſoner is whipt by order of the lord inquiſitors, either for having ſpoken too loud, for crying, or beating upon the walls of his cell, or for having quarrelled with his comrades. Many criminals have been whipt ſo cruelly for ſuch faults, that it has thrown them into a fit of ſickneſs for ſeveral months, and ſome have been maimed all their life-time. Theſe puniſhments are inflicted on all ſorts of perſons, without the leaſt diſtinction of age, ſex or quality; inſomuch that they barbarouſly ſtrip married women and maidens of the ſtricteſt virtue, whom their parents had educated with the utmoſt care. But the moſt inhuman circumſtance, is, that whenever any priſoner happens to make the leaſt diſturbance, all who are in the cell with him are puniſh'd for it; the diſturber for making a noiſe, and the reſt for not immediately diſcovering it.

Now ſuch a procedure as this, throws the priſoners into the higheſt perplexity, ſince, in caſe they don't impeach their comrades, they are puniſh'd; and, in caſe they do, they never fail of being accuſed by them, not only in the above-mention'd caſes, but in thoſe of a capital nature: ſo that all thoſe poor wretches can do, is, to ſubmit patiently to their ſufferings, and to hold their tongues.

It may be worthy our conſideration, to reflect on the miſerable condition to which a great number of young maidens, nuns, and women of the higheſt quality and the ſtricteſt virtue are reduced, who are confined in the priſons of the inquiſition, with the moſt flagitious and moſt abandon'd perſons of their own ſex: and on the great number of friars, prieſts and gentlemen of the greateſt birth, who have no other companions but a ſett of ignorant, illiterate, debauch'd, mean wretches.

We muſt alſo obſerve, that ſuch as are whipt for having ſpoke to thoſe in the next cell to them, are frequently put into the ſame dungeons with them a few days after. Such procedure as this appears vaſtly myſterious, and can be done from no other motive, but purely to embarraſs and perplex the priſoners.

IN caſe, as frequently happens, the priſoners are very fervent in their prayers, faſt certain days in the week, and the whole Lent, the inquiſitors forbid their piety and abſtinence, pretending 'tis all hypocriſy: but God, who ſees the heart of man, will one day manifeſt whether the judges or the priſoners were the greateſt hypocrites.

CHAP. IV.

How WOMEN are treated. The order obſerved in proſecutions.

WE have hitherto related but the leaſt part of the ſufferings of thoſe who are confin'd in the inquiſition. Words could but faintly deſcribe the barbarities which are practiſed in theſe gloomy habitations, eſpecially in the cells where the women are impriſoned, the inquiſitors acting with infinitely more caution with regard to that ſex, and are more ſecret in all things which concern them: however 'tis certain, that the handſomeſt meet with the moſt gentle treatment; and here we ſhall ſuppreſs a great number of particulars which it would be indecent to relate. There is now a certain woman at Madrid, who happening to be engaged in a very odd adventure in one of the Portugueze inquiſitions, was no ſooner releaſed but ſhe immediately left the kingdom, and could never be prevailed with to return back into it.

Were the numberleſs multitude of unhappy wretches, who are daily let out of theſe priſons, at full liberty to divulge what they have ſeen and ſuffer'd; and were they not afraid of being ſeiz'd again and burnt alive, in caſe they happen to blab, the world world would ſoon have another idea of the ſanctity of this tribunal; but the oath of ſecrecy, which is adminiſtred to them at their releaſe, and the dreadful menaces which are pronounced on theſe occaſions; menaces enough to terrify the moſt undaunted, force them not to once open their lips. The only conſolation left them, is the liberty of revealing their thoughts to their confeſſors; and their confeſſions, ſtrike the prieſts to whom they are then made with the utmoſt horror. But of what ſervice is this? are families leſs diſhonour'd upon this account, or is their deſtruction leſs certain? The inquiſitors, to whom complaints are frequently made on this account, pretend that theſe unhappy victims of their fury and inſatiable avarice, impoſe upon their confeſſors, purely to excite their compaſſion. Might we not anſwer, that there is much more room to doubt the ſincerity of a forced confeſſion, made by perſons whoſe ſouls are dejected with terror; who are oppreſſed and inhumanly treated, and perſuaded they have no other way left to recover their liberty and ſave their lives than a ſacramental confeſſion, which is made with the utmoſt freedom; which the perſon who makes it is firmly perſuaded will never be divulged; and from which he cannot expect the leaſt relief? It even frequently happens, that the dread with which ſeveral poor penitents who have eſcaped the clutches of the inquiſition, are ſtruck, leſt their ghoſtly fathers ſhould not keep an inviolable ſecrecy with regard to their confeſſions; prompts them to commit ſacrilege, and to accuſe themſelves falſly of crimes before the audience. For this reaſon, 'tis very neceſſary that all who hear the confeſſions of ſuch unhappy perſons, take great care, not to ſuffer them to aggravate the crimes whereof they accuſe themſelves falſly.

It might be anſwer'd in the ſecond place, that as the agents of the inquiſition have reconciled, in the acts of faith, ſuch as have pleaded guilty before their tribunal, they are not to ſuppoſe that they tell an untruth in that of penance; ſince, at that rate, one muſt conclude, that they are no leſs Jews or Hereticks at their leaving the inquiſition, than when they were firſt impriſon'd in it: whence it would follow, that all the penance which they had been enjoined; all the acts of faith, and their ſeveral reconciliations, would be ſo many uſeleſs ceremonies. In fine, admit the proceedings of the inquiſition are as equitable as they pretend to be; why ſhould they force all perſons at their releaſe, to take an oath not to reveal any circumſtance that has happen'd? Would it not be of greater ſervice to the publick, as well as more glorious for the holy office, to allow their priſoners a full liberty of ſpeech, and to bind them no otherwiſe, than the obliging them to tell nothing but the truth. This would be the only method of making it known to every one; priſoners would no longer complain of their being forced to obſerve an inviolable ſecrecy; a remedy would thereby be applied to the inexpreſſible perplexity and confuſion which occaſions ſo many executions, and which renders the juſtifying ſo many innocent perſons an impoſſibility.

But the better to clear up this matter, it will be proper to exhibit the order which is obſerved in the trials of the inquiſition; firſt of ſuch as die negative, and ſecondly of thoſe who plead guilty. Heaven is witneſs that I aim at nothing but the truth in what I am going to relate; and that I am prompted by no other motive than the glory of God, and the ſervice of my fellow-creatures.

Firſt, the priſoner is carried to the audience by the Alcaide, attended by a turnkey: he goes thither bare-headed, and at his going in, he is obliged to kneel, when his name, country, trade or profeſſion, and a thouſand trifling particulars are aſk'd him; all which are writ down, and afterwards ſigned by him.

Some priſoners after having been carried to the firſt audience, are ſometimes confined two, three or four years, before they are call'd a ſecond time, while others are tried with much greater diſpatch. Theſe delays generally occaſion a moſt horrid circumſtance, which is, that thoſe who are laſt confined, voluntarily impeach ſuch as are confined along with them, for fear theſe ſhould have accuſed them before.

There is reaſon to believe, that the ſlowneſs of certain procedures is wholly owing to the want of a ſufficient number of witneſſes againſt the priſoners, and the hopes with which the inquiſitors flatter themſelves, that by ſuſpending the trial, they will thereby obtain a greater number of affidavits; becauſe thoſe who are newly impriſoned are perpetually impeaching others who are at liberty, and theſe accuſe again in their turn ſuch as were impriſon'd before them. But 'tis certain, that theſe dreadful delays frequently reduce a priſoner to deſpair, who being beſides continually prompted by the jailors and turnkeys, is at laſt reſolved to ſue to be admitted to audience; when in order to procure his diſcharge, he accuſes himſelf of numberleſs crimes whereof he is wholly innocent, and which, perhaps, no one had laid to his charge.

When a priſoner is called a ſecond time to audience, called Meſa, or board of the holy office, 'tis in order to inquire into his extraction; for not ſatisfied with taking down the names of his father and mother, they alſo inquire thoſe of his grandfathers, great grandfathers, brothers, ſiſters, children, uncles, nephews and couſins to the fourth generation: they afterwards inquire whether they are now chriſtians; if wholly or in part only. Theſe interrogatories, ſo little uſed in other tribunals, make thoſe who are aſk'd them believe, that the ſole motive of their being thus examined with regard to their anceſtors, is purely to ſift out whether they have failed to impeach any of them; moſt priſoners ſuppoſing that this is the only way to ſave their lives.

But after that a priſoner has made all theſe declarations, he is ſtill confined; for many crimes are laid to his charge by perſons unknown, whoſe names it is conſequently very difficult for him to gueſs, which yet is the only way left him to procure his releaſe.

We ſhould have a better idea of the cruelty, the confuſion and vexation of the inquiſitors, were they to publiſh faithfully the trials of thoſe whom they have delivered up to the executioner, merely becauſe they could not hit upon the names of thoſe who depoſed againſt them; moſt of whom are at the ſame time their accomplices. Now ſuch as are condemned to the flames by the inquiſitors, becauſe they did not declare all their accomplices and thoſe who impeached them, are called Diminutos, or perſons who did not make a full confeſſion, or for not having named all their accomplices.

After that the names of the ſeveral relations of the priſoner have been taken down, he is aſked, whether he be willing to confeſs his crimes? which they tell him is the only way left to excite the uſual clemency and mercy of the inquiſition. This he is exhorted to do as ſpeedily as poſſible, but without ſpecifying the crimes he is ſuppoſed to have committed. This, in the inquiſition, is called the firſt information. In caſe the priſoner anſwers, that he has always been a member of the chriſtian church, and cannot accuſe himſelf of any crime cognizable by the inquiſitors, he then is obliged to take a freſh oath of ſecrecy; when, having ſigned his anſwers, he is remanded back to his cell.

Being brought a third time before the board, which is the ſecond information; after taking the uſual oath of ſecrecy, and that he will declare nothing but the truth, he is aſked, whether he be deſirous of confeſſing himſelf in order to merit mercy? In caſe he ſtill anſwers, that he never acted any thing againſt the faith of Chriſt, but has conſtantly adhered thereto all his life-time. They then interrogate him upon divers other articles of the law of Moſes; which is generally done in manner following:

Whether he has left the law of Chriſt to follow that of Moſes? or, whether he is acquainted with any chriſtians who have acted in that manner?——— Anſwer'd in the negative.

Whether,

Whether, in compliance with the laws of Moſes, he has abſtained from ſwines fleſh, that of hares, of rabbits, or of fiſh that have no ſhell?—— Anſwer'd in the negative.

Theſe two queſtions ſufficiently ſhew in what manner a priſoner is examined with regard to his obſervation of the Jewiſh diſpenſation. At the end therefore of each queſtion, the words, anſwered in the negative, are only written; and no mention is made of the proteſtations, complaints, and ſupplicating replies of the unhappy priſoners. Some time ago one of theſe being aſked, whether he had not ſhifted himſelf on ſaturdays? whether he had not ſwept his houſe backwards? or had not thrown little crums of bread and drops of wine into pots of water, of which ſuperſtitious ceremonies the new chriſtians are accuſed? The priſoner anſwer'd in this manner: " I have already declared to you, gentlemen, that I was a chriſtian, which " circumſtance alone ſufficiently ſhews, that I could never be give into ſuch ridicu- " lous ceremonies; therefore, if I may preſume to adviſe, don't trifle away your " precious time in this manner, but rather be quick in determining the fate of ſo " many unhappy wretches who are now groaning in captivity."

There are daily priſoners, who, before their examination being wholly unacquainted with the Jewiſh ceremonies, get by heart the ridiculous particulars which are told them. When they afterwards accuſe themſelves, for fear of being puniſh'd for having practiſed thoſe filthy, ſuperſtitious cuſtoms; whereas, in reality, they were firſt taught them by thoſe who are their judges.

The interrogatories and anſwers being ended, the priſoner is remanded back to his cell.

As there is no fixed time for the length of the trials, ſome are diſpatched in a few weeks, while others take up ſeveral years: 'tis in vain for a priſoner to beg and intreat, for the inquiſitors are deaf to his cries, and ſeldom or never admit him to audience but when they judge proper. And if it happen that they are wrought upon by his ſupplications, and he is accordingly brought before them; yet, if he has nothing to alledge but his innocence and the miſery he ſuffers; he is immediately remanded back to priſon, when he is reproached for having ſo vilely abuſed the lenity of the inquiſitors; and to heighten his affliction, he is barbarouſly uſed by the turnkeys, who upbraid him for begging to be admitted to audience, ſince he, at the ſame time, did not intend to acknowledge his guilt.

However, ſome time after, that is, whenever the inquiſitors think proper, the priſoner is ſent for; and being now at the third and laſt information, he is urged by all the motives which are moſt apt to inſpire him with terror, to confeſs his crimes: if he refuſes, he is terribly menaced; and if he ſtill perſiſts in what they call his obſtinacy, the proctor appears to declare to him his concluſions, otherwiſe called the declaration of juſtice.

Then the proctor of the inquiſition, holding a paper in his hand, reads the following words out of it:

1. That the priſoner, who was baptized a chriſtian, has abandoned the faith and profeſſed the law of Moſes, in hopes that he might be ſaved in the practice of the Jewiſh ceremonies.

2. That the ſaid priſoner, being ſome time ſince in a certain place with perſons of the ſame extraction with himſelf, that is, with new chriſtians; the perſons then aſſembled, declared to each other, that they lived in a ſtrict obedience to the Jewiſh law, and therefore never eat of thoſe things which were forbidden by the ſaid law, ſuch as ſwines fleſh, &c.

3. That the ſaid priſoner being in a certain place, with certain perſons, who like himſelf were new chriſtians; one of the company affirm'd, that he had eat part of a ham, to whom the priſoner anſwer'd, that he never eat any. To this ſome perſon then then preſent, ſaid that he did very right if he were prompted thereto from a reſolution of obeying the law of Moſes. That this ſubject being purſued farther, all the company had declared themſelves followers of the ſaid law, in obedience to which they ſhifted every ſaturday.

4. That the priſoner at the bar, happening to meet in a certain place with other new chriſtians, had told them he intended to purchaſe a conſiderable poſt; to which one of the company replied, that if he might adviſe, he ſhould not buy it, ſince as he was a new chriſtian he might be prevented from doing it. But that another of the company had told him, that this conſideration ought not to divert him from purchaſing the ſaid employment, ſince others of the ſame extraction as himſelf had acted in ſuch; and that all the company had declared in favour of the Jewiſh law, purely to procure to themſelves riches and honour: that it was in view of fulfilling this law that they all ſaid the pater, and abſtained from eating certain meats prohibited by the Moſaic law.

And inſomuch as the ſaid priſoner is ſufficiently convicted of the above-mentioned crimes, the ſaid proctor concludes that he ſhall be delivered over to the ſecular arm, as a heretick and apoſtate.

Such is pretty near the inſtrument called by the inquiſitors the proctor's declaration; which being read, the priſoner is aſked, whether the whole purport of it be not true? And in caſe he anſwers, (as generally happens) that it is abſolutely falſe, he then is remanded back to his cell.

CHAP. V.

SOme time after this horrid declaration has been made, which is whenever the inquiſitors think proper, the priſoner is called to the board, when a counſellor is ſent for, called in Portugueſe, Letrado, to undertake his defence; tho, to ſpeak the truth, theſe counſellors are rather ſpies ſet over him, than his advocates.

Then the inquiſitors ſay to the counſellor: The priſoner at the bar having deſired counſel, we grant you leave to undertake his defenſe, and to make ſuch petitions, obſervations and remonſtrances as you ſhall think proper; but with this proviſo, that in caſe you perceive that the priſoner is for employing the leaſt fraud or malice in his defenſe, you are ſtrictly enjoyn'd to inform the court of it.

This declaration ended, the priſoner and his Letrado are put into another room, but a third perſon comes to them, and ſtays all the time they diſcourſe together, in order to prevent any juggle between them.

The counſellor and the ſpy ſeat themſelves in chairs, and tho the priſoner is a perſon of the firſt quality, or a dignitary of the church, he yet is forced to ſit upon a ſtool. Then the counſellor reads the declaration which was given him, containing the ſeveral matters laid to his charge, as delivered by the proctor; which being done, he aſks the priſoner whether he has any thing to ſay in his defence. The priſoner anſwers, that he's a chriſtian; that he has never done any thing in oppoſition to the chriſtian faith; and that the purport of the declaration is abſolutely falſe. Then the Letrado takes the pen into his hand, and draws up the objections, which are generally as follows:

That it would be a very eaſy matter to prove, that the priſoner was baptized a chriſtian; that he has fulfilled the ſeveral duties enjoyn'd him in his baptiſm; that he has

has led a very exemplary life; has been duly preſent at maſs and ſermons; has frequently approached the ſacraments of penance and the euchariſt; and beſtowed alms liberally on the poor, and on religious houſes.

Furthermore, that he has done the moſt ſignal ſervice to the churches and fraternities to which he belonged; that he has employ'd a great part of his ſubſtance in works of piety; that no perſon can ſay he ever committed an action contrary to the religion he profeſſes; ſo far from it, that he has always diſcover'd the higheſt love, as well as awe of the divine Being, and the utmoſt love and charity for his neighbour.

That it can be as clearly proved, he never ſhifted himſelf on ſaturdays; that he has frequently been ſeen eating ſwines fleſh, hare, rabbits, and all ſorts of fiſh, whether ſhell-fiſh or otherwiſe, without making the leaſt diſtinction with regard to meats, except in conformity to the holy Roman church. That his ſervants may be examined on theſe articles, and his moſt intimate acquaintance, above all, his confeſſor, and the rector of the pariſh where he lived; and that all theſe will not ſcruple to make oath, that in whatever concerns religion his conduct was always irreproachable.

Such is the uſual form of the objections, which the counſellors make who are appointed on theſe occaſions to plead the cauſe of criminals. Being ſigned by the Letrado and the priſoner, the former goes to the Meſa in order to give an account of what he has done, and the latter is remanded back to priſon.

Some time after, viz. whenever the judges think fitting, they ſend for a priſoner before them, in order for his calling ſuch perſons as may prove the particulars of his objections. The law requires that there be three witneſſes at leaſt for each article, and indeed there are few priſoners but clearly prove what they had alledged in their own juſtification. However, this is of very little ſervice to them, tho in juſtice they ought to invalidate the teſtimony of a ſingle perſon, which at the ſame time is generally trifling and inconſiſtent. The priſoner having done, he is ſent back to priſon.

Some time after this, he is again ſent for, when he is urged a-freſh to confeſs his guilt. In caſe he perſiſts in declaring his innocence, he is aſked, whether he conſents that the proctor ſhould make a new declaration of the proofs found againſt him, immediately after which the ſecretary begins to read in theſe or the like words:

The legal declaration of the affidavits given in againſt the priſoner at the bar.

An evidence whom we will call * Richard, has depoſed, that about ten years ago, he heard and ſaw, the priſoner at the bar whoſe name is Lewis, being in a certain place (ſuppoſe Coimbra) with perſons of the ſame extraction with himſelf, they declared to each other, that both of them lived in conformity to the law of Moſes.

† Another evidence, whom we will call John, has alſo depoſed that the ſaid Lewis being in a certain place (ſuppoſe Caſtelbranco) about fifteen years ago, in company with other new chriſtians, whom we will call Francis and John; one of the company having obſerved that he uſed to eat pork, was anſwered by the priſoner at the bar, whoſe name is Lewis, that he never eat any; to which another, whom we will call Francis, ſaid, that Lewis did very well, provided it was in obedience to the law; and that the whole company on that occaſion affirmed, they ſquared their conduct according to the principles of the Moſaical inſtitution.

* This evidence, whom we call Richard, ſeems here to have been the only witneſs with Lewis. Compare this with the declaration of the ſaid Lewis, hereafter mentioned.

† This witneſs, whom we call John, has impeached Lewis and Francis. Tho there are but three perſons mentioned in this indictment, there are nevertheleſs ſometimes eight, who are all enſnar'd by the inquiſitors. The reader is deſired to beſtow ſome reflection on theſe depoſitions, in order to compare them with thoſe of the priſoner.

A third witneſs, ſuppoſe his name * William, has legally depoſed, that the above-mentioned Lewis being about ſix years ago in a certain place, Coimbray for inſtance, with perſons of the ſame extraction with himſelf, whom we will ſuppoſe to be Emanuel and William, the ſaid Lewis told the evidence then preſent, that he intended to purchaſe a conſiderable employment; that one of the ſaid witneſſes, Emanuel for inſtance, told him it would not be proper for him to buy it, becauſe being a new chriſtian 'twas very probable ſome perſon or other might traverſe his deſign; to which another of the company, ſuppoſe William, anſwered, that this ought not to prevent his purchaſing it, ſince perſons of the ſame extraction with himſelf had exercifed ſuch employments; and that all the company then preſent, profeſſed their living in obedience to the injunctions of the law of Moſes.

This is pretty near the form of the declarations of the proofs which the inquiſitors pretend to have againſt their priſoners.

Thoſe of the priſoner, whom we will call Lewis, conſiſt only of three witneſſes, whoſe evidence is far from agreeing; however, theſe are conſidered by the inquiſitors as ſufficiently valid to cauſe any perſon to be ſeiz'd; nay, ſometimes a perſon is impriſoned tho there are but two ſuch evidences, who as they are commonly perjured, can hardly agree in the particulars they depoſe. If the inquiſitors would allow the trials to be publiſhed, 'twould then be found, that ſcarce one witneſs in a thouſand agree in all circumſtances, unleſs matters were ſo managed, that having impeach'd a perſon before they themſelves were taken up, they had concerted and agreed together upon their depoſitions before-hand.

The declaration is then read to the priſoner, when he is aſked, whether he allows the charge to be true; but as we will ſuppoſe Lewis to be innocent, he conſequently denies every article of it; upon which he is immediately remanded back to priſon.

The inquiſitors don't permit the counſellor to have any conference with the priſoner for ſome time afterwards; but this is of little prejudice to him, ſince he really has only the ſpecious name of his counſellor. And to ſay the truth, he is not allowed to ſupplicate or alledge any thing in favour of the priſoner, but what the inquiſitors think proper. The counſellor is never ſhewn either the trial or the proceedings; and as he is not informed of the ſeveral circumſtances of the affair, it would be ſcarce poſſible for him to make a ſuitable defence, ſince he is nominated to this employment by the moſt zealous familiars of the inquiſition, who very often are ſurprizingly illiterate. In fine, as theſe counſellors are retainers to the holy office, they always ſet the caſe of thoſe priſoners whoſe cauſe they pretend to plead, in the worſt light. And inaſmuch as the inquiſitors and familiars, are prejudiced againſt all thoſe who in Portugal are diſtinguiſh'd by the name of new chriſtians, their counſellors always think the worſt of their priſoners. Now if theſe happen to ſpeak their real ſentiments at the board, and that theſe prove to be againſt the priſoner, they are of great prejudice to the latter; whereas tho this advocate judge never ſo favourably of him, 'tis of very little ſervice to him.

The proctor is the chief man in the ſecret, and may, whenever he pleaſes, peruſe the whole proceſs, in order that he may be the better enabled to perplex the priſoner; whereas the counſellor having but a very ſuperficial knowledge of the whole affair, cannot poſſibly make a ſuitable defence. Hence it is, that great numbers of theſe unhappy creatures die undefended; conſtrained either to periſh miſerably in the flames, or to caſt the blackeſt ſtain on their families, by accuſing themſelves of Judaiſm, or ſeveral other crimes, whereof they are wholly innocent.

Some

* The reader will eaſily obſerve that the evidence is very different from the defence made by the priſoner, which is a plain proof that the whole is but a trick.

Some time after, whenever the inquiſitors think proper, the advocate is allow'd acceſs to the priſoner, when he reads to him the above-mentioned declaration of proofs which had before been ſignified to him at the board, and drawn up in pretty near the form before exhibited. This inſtrument includes indeed a variety of depoſitions; but how numerous ſoever they be, they always differ both in ſubſtance and circumſtances.

This inſtrument being read, the Letrado aſks the priſoner what he has to alledge againſt the charge. In caſe he anſwers, that the whole is a mere rhapſody of lies; that he is innocent of all that is laid to his charge; and that he earneſtly beſeeches the counſellor to undertake his defence: then the Letrado changing his note, begins to act the part of an inquiſitor; employs all his rhetorick to prevail upon his client to make an open confeſſion; repreſents to him, that it will be impoſſible for him to extricate himſelf by any other means; and that, in caſe he continue obſtinate, he will run the riſk of continuing ſeveral years in priſon, or of being put to death.

A little reflection on theſe occaſions, has the effect which ſuch advice given by a counſellor muſt naturally produce in weak minds, ſuch as thoſe of women and others; and indeed, theſe falſe advocates generally perſuade their clients to accuſe themſelves tho in never ſo ſcandalous a manner.

That in caſe the priſoner ſtill perſiſts in declaring his innocence, then the Letrado never fails to addreſs him as follows: What anſwers can you make to the crimes which the proctor has laid to your charge, and which he affirms to be ſufficiently proved? It muſt be confeſſed, that a priſoner is very much to be pitied on theſe occaſions; for what ſuccour or conſolation can ſuch a pretended advocate adminiſter? Is it not plain that the whole is a mere juggle? Were the Letrado to do his duty, ought he not to except againſt all the witneſſes, ſince either they differ in their depoſitions, are moſt of them priſoners, or were forced by threats and violence to give ſuch evidence as the inquiſitors think proper? In lay-tribunals a ſingle witneſs goes for nothing, tho it were in caſe of high-treaſon; and ſuch muſt be men of unſullied characters. But the inquiſitors, on the contrary, receive all kind of witneſſes; and the depoſitions of perſons ſuborned and forced, and who have been confined ſeveral years in priſon, and had no other way of ſaving their lives, are received as valid. Was an offer of liberty made to thoſe who are confined in our different priſons, upon condition that they would depoſe againſt others, without their being obliged to agree with the depoſitions of the other witneſſes, there is hardly one but would endeavour to procure his liberty at ſo eaſy a rate. Are not the priſoners who are confined in the priſons of the inquiſition human creatures as well as thoſe who are confined in ſecular jails? Does not the horrors of ſo dreadful a confinement, and the fear of a cruel death, make as ſtrong an impreſſion upon them, eſpecially on women? There is no room to doubt, but as theſe unhappy creatures confeſs themſelves falſly to be Jews when it is extorted from them, they would alſo accuſe themſelves to be Mahometans were threats and menaces employ'd.

However, the counſellors have not the leaſt ſcruple upon theſe occaſions, but are very eaſy in their minds, and have not the leaſt qualm of conſcience, tho they are anſwerable to heaven for the life, the wealth, and honour of thoſe whoſe cauſe they undertake. And if it happens, which is but too often the caſe, that a priſoner accuſes others falſly by the advice of his counſellor, into what guilt does this latter plunge himſelf! and can we ſuppoſe he can ever atone for it?

In fine, the Letrado having aſked the priſoner whether he has any ſolid exceptions to make againſt his witneſſes? The latter anſwers, that 'twill be impoſſible for him to hit upon any, ſince they are all unknown to him. Then the advocate draws up ſeveral againſt the witneſſes in general; and at the ſame time engages the priſoner to diſcloſe to him, without the leaſt reſerve, whatever he may have to alledge againſt all all perſons with whom he may have had any difference, in order that in ſo great a number, he may include thoſe who depoſed againſt him. Nevertheleſs, as the priſoner is not only often unacquainted with his accuſers, but never ſo much as once heard their names; the conſequence is, that tho he excepts againſt an hundred, he has not the good luck to hit upon thoſe whom only it concerned him to name. Another inconveniency which ariſes from the priſoner's perplexity is, that as he, by his counſellor, excepts againſt all the perſons he can poſſibly think of, who perhaps never once thought to do him the leaſt prejudice, he thereby makes a general confeſſion of his whole life to the Letrado; diſcovers to him all the intrigues, or ſcenes of gallantry in which he may have been engaged, and thereby ruins the reputation of ſeveral women, and thoſe perhaps of diſtinction, by diſcloſing what ought to have been buried in eternal oblivion. Such is the wretched perplexity of thoſe who are impriſoned by the inquiſitors, who have no refuge left but to make vain and empty challenges, by ſaying for inſtance, that ſuch a one is their enemy, becauſe they either debauch'd his wife, his daughter, or his ſiſter. On which we are to obſerve, that the inquiſitors pay no manner of regard to ſuch exceptions, if it can be proved that the perſon who makes them, either ſpoke afterwards, or was reconciled to the perſon whom he challenges; as tho the Portugueze did not frequently conceal their revenge, under the moſt ſpecious appearance of friendſhip.

Another method by which the priſoners of the holy office ſometimes recover their liberty, is by proving their being in another place, which in Portugueze is called * coarctato, that is, the proving the priſoner was in a different place from that ſworn to in the indictment: as for inſtance, to ſhew that he was in Lisbon, when 'twas pretended he was in Coimbra.

For the validity of every challenge or exception, the priſoner muſt bring three witneſſes at leaſt, of an unſullied character, all of them old chriſtians; but the advocate is not told their names. We are to obſerve, that the witneſſes who are ſubpæna'd by the priſoner on theſe occaſions, are always under ſuch dreadful apprehenſions leſt the inquiſitors ſhould ſuſpect their favouring the priſoner, that this conſideration frequently prevents their making ſuch depoſitions as might be of advantage to the priſoner, or at leaſt making them very imperfectly. We are farther to obſerve, that none but priſoners of experience or underſtanding, fly for refuge to the coarctato; and if the priſoner himſelf does not hit upon it, his advocate never puts it into his head. The better to illuſtrate this matter, the reader is to know, that the priſoner is never told the places directly, which the witneſſes ſwore to, unleſs he deſires to be told their names in order to clear himſelf by the coarctato; but that in the declarations which are read to the priſoner, they always make uſe of the words, in a certain place, without ſpecifying any particular one, as we have ſhewn in the abovementioned examples. Now moſt priſoners finding thoſe places are not pointed out, ſeldom have the ſenſe to require their being named, in order to clear themſelves by the coarctato. Beſides, this expedient is generally of no ſervice to women, young perſons, and even to perſons of certain conditions; ſuch being too ignorant to think of it themſelves, and are never prompted to it by their advocates, tho bound in duty to do all that lies in their power for thoſe whoſe cauſe they undertake. But ſo unhappy is the lot of all who are ſeized by the inquiſitors, that every thing ſeems to conſpire their ruin; and whenever their defence is to be undertaken, numberleſs difficulties ariſe, and thoſe for the moſt part unſurmountable.

CHAP.

* The plea of coarctato can be alledged by none but travellers, and is ſcarce ever allowed to women.

CHAP. VI.

SEQUEL of the proceedings againſt ſuch men as are impeach'd; and againſt women.

ALL that the priſoner and his advocate can do for their advantage conſiſts in theſe kinds of challenges. Some time after the priſoner is called to audience, but only to inquire of him the names of thoſe witneſſes he had mentioned in his challenges or exceptions. Having done this, he is remanded back to priſon, and not a word is mention'd to him of his cauſe. If he has been ſo happy, when he made his exceptions, as to hit on the names of thoſe who depoſed againſt him; then the witneſſes he calls upon, are examined with regard to theſe exceptions; otherwiſe, no farther mention is made of them, and the cauſe continues at a ſtand.

Suppoſe that the priſoner whom we will call Lewis, was taken up in January 1700, no mention is made to him of his trial till two years after his impriſonment. If the reader thinks this a long time, he is to know that ſeveral priſoners have been confined three years, before a word has been ſaid to them of it. Two years being elapſed, all the proceedings we before took notice of are concluded in two months, ſo that Lewis flatters himſelf he ſhall be ſet at liberty in the firſt act of faith: but he is miſtaken; for the act of faith is ſolemnized, but no notice is taken of him. How bitter muſt the reflection be, when a poor priſoner conſiders that it would be impoſſible for him to procure his liberty before another act of faith, which will be two years at leaſt! In vain does he torture his mind, to gueſs at the reaſons why he ſhould be detained in this manner; for this it will be impoſſible for him to gueſs.

At laſt, about a year after, he is called to audience, when he is again exhorted to confeſs his crime. In caſe he anſwers as he did before, that he is wholly innocent, and is not conſcious to himſelf of having committed any crime, he is remanded back till a little before the next act of faith, when he (ſuppoſe Lewis) is put to the torture, where at the ſame time that all his bones are diſlocated in a dreadful manner, he is earneſtly conjured, (nor are the moſt terrible menaces omitted on theſe occaſions) to make a general confeſſion of all his crimes, in order that he may be ſet at liberty.

'Tis indeed ſurprizing, how it can be poſſible for any of theſe unhappy wretches, to bear up againſt ſuch a croud of ſufferings; but in order to give the reader ſome idea of this matter, and the effect which this torture generally produces, we ſhall here inſtance an example, which is that of Mary of the conception, a native of Villa-eſtremos, and daughter to Emanuel Soares.

This young woman, who afterwards lived with one of her brothers named Alvares Pinto, was taken up, and alſo two of her ſiſters. Theſe three young women, after having been long impriſon'd, were at laſt ſet at liberty in the act of faith ſolemnized at Evora in April 1660. Mary of the conception, after having conſtantly perſiſted in declaring her innocence, was at laſt put to the torture. She bore it very couragiouſly till 'twas pretty near ended; but at laſt, overcome with the torments, ſhe accuſed herſelf. Upon this ſhe was unbound, and was ſuffered to put on her clothes in order to make her confeſſion. But now, inſtead of perſiſting in what ſhe had before declared, ſhe proteſted that all ſhe had ſpoke when upon the rack, was abſolutely falſe; that ſhe was a chriſtian, and that the dread of dying under her torments, was the ſole motive why ſhe accuſed herſelf of judaiſm. Upon this ſhe was remanded back to priſon, and a few days after was put a ſecond time to the torture; when ſhe again accuſed herſelf; which was no ſooner done than ſhe was unlooſed, when being carried to the audience, ſhe now perſiſted in her innocence, and told her judges, that 'twould be to no purpoſe for them to put her a third time to the torture, ſince ſhe ſhould always accuſe herſelf falſly tho ſhe were rack'd an hundred times. However, ſhe was again put upon the rack; but as heaven then indued her with uncommon reſolution, ſhe went thro' it continually perſiſting in her innocence. What is here related, was publiſhed with her ſentence; and 'twas for refuſing to ratify what ſhe had confeſs'd in the two firſt tortures, that ſhe was condemned to be whipt publickly thro' the ſtreets, and afterwards baniſhed for ten years.

In the ſame act of faith, there appeared to be reconciled Andrao Franciſco Tendeiro, born in Villa-vicioſa, who hearing this young woman's ſentence pronounced, and having ſaid to thoſe who ſtood near him, that he thought it a very ſevere one; he was called to the audience, when the inquiſitors, after having ſharply reprimanded him, told him, he might look upon it as a great happineſs, that they had been ſo indulgent as not to confine him; that tho they, out of their great goodneſs and charity, permitted him to enjoy his liberty, he yet ſhould take the utmoſt care not to blabb ſo inconſiderately another time.

When women are put to the torture, they are undreſſed to their ſhifts, which are of coarſe cloth; then they are put upon the rack in a very indecent manner, before a large company of men; ſo that as moſt of them are terrified by the torture they undergo, they confeſs or deny whatever is required from them, in order to be freed from the torments they are made to ſuffer.

Let us nevertheleſs ſuppoſe, that Lewis has had ſo much reſolution, as to bear up under the torments without confeſſing any thing; that the next act of faith, (or jail-delivery) he is ſet at liberty, that is, is not condemned to die, for want of ſufficient evidence, the three above-mentioned being not enough; ſuppoſing, I ſay, he is clear'd on this occaſion, is it not ſurprizing that a poor creature ſhould be tortured in this manner upon ſo trifling a matter? that he ſhall be made to ſuffer ſo many torments upon ſuch ſlight evidence? that a trial which might have been diſpatch'd in a few days, ſhall be ſpun out to ſo many years? and that a man's health and buſineſs muſt be ruin'd, becauſe forſooth, he muſt be obliged to wait till the next jail-delivery? Is not all this unjuſt and barbarous?

Lewis being thus releas'd, is carried to a publick ſchool, where he is confined a month, in order to learn his catechiſm. But of what ſervice is this? And if he already knows all he can be taught, why is he confined in this manner? The reaſon is certainly, becauſe the inquiſitors would thereby perſuade the vulgar, that he is ignorant of the very elements of the chriſtian religion.

At laſt Lewis is completely ſet at liberty, becauſe of the happineſs he had in his ill fortune, viz. that there were no more than three witneſſes appear'd againſt him. But let us now ſuppoſe there are ten, all perſons of the character we juſt now deſcribed; which, according to the maxims of the inquiſition, is ſufficient to cauſe a perſon to be delivered over to the ſecular arm, as manifeſtly convicted. A little before the jail-delivery, Lewis is called to audience, when it is inſinuated to him, that he muſt prepare to hear his ſentence, which is to be pronounced in the next act of faith that is to be ſolemnized on a day they name to him. This is the notice which is given to all ſuch as are to be condemn'd, that fatal day being carefully concealed from the reſt of the priſoners till the moment it is to be ſolemnized. In what a dreadful ſituation is the mind of ſuch an unhappy wretch, who is revolving continually the horrid barbarities which are preparing, unaſſiſted with a confeſſor, or any conſolation; and at the ſame time abſolutely reſolved to ſuffer death, rather than accuſe himſelf or any other perſon falſly. In fine, the friday immediately preceeding ing the ſunday of the act of faith, Lewis's hands are tied very early in the morning; and the ſame inſtant a jeſuit is ſent to him, in order to receive his confeſſion, and aſſiſt him during thoſe laſt three days.

The moment the confeſſor is come in, the priſoner makes his confeſſion to him as one who is ſoon to leave the world, being reſolved not to preſerve his life, when truth and his own honour are to be the ſacrifice. Sunday being come, he walks in the proceſſion, hears ſentence of death publickly pronounced upon himſelf; when he declares aloud that he dies a good chriſtian, and has always lived ſo; that he is innocent of all the crimes which are laid to his charge; that notwithſtanding this, he ſtill reſigns himſelf to puniſhment and death, in hopes of obtaining from Chriſt Jeſus, the pardon of thoſe ſins whereof he is really guilty. Nevertheleſs, we daily ſee a great number of priſoners, who terrified with the approaches of death, either prevent ſentence of condemnation from paſſing upon them; or, who after ſentence has paſs'd, agree to all the queſtions which are put to them, and confeſs themſelves guilty of things whereof they are wholly innocent.

As ſoon as Lewis has heard his ſentence pronounced, he is delivered over to the ſecular arm, when he is carried before the parliament, where, without once inquiring into his trial, he is condemned to the flames. Before he is delivered up to the executioners, he is aſked what religion he is deſirous of dying in? to which not only Lewis, but all thoſe unhappy perſons who are in his circumſtances, anſwer; that they die as they have lived, in the principles of the Roman catholick religion; that they deteſt all ſects and hereſies, as alſo the Jewiſh law; acknowledging Chriſt Jeſus for their only ſaviour, in whoſe merits they put their whole truſt.

Lewis being at laſt brought to the ſtake, perſiſts in his ſentiments to the laſt; and in this manner do all reſign their breath who are condemn'd to the flames by the inquiſitors, and are by them called Convitto negativo, or negative convicts.

We will now ſee, in what manner thoſe extricate themſelves, who are reconciled and condemned to baniſhment, for having deferred their confeſſion till ſentence of death had paſſed upon them.

Let us ſuppoſe therefore that the above-mention'd Lewis is accuſed by fifteen or twenty perſons, who diſagree in all the circumſtances of their ſeveral depoſitions. Lewis finds his ruin unavoidable, becauſe of the impoſſibility to except againſt ſuch a number of witneſſes with whom he is wholly unacquainted. If nevertheleſs the dread of puniſhment in the condition he is in, at laſt inclines him to accuſe himſelf of things whereof he is wholly innocent, he undoubtedly argues with himſelf in theſe or ſuch like words: How will it be poſſible for me to hit upon the names of ſuch witneſſes? and tho I ſhould be ſo fortunate as to gueſs them all, how will it be poſſible for me to name exactly the time, the place, and the occaſion of the ſeveral conferences, which 'tis pretended I had with them? This, methinks, is what I ſhall never be able to do: however, I know by experience, that ſome perſons have procur'd their liberty, by confeſſing themſelves guilty of ſeveral crimes whereof they are as innocent as I am: it therefore will be enough, if I hit upon the names of thoſe who have ſwore againſt me, tho I ſhould not have the good fortune to gueſs the other circumſtances. But then, how can I poſſibly gueſs the names of twenty people? conſequently the only method by which I can do this, will be to impeach all the new chriſtians in general, with whom I have the leaſt acquaintance, at leaſt all thoſe with whom I have any intimacy, ſince 'tis the only way left me to ſave my life.

Lewis having taken this reſolution, revolves in his mind all the perſons whom he has the leaſt room to ſuſpect are his adverſaries; upon this he deſires to be admitted to audience, where, as he frequently cannot exactly hit upon the names of thoſe whom he imagines to be his accuſers, he points them out to the inquiſitors, by ſaying, the ſon, daughter, or wife of Mr. ſuch-a-one; and in order that he may be ſure of naming the twenty who have ſwore againſt him, he ſometimes accuſes two hundred, and at laſt perhaps does not gueſs the perſons who impeach'd him.

Several priſoners begin by naming their fathers, children, brothers, from an opinion that their judges (ſince they did not ſpare their neareſt relations) will excuſe them, as ſuppoſing it may be owing to their bad memory, in caſe they cannot hit upon all the names of thoſe who impeach'd them. Other priſoners, in order not to expoſe their relations, forbear to name them, and mention none but indifferent perſons. But to return to Lewis: he flatters himſelf that now he has made ſo ample a confeſſion, he will ſoon recover his liberty; but alas! he is in a greater perplexity than ever, in caſe he could not gueſs the names of all who ſwore againſt him, becauſe the inquiſitors always declare to him on theſe occaſions, that in caſe he does not complete his confeſſion, the proctor will give in his petition, praying that he may be tried as a Diminuto, i. e. one who has maliciouſly ſuppreſſed part of his accomplices, and made an imperfect confeſſion.

This unfortunate wretch, who has gone ſo far as to accuſe himſelf falſly in order to ſave his life, ſeeing himſelf in danger of forfeiting it, notwithſtanding the horrid confeſſion he has made, rambles (in his mind) all over his own country and thoſe adjacent to it. Nothing eludes his reflections, for he revolves the names of all the new chriſtians with whom he has the leaſt acquaintance, not ſparing even prieſts or monks; and if Portugal is not found ſufficient, he travels into Spain, Italy, France, in order to hit upon perſons whom he may accuſe. But if he is told that all this is not yet ſufficient, he then rakes into the aſhes of the dead, who, as was before obſerved, are no leſs exempt from the proſecutions of the inquiſitors, than the living.

In fine, if Lewis has had the good luck to find out all the names required, he then comes out at the jail-delivery among the reconciled, when he is baniſh'd for five years either to Braſil, or ſome other country. 'Tis by this means that ſuch as accuſe themſelves after their trial, are diſtinguiſh'd from thoſe who have prevented their condemnation; the latter being never ſent into baniſhment.

CHAP. VII.

The confeſſion of the priſoner compared with the depoſitions of his accuſers.

WE have juſt before ſeen, in what manner the priſoner, whom we called Lewis, got his liberty; we are now going to examine what relation there is between thoſe particulars he has confeſſed, and the depoſitions we before ſuppoſed to have been made againſt him. By this it will manifeſtly appear, that all theſe pretended confeſſions are ſo many traps laid for the innocent; and that all the depoſitions which are made before the inquiſitors, are very near in the ſame ſtrain. Perhaps the reader may think me guilty of tautology; however, the neceſſity I was under of giving a perfect knowledge of theſe matters, was the reaſon of my being ſo prolix.

Lewis therefore, as was before obſerved, has made a confeſſion, and in order to gueſs the names of the twenty perſons who depoſed againſt him, has accuſed two hundred. He named ſuch a number of them, that he had the good luck to hit upon thoſe which were for his purpoſe.

Let us now give an inſtance in thoſe things which happen'd to Lewis, on which occaſion we are to remember, that all priſoners of the inquiſition who are accuſed of Judaiſm, make pretty near the ſame confeſſion.

Lewis

Lewis * has made oath, that about ſix years ago, being at Gologan-fair, and ſupping in an inn with Richard, Bernard and Giles, a piece of pork was brought upon the table; that thereupon, Giles ſaid he never eat of that fleſh; that Bernard ſaid the ſame, and added that it always made him ſick; that then Richard ſaid, he was perſuaded he did not refrain from eating ſwine-fleſh, but only becauſe it was prohibited by the law of Moſes. That this deponent, Lewis, confeſſed that what he ſaid was true; ſo that at laſt they had all profeſſed their obedience to the law of Moſes.

Lewis † has declared upon oath, that being about five years ſince in company with John, in the convent of Bajulo three leagues from Coimbra; that there John told him he had the higheſt veneration for the religious of that monaſtery, who are Carmelites, becauſe they had been founded by Elias the prophet of the antient law; and that this diſcourſe had inſenſibly engaged them to declare themſelves Jews.

Lewis ‖ has declared upon oath, that engaging in diſcourſe about twelve years ſince at one of the gates of Coimbra, with William, Silveſter and Laurence, a peaſant came up to them, and aſked whether they would buy two books he had in his hand: to which Laurence replied, no. Upon which, the countryman going away, William ſaid to the reſt, that they might ſpeak their thoughts freely, ſince they all profeſſed the ſame religion. Whereupon they all declared their attachment to the law of Moſes; and that they would have made a more open declaration, had not ſome perſons come up to them as they were diſcourſing.

Lewis has declared upon oath, that being at Coimbra about nine years ago in Francis's houſe, in company with Leonora, wife to the ſaid Francis, they had mutually diſcover'd themſelves to be followers of the Jewiſh faith.

I beg the reader to reflect a little how eaſily the confeſſions of perſons impeach'd are received, provided they only name thoſe who have depoſed againſt them; and that they never conſider whether it agrees with the ſaid depoſitions in time, place, occaſion, and ſuch-like eſſential circumſtances. That in caſe Lewis's declaration is genuine and ſincere, ought it not to agree in every particular, with the depoſitions of the accuſers? Nevertheleſs, if the inquiſitors were to allow the trials to be publiſh'd, we ſhould ſcarce ever find that the declarations of the perſons impeach'd and their accuſers, agreed exactly in particulars; whereas, if the inquiſitors were to require, that all parties ſhould agree together in circumſtances, we then ſhould not ſee chriſtians daily accuſing one another of Judaiſm; it being almoſt impoſſible for perſons to agree in facts when they are intirely falſe. If it ſhould happen that ſome one of the priſoners ſhould be really found a Jew, the witneſſes who had depoſed againſt him, would not fail of agreeing together in all the circumſtances, ſince the allegations would be juſt.

Perhaps it will be aſked, why ſo many priſoners who accuſe themſelves, are given over to the ſecular arm, upon pretence that they have concealed ſome of their accomplices; who are therefore called Diminutos, i. e. whoſe confeſſions are defective and imperfect.

As this is a very delicate article, it may be proper to dwell a little upon it. In order therefore to ſay no more than what we know to be true, we are to diſtinguiſh three kinds of Diminutos, who as ſuch come out condemn'd to die.

The firſt are thoſe who having accuſed themſelves after their being impriſon'd, or, at leaſt before ſentence of condemnation had paſſed upon them, have conſequently had all the time requiſite to examine themſelves, and make a complete declaration.

* The reader may obſerve, how much theſe depoſitions differ from thoſe of Richard above-mentioned.

† Compare this depoſition with that of John aforementioned, and obſerve how they differ.

‖ What affinity or relation is there between this depoſition with that of Francis above-mentioned, who has declared John to be an accomplice? Were the trials publiſh'd, we ſhould meet with many contradictions of the ſame nature.

The ſecond are ſuch as have not confeſſed till after ſentence of condemnation had paſſed upon them. Theſe are put to the torture, in order thereby to force them to complete their confeſſions, and by that means ſave their lives; which is looked upon by the inquiſitors as an extraordinary act of clemency and mercy; inaſmuch as, in conſideration of the torture, the priſoners are not required to make ſo exact a declaration; the torture making up for the inſufficiency of their confeſſion. This ſecond kind of Diminutos are allowed time to anſwer what is required of them, till the friday immediately preceding the ſunday of the act of faith.

The third are ſuch as do not make a confeſſion till they are hand-cuff'd, and are given up to the confeſſors. The condition of theſe is worſe than thoſe above-mentioned, becauſe they are never after put to the torture; and that the only way to clear themſelves, is to name all thoſe who have accuſed them, without ſo much as excepting one ſingle perſon.

'Tis in order to gueſs them all, that ſuch priſoners are induced not to ſpare their neareſt relations, and ſtrangers. And becauſe theſe unhappy wretches, who are brought to the brink of deſpair by the dread of an ignominious and cruel death, name a great number of perſons whom they never knew, and by that means put a great many people in the danger whence they endeavour to extricate themſelves; the Portugueze ſay proverbially, Maõs atados, terras abraladas: i. e. the moment a priſoner is hand-cuff'd, the country is on fire.

'Tis very probable, that moſt of thoſe who come out condemned as Diminutos, after having accuſed themſelves, and ſeveral perſons of the ſame crimes whereof they declared themſelves guilty, have willingly ſpared their wives, their children, fathers, or brothers. Now as there is no room to preſume that they acted in this manner from a defect of memory, it is not thought neceſſary to put them to the torture to force them to name ſuch perſons. 'Tis for this inſincerity that the inquiſitors cauſe them to be burnt as Diminutos. Nevertheleſs, it ſometimes happens that perſons tho they impeach all their relations, are nevertheleſs delivered over to the ſecular arm as Diminutos; merely for omitting the names of perſons with whom they had the ſlighteſt acquaintance. As for inſtance:

George Francis Mela, inhabitant of Villa-Vicioſa, having been ſeized by the inquiſitors of Devora, made a voluntary accuſation a little time after his impriſonment, in hopes of ſoon obtaining his liberty by that means. In his confeſſion he impeached all the perſons he could poſſibly think of, as well his own countrymen as foreigners; inſomuch that he named upwards of five hundred. He had a daughter, who at five years of age had been put into the convent Della Speranza, of the ſame city, where ſhe had been educated by the nuns of that houſe, who were antient chriſtians. This young woman being grown up to years of maturity, had taken the veil, and led a moſt exemplary life. Her father, whenever he came to ſee his daughter, never diſcourſed her but in preſence of ſome of the nuns. The unfortunate father being reſolved to get out of priſon at any rate, accuſes his wife, his brothers and children, and among the reſt the nun in queſtion; but notwithſtanding his going theſe horrid lengths, he yet could not ſatisfy the inquiſitors, who condemned his as a Diminuto. Thus unhappily undeceived, and reduced to the deepeſt deſpair, when he found that notwithſtanding all his confeſſions he ſtill muſt ſuffer, he diſowned all he had before affirmed; declared aloud that all he had depoſed, either againſt himſelf or others, was abſolutely falſe; and that he had only made thoſe depoſitions purely to ſave his life. In his ſentence he was called Diminuto revogante, i. e. who has confeſſed ſome part, and afterwards denied it all.

Maria Mendez, native of Fronteira, living at Elvas, relict of Gaſper Gomez Jacinthus, having been ſeized by order of the inquiſitors, at firſt made a confeſſion, in which ſhe accuſed her children, grand-children, relations, and all her friends and acquaintance, tance, making in all near ſix hundred perſons; and yet ſhe was ſentenced to die as a Diminuta. Finding herſelf reduced to this deſperate condition, notwithſtanding the ample confeſſions ſhe had made, ſhe denied all ſhe had before affirmed, and proteſted the only motive of her declaring ſo many falſities, was in order to ſave her life. At laſt, coming out in the act of faith, in all her dreadful geer, in order to go to the ſtake; one of her daughters ſeeing her paſs by, named ſome of their relations aloud, fearing ſhe had either omitted or forgot them; and hoping that in caſe ſhe declared them to the inquiſitors, ſhe might eſcape the flames: but her unfortunate mother anſwered, I did not omit thoſe you juſt now named; and have rambled over Portugal and Caſtile, but all to no purpoſe.

CHAP. VIII.

Puniſhment of NEGATIVE CONVICTS.

'TIS manifeſt, from what was juſt now obſerved, that not only all ſuch are condemned as Diminutos who have endeavoured to ſpare their relations, but alſo moſt of thoſe who could not poſſibly gueſs the names of the ſeveral perſons who are ſuppoſed to have been their accomplices. 'Tis certainly a moſt melancholy ſpectacle, to ſee perſons thus carried to execution; who, after having accuſed themſelves, have ſworn againſt their own fathers, brothers, and children.

It will perhaps be aſked, why certain priſoners, after having impeached a great number of perſons, chuſe rather to die than depoſe in this manner againſt their relations. To this 'tis anſwered, that the tenderneſs one naturally breathes for perſons who are ſo nearly related, and ſo dearly beloved; prompts thoſe unhappy wretches to loſe their own lives, rather than to reduce their relations, whom they know to be innocent, to the ſame deſperate condition with themſelves.

It may be aſked, whence it is that ſome Diminutos, and even certain negative criminals, after having deferred matters to the very laſt, do yet make a confeſſion, when there is no other way left of ſaving their lives; and that many priſoners have a very good gueſs, and name all the perſons who have depoſed againſt them. 'Tis anſwered, that ſuch perſons have been informed by ſome other means; or elſe, by deep reflection, have at laſt hit upon the names of thoſe who had impeached them; or, that in caſe they ſo long deferred the making their declaration, from a principle of conſcience, in order that they might not expoſe the lives of innocent perſons by accuſing them falſly; that nevertheleſs the fear of death has afterwards forced them, as it were againſt their wills, to act in this manner. But ſince we have mentioned negative criminals, we ſhall inſtance ſome of them, in order to ſhew the fate of thoſe to whom the inquiſitors give that name.

James de Mello, a native of Lisbon, a gentleman of ſome conſideration, and knight of the order of Chriſt, had ſerved ſeveral years in quality of captain of the horſe, with great honour and diſtinction. This Mello was partly a new chriſtian, as alſo his wife and two ſons. It had frequently happened, that when he ſaw any new chriſtian arreſted by order of the inquiſitors, he had diſcovered the greateſt joy upon that account, as well as zeal for the inquiſition, in order that he might not be ſuſpected of favouring the Jewiſh tenets.

Notwithſtanding this, it happened, whether out of revenge or otherwiſe, that one of thoſe whoſe misfortune this gentleman ſeem'd to have inſulted, accuſed him, with his his two ſons and his wife; whereupon they were all thrown into priſon together. As his wife and the children had been brought up very tenderly, and wholly unacquainted with adverſity, they ſoon grew very uneaſy under their confinement; whereupon they reſolved to make an immediate confeſſion, to which they probably had been prompted by the exhortations of their gaolers or their fellow-priſoners. Deluded by their advice, they all three accuſed the poor gentleman; and thereupon were releaſed a little after. The captain himſelf came out alſo in the next act of faith; but it was in order to be burnt as a negative convict, notwithſtanding all the proteſtations he made of his being a chriſtian, and his invoking the name of Chriſt with his laſt breath.

Alphonſe Nobre, born in Villa-Vicioſa, one of the principal gentlemen of that city, whereof he had been mayor, and prior of the mercy, was caſt into the priſon of Coimbra, upon the ſuppoſition that he was partly a new chriſtian. Some time after his ſon and daughter were ſeized; who, prompted by wicked advice, or terrified by threats, firſt accuſed themſelves, and afterwards their father, who came out in the act of faith, condemned as a negative convict. As the old gentleman was walking in the proceſſion, it happened that he paſſed cloſe by his ſon; who, ſtruck with horror at his father's ill fate, beſought him to forgive him, and to indulge him his bleſſing. I pardon you, replied his father, for having brought me into this condition thro' your baſeneſs, becauſe I hope that heaven will pardon me; but I ſhan't give you my bleſſing. He would not look upon him as his ſon, who had brought ſo much diſhonour upon himſelf; ſo that he conſented to paſs for a Jew, tho he was really a chriſtian. I beſeech God, ſays the old man, to convert and pardon you. Having ſaid theſe words, he went to death with the utmoſt conſtancy; which, added to the demonſtrations he gave of a ſincere and ſolid piety, very much raiſed the admiration of the ſpectators.

John of Siqueira, and his brother, natives of Torres Alvàs, ſons of a laundreſs, were ſeized at Lisbon about thirty-five years ago. At the ſame time was arreſted John Travaſſos da Coſta, who for ſeveral years had been vicar-general to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Lisbon. The two brothers reſolutely aſſerted their innocence; but as a great number of witneſſes had ſwore againſt them, they were condemned. The great vicar Travaſſos, who, in conſideration of his dignity, had been frequently admitted to audience, and knew how difficult it is for a perſon who is once ſeized by the inquiſitors to get out of their clutches, felt a ſudden damp upon his ſpirits, confeſſed whatever was required of him, and impeached a great number of perſons; among whom were John de Sequeira, and his brother, who in all probability were told by their fellow-priſoners that Travaſſos had depoſed againſt them. Now one of the brothers being at the audience, ſaid to the inquiſitors; gentlemen, how can it poſſibly enter into your thoughts, that a vicar-general ſhould have revealed his ſecrets to me, who being no more than the ſon of a laundreſs, ſhould have thought it honour ſufficient to have been his footman? In caſe Travaſſos has depoſed againſt me 'twas undoubtedly becauſe he imagined I ſhould play him the ſame trick; however, I heartily forgive him, as I hope for forgiveneſs from almighty God: but I proteſt, I am not guilty of one of theſe articles whereof I am now accuſed. Were I really a Jew, as you pretend me to be, why ſhould I ſcruple to own myſelf ſuch to ſave my life, ſince I have no eſtate to loſe? But I dare flatter myſelf that heaven preſents me this opportunity of working out my ſalvation by the torments I am to ſuffer in this world; and I am firmly reſolved not to loſe it. The two brothers were burnt as negative convicts, and to the laſt gaſp gave the moſt lively teſtimonies of their faith in Chriſt. In the ſame act of faith the grand vicar walked cloathed with the ſanbenito, and lived ever ſince in a miſerable manner. 'Twas even reported, that he

he declared, in his dying moments, that all he had depoſed before the inquiſitors, either againſt himſelf or others, was intirely falſe: but the holy office has no manner of regard to ſuch declarations.

Were the old chriſtians as much baited by the inquiſitors as the new ones, and were they not skreen'd from all theſe proſecutions and grievances by the bare privilege of their birth, there is no doubt but they would alſo accuſe themſelves of the ſame crimes. This we may preſume, becauſe ſince the ſtatute which ordained that the depoſitions of the new chriſtians againſt the old ones ſhould be of no force, the latter have frequently been in the ſame caſe; and that from 1535 to 1600, when this ſtatute was made, ſeveral antient chriſtians were impeached, and accuſed themſelves of judaiſm; inſomuch that one of theſe confeſſed he went to a place near a well, at a little diſtance from this city, where he expected to ſee the Meſſias riding on a goat.

But ſince, by the ſtatute above-mentioned, it has been enacted that no new chriſtian ſhould be allowed to depoſe againſt the old ones; whenever any of theſe are taken up by the inquiſitors, they have no more to do but to declare their extraction, which alone is looked upon as a very conſiderable defence; and the new chriſtians, who either from inadvertency or otherwiſe, accuſe any of the old chriſtians, are looked upon as foreſworn wretches, and as ſuch are obliged to wear the carocha in the act of faith, and afterwards are whipt and ſent to the gallies.

Baptiſt Fangueiro Cabros, born in Elvas, of the principal nobility of the country, was ſeized, and declared a new chriſtian in the eighth degree: accordingly he was tried and condemned. He afterwards confeſſed, being already hand-cuff'd, when he could no more be put to the torture, or conſequently make up by this cruel method for the defects of his confeſſion. However, being reſolutely determined to ſave his life, if poſſible, he impeached all the perſons he could poſſibly think of; and among the reſt a female Mulatto, who was related to the family of one of his uncles, on that ſide by which he was ſaid to be partly a new chriſtian. He therefore came out in the act of faith, clothed with the ſan benito de Fogo Revolto, and was ſent to the gallies. Not long after the Mulatto above-mentioned was arreſted, who made no other defence than that ſhe was an old chriſtian; and this being proved, Fangueiro was remanded back to priſon, whence he came out a ſecond time with the carocha on, was again whipt, and ſent to the gallies for five years. And inaſmuch as the captain of the galley had favoured him becauſe of his quality, and therefore diſpenſed with his doing the ſervile and painful duty to which the other ſlaves are condemned, the captain was ſent to the inquiſition, and ſeverely reprimanded for his indulgence. It may not be improper to obſerve, that Fangueiro had depoſed againſt the Mulatto, when, as he was hand-cuffed, he could not, as was before obſerved, make up the defects of his confeſſion by torture; he therefore could not eſcape death any other way than by accuſing the Mulatto who was included in the number of his accomplices; and nevertheleſs he was whipt and condemned to the gallies, for only having impeached her.

CHAP. IX.

IN this manner ſuch new chriſtians as impeach old ones are convicted of perjury; for ſince the enacting the above-mentioned ſtatute, the latter ſufficiently defend themſelves by only pleading the ſtatute, and their being antient chriſtians.

But were thoſe two expedients to fail, they undoubtedly would act as all new chriſtians are forced to do, in order to eſcape being puniſhed capitally. If it ſhould be aſked, how it comes to paſs that ſo many new chriſtians, who have accuſed themſelves of being Jews, appear in the ſeveral acts of faith? it will be anſwer'd, that were they urg'd to confeſs themſelves Calviniſts or Mahometans, moſt of them would call themſelves ſuch, or any other name that might be required of them; the barbarities of the inquiſitors being the ſole motive which forces ſo many to accuſe themſelves of crimes whereof they are wholly innocent.

Hence it is, that the ſovereign, the nobility, and the common people of Portugal being impoſed upon by theſe ſpecious appearances, look upon theſe unfortunate new chriſtians as a ſett of abominable wretches, preſuming the horrid things which are laid to their charge in the act of faith, to be all matter of fact: but could one but make them comprehend the truth of the particulars contained in theſe Memoirs, their hatred would ſoon be changed into pity; and all of them would unanimouſly endeavour to find out expedients for remedying an abuſe of ſuch horrid conſequence, which occaſions the deſtruction of a numberleſs multitude of chriſtians, by ſuffering them to paſs for Jews; a circumſtance which at the ſame time caſts the blackeſt ſtain on the Portugueſe name.

It muſt be farther obſerved, that the ſame man who was look'd upon as perjured when he depoſed againſt an antient chriſtian, is looked upon as a good witneſs when he accuſes a new one; whereas one would naturally ſuppoſe, that whoſoever depoſes falſly againſt one perſon, would do the ſame againſt another, and conſequently ought never to be received as a witneſs.

It may be objected, that ſuch as are in this manner convicted of perjury, are not look'd upon as forſworn, merely becauſe they depoſed againſt antient chriſtians, but alſo becauſe, after their being ſtrictly examin'd, they themſelves own'd their depoſition was falſe.

This objection may be eaſily anſwer'd, by juſtly affirming, that many are condemn'd as perjured who did not own themſelves to be ſo; and that even ſuch as ſeem to confeſs their being forſworn, were prompted to it from no other motive than purely to get out of their cruel confinements, to eſcape torture, and ſave their lives; in the ſame manner as they accuſe themſelves falſly to be Jews, they would accuſe themſelves of being Mahometans and idolaters, were they urged to it, and had no other way left to get out of the clutches of the inquiſitors. Were the inquiſitors as zealous in forcing their priſoners to deny what they depoſe againſt new chriſtians, as they are to make them contradict what they had ſworn againſt the old ones, they would retract equally in both caſes; but ſo far from doing this, they are burnt by the name of confeſſo revogante, i. e. one who has retracted what he had before confeſſed.

Perhaps it will be objected, that they are ſufficiently convicted of perjury, when they impeach thoſe perſons for new chriſtians who are well known to be old ones.

To

To this 'tis anſwer'd, that when they accuſe them of being new chriſtians, they really thought them ſuch. And indeed, ſo much care is at firſt taken in adviſing them not to depoſe againſt antient chriſtians, ſince, in caſe they do ſo, they will inevitably be puniſhed with great ſeverity, that 'tis manifeſt a priſoner, after having had ſuch notice given him, never pretends to impeach an old chriſtian but unknowingly; becauſe he imagines him to be a new one, and is afraid that he had depoſed againſt him before. Had not Fanguciro, whom we mention'd in the preceding chapter, been afraid of being burnt as a Diminuto, he would never have once thought of impeaching the Mulatto woman.

We don't think that the puniſhing of perjurers with ſeverity is unjuſt, but only that all ſuch who are ſo, are not puniſhed with the ſame impartiality; and that the old chriſtians are ſpared on this occaſion, who being liable to the ſame frailties with the reſt of mankind, may ſometimes be Jews, and, like the new chriſtians, ſometimes ſpeak truth, and at other times be guilty of falſhood.

In the monaſtery of the Franciſcans of Lisbon, in Campo do Curral, was a friar, a man of great learning, of a very good family, and born in that city: the name of his houſe was Travaſſos da Coſta, and 'tis ſaid that his father was regiſter of the court. This friar, tho an old chriſtian, nevertheleſs gave himſelf up intirely to Jewiſh principles; and ſo fond was he of his new belief, that he inſinuated his errors to his brethren, and endeavoured to bring them over to his own ſentiments. The friars after having attempted, but in vain, to bring him back to his former belief, were at laſt forced to impeach him to the inquiſition. Upon this he was ſeized, tried, condemned and burnt; when he proteſted in his dying moments, that he was firmly perſuaded the law of Moſes was the only true one.

In his ſentence, which was read publickly in the act of faith, or jail-delivery, he was called, partly a new chriſtian; but his relations conſidering he would thereby bring a great ſcandal upon the whole family, made their remonſtrances to the inquiſitors upon that account. They owned that their relation had been juſtly condemned and executed, ſince he had profeſſed himſelf a Jew; but they inſiſted, that as he was not a new chriſtian they ſhould not call him a Jew, which would preſerve his family from the ſhame and ignominy it would otherwiſe be expoſed to. The inquiſitors allowed them to prove what they had advanced; upon which juſtice was done them. The words which had been written under the ſentence of the deceaſed were erazed, and they were recognized true antient chriſtians. Here we ſee an antient chriſtian turn Jew, and perſiſt in his errors with his laſt breath.

Francis de Alevido Cabras, a native of Elvas, ſon to Andrew Martin Cabras, and one of the principal gentlemen of that city, was a ſworn enemy to all the new chriſtians, ſo that he never failed to perſecute them grievouſly, whenever he had the leaſt opportunity for it. His behaviour was the occaſion, that when a report having been ſpread, that his mother had inherited, by one of her grandfathers, ſome of the blood of the new chriſtians; notwithſtanding all the reſt of her anceſtors, both by father and mother, had been old chriſtians, ſome perſons depoſed againſt Alevido and Donna Britta de Sigueira his aunt, his mother's ſiſter; whereupon they were both ſeized. Francis de Alevido accuſed himſelf immediately, and appeared in the proceſſion as reconciled; that is, clothed in the ſan benito.

He was no ſooner returned to the houſe of his father, whoſe name was Andrew Martin, but the latter, exaſperated againſt him for the ignominy he had brought upon himſelf and all his family, immediately turned him out of doors, and ſent him to Spain. He continued for ſome time in that kingdom, turned Franciſcan friar, and afterwards returned to Portugal, where the religious of his order obliged him to quit the habit, and declared his profeſſion invalid, becauſe he had been impriſoned in the inquiſition.

inquiſition. Whereupon he came out from thence a jewiſh convict, as was manifeſt from his own confeſſion; ſo that ever ſince the concluſion of the peace between Spain and Portugal, he reſided at Elvas, and wore a lay habit.

As for Donna Britta de Siqueira his aunt, ſhe acted in a quite different manner from what her nephew had done. To juſtify herſelf, ſhe ſaid ſhe was an old chriſtian, and was ſet at liberty after her being acknowledged ſuch; whence it was manifeſt that Francis de Alevido was not a new chriſtian, as he was ſuppoſed to be.

The witneſſes who depoſed againſt Donna Britta, came out with carochas; were whipt and ſent to the gallies. Francis de Alevido was again ſeized, and after having been impriſon'd a conſiderable time, he came out with a carocha, and was baniſhed Portugal for two years; and that becauſe he, being an antient chriſtian, had accuſed himſelf falſly of Judaiſm, and for having prejudiced a great number of people by his falſe depoſitions. Here again we ſee an old chriſtian condemned as a Jew by his own confeſſion, and afterwards convicted of accuſing himſelf and others falſly.

Francis Lopes Margalho, a native of Elvas, univerſally known to be an old chriſtian, upon his wife's being ſeized by the inquiſitors, reſolved to accuſe himſelf immediately; and having a nephew, Emanuel Lopes Torras by name, he exhorted him to imitate what he had done. His nephew anſwered he would not; becauſe, ſays he, I am an old chriſtian: but this however did not keep his uncle from going to the inquiſition, as he had before reſolved. Nevertheleſs his nephew proved his extraction, and was not moleſted. He was ſon to Margalho's own brother. We leave theſe examples to the reader's conſideration.

Antonio Gonſalves, born in Olivença, and living in Cabanas in the dioceſe of Viſeo, known and proved an old chriſtian, was impriſoned in the inquiſition, and came out from thence with the ſan benito in the act of faith in 1660.

Meya Noite, born in Abrantes, being undeniably an old chriſtian, was the ſworn enemy of the new chriſtians, which was his ruin. This man, who might juſtly be called a bully, always diſcovered the greateſt joy and ſatisfaction, whenever he ſaw any new chriſtian impriſoned in the inquiſition; when he uſed to inſult them, and often follow them to the very gate of the priſon, calling them Jews, and loading them with a thouſand imprecations. This cruel uſage exaſperated all the new chriſtians to ſuch a degree, that twelve of them conſpired together to ruin him: theſe made a reſolution, that in caſe they ſhould be ſeized, they would unanimouſly accuſe Meya Noite of judaizing in concert with them; and agreed upon what they ſhould ſay, in order that their depoſitions might concur in every circumſtance: They were afterwards all ſeized, when every one in particular accuſing himſelf, ſwore, that ſuch a day, in ſuch a place, and on ſuch an occaſion, the above-mentioned Meya Noite, with ſuch and ſuch perſons, naming the other eleven, had mutually declared that they lived in obedience to the Moſaical inſtitutions: and upon the inquiſitors aſking each of them in particular, whether Meya Noite were a new chriſtian? each of them, as had been before concerted, anſwered, that he knew nothing of that matter; but that in the indictment in queſtion, the ſaid Meya Noite told them he was chriſtiam novo, and that they had believed him upon his affirming himſelf to be ſo. With this precaution theſe twelve evidences extricated themſelves out of the danger, to which all ſuch (ſince this ſtatute) are inevitably expoſed, who have impeached an old chriſtian of judaizing. This unhappy man having been carried to priſon, and finding himſelf thus accuſed by the concurrent teſtimony of twelve perſons (a circumſtance that never happen'd in the inquiſition, at leaſt ſuch another has never ſince occurr'd) found it impoſſible for him to invalidate them. And as he was not of a very conſiderable family, and could not tell the name of one of his great grandfathers, tho univerſally known to be an antient chriſtian, he had the name of partly a new chriſtian given given him; whereupon he was tried, condemn'd and burnt, tho he cried aloud, all the way he went to execution, that he was an old chriſtian.

From theſe ſeveral inſtances we may juſtly affirm, that the inquiſitors not only forbear to employ the neceſſary expedients for improving true religion and ſuppreſſing Judaiſm; but, on the contrary, ſeem by their rigours in their cruelties, and other barbarities ſo oppoſite to the maxims of equity and juſtice, to endeavour only to oblige thoſe to embrace the Jewiſh religion, who are really chriſtians, by forcing them to impeach themſelves and others, of crimes they never once had the thoughts of committing.

CHAP. X.

The following is extracted from Dellon's Inquiſition of Goa. Deſcription of that INQUISITION.

THE priſon of the inquiſition, called by the Portugueſe, Santa Caſa or holy Houſe, ſtands on one ſide of the great ſquare before the cathedral, dedicated to S. Catherine. 'Tis a large and magnificent edifice. In the front are three gates, whereof the middle one is the largeſt, which is at the foot of the great ſtair-caſe that leads to the great hall to be mentioned hereafter. The two gates on each ſide, lead to the apartment of the inquiſitors, each of which is vaſtly ſpacious. Beſides theſe there are ſeveral other apartments, for the officers of the priſon. Beyond theſe is a large building, divided into ſeveral leſſer ones two ſtory high, ſeparated from one another by lower courts. On each ſtory is a gallery in form of a dormitory, divided into ſeven or eight cells or dungeons, each ten foot ſquare, and are about two hundred in number.

Some of theſe cells are very dark, having no window, and receiving the light only by the door; theſe cells are ſmaller and lower than the reſt. One day when I complained about that in which I myſelf was confined, I was carried to one of the above-mentioned, to ſhew me that I might have been uſed ſtill more rigorouſly in that particular. All the other dungeons but the laſt mentioned are ſquare, arch'd, white-waſh'd, neat, and enlightned by a grate, to which there is no ſhutter, and which ſtands ſo high, that the talleſt man cannot reach up to it.

The walls of theſe cells are five foot thick in every part, and each cell has an inner and an outer door; that on the inſide the wall is in the manner of a folding door, is made very ſtrong with iron bars, and open about half way at the lower part, like a grate. At top is a little window (or wicket) by which the priſoners receive their victuals, linen, and ſuch things as can go thro' it. This wicket is lock'd up, and farther ſecured with two ſtrong bolts.

The inner door is not ſo ſtrong as the outward one, but is of one intire piece, and not open in any part. 'Tis generally left open from ſix in the morning till eleven, to let in the air thro' the grates of the other door, in order that theſe dungeons may be leſs noxious. This ſecond door, like the firſt, is always ſhut all the reſt of the day.

To each of the priſoners is allowed, an earthen pot fill'd with water for waſhing; another water-veſſel called Gurguleta, alſo filled with water for drinking, with a pucaro, or diſh made of a kind of red earth commonly found in the Indies, which is of wonderful uſe in keeping the water ſweet. They have likewiſe a broom to ſweep their cells; a mat which is ſpread on a kind of bedſtead, on which they lye; a large veſſel to eaſe nature in, that is emptied every four days; a pot to cover it, in which they alſo throw the duſt, &c. they ſweep up.

The priſoners eat the food of the country. The blacks are fed with cangé or rice-water, rice, and a little fry'd fiſh; and the whites have the ſame food except that they are allowed ſome fruit, and a little meat every thurſday and ſunday for their dinners, but not a morſel at ſupper, not even on eaſter-ſunday. This regimen is obſerved both for thriftineſs, and to mortify the priſoners, who are ſaid to have incurr'd the greater excommunication; as alſo to prevent what the Indians call mordechi, or an indigeſtion that is but too frequent, and of the moſt dangerous conſequence in thoſe ſultry climates, and particularly ſince the priſoners lead ſuch ſedentary lives.

This diſtemper generally begins by a violent fever, which is attended with ſhiverings; and purges upwards, which is ſoon followed by the death of the patient, in caſe a remedy is not immediately applied. There is one which is uſually employed by the Indians on theſe occaſions, becauſe daily experience proves it to be a ſpecific, and if omitted is of the moſt dangerous conſequence.

Their remedy is the applying a piece of iron red-hot to the patient's foot, at the moſt callous part of the heel. A ſpit or bar is made uſe of for this purpoſe, which is applied croſs-wiſe, and held to the part above-mentioned till ſuch time as the violence of the burning forces the patient to cry out. However, this does not put him to much pain, nor prevent his walking about immediately after with the ſame caſe as before, unleſs he has ſome other hurt. This remedy, provided it be taken in time, is generally infallible; and a man, who in caſe had it not been applied, would have run the hazard of his life, is often inſtantaneouſly cured by this ſimple remedy. We are to obſerve, that bleeding is of very dangerous conſequence in theſe diſtempers; and that a phyſician upon his firſt coming to the Indies, muſt take great care not to miſtake on theſe occaſions, ſince it might be of the moſt pernicious conſequence.

Sometimes phyſicians and ſurgeons viſit the ſick; but tho a priſoner be never ſo ſick, neither the viaticum or extreme unction are adminiſtred to him, nor does he ever hear a ſermon or maſs.

Such as die in priſon are buried in it without the leaſt ceremony; and in caſe they are judged by the inquiſitors to have merited death, their bones are burnt in the next gaol-delivery or act of faith.

As 'tis very ſultry in the Indies, and the inquiſitors don't allow the priſoners to have beds, they never have fire, candle, or any light but that of the ſun. With regard to beds, there are two bedſteads in each cell; becauſe they are ſometimes forced to confine two priſoners in the ſame dungeon. Beſides the mat which is allowed to every one, the Europeans, and perſons of ſome diſtinction, have a counterpain, which being doubled, ſerves them inſtead of a mattraſs; but ſeldom have coverlets, becauſe of the violent heat of the Indian climate, unleſs it be to guard againſt a kind of gnats, whereof there are vaſt quantities in theſe countries, and which are inexpreſſibly troubleſome.

CHAP.

CHAP. XI.

Of the officers of that tribunal, and their behaviour to the priſoners; from DELLON.

THere are two inquiſitors of Goa, the firſt whereof called Inquiſidor Mor, or the grand inquiſitor, is always a ſecular prieſt; and the ſecond, a Dominican friar. There are other officers of the inquiſition called Deputados do ſanto officio, who are more in number, and are of other religious orders. Theſe aſſiſt at the pronouncing ſentence on the criminal, and at the examination and preparation of the trial; but they never come into court, unleſs the inquiſitors ſend for them. There are other officers called Calificadores do ſanto officio, who examine all books which are ſuſpected to contain any tenets againſt the faith. Theſe are never preſent at the pronouncing ſentence, nor ever come into court but to give an account of what they have tranſacted in thoſe particulars committed to their charge.

There is moreover a proctor, an attorney and counſellors for ſuch priſoners as deſire them; but theſe, inſtead of defending them, only betray and pump their ſecrets out of them. And tho there were no room to doubt of their fidelity and ſincerity; yet their ſuccour and protection would be of little ſervice to the priſoners, ſince they are never allowed to ſpeak to them but in preſence of their judges, or other perſons appointed by the inquiſitors, to give them an account of all that paſſes.

There are alſo other officers of the inquiſition called Familiares do ſanto officio, who are properly the ſergeants of the inquiſition. People of the higheſt quality are proud of the employment, which is to ſeize thoſe who are impeached by the tribunal; which generally ſends a familiar of the ſame quality with the perſon who is to be arreſted. Theſe officers have no ſalary, but think the honour of their poſt a ſufficient recompence. All of them wear a badge of honour, a gold medal on which the arms of the inquiſition are engraved. Whenever a familiar is to ſeize a perſon, he goes unattended; when he declares to the priſoner that the inquiſitors have ſent for him. At the pronouncing of theſe words, the priſoner is obliged to follow forthwith, ſince, were he to make the leaſt reſiſtance, he would immediately be ſeized by an hundred perſons.

Beſides theſe officers, there are alſo ſecretaries; real ſergeants, called meirinhos; an alcaide or jailor, and turnkeys to ſecure the priſoners, and to carry them victuals and other neceſſaries.

As all the priſoners are commonly ſeparated, and that two are very ſeldom put into the ſame cell, four turnkeys are ſufficient to ſecure two hundred. The priſoners are obliged to be perpetually ſilent; and did any of them preſume to complain, to cry, or even pray with too loud a voice, they would run the hazard of being ſeverely beat by the turnkeys; for the moment theſe hear the leaſt noiſe, they immediately run to the place whence it comes, to command ſilence; and in caſe the priſoner does not obey after the firſt or ſecond notice, they open the door of his dungeon, and beat him moſt unmercifully. This ſeverity is not only of ſervice in puniſhing ſuch as offend, but to frighten the reſt of the priſoners, who all hear the cries and blows, becauſe of the deep ſilence that reigns all over the priſon.

The jailor and his turnkeys are continually in the galleries, and lie in them.

The inquiſitor attended by a ſecretary and an interpreter, viſits all the priſoners every two months, or thereabouts; on which occaſion he aſks them whether they want any thing? whether their meats are brought them at the ſtated hours? and whether they have no complaints to make againſt the turnkeys? To theſe queſtions the ſecretary writes down the ſeveral anſwers; which being done, the door is immediately ſhut.

However theſe viſitations are purely for form ſake, and to give a ſpecious colour to the juſtice and humanity of the tribunal, but are never of the leaſt ſervice to ſuch perſons who are ſo ſilly as to complain; ſo far from it, that they are treated much more cruelly upon that account.

The wealthy priſoners are not better fed than the pooreſt among them, and the latter are ſubſiſted out of the confiſcations of the former; the inquiſitors ever confiſcating all the goods and chattels of their priſoners.

CHAP. XII.

Of the formalities obſerved in the INQUISITION.

WHen a perſon is ſeized, his name, profeſſion or quality, and age are aſked. This being done, he is charitably exhorted to diſcover his whole ſubſtance; and that he may be the more willingly induced to do this, they aſſure him in the name of Chriſt Jeſus, that in caſe he is innocent, every thing ſhall be faithfully reſtored him; and on the other ſide, tho he ſhould be cleared, all the effects that ſhall be afterwards found, which he himſelf had not revealed, ſhall be certainly confiſcated, tho he ſhould be cleared. But as people form to themſelves the moſt advantageous idea of the piety and integrity of the judges of this tribunal; a priſoner who is innocent, and conſequently is fully perſuaded he ſhall be cleared, makes no ſcruple of diſcloſing to the inquiſitors the greateſt and moſt important ſecrets of his family and affairs.

The publick indeed has ſome reaſon to be prejudiced in favour of the inquiſitors, ſince there is no tribunal in the world, where juſtice is exerciſed with ſo much humanity; but then this is mere ſhew and outſide. Such as voluntarily accuſe themſelves, and diſcover their repentance before their being ſeiz'd, are ſeldom impriſon'd; but on the other ſide, all who do not accuſe themſelves before their impriſonment, are reputed guilty and condemned as ſuch. There muſt be ſeven witneſſes to condemn a man; and when a priſoner confeſſes his guilt, the inquiſitors are ſatisfied with excommunicating his perſon, and confiſcating his goods and chattels. But in caſe he's ſo unhappy as to fall a ſecond time into their clutches, they then give him over to the ſecular arm, but firſt obtain a promiſe from the ſecular judges, that in caſe they reſolve to put the priſoner to death, it ſhall at leaſt be without effuſion of blood. Surprizing gentleneſs and humanity! But we muſt add ſome circumſtances to ſhew what is to be expected from this ſpecious humanity. The witneſſes are never confronted; the vileſt wretches are received as evidences, and even thoſe whoſe intereſt it is to get the priſoner executed. The priſoner is not allowed to challenge the moſt notorious evidences, and ſuch as are leaſt capable of depoſing againſt him; and theſe ſeven witneſſes are frequently reduced to five. Among theſe ſeven witneſſes, the pretended accomplices are included, whoſe evidence is extorted from them by the rack, and have no other way to ſave their lives than by accuſing themſelves falſly. The priſoner priſoner himſelf is included in the number of witneſſes, who, tho he accuſes himſelf falſly upon the rack, is nevertheleſs admitted an evidence againſt himſelf. Nay, theſe ſeven are frequently reduced to none at all, becauſe they are in reality only pretended accomplices, who are wholly innocent of the crimes laid to their charge; but whom the inquiſitors render guilty, by forcing them, either by the rack, or menaces of fire, to accuſe innocent perſons in order to ſave their own lives. In order to give the reader an idea of this myſtery; he is to know, that of the ſeveral crimes whereof the inquiſitors may take cognizance, ſome are of ſuch a nature that one perſon only is guilty, as for inſtance, blaſphemy, impiety, &c. Others there are which cannot be perpetrated without one accomplice at leaſt; as ſodomy; and others again, which cannot be committed without ſeveral accomplices, as the having aſſiſted at the judaical ſabbath; or the being preſent in thoſe ſuperſtitious aſſemblies, that converted idolaters find it ſo hard a matter to quit; and which are looked upon as magical and diabolical, becauſe they are held in order to diſcover ſecrets, and pry into futurity, by ſupernatural methods.

'Tis particularly with regard to ſuch crimes as cannot be perpetrated without one or more accomplices, that the inquiſitors act after a moſt extraordinary manner.

The Jews having been driven out of Spain, by Ferdinand king of Arragon and Iſabella queen of Caſtile, fled to Portugal, where they were protected, upon condition they would turn chriſtians. This they did, at leaſt in outward appearance; and as their very name is odious in all places, the chriſtian families have been diſtinguiſhed from the converted jewiſh ever ſince that time; inſomuch that the people now call thoſe who are deſcended from theſe in any degree ſoever Chriſtiams novos, or new chriſtians: and becauſe that in proceſs of time, ſome of theſe converted Jews married with antient chriſtians, their poſterity are every day reproached with being partly new chriſtians, which in the Portugueſe language is tem parte de chriſtiam novo. In this manner theſe unhappy wretches, tho their grandfathers and fathers were chriſtians, have not yet been able to get themſelves admitted among thoſe who are called Chriſtiam velhos or old chriſtians. And as the families, which are thus deſcended directly or partly from thoſe Jews, are diſtinctly known in Portugal, and are deteſted and hated by the reſt; they are therefore obliged to unite themſelves more ſtrongly in friendſhip, in order to do reciprocal ſervices, which they cannot expect from old chriſtians; and 'tis this ſtrict union that increaſes the hatred and averſion of the latter, and is uſually the cauſe of all their misfortunes.

CHAP. XIII.

TO give the reader a perfect idea of this matter, we will ſuppoſe that a new chriſtian, who nevertheleſs is a ſincere chriſtian, and really deſcended from the unfortunate families above-mentioned, is ſeized by order of the inquiſitors, and not only accuſed by ſeven witneſſes, but fifty. As a perſon, in theſe circumſtances, who is conſcious of his innocence, which he flatters himſelf to make appear, will make no ſcruple to give in to his judges an exact inventory of all his goods and chattels, not doubting but they will be faithfully reſtored to him: but he is very much miſtaken; for the inquiſitors have no ſooner confined him, but they order every thing to be ſold by auction, well knowing they ſhall never reſtore them to him.

After the priſoner has been confined for ſome months, he is called to audience, and aſked if he knows the reaſons why he is impriſoned? and as he always anſwers in the negative, he is exhorted to think ſeriouſly of that matter, and to reveal it, ſince 'tis the only way left him to get an immediate releaſe; upon which he is remanded to his cell. Some time after he is again ſent for to audience, and examined ſeveral times; when he makes the ſame anſwer. At laſt, a little before the auto da fe, the proctor comes to him and declares, that ſeveral perſons have accuſed him of judaizing; that is, of having obſerved the ceremonies of the moſaick law, ſuch as the abſtaining from ſwines fleſh, hares, &c. of meeting and ſolemnizing the ſabbath, and other particulars. He is then conjured by the bowels of the mercy of Chriſt Jeſus (for theſe are the very words) to make a voluntary confeſſion of his crimes, as there is no other way left him to ſave his life; and that the holy office does its utmoſt to preſerve it. As we ſuppoſe the priſoner innocent, he perſiſts in denying the charge, whereupon he is condemned as a convicto negativo, or a negative convict; that is, to the flames.

However, he is frequently exhorted to accuſe himſelf, and told that in caſe he does it the evening before the jail-delivery, he may eſcape the flames; but if he perſiſts in declaring his innocence, he is at laſt told that he is condemned to die, and this is done the friday before the ſunday of his coming out. This he is told in preſence of a tipſtaff or ſergeant belonging to the ſecular tribunal, who thereupon ties his hands with a cord, to ſhew that he takes poſſeſſion of him after his being abandoned by the eccleſiaſtical juſtice. At the ſame time a confeſſor is ſent to him, who continues with him day and night, and is perpetually urging him to confeſs the crimes which are laid to his charge, in order to ſave his life; but a perſon who is innocent is ſtrangely perplexed on this occaſion; for if he perſiſts to plead not guilty till ſunday, he then is inhumanly burnt on that day; and in caſe he pleads guilty, he makes himſelf infamous as long as he lives. But on the other ſide, if the exhortations of the confeſſor, and the dread of puniſhment prompt him to confeſs himſelf guilty of crimes whereof he is truly innocent, he then muſt deſire to be admitted to audience, which favour is ever immediately allowed to priſoners. As ſoon as he is come before the judge, he muſt immediately plead guilty, and then ſue for mercy, as well in conſideration of his crimes, as his obſtinacy in having ſo long denied them; and as 'tis ſuppoſed that he accuſes himſelf ſincerely, he is obliged to give the moſt minute detail of all his crimes; and this innocent perſon, who has been told the ſeveral depoſitions of his witneſſes, has no more to do, in order to ſatisfy what is required of him, than to repeat what was before told him.

He then poſſibly ſuppoſes that his troubles are at an end, but alas! is very much miſtaken, he being obliged to ſubmit to many other things, which are infinitely more ſhocking than any thing which has been hitherto; for the inquiſitors never fail to addreſs him as follows: If thou haſt lived in obedience to the moſaic law; if thou haſt been preſent in aſſemblies on the ſabbath, as thou confeſſeſt to have done, and thy accuſers were there alſo, as 'tis probable they were; 'twill then be neceſſary for thee, in order to convince us of the ſincerity of thy confeſſion, to name not only thy accuſers, but likewiſe all who were preſent with thee in thoſe aſſemblies.

One cannot eaſily diſcover the motive which prompts the inquiſitors to force theſe pretended Jews to gueſs the names of thoſe who ſwore againſt them, unleſs it be that the witneſſes with regard to the ſabbath are his accomplices; but how will it be poſſible for an innocent man to gueſs them? or ſuppoſing him guilty, what ſignifies his naming to the inquiſitors ſuch perſons as he knows, ſince they have received their depoſitions; and that the priſoner is pronounced guilty, merely on their affidavits? In all other caſes, they will not permit a criminal to know any evidence whom he will except againſt, but on the contrary will oblige him to gueſs it. If we ſhould ſuppoſe them accomplices, the inquiſitors won't be better acquainted with them for his telling their names; in caſe they have been forced to confeſs their crimes in the priſon of the inquiſition, they either have been or are ſtill confined in them, and the inquiſitors have no intereſt to make the priſoners gueſs their names; he will not be more innocent, nor they leſs guilty upon that account. The priſoner, and thoſe who depoſe againſt him, are equally in the power of the inquiſitors; what therefore can be the intereſt of thoſe judges, unleſs it be to prevail with the priſoner to accuſe all his accomplices, by endeavouring to gueſs the names of all his accomplices? This may be of ſome ſervice, in caſe he be really guilty; but if he be innocent, the forcing him to gueſs the names of people he knows nothing of, cannot but put him into a great dilemma, and this muſt unavoidably happen; for as this poor new chriſtian is ſaid to name perſons with whom he is wholly unacquainted, to the inquiſitors who know them very well, (ſince otherwiſe the confeſſing himſelf guilty of a crime whereof he is wholly innocent, would not ſave him from the flames) the priſoner, I ſay, muſt neceſſarily argue as follows: None but my relations, my friends or neighbours, can poſſibly have impeached me; and ſome of the new chriſtians I uſed to frequent, for the old chriſtians are very ſeldom ſuſpected or troubled about judaiſm; and perhaps the perſons I hint at, have been reduced to the ſame unhappy circumſtances with myſelf: I therefore muſt accuſe them all in my turn. But as it is ſcarce poſſible for the priſoner to gueſs the names of all who depoſed againſt him, he is obliged, in order to hit upon the names of the ſix or ſeven perſons who depoſed againſt him, to accuſe a great number of innocent perſons who never ſo much as thought of him. However, he is obliged to ſwear againſt them, as ſoon as he has once made ſuch a declaration, which alone is a motive ſufficient to cauſe ſuch perſons to be ſeized, and to be confined in the priſons of the inquiſition, till ſeven witneſſes can be ſuborned to accuſe them falſly, as the perſon whom I here inſtanced; and frequently many unfortunate perſons are burnt, tho their accuſations are as unjuſt as thoſe above-mentioned.

CHAP. XIV.

Sequel of the formalities and injuſtice of the tribunal of the INQUISITION.

THIS plain from what has been ſaid in the foregoing chapter, that the miſerable victims of the inquiſition impeach one another, and conſequently that a man may be wholly innocent tho fifty perſons are to ſwear againſt him; nevertheleſs, this ſame unhappy man, notwithſtanding his innocence, upon his refuſing to accuſe himſelf, or his ill fate in not gueſſing thoſe who ſwore againſt him, is delivered over to the executioner, as a criminal who is ſuppoſed to be ſufficiently convicted. But this would happen leſs frequently, were care taken to confront the proſecutors, witneſſes and the priſoner.

Whatever is practiſed with regard to perſons ſuſpected (by ſubornation) of judaiſm, and all that has been juſt now related, is to be underſtood of perſons ſuſpected of incantations, becauſe ſuch are ſuppoſed to have been preſent in the ſuperſtitious aſſemblies above-mentioned. The difficulty of gueſſing the names of their evidences is ſtill greater, becauſe they have not the opportunity, like the new chriſtians, to ſearch for their evidences and accomplices, among one particular branch of men; but are obliged to gueſs at random, and to call over all their relations, acquaintance, friend friends and enemies, of all profeſſions; which throws the innocent perſons into a ſtill greater perplexity, becauſe they are obliged, in theſe fortuitous and forced accuſations, to name a greater number, in order that they may be able, among a croud of innocent perſons, to gueſs thoſe witneſſes about whom they are examined.

The goods and chattels of ſuch as are condemned to die, and of thoſe who eſcape death by a voluntrary confeſſion, are equally confiſcated, becauſe they are all reputed guilty; and as the inquiſitors thirſt leſs after a man's life than his wealth, and that purſuant to the laws of that tribunal, ſuch only as have relapſed, and others who will not confeſs their guilt, are delivered over to the ſecular arm; the judges ſet every engine at work, in order to oblige the priſoners to confeſs, and never fail to put them to torture upon theſe occaſions. They have even the inhumanity to torture them in the ſevereſt manner, in order to ſave their lives, by forcing them to plead guilty. But the true reaſon why they ſo earneſtly deſire that all priſoners ſhould accuſe themſelves, is, becauſe when once a man has pleaded guilty, no one can afterwards doubt but his goods and chattels were juſtly confiſcated; and that by pardoning thoſe pretended criminals, they deceive the ſimple and ignorant by a ſpecious appearance of juſtice and humanity, which does not a little contribute to perſuade the publick of the ſanctity and juſtice of this tribunal; which, were it not for this artifice, would ſoon fall to the ground. It may be proper to obſerve in this place, that all who have in this manner eſcaped the flames by a forced confeſſion, are obliged to inform the world, as ſoon as they are releaſed by the inquiſitors, that they have been treated with great humanity and tenderneſs, in ſparing their lives, when they juſtly merited to die: and were a man, after having pleaded guilty, to pretend to juſtify himſelf after his releaſe, he would immediately be impeached; when he would be ſeized and burnt in the next act of faith, without any hopes of pardon.

'Tis therefore certain, that many chriſtians are put to death merely thro' a falſe accuſation, and tho they were but imperfectly convicted of judaizing: this the inquiſitors would ſoon find, would they but give themſelves the trouble to examine matters coolly, and without prejudice; and recollect that of an hundred perſons who are condemned to the flames as Jews, ſcarce four profeſs that faith in their dying moments. The reſt cry out with their lateſt breath that they are chriſtians, have been ſo all their life-time, and that they worſhip Chriſt as the ſole, the true God; and that their hopes are grounded wholly on his mercy, and the merits of his precious blood. But neither the cries nor the expoſtulations of thoſe unhappy creatures, (if we may give that name to perſons who ſuffer for the ſake of truth) make the leaſt impreſſion on their bloody judges, who think, that ſo clear and authentick a confeſſion, which ſuch a multitude of people make of their faith, as they go to execution, does not merit the leaſt reflection; but, on the contrary, ſuppoſe that the bare apprehenſion of torments, which forces a certain number of witneſſes to accuſe innocent perſons, will alone ſecure them from divine vengeance. If ſo many chriſtians, who are branded with judaiſm, are unjuſtly delivered over to the ſecular arm, in all the tribunals of the inquiſition, there is no leſs, or leſs frequent injuſtice committed, with regard to ſuch as are accuſed of magick or incantation, in the Indies, and are thereupon condemned to the flames. And to exhibit this clearly to the reader, we are to obſerve that the heathens, who have a great number of ſuperſtitious practices, in their inquiring, for inſtance, the ſucceſs of an affair, or of a fit of ſickneſs? whether a perſon loves us? who has ſtole a thing? and ſuch like: we muſt, I ſay, obſerve that theſe heathens can neither ſo well, or ſo ſoon lay aſide theſe things, as not frequently to uſe them after their baptiſm. But this will not be thought ſo particular, if we reflect that in France, where the chriſtian religion has been ſo long eſtabliſhed, we nevertheleſs meet a great number of perſons who believe and practiſe impertinent ceremonies, which ſo long a ſeries of years has not been

been able to obliterate. We are farther to obſerve, that theſe lately-converted heathens, have ſpent the greateſt part of their lives in the pagan religion, and that ſuch of them as live under the Portugueſe government, in the Indies, are either ſubjects or ſlaves, who ſeldom change their religion upon any other motive, but in hopes of being better treated by their maſters. Neverthleſs ſuch faults, as they are committed by unenlightned and ignorant perſons, ought at moſt to be puniſhed with whipping, are nevertheleſs expiated by fire, in caſe they plead not guilty a ſecond time, after having confeſſed the firſt; or perſiſt in pleading not guilty the firſt time. The inquiſitors not only puniſh ſuch chriſtians as are guilty, or are pretended to be guilty of thoſe crimes whereof they take cognizance; but alſo Mahometans, heathens, or others, of what religion ſoever, who have perpetrated any one of theſe crimes, or have followed their religious worſhip in any of the dominions ſubject to the king of Portugal. For notwithſtanding that the king allows liberty of conſcience, the inquiſitors interpret their privilege in ſuch a manner, as to permit foreigners to profeſs their reſpective religions, but puniſh all thoſe who preſume to exerciſe it in any manner. And as his Portugueſe majeſty has many more Mahometan and heathen ſubjects, than chriſtian in his dominions in the Eaſt-Indies, and that the inquiſitors, who put to death all chriſtians who have relapſed, never condemn ſuch to death as were never baptized, tho they were to relapſe an hundred times into the ſame guilt, and are at moſt puniſhed either with baniſhment, whipping, or the gallies; the dread of being puniſhed with death, hinders great numbers from embracing the chriſtian religion. Thus the holy office, ſo far from being of advantage to the faith in thoſe countries, drives people from the church, and makes them conſider it with horror.

The perpetual chain of accuſations, which muſt neceſſarily follow from the particulars we have now related, and the liberty which all men have to impeach thoſe againſt whom they may have conceived malice, is the occaſion that the priſons of the inquiſition are ſeldom empty. And notwithſtanding there is an act of faith or jail-delivery, every two or three years at fartheſt, there are nevertheleſs two hundred perſons or more, tried every ſeſſions.

CHAP. XV.

Some particulars relating to the OFFICERS of the INQUISITION.

THere are four inquiſitions in the whole extent of the Portugueſe dominions, viz. in Portugal thoſe of Lisbon, Coimbra, and Evora; and that of Goa in the Eaſt-Indies. Theſe tribunals are all ſovereign, and have no appeal from them. The juriſdiction of that of Goa extends over the ſeveral countries poſſeſſed by the king of Portugal, on the other ſide the Cape of good hope. Beſides theſe four tribunals, there is alſo the great council of the inquiſition, in which the inquiſitor-general preſides. This tribunal is the principal, and it is made acquainted with whatever is done in all other places: Beſides the honour, the unbounded authority, and the ſalaries annex'd to the employments of inquiſitors, there are alſo two circumſtances that are vaſtly beneficial to them. The firſt is, whenever they expoſe the effects of any priſoner to ſale by auction, if there is any precious jewel, or any ſuch thing among them, which they are deſirous of, they have no more to do but to ſend one of their ſervants to bid, and no body will preſume to outbid them; by which means they often purchaſe very valuable things for a trifle. The ſecond method by which they make a great advantage is, that as the ſums ariſing from the confiſcations are put into the king's treaſury, they are empower'd to draw a warrant upon it for whatſoever ſums, and at what time ſoever they pleaſe, to defray the expences and private exigencies of the inquiſition. This money is paid at ſight, nor does any perſon preſume to inquire what thoſe private exigencies are, by which means they get the greateſt part of monies ariſing from confiſcations.

The king nominates all the inquiſitors, who are confirmed by the pope, and from him they receive all their bulls. The inquiſitor of Goa only aſſumes the privilege of being carried in a chair, and he is much more reſpected than either the archbiſhop or the viceroy. He has juriſdiction over all perſons, both eccleſiaſtical and ſecular, the archbiſhop, his great vicar who is commonly a biſhop, the viceroy, and the governor when the viceroy is dead, excepted. But he has the power of arreſting any of theſe, after having firſt given notice thereof to the court of Portugal, and received ſecret orders for that purpoſe from the ſupreme council of Lisbon, called conſelho ſupremo. This ſovereign tribunal meets every fortnight, except upon extraordinary occaſions, when they meet oftner; whereas the ordinary councils meet twice every day, viz. from eight in the morning till eleven, and from two till four, ſometimes later in the afternoon, eſpecially when the acts of faith draw near; for on thoſe occaſions the audience is frequently continued till after ten at night.

When cauſes are tried, beſides the Deputados who aſſiſt, the archbiſhops or biſhops of the ſeveral places where the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed, have the privilege of being preſent in them, and to preſide in all the ſentences pronounced againſt them.

The priſon of the inquiſition of Goa, is a moſt dark, dirty, ſtinking, dreadful place, and it's impoſſible for imagination to form a worſe: 'tis called Aljouvar by the Portugueſe, and is a kind of cellar, at which the light enters only by a ſmall hole, into which the ſun-beams never enter. It caſts a dreadful ſtench; nor have the priſoners any other place to eaſe nature in, than a great hole like a well, level with the ground, and in the midſt of the cavern; whence it is, that part of the filth lies round the hole; for which reaſon moſt of the priſoners eaſe themſelves in different parts of the cavern.

Here follows the manner in which Dellon tells us he was brought to audience:

When I found, ſays he, that I was kept a whole day and night in the Aljouvar, without being examined, I began to flatter myſelf that I might continue in it till my affair was concluded; but all my hopes vaniſhed, when an officer of the inquiſition came the 16th of January at eight in the morning, and brought orders for carrying us to the Santa Caſa, which was immediately executed.

The irons with which I was loaded, made walking very painful to me; however, we were obliged to walk on foot thus fetter'd, from the Aljouvar to the inquiſition. I was helped in going up the ſtairs, when I entered with my companions the great hall, where ſeveral ſmiths knock'd off our irons; which being done I was firſt called to audience.

After having croſs'd the hall, I went into an antichamber, and from thence into another apartment, where I found my judge. This place is called by the Portugueſe Meſa do Santo Officio, i. e. the table or tribunal of the holy office. It was hung with blue and yellow taffety. At one end of it is a large crucifix in relievo, placed againſt the hangings, and reaching up almoſt to the cieling. In the middle of the chamber is a large alcove, on which is fixed a table near fifteen foot long and four over. There was alſo over the alcove, two eaſy chairs and ſeveral other ſeats round the table, and at the end, on one ſide of the crucifix, was the ſecretary ſeated on a folding chair. I was placed at the other end, oppoſite to the ſecretary; very near me, and at my right hand was ſeated, in one of theſe eaſy chairs, the great inquiſitor of the Indies, Franciſco Delgado e Matos, a ſecular prieſt, about forty. He was alone, becauſe then, of the two inquiſitors who are generally in Goa, the ſecond, who is always always a Dominican friar, was embarked for Portugal a little while before, and the king had not yet nominated any perſon to ſucceed him.

At my coming into the hall of audience, I threw myſelf at the feet of my judge, imagining the ſuppliant poſture I was in, would move him to compaſſion; but he would not ſuffer me to continue in it, and therefore immediately ordered me to riſe. Then having aſked me my name and my profeſſion, he aſked me whether I knew the reaſon why I had been impriſoned? whereupon he exhorted me to declare it immediately, as it was the only means left me to recover my liberty inſtantly. After having anſwer'd theſe two firſt queſtions, I told him, that I believed I knew the reaſon for my being impriſoned, and that in caſe he would be pleaſed to hear me, I would immediately accuſe myſelf. I mingled tears with my entreaties, and thereupon I threw myſelf a ſecond time at his feet; but my judge told me with great coolneſs, that I might take my time, for that matters were not urgent; that he had affairs upon his hands of much greater conſequence than mine; that he would give me notice at a proper ſeaſon, when immediately he rang a little bell for the alcaide, or turnkey of the priſon. This officer came into the hall, and conducted me to a long gallery not far diſtant from it, whither we were followed by the ſecretary.

Here my trunk was brought, which was opened before me; upon which I was ſearched very narrowly, and every thing I had about me was taken away to the very buttons of my ſleeves, and a ring which I wore on my finger; inſomuch that they left me nothing but my beads, my handkerchief, and a few pieces of gold which I had ſowed up in a ribbon, and were lodged between leg and ſtocking, which they happened to overlook. A pretty exact inventory was immediately drawn up of all the reſt; but all this was of no manner of ſervice to me, ſince nothing of value was afterwards reſtored to me, notwithſtanding that the ſecretary aſſured me, and the inquiſitor alſo, that all I had would be faithfully reſtored to me the inſtant I ſhould be releaſed.

The inventory being drawn up, the alcaide took me by the hand, and carried me to a dungeon ten foot ſquare; where I was confined alone, nor ever ſaw a living ſoul till the evening, when my ſupper was brought me. As I had not eat any thing either that or the preceding day, I eat what was given me very heartily, and ſlept much better upon it. The turnkey coming the next morning with my breakfaſt, I deſired to have my books and combs; but they told me, that priſoners are never allowed to have books, not even a prieſt to have his breviary, tho he be obliged to repeat divine ſervice; and that as for my combs, I ſhould not want them; and indeed this was very true, for they immediately cut off my hair, a cuſtom obſerved with regard to both women and men, tho of the greateſt quality, the firſt or ſecond day at fartheſt, of their impriſonment.

I had been told, when I was firſt impriſon'd, that when I ſhould want any thing, I need do no more than knock gently at the door, in order to call the turnkeys, or to aſk for what I wanted at meal time: and that when I were deſirous of going to the audience, I need only addreſs myſelf to the alcaide, who, as the turnkeys, never ſpeaks to the priſoners without having ſome perſon along with him. I had alſo been flatter'd with the hopes, that I ſhould be ſet at liberty immediately after my confeſſion, which made me continually importune my officers to let me be carried before my judges; but notwithſtanding all my tears and intreaties, I was not indulged it, till the laſt day of January 1674.

The alcaide, accompanied with a turnkey, came to me for that purpoſe about two in the afternoon. I dreſſed as he ordered me, and came out of my dungeon bare-legged and bare-footed, the jailor going before, and the turnkey after me. In this order we walked to the gate of the chamber where audience is given. Here the alcaide advancing a little forward, and making a low bow, came out again, upon which which I went in. Here I found the inquiſitor and ſecretary, as before. Immediately I fell upon my knees, but was ordered to riſe and ſeat myſelf, upon which I ſat down upon a bench which was placed at the end of the table, on the ſide where the judges ſat. Juſt by me, and at the end of the table, was a maſs-book, on which I was firſt ordered to lay my hand, and to promiſe that I would ſwear to the truth, and to keep inviolable ſecrecy, which are the two oaths required of all who appear before this tribunal, whether they come to give in their depoſitions or to receive any orders.

I was afterwards aſked, whether I knew the reaſon of my being impriſoned, and if I were reſolved to declare it? to which I anſwered, that I was fully determined to do ſo. Upon which I made an exact declaration of all I had before related with regard to baptiſm and the worſhip of images; but did not mention any thing I had ſaid with reſpect to the inquiſition, they not occurring at that time to my memory. The judge having again aſked me, whether I had any more to ſay? and being told, that I could not think of any thing elſe; was ſo far from ſetting me at liberty, as I had flattered myſelf I ſhould be, that he concluded the audience with theſe very words.

That I had done very well to accuſe myſelf voluntarily, and that he exhorted me in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, to declare immediately the remainder of my informations, in order that I might experience the goodneſs and mercy which that tribunal indulges to all who prove the ſincerity of their repentance by a genuine and voluntary confeſſion.

My declaration and the exhortation being ended and written down, it was read to me, and I ſigned it; which being done, the inquiſitor rang a little bell to call the alcaide, who came, and carried me back to priſon in the ſame order I came.

I was carried a ſecond time before the judge, without my deſiring it, on the 15th of February, which made me ſuppoſe that he intended to ſet me at liberty. Being come, I was again aſked whether I had no more to ſay? I was exhorted not to diſguiſe any circumſtance, but on the contrary to make a ſincere confeſſion of my faults. I anſwered, that after a very ſerious ſelf-examination, I could not think of any freſh particulars. I then was aſked my name, thoſe of my father, my mother, brothers, grandfathers and grandmothers, godfathers and godmothers; whether I were chriſtam de cito dies? that is, a chriſtian of eight days ſtanding; becauſe children are not baptized in Portugal till the eighth day after their birth, nor are childbed-women churched till the fortieth day after their lying-in, tho they had never ſo eaſy a delivery. The judge ſeemed to be ſurprized, when I told him that the cuſtom of deferring the baptiſm of children a whole week, was not practiſed in France; but that, on the contrary, they were always chriſtned as ſoon as conveniency would permit. 'Tis pretty evident by the obſervance of theſe moſaic ceremonies, that notwithſtanding the Portugueſe pretend to have the Jews in ſo much abhorrence, they yet are not ſo good chriſtians as they ought to be. But this is not the greateſt evil which flows from the obſervance of theſe jewiſh inſtitutions; for from the former, it happens but too frequently, that children die without being regenerated by the ſacrament of baptiſm, and are by that means excluded heaven for ever; and in order not to violate the ceremony of purification, which ought to ceaſe after the goſpel diſpenſation, the Portugueſe women don't in the leaſt ſcruple to act in contempt to an injunction of the church, which obliges all chriſtians to aſſiſt every ſunday and every feſtival at the holy ſacrifice of the maſs, unleſs they happened to be prevented from ſo doing, by ſome lawful cauſe.

I was farther aſked the name of the perſon who baptized me, in what dioceſe, what city, and laſtly, whether I had ever been confirmed, and by what biſhop? Having anſwered theſe ſeveral queſtions, I was ordered to kneel down, to make a ſign of the croſs, to repeat the Pater noſter, the Ave Maria, the creed, the commandments mandments of God and the church, and the salve regina. In fine, he concluded as before, with exhorting me by the bowels of Jesus, to confess immediately the several crimes and errors I had not yet revealed; which being written down, and read before me, and signed by myself, I was remanded back to prison.

From the first moment of my confinement, I had always been in the deepest affliction, and shed incessant tears; but at my return from the second audience, I abandoned myself entirely to grief, when I found that I was required to confess such things as to me appeared impossible, since I could not recollect any such circumstances as I was ordered to confess. I therefore endeavoured to starve myself; not but I took all the sustenance that was brought me, because, in case I had refused it, I should have been beat by the turnkeys, who always examine very carefully, upon their taking the plates back, whether the prisoners eat enough to support nature; but my despair suggested methods to elude their vigilance in this particular. I spent whole days without taking a morsel, and used to throw part of what was given me into the bason, to prevent its being seen. This severe abstinence entirely prevented my sleeping, and now I did nothing but macerate my body in this manner, and shed floods of tears. However, in these days of sorrow and lamentation, I revolved in my mind all the errors of my past life, and confest that all my misery was a judgment from heaven upon me: I even persuaded myself, that God perhaps had employ'd these severe but salutary methods to call me to himself; when being a little revived and comforted with these reflections, I sincerely implored the assistance of the holy virgin, who is equally the comforter of the afflicted, and the refuge and asylum of sinners; and indeed I have had so visible a demonstration of her protection, as well during my imprisonment, as on several other occasions, that I cannot forbear making this publick testimony thereof.

In fine, after having made a more exact, or more happy recollection of all I had said or done during my residence at Daman, I remembred the several expressions I had used touching the inquisition and the integrity thereof: upon which I immediately desired to be admitted to audience; but this however was not granted me till the 16th of March following.

I made no doubt, upon my appearance this time before the judge, but that I should then put an end to my unhappy affair, and after the confession I was going to make, be immediately set at liberty; but when I thought my wishes upon the point of being accomplished, I saw myself immediately fall from my most sanguine hopes; because that when I had declared every thing I had to say with regard to the inquisition, I was told that this was not what was expected from me; and having nothing else to say, I was immediately remanded back, nor would they so much as write down my confession.

Despair having prompted M. Dellon to make away with himself, advice thereof was given to the inquisitors, who ordered him to be brought to audience; but he was so weak, that he was forced to be carried thither. I there, continues he, was laid along the floor, my extreme weakness not allowing me either to sit or stand.

Then the inquisitor reproached me several times; gave orders for my being carried away, and handcuffs to be put upon me, to prevent my forcing off the chains with which I was bound. This was immediately executed, and I was not only handcuffed, but an iron machine was clapt about my neck, which held to the handcuffs, and was locked with a padlock; so that now it was impossible for me to stir my arms. But this treatment only exasperated me the more: I threw myself on the ground, and struck my head against the floor and the walls; and had I been bound but a little longer in that manner, I should have infallibly have got my arms at liberty, and should have died with it: but as I was continually watched, they found by my actions, that ſeverity was very unſeaſonable at this time, and that it were better to employ gentle methods.

Upon this my irons were knocked off, endeavours were made to comfort me with deluſive hopes, I was put into another cell, and had again a companion given me, who was order'd to watch me narrowly. This priſoner was a Black, but much more unſociable than my former companion. Nevertheleſs heaven, who had preſerved me from ſo great an evil, baniſhed the deſpair which ſat brooding over me, a circumſtance in which I was more happy than many others, who frequently made away themſelves in their confinement in theſe dungeons, where no conſolation is ever allowed to enter. This companion continued about two months with me, for as ſoon as I appeared to be eaſier in my mind he was taken from me, notwithſtanding my weakneſs was ſo great, that I could ſcarce walk from my bed to the door of my cell, when victuals were brought me. In fine, after having ſpent almoſt a year in this manner, I was ſeaſoned to affliction, and providence afterwards endued me with ſo much patience, that I never made any more attempts upon my own life.

I had been about eighteen months in this confinement, when the judges being informed that I was in a condition to ſpeak, ſent for me the fourth time to audience. where I was aſked, whether I was not reſolved to anſwer what was required of me? Having replied, that I could not recollect a ſingle circumſtance more, the proctor of the inquiſition appeared with his declaration, in order to ſignify to me the ſeveral informations which had been exhibited againſt me.

In all the other examinations I had accuſed myſelf, and they were contented with hearing my depoſition without deſcending to particulars, and had remanded me back to my cell the inſtant I proteſted I had no more to declare againſt myſelf; but in this fourth examination I was accuſed, and was allowed to defend myſelf. They read to me, in the informations which were exhibited againſt me, the ſeveral things wherewith I had accuſed myſelf. Theſe facts were true, and I had confeſſed them by my own proper impulſe, conſequently I had nothing to object againſt theſe facts; but then I flattered myſelf, that I could prove to the judges they were not ſo criminal as they were thought to be. I therefore anſwered, with regard to what I had advanced on baptiſm, that I did not any way intend to oppoſe the doctrine of the church; but that the paſſage, niſi quis renatus fuerit ex aqua & ſpiritu ſancto, non poteſt introire in regnum Dei, having appeared very expreſs to me, I had deſired an explication of it. The chief inquiſitor ſeem'd ſurprized, that I ſhould mention a paſſage that every one knows by heart, and his ſurprize raiſed my aſtoniſhment. He aſked me where that paſſage was to be found; I anſwered in the goſpel according to St. John, chap. iii. ver. 5. He then ordered the new teſtament to be brought, looked out the place, read it, but did not explain it to me. However, he was very glad to inform me, that it was ſufficiently explained by tradition; becauſe the church has always looked upon as baptized, not only all thoſe who died for our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, without having received the ordinary form of baptiſm; but alſo thoſe who deſiring to be baptized, and repenting of their ſins, have died ſuddenly unbaptized.

With reſpect to the worſhip of images, I ſaid I had advanced nothing but what was borrowed from the holy council of Trent, and repeated to him the paſſage following, from the 25th ſeſſion, De invocatione ſanctorum & ſacris imaginibus; imagines Chriſti, Deiparæ virginis, & aliorum ſanctorum retinendas, iiſque debitum honorem, & venerationem impertiendam; ita ut per imagines, coram quibus procumbimus, Chriſtum adoremus; & ſanctos, quorum illæ ſimilitudinem gerunt, veneremur.

The judge ſeem'd more ſurprized to hear of this quotation, than he had been at my repeating the former; and looking into the council of Trent, he ſhut the book without explaining the paſſage.

'Tis

'Tis ſurprizing to think, that perſons who are eſtabliſhed judges over others in matters of faith, ſhould be ſo profoundly ignorant; and I muſt confeſs, that I could ſcarce believe this circumſtance myſelf, tho I had been an eye-witneſs to it, and have it perfectly freſh in my memory, had I not found in Tavernier's voyages, that how reſerved ſoever father Ephraim of Nevers may be on matters relating to the inquiſitors, who tortured him ſo cruelly, he yet breaks out into the following expreſſion: That nothing ſhocked him ſo much as the ſtupid ignorance of thoſe inquiſitors.

The proctor when he read the informations, had ſaid, that beſides what I myſelf had confeſſed, I was moreover accuſed and clearly convicted of having ſpoke with contempt of the inquiſition and its miniſters; and of having ſpoke with great diſreſpect of the pope and his authority. He concluded, that the ſtubbornneſs I had hitherto ſhewn in ſlighting ſo much charitable advice which had been given me, being a manifeſt proof that I concealed very pernicious deſigns; and that having deſigned to teach and foment hereſy, I conſequently was become obnoxious to the major excommunication; that my goods and chattels ought to be forfeited to the king, and myſelf delivered over to the executioner in order to be conſumed in the flames.

I leave the reader to judge the tortures which theſe concluſions of the proctor raiſed in my breaſt; notwithſtanding I can truly affirm, that how dreadful ſoever thoſe words may be, yet death would have been more welcome than impriſonment. Thus in ſpight of the terror with which I was ſeized, I yet had ſpirits enough left to anſwer the accuſations which were then exhibited againſt me, in ſaying that I never had harboured any ſiniſter intentions; that I had ever continued a true catholick; that all thoſe I had converſed with in India, would vouch the truth thereof, particularly father Ambroſe and father Ives, both French Capuchins, who had frequently heard my confeſſions. I knew after I was ſet at liberty, that father Ives was actually at Goa at the very time when I called upon his teſtimony; that I had ſometimes gone fifty miles to celebrate Eaſter; that if I had been any ways inclined to entertain heretical principles, I might eaſily have ſettled in thoſe countries in the Indies, where a full liberty of ſpeaking is allowed; and conſequently, that I ſhould not, had matters ſtood thus, have ſettled in the dominions of the king of Portugal; that ſo far from diſputing againſt religion, I had, on the contrary, frequently argued with hereticks in defence of it; that indeed I remembred I had ſpoke with too much freedom, when I was before the inquiſitor; but that I was greatly ſurprized they would impute that very thing to me as a heinous crime, which they had looked upon as a trifle, when I offered to declare it about a year and half ago: that as to the particulars which related to his holineſs, I could not recollect that I had expreſſed myſelf in the manner laid to my charge; that nevertheleſs, if they would pleaſe to deſcend to particulars, I would ſincerely confeſs the truth.

Then the inquiſitor told me, that I was allowed time to conſider of thoſe articles which related to his holineſs; but that he could not ſufficiently admire my impudence, in affirming that I had made my confeſſion with regard to the inquiſition, ſince 'twas very certain that I had not once opened my mouth upon that head; and that in caſe I had made my declaration upon that article, when I ſaid I had done it, I ſhould not have been kept ſo long in priſon.

I remembred ſo perfectly every thing I had advanced, and the anſwers that had been made me; and was ſo tranſported with rage to ſee myſelf mocked in that manner, that if I had not been immediately ordered to withdraw, upon the ſigning of my depoſition, it would have been impoſſible for me to refrain from opprobrious expreſſions before the judge: and had I had ſtrength and liberty equal to the the courage with which my paſſion fired me, I perhaps ſhould have gone farther than injurious terms.

I was called three or four times to audience in a month, where I was urged to confeſs thoſe particulars I had advanced with reſpect to the pope. A new proof was then declared to me, which the proctor pretended was drawn up againſt me on that head, but which did not differ in a ſingle circumſtance from what had before been urged againſt me. But a proof that the whole was a falſe accuſation, and invented merely to force me to ſpeak, is, that they would not declare to me the particulars which they pretended I had advanced. At laſt, finding they could get no more out of me, they ſaid no more; and this article was not inſerted in my indictment, when it was read publickly in the act of faith.

They therefore attempted again in theſe laſt audiences, to oblige me to confeſs, that in the ſeveral facts I agreed upon, I really intended to defend hereſy; but this I was reſolved never to own, ſince it was a falſhood.

During November and December, my ears were wounded with the cries of priſoners who were put to the torture, which is ſo ſevere that I have known ſeveral perſons of both ſexes, who were lame all their life-time after, and among the reſt, the firſt companion I had in my confinement.

In this holy tribunal no regard is had to age, ſex or condition; but all are treated with the ſame ſeverity; and are indiſcriminately tortured, and ſtript almoſt naked, whenever the bloody-minded inquiſitors are pleaſed to order it.

I remembred I had heard before my impriſonment, that the auto de fe was generally ſolemnized the firſt ſunday in advent, becauſe that paſſage of ſcripture which relates to the laſt judgment is read on that day in churches, the inquiſitors then pretending to exhibit a lively repreſentation thereof. I moreover obſerved, that there were a great number of perſons confined in that priſon; the deep ſilence which reigns in that houſe giving me an opportunity to count the number of doors which were daily opened at the ſtated times of eating. I was beſides almoſt ſure, that a new archbiſhop arrived at Goa in October, the ſee having been before vacant for almoſt thirty years. At leaſt I thought ſo, becauſe the bells of the cathedral had rung in an extraordinary manner for nine days together, at a time when neither the univerſal church, nor that of Goa in particular, ſolemnize any remarkable feſtival. I knew that this prelate was expected even before my confinement.

Theſe ſeveral reaſons made me flatter myſelf, that I might gain my liberty in the beginning of December; but when I found the firſt and ſecond ſunday in advent were paſt, I did not doubt but either my liberty or confinement was poſtponed for at leaſt twelve months.

As I fanſied that the act of faith was never ſolemnized but in the beginning of the month of December, finding it elapſe without the leaſt ſign of any preparation for that dreadful ceremony, I reſolved to ſubmit another year to my afflictions; nevertheleſs, I found at a time when I leaſt expected it, that I was likely to be ſet at liberty.

I obſerved that ſaturday the 11th of January 1676, intending after dinner to give my linen to the turnkeys in order to get it waſhed, as was the cuſtom, they refuſed to take it, and put it off till the next day.

I could not but revolve a thouſand thoughts upon the occaſion of this extraordinary refuſal, but not finding one ſatisfactory, I at laſt concluded, that poſſibly the act of faith might be ſolemnized the next day; but I was more ſtrongly confirmed in my opinion, or rather looked upon it as certain, when after hearing the ringing for veſpers at the cathedral, matins were rung immediately after, which had never been done ſince my confinement, the eve of the feaſt of Corpus Chriſti excepted, which is always ſolemnized in India, the thurſday immediately following low-ſunday, ſunday, becauſe of the continual rains which fall at the time of its celebration in Europe. One would have thought that my heart was going to be fill'd with joy, ſince I thought I ſhould be ſoon ſet at liberty, and that I ſhould come out of the grave, as it were, in which I had been buried for near two years: nevertheleſs the dread with which the fatal concluſion of the proctor had filled me, and the uncertainty of my deſtiny, heightned my affliction to that degree, that I ſpent the remainder of that day, and part of the night, in ſuch a condition as would have moved the hardeſt heart, thoſe excepted under whoſe cruelty I ſuffered.

Supper was brought me, which I refuſed, and contrary to cuſtom it was not urged upon me; but no ſooner were the doors ſhut but I gave myſelf up to grief and deſpair. At laſt, after having deplored my hard fate with ſighs and tears, oppreſſed with the moſt piercing anguiſh, I began to doze about eleven at night.

I had not been long aſleep, when I was on a ſudden awaked by the noiſe which the turnkeys made in opening the doors of my cell, and as this was unuſual, I was ſurprized to ſee people enter it with a light; and my fears were not a little increaſed by the lateneſs of the hour.

Then the alcaide gave me clothes, which he ordered me to put on, and to be ready to leave my cell when he ſhould call me for that purpoſe; then he went away, leaving a lighted lamp in the dungeon. I now had neither ſtrength enough to riſe, nor to anſwer; and the moment the turnkeys left me, I was ſeized with ſuch a trembling, that for above an hour I could not ſo much as caſt my eyes upon the clothes which were left me. At laſt I roſe, and falling proſtrate upon the earth before a croſs which I had drawn upon a wall, I recommended myſelf to heaven, and reſigned myſelf wholly to providence; after which I put on the ſuit, which conſiſted in a waſtcoat, the ſleeves whereof reached to the wriſt, and a pair of drawers that reached to the heels; the whole made of a black and white ſtriped linen.

I did not wait long after the dreſs was brought me, for the turnkeys came about two in the morning into my cell, whence I was carried into a long gallery, where I found a great number of my fellow-ſufferers ſtanding againſt the walls. Here I placed myſelf, and ſeveral did the ſame after me. Notwithſtanding there were upwards of two hundred more in this gallery; yet as all of them were gloomily ſilent; that there were not above a dozen whites among them, who could ſcarce be diſtinguiſhed from the reſt; and that all were clothed in the ſame dreſs with myſelf, they might eaſily have been taken for ſo many ſtatues fixed againſt the wall, had not the motion of their eyes, which was the only liberty allowed them, ſhewed them to be living creatures.

The gallery in which we ſtood had ſo few lamps in it, and the light of them was ſo very faint and weak, that this circumſtance added to the croud of black and ſorrowful objects, ſeemed to make the whole like a burial.

The women, who were clothed in the ſame linen as the men, were placed in an adjacent gallery, where we could ſee them; but I obſerved, that in a dormitory not far from the place where we ſtood, there were alſo priſoners clothed in a black ſuit, which deſcended very low, who walked up and down from time to time. I did not then know what this meant, but was informed a few hours after, that they were thoſe who were to be burnt, and were walking up and down with their confeſſors.

As I was unacquainted with the formalities of the holy office, how heartily ſoever I might formerly have wiſhed to die, I then was under dreadful apprehenſions leſt I ſhould be one of thoſe who were condemned to the flames. However, I cheer'd myſelf a little, when I conſidered my dreſs was not different from the reſt, and that 'twas not likely ſuch a number of people would be burnt as were there preſent.

After we were all placed againſt the wall, a yellow wax taper was given to each of us; after which clothes were brought us made like tunicks or large ſcapularies; they were of yellow cloth, with red St. Andrew's croſſes painted before and behind. Such as are branded with theſe ſtigmas, are thoſe who have been guilty, or ſuppoſed to be guilty, of crimes againſt the faith of Chriſt, whether they be Jews, Mahometans, Wizards, or Hereticks, who have left the catholick religion. Theſe large ſcapularies with large St. Andrew's croſſes are called ſan benitos.

Thoſe who were looked upon as convict, and perſiſt in declaring their innocence, or have relapſed, wore another kind of ſcapulary called Samarra, the ground whereof is grey; the criminal is drawn thereon, both before and behind, ſtanding on firebrands with flames mounting upwards, and devils around them: at the bottom of the portrait the crime and name of the priſoner are written. But ſuch as accuſe themſelves after ſentence has been pronounced upon them before their releaſe, and have not relapſed, have flames pointing downwards painted on their Samarra's, and this is called ſogo revolto, or reverſed fire.

San benitos were given to twenty blacks accuſed of magick, and to a Portugueſe convicted of the ſame crime, and who was moreover a new chriſtian; and as they were reſolved not to revenge themſelves by halves, but to inſult me to the utmoſt, they forced me to put on a dreſs like to that of the Wizards and Hereticks, tho I had always confeſſed the catholick religion. This the judges might eaſily have known from a great many people, both Frenchmen and others, with whom I had lived in ſeveral parts of India. My terror was increaſed when I ſaw myſelf in this habit, becauſe I thought that as there were not, among ſo great a number of criminals, but twenty-two perſons who were dreſſed with theſe ignominious ſan benito's, 'twas very poſſible that theſe only were thoſe who were not to be pardoned.

After the ſan benitos, five paſtboard caps were brought, ſhaped like a ſugar-loaf, having devils and flames painted on them, with the word feiticero, i. e. wizard, round them. Theſe caps are called carrochas, and were put on the heads of the five moſt guilty of the criminals, among thoſe who were accuſed of magick; and as they ſtood pretty near me, I expected to have one alſo; however I was miſtaken. I then almoſt doubted no more but that theſe miſerable wretches were to be really burnt, and as they were not better acquainted than myſelf with the formalities of the inquiſition, they have ſince told me, that they thought their ruin inevitable.

Every one being habited according to his imputed crime, we were allowed to ſit upon the ground till farther orders.

About four in the morning, ſeveral domeſticks belonging to the priſon came after the turnkeys, to give bread and figs to ſuch as would eat; but for my part, tho I had not ſupped the night before, I had ſo little appetite, that I ſhould have taken nothing, had not one of the turnkeys come up to me and ſaid, take the bread that is offered you; and if you can't eat it now, put it into your pocket, for depend upon't you'll be hungry before you come back.

Theſe words gave me the higheſt conſolation, and diſpelled all my fears, ſince he talked of my returning back, which made me take his advice.

At laſt, after having long waited, day began to break about five, when one might plainly behold in the faces of all the priſoners, the various impulſes of ſhame, grief, and fear, as thoſe different paſſions raged in their boſoms; for notwithſtanding that they were all fluſhed with joy, when they found they were going to be delivered from their dreadful and inſupportable captivity; yet the uncertainty of their fate very much diminiſhed their tranſports.

CHAP. XVI.

Order of the PROCESSION in the act of faith, and the ceremonies which are observed in the place where it is solemnized.

THE largeſt bell of the cathedral began to ring a little before ſun-riſe, to give notice to the people of the ſolemnization of the act of faith, which is, as it were, the triumph of the holy office. We at firſt marched out one by one. I obſerved in paſſing out of the gallery into the great hall, that the inquiſitor was ſitting at the door, having a ſecretary ſtanding near him; that the hall was crouded with the inhabitants of Goa, whoſe names were written in a liſt which the ſecretary held in his hand; and that at the ſame time that a priſoner was ordered out, he named one of thoſe gentlemen who were in the hall, who immediately went up to the priſoner and attended him, in order to ſtand godfather to him in the act of faith:

Theſe godfathers anſwer for the perſons they attend upon, and repreſent them when the feſtival is ended. The inquiſitors pretend that 'tis a great honour for a perſon to be choſen godfather on theſe occaſions.

The general of the Portugueſe ſhips in India was my godfather, and therefore I came out along with him; and being got into the ſtreet, I found that the proceſſion opened with the Dominicans, who enjoy this privilege becauſe St. Dominic their founder inſtituted the inquiſition. Before them, the ſtandard of the holy office was carried, in which the image of the founder was wrought in very rich embroidery, holding a ſword in one hand, and an olive branch in the other, with this inſcription, juſtitia & miſericordia.

After theſe friars follow the priſoners walking one after another, with each his godfather by his ſide, and a wax taper in his hand. The leaſt guilty walk'd firſt, and as I was not looked upon to be very innocent, above an hundred priſoners walked before me. Men and women walked together, for there was no other diſtinction than that of crimes. I like the reſt, was bare-headed and bare-footed, but I ſuffered very much in the march, which laſted above an hour, becauſe of the little flints with which the ſtreets of Goa are fill'd, ſo that my feet were all bloody.

We were carried thro' the principal ſtreets, expoſed to the ſight of innumerable ſpectators, who were come from all parts of India, and lined the way as we walked; care being taken to give notice of the act of faith in ſermon time, in the moſt diſtant churches, a long time before its ſolemnization.

At laſt, oppreſſed with ſhame and confuſion, and vaſtly fatigued with the march, we arrived at St. Francis's church, which was then appointed to prepare the celebration of the act of faith.

The high altar was covered with black, and had on it ſix ſilver candleſticks, in which were ſix lighted white wax tapers. On each ſide of the altar two ſeats like thrones were raiſed; that to the right for the inquiſitor and his council, and the other for the viceroy and his court.

At ſome diſtance from them, and oppoſite to the high-altar, a little towards the door, another altar had been raiſed, on which two maſs-books lay open. From them to the church-gate a gallery was built about three foot wide, railed in on each ſide; and on each ſide forms were placed for the criminals to ſit on, with their reſpective ſpective godfathers, who ſat down as they came into the church, ſo that thoſe who came firſt into it ſat neareſt to the altar. Being ſeated in my place, I began to conſider the order which thoſe who came after me were made to obſerve. I found that thoſe who wore the dreadful carrochas above-mentioned, walked laſt in the proceſſion; that immediately a large crucifix was carried, the face of which was turned to thoſe who walked before it; and which was followed by two perſons and four ſtatues, that were carried, big as the life, and repreſenting ſo many men, each of them fixed upon a long pole, and accompanied with ſo many boxes, each carried by a man, which boxes were filled with the bones of thoſe whom thoſe ſtatues repreſented.

By the face of the crucifix turned towards thoſe who preceeded it, the mercy that had been ſhewn them is denoted, by ſparing their lives tho they had juſtly deſerved to die; and by the ſaid crucifix's being turned behind to thoſe who follow'd it, is denoted, that thoſe unhappy wretches are now loſt to all hope; thus every thing that relates to the inquiſition has a myſterious ſignification.

The dreſs of theſe unhappy perſons inſpired equal horror and pity. The living criminals, and the ſtatues, were clothed in ſamarras made of grey linen, painted full of devils, flames and firebrands, on which the criminal's head was painted both before and behind, with the ſentence written below, containing in few words and in large letters, his name, that of his country, and the crime for which he was to ſuffer. They alſo wore carrochas, which like the habit were filled with flames and devils.

The little trunks in which the bones of thoſe who died were laid, and who had been proſecuted before, or after their deceaſe; before or after their impriſonment; in order that their goods and chattels might be confiſcated, were alſo painted black, and covered with demons and flames.

We are here to obſerve, that the inquiſitors do not confine their juriſdiction over the living only, or ſuch as die in priſon; but that they frequently proſecute people ſeveral years after their death, whenever they may then be impeached of any conſiderable crime. In this caſe their bodies are dug up, and if they are found guilty, their bones are burnt in the act of faith; all their goods and chattels are confiſcated, which are forcibly taken away from their heirs. I advance nothing in this place but what I my ſelf know to be true; for among the ſtatues that were carried in the act of faith, one of them repreſented a man dead many years before, who had been lately proſecuted; his bones dug up, his goods confiſcated, and bones burnt; or perhaps thoſe of ſome other perſon who had been buried in the ſame place.

Theſe unhappy wretches being entred in the gloomy manner above deſcribed, and ſeated in the places appointed them near the church door, the inquiſitor came, attended by his officers, and went and ſeated himſelf on the bench that ſtood to the right of the altar, during which, the viceroy and his court ſeated themſelves on the left.

The crucifix was placed on the altar betwixt the ſix candleſticks, when every one being ſeated in his place, and the church crouded with people, the provincial of the Auſtin friars went up into the pulpit, and preached for half an hour. Notwithſtanding my great anguiſh of heart, I obſerved that he compared the inquiſition to Noah's ark; but nevertheleſs that he found this difference between them, viz. that the beaſts who entred into the ark, came from thence after the flood with the very identical inclinations they had carried into it; but that the inquiſition had this admirable property, to make ſo great a change with regard to thoſe who were impriſoned in it, that many who were cruel as lions and tygers at their going in, came out from thence as meek and gentle as lambs.

Sermon being ended, two readers went alternately into the pulpit, where they read in publick the trial of the ſeveral criminals, and alſo their reſpective ſentences.

The priſoner whoſe ſentence was read, was, while that was doing, conducted by the alcaide to the middle of the gallery, where he ſtood, with a lighted wax taper in his hand, till his ſentence was read. And as all the priſoners are ſuppoſed to have incurred the penalty of the greater excommunication, after their trial and ſentence have been read, the priſoner is carried to the foot of the high altar, on which the maſs-books are laid; and here being ordered to kneel, he lays his hands on the book; and continues in this poſture till every criminal has a maſs-book before him.

Then the reader laying aſide the trials, read aloud a confeſſion of faith, having firſt briefly exhorted the priſoners to repeat it after him with their hearts as well as mouths; and this being done, each priſoner returned back to his place, and the trials were again read.

I was called in my turn, when I found that my impeachment conſiſted of three heads: the firſt, for having aſſerted the invalidity of baptiſm flaminis; the ſecond, for having ſaid that images are not to be worſhipped, and for having blaſphemed a crucifix, by ſaying that one of ivory, was no more than a piece of ivory; and thirdly, for having ſpoke with contempt of the inquiſition and its miniſters; but above all, for the blackneſs of my intentions when I affirmed theſe ſeveral things: in conſideration whereof I was declared excommunicate; and for reparation, my goods and chattels were confiſcated to the king's uſe, and myſelf baniſhed from the Indies, and condemn'd to row in the Portugueſe gallies for five years, and alſo to fulfil the other penances which ſhould be particularly enjoin'd me by the inquiſitors.

Of theſe puniſhments, none was ſo grievous to me as my being forced to leave the Indies, where I had made a reſolution of travelling ſeveral years longer: however, this reflection was ſweetned, when I conſidered that I was going to be releaſed out of the clutches of the inquiſitors.

My confeſſion of faith being read, I returned to my place, and made my advantage of the advice my turnkey had given me, not to refuſe the bread which was offered me; for as the ceremony laſted the whole day, none of the criminals eat any thing that day but in the church.

CHAP. XVII.

ABSOLUTION of the excommunicated, and what is obſerved with regard to thoſe who are condemned to the flames.

AFter the trials of thoſe who were pardoned were read, the inquiſitor left his ſeat, in order to put on the albe and the ſtole; when being accompanied with about twenty prieſts, each having a ſwitch in his hand, he came into the middle of the church, where, after having ſaid ſeveral prayers, we were abſolved from the excommunication, which was pretended we had incurred, by virtue of a ſtroke on the back, which theſe prieſts gave to each of us with the ſwitch.

I cannot forbear relating a circumſtance, to ſhew how groſly ſuperſtitious the Portugueſe are with regard to every thing that relates to the inquiſition; which is, that during the proceſſion, and all the time I continued in the church, my godfather would never anſwer me tho I ſpoke ſeveral times to him, and beſought him to give me a pinch of ſnuff, which he refuſed me for fear of being involved in the ſame cenſure with myſelf; but as ſoon as I was abſolved, he embraced me, gave me ſnuff, and told me he then looked upon me as his brother, ſince the church had looſed me.

This ceremony being ended, and the inquiſitor returned to his ſeat, the priſoners who were to be burnt were made to advance forward. There were a man, a woman, and the images of four men deceaſed, with the boxes in which their bones were laid: the man and woman were black Indians and chriſtians, accuſed of magick, and condemned as relapſed; but in reality were no more wizards than thoſe who condemned them.

Of the four images, two repreſented men convicted of magick, and the other two, two men, both new chriſtians, accuſed of turning Jews; one whereof died in the inquiſition, and the other in his own houſe, and had been buried many years before in his pariſh church. However, being accuſed after his death of embracing the jewiſh principles, as he died very rich, the inquiſitors had cauſed his body to be taken out of the grave, in order to burn his bones in the act of faith. Hence 'tis plain, that the inquiſitors, like our Saviour himſelf, exerciſe a power over the living and the dead.

The trials of theſe unhappy perſons were read, which all ended with theſe words, viz. that it not being in the power of the holy office to pardon them, becauſe of their relapſing into their errors or their impenitence; and being indiſpenſably obliged to puniſh them in the utmoſt rigour of the laws, they therefore delivered them over to the flames.

While theſe laſt words were pronouncing, a ſergeant from the ſecular powers advanced forward, and took poſſeſſion of theſe unfortunate perſons, who before had been ſtruck gently on the breaſt by the alcaide, to ſhew they were abandoned by the inquiſitors.

In this manner the act of faith ended, and whilſt the condemned criminals were carried to the river ſide, where the viceroy and his court were aſſembled, and where the piles on which they were to be burnt, had been prepared the day before; while theſe things, I ſay, were doing, we were carried back to priſon, but without obſerving any order as we walked.

Tho I did not ſee them executed, yet, as I had a full account of it from perſons who had been preſent at ſeveral of theſe executions, I ſhall give a deſcription thereof in few words.

When the condemned priſoners are coming to the place where the lay-judges are aſſembled, they are aſked what religion they chuſe to profeſs at leaving the world; but don't make the leaſt mention of their trial, which is ſuppoſed to have been fair; and that they were very juſtly condemned; the inquiſition being looked upon as infallible.

Having anſwered this only queſtion that is aſked them, the executioner lays hold of them; ties them to ſtakes, where they are firſt ſtrangled, in caſe they die chriſtians; but in caſe they perſiſt in profeſſing judaiſm or hereſy, they then are burnt alive: however, this happens ſo rarely, that there is ſcarce one inſtance of it in four acts of faith, tho ſeveral perſons generally ſuffer on thoſe occaſions.

The day after the execution, the pictures of the executed criminals are carried into the church of the Dominicans. Their heads only are repreſented to the life, with firebrands under them, with their names, thoſe of their fathers and their country, and the crime for which they ſuffered, with the day of the month and year of their execution.

In caſe the criminal had relapſed into this guilt, the following words are writ under his picture, morreo quemado por Hereje relapſo, i. e. that he was burnt as an Heretick relapſed. If he perſevered in his error, after having been accuſed but once, the words por Hereje contumas, are written under his picture; but there are very few of theſe. In fine, if after having been accuſed but once, by a ſufficient number of witneſſes, neſſes, he perſiſts in aſſerting his innocence, and dies in profeſſing the chriſtian religion, then there is under his picture, morreo queimado por Hereje convitto negativo, i. e. he was burnt as a Heretick convict, but did not confeſs, and of the latter there are great numbers. Now 'tis certain, that out of an hundred who die as negatives, ninety-nine, are not only innocent of the crime imputed to them, but chuſe to die, rather than falſly confeſs themſelves guilty of a crime. For 'tis not natural to ſuppoſe, that was a man ſure to be pardoned in caſe he would confeſs, that he would perſiſt in his innocence; and chuſe rather to be burnt than to own a truth, the confeſſion of which would ſave him.

Theſe terrible portraits are hung up in the nave, and over the great gate of the church, as ſo many illuſtrious trophies ſacred to the glory of the holy office, and when this ſide of the church is filled, they alſo croud the wings near the gate with them. In the great church of the Dominicans at Lisbon, which is not far from the inquiſition, there are ſeveral hundred of theſe melancholy paintings.

CHAP. XVIII.

M. Dellon is releaſed out of the INQUISITION; is carried to a houſe, in order to be inſtructed; when he is brought back to the INQUISITION, there to receive the penance inflicted upon him.

I Was ſo wearied and dejected at my return from the act of faith, that I was almoſt as deſirous of going back to my cell, as I had been a little before to come out of it.

My godfather accompanied me to the hall, and the alcaide having carried me into the gallery, I went and ſhut myſelf up whilſt he was looking after the reſt. Being got in, I threw myſelf upon the bed till my ſupper ſhould be brought me, which conſiſted only of bread and figs, the hurry of the day not allowing the officers to get any thing elſe. I ſlept however much better this night than I had done for a conſiderable time before, but the moment day appeared, I was impatient to know my fate. About ſix; the alcaide bid me give him back the dreſs I had wore in the proceſſion, which I willingly returned him; and at the ſame time offered him the ſan benito, but he would not receive it, I being to wear it on all ſundays and feſtivals till I had completed my ſentence.

About ſeven, breakfaſt was brought me, and a little after I was ordered to pack up my things, and to be in readineſs againſt my being called out. I obey'd this laſt order with all poſſible care and diſpatch; when about nine a turnkey opened my door, order'd me to take up my bundle upon my ſhoulders, and to follow him to the great hall, whither the greateſt part of the priſoners were already come.

Having ſtaid ſome time here, I ſaw about twenty of my fellow-priſoners, who had been ſentenced to be whipt the day before, which had juſt then been executed upon them by the hands of the common hangman, thro' all the ſtreets in the city. Being thus aſſembled, the inquiſitor came in, when we all fell on our knees to receive his bleſſing, after having kiſs'd the ground he walk'd upon. Orders were afterwards given to ſuch blacks as had few or no clothes, to carry thoſe of the whites. Such of the priſoners as were not chriſtians, were immediately ſent to the places whither they had been condemned; ſome of them into baniſhment, others to the gallies, or the houſe where powder is made, called caſa da polvera; and the chriſtians, whether blacks blacks or whites, were carried to a houſe hired for that purpoſe in the city, there to be inſtructed for ſome time.

The blacks lay in the parlours and galleries, and the whites were put into a ſeparate apartment, where we were confined all night, but had liberty to range the whole houſe over in the day time, and to ſpeak with any body. The whites and blacks were catechiſed ſeparately every day, and maſs was daily celebrated, at which we all aſſiſted, as alſo at morning and evening prayer.

During my ſtay in this houſe, I was viſited by a religious Dominican my friend, whom I had known at Daman, where he was prior. The good father, who was oppreſſed with years and ſickneſs, no ſooner heard of my being ſet at liberty, but he immediately viſited me in a ſedan. He bewailed my ill fate with tears and embraces, telling me that he had been in great terror for my ſake; that he had frequently inquired into the ſtate of my health, and my affairs, of the father, procurator of the priſoners, his friend, and of the ſame order; that he could obtain no anſwer for a conſiderable time; and that at laſt, after many entreaties, all he could get out of him, was, that I was ſtill alive.

The ſight of this good friar gave me great conſolation, and the neceſſity I was under of leaving the Indies was a trouble to us both. He had the humanity to viſit me ſeveral times, when he requeſted me to return to the Indies as ſoon as I ſhould be ſet at liberty; and ſent me proviſions of various kinds for the voyage, which otherwiſe I could never have procured.

After I had lived in this houſe till the 23d of January, we were again conducted into the hall of the inquiſition, when each of us was called in his turn to the board of the holy office, there to receive from the hands of the inquiſitor, a paper containing the penances to which we were reſpectively ſentenced; I went thither in my turn, when laying my hands on the goſpels, I was ordered to kneel down, and to promiſe not to reveal any of thoſe particulars, which had happened in the inquiſition during my impriſonment.

The judge afterwards gave me a paper ſigned by himſelf, containing the penance enjoined, and as it was ſhort, I ſhall tranſcribe it word for word.

Liſt of the penances enjoin'd, &c.

1. During the three years to come, he ſhall confeſs and communicate: the firſt year, every month; and the two following, at Eaſter, Whitſontide, Chriſtmas, and the aſſumption of our Lady.

2. He ſhall aſſiſt at maſs, and ſermons all ſundays and feſtivals, in caſe he has opportunity for ſo doing.

3. During the ſaid three years, he ſhall daily repeat five times the pater noſter and ave maria, in honour of the five wounds of our Saviour Chriſt.

4. He ſhall not engage in friendſhip with Hereticks, or perſons whoſe faith is in the leaſt ſuſpected, which may in any manner prejudice his ſalvation.

5. He ſhall keep inviolably ſecret, all he has either ſeen, ſaid, or heard; as alſo whatever has been tranſacted with himſelf, either at the board, or other places of the holy office.

CHAP. XIX.

Deſcription of the galley, or priſon of the INQUISITION in Lisbon.

THE galley is ſo called, becauſe as there are no gallies in Portugal, all who are condemned to them by the inquiſitors or the ſecular magiſtrate, are ſent to this place.

In this galley all the priſoners are chained in couples by one foot only; the chain is about eight foot long, and each priſoner has an iron hook at his girdle to hang it on, in ſuch a manner, that there is about three foot in length of it, between both of them.

Theſe ſlaves work daily in the king's ſhip-yards, and are employ'd in carrying wood to the carpenters, in unlading veſſels, fetching ſtones and ſand to ballaſt them, and proviſions to victual them; they make the tow, and, in ſhort, do whatever the king's officers think proper to order them, tho never ſo mean, laborious, and ſlaviſh.

This gallery is alſo a houſe of correction for fugitive or incorrigible ſlaves. There are alſo a great many Turks in it, who were taken on board the corſairs of Barbary; and all theſe perſons, of what quality and condition ſoever, are differently employ'd in ſervile and laborious work, unleſs they have money to fee the officers that ſuperintend them, who otherwiſe treat them with the utmoſt inhumanity. This galley, as 'tis called, ſtands on the bank of the river, and conſiſts of two very large rooms, one above the other, both of which are generally full; and the ſlaves lie on bedſteads covered with mats.

Their heads and beards are ſhaved once a month, and they wear blue cloth coats and caps. They have likewiſe a garment of grey ſerge, which they uſe as a cloak in the day, and a coverlet in the night; theſe, and two coarſe ſhirts, is all the king allows them every ſix months.

Each ſlave has a pound and half of black biſcuit daily; ſix pound of ſalt meat a month, with a buſhel of peas, lentils or beans, which they may diſpoſe of as they pleaſe. Thoſe who are aſſiſted by friends, generally ſell their allowance, in order to buy ſomething elſe with it. They are carried very early every morning, all feſtivals excepted, to the yard, which is about a mile and half from the priſon. There they are forced to work continually till eleven, at whatſoever their taſk-maſters think proper to employ them in; they then leave off work till one, and during that interval are allowed to eat or ſleep. At one a-clock they again begin to work, which they continue till night, when they return back to priſon.

In this priſon there is a chapel, in which maſs is ſaid on ſundays and feſtivals, and whither ſeveral charitable clergymen come frequently to cathechiſe, and preach to the galley ſlaves. Beſides the king's allowance to the priſoners, they receive frequent alms; ſo that none of them can be in real want. When any of them are ſick, they are carefully viſited by phyſicians and ſurgeons, and if very ſick, the ſacraments are duly adminiſtred to them, and they never want ſpiritual conſolation at thoſe ſeaſons. When a ſlave commits ſome egregious fault, he is whipt very cruelly, being extended at full length, with his belly towards the ground, and being held in this manner by two men, a third whips him ſo ſeverely on the buttocks, with a rope, that it generally takes away the fleſh with the blow. Dellon tells us, that he has ſeen ſome, who, after being whipt, the ſuffering parts have mortified in ſuch a manner, that they were obliged to have deep inciſions made in them; and that theſe often ulcerated in ſuch a manner, that the unhappy wretches could not work for a conſiderable time.

When a ſlave has any buſineſs that abſolutely requires his preſence, he is allowed to go about the city without his companion, provided he pays a man, who is oblig'd to follow him every where. He then drags his chain alone, and, as it's very long, he puts it over his ſhoulders, when it hangs either before or behind, as he thinks proper.

ILLU-

Of the HISTORICAL

MEMOIRS

Relating to the

INQUISITION.

THE Inquiſition is a ſubject of ſo particular a nature, that any one who attempts to write upon it with impartiality, will find he has undertaken a very difficult province.

If we conſider it with regard to its origin, we ſhall find ſo many perſons of the greateſt character for their holineſs, and the practice of all the chriſtian virtues among its founders; that we can ſcarce look upon this work of theirs as a myſtery of iniquity, and calculated wholly for the ruin of the virtuous. If we reflect farther, that the wiſeſt and moſt politick kings have ſtrenuouſly endeavoured to eſtabliſh it in all parts of their dominions, tho it leſſened their authority at the ſame time; it will induce us to think, that they were prompted to it from no other motives, than the advantage they thought would accrue to true religion. Not to mention, that many of thoſe who preſide over it, are perſons of the moſt illuſtrious birth, and of ſo unſullied a reputation, that 'tis almoſt impoſſible we ſhould ſuſpect they could ever commit the vile and unjuſt actions, which this tribunal is generally ſaid to be guilty of.

But then, if we view the ſame object in another light, and inquire into its tyrannical proceedings, we muſt neceſſarily have the utmoſt deteſtation for an inſtitution, which, upon the ſpecious pretext of imploying its ſeverities againſt error, does at the ſame time undermine the very foundation of that religion, for whoſe ſake it ſeems to have been eſtabliſhed. Such a cloud of witneſſes have given in their evidence with reſpect to the barbarity and cruelty that is exerciſed therein, that 'tis impoſſible to challenge or except againſt them all. Beſides, a perſon who is ever ſo little converſant in antient church-hiſtory, cannot but exclaim againſt an order of monks, who, laying aſide all humility and repentance, which ought to be their peculiar characteriſticks; arrogate to themſelves a power, not only over kings, who indeed as laymen, are as much expoſed to the cenſures of the church with regard to ſpirituals, as the meaneſt of their ſubjects; but alſo over biſhops, who cannot with juſtice be judged by any but their equals, in matters relating to doctrine. 'Tis impoſſible but we muſt be ſeized with the moſt melancholy reflections, when we ſee the ſucceſſors of the apoſtles, obliged to ſubmit to a vile ſet of monks; or expoſed to the ignominy of being loaded with irons, and conſtrained to anſwer, like ſo many criminals, to ſuch wretches as God never appointed them for judges. The inquiſition, when conſidered in this light, loſes all that appearance of piety which renders it ſo venerable in the eyes of a few, and that authority which aſtoniſhes the greateſt part of mankind. We then perceive plainly, that all thoſe princes who have endeavoured to eſtabliſh it in their dominions, have been ſecretly prompted to it by perſons whoſe intereſt it was to adviſe them thereto, and to diſguiſe the conſequences which would reſult from it; that they had been rewarded upon that account, with the patronage and favour of the court of Rome, which at that time they ſtood in need of; in a word, that human motives had as much ſhare in it, as zeal for the purity of the faith.

A great number of authors have employ'd their pens againſt this inſtitution. Some in writing the hiſtory of the Albigenſes and Waldenſes, have ſet forth the eſtabliſhment of the juriſdiction of the holy office, in colours conformable to the prejudices of the religion they had imbibed; others again have written books expreſsly on this ſubject. We may affirm in general, that none but the flatterers of the court of Rome, have praiſed, with any pleaſure, the bloody zeal of thoſe wretches, that offered the blood of Hereticks to a God, who deſires only their converſion; who holds it in his hand, and who ſuffers hereſy to ſubſiſt, purely to draw good from it. M. de Limborch, a famous divine among the Remonſtrants, having recovered ſome acts of the inquiſition of Toulouſe, being the ſentence which had been pronounced in the beginning of the fourteenth century, againſt thoſe perſons who had been either ſuſpected or convicted of adhering to the party and the religion of the Albigenſes; thought he ſhould do the proteſtants no little ſervice in making them publick. It muſt be owned that they reflect no little diſhonour on thoſe who were concerned in them.

The principal deſign of the editor, was, to ſhew that the Roman catholick religion ſupports itſelf by no other methods than thoſe of cruelty and perſecution; but the bare collection of theſe ſentences was not ſufficient. The neceſſity there was of publiſhing them in the ſame ſtyle, and with the ſame orthography uſed in the original inſtruments, for fear leſt they ſhould be looked upon as counterfeits, made the peruſal of them very harſh and unpleaſant, not to mention that they were unintelligible to a great many readers. However, M. de Limborch removed this difficulty, by annexing to it a hiſtory of the inquiſition, which he treated at large, and with much more coolneſs and moderation than could have been expected from a proteſtant divine. His work was publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1692. The ſubject was of too important a nature not to be treated in the French tongue; accordingly the year following, a book was publiſhed under the title of the hiſtory of the inquiſition and its origin. This work, which was pretended to be printed at Colen, conſiders the inquiſition as the principal ſtrength of the ſee of Rome. And notwithſtanding that the author has extracted part of his book from the treatiſe above-mentioned, nevertheleſs, from ſeveral paſſages in it, we may conclude it was written by a Roman catholick. About ſix years before the publication of the two above-cited treatiſes, M. Dellon a French phyſician, printed a narrative of his ſufferings in the inquiſition of Goa, which ſold prodigiouſly; and indeed the publick is very fond of ſuch relations.

The memoirs relating to the hiſtory of the inquiſition, abound with very curious particulars. 'Tis pity the author was not ſomething more methodical; did not always handle his ſubject with a due copiouſneſs; and had not, in his frequent verbal tranſcripts from the French writer on the inquiſition, omitted ſeveral eſſential particulars which he might eaſily have copied. He writes with ſo much freedom, that I have ſometimes doubted whether his work had really been printed at Paris with permiſſion. 'Tis ſcarce credible, that it could have been ſtamped with the imprimatur of the royal cenſors, eſpecially that they would have let it paſs with ſo many judicious reflections, which reflect ſo much upon the court of Rome, and ſome other ſovereigns; when we conſider, that the ſame cenſors ſhall frequently boggle ſo much at the wrong interpretation, which may ſometimes be given to a very innocent word; and ſhall, upon ſo trifling a motive, force an author to new model an entire chapter, and frequently his his whole work. If ſo myſterious a conduct be not contradictory, at leaſt we may affirm, 'tis very imprudent in them to ſuffer ſuch books to be printed, as are purpoſely calculated to render a yoke odious, which they are inſenſibly endeavouring to eſtabliſh in the kingdom.

Page 193. The author of the memoirs aſſerts very juſtly, that force, violence, tortures, and ſuch like methods, were never employ'd in the primitive times, to bring back Hereticks into the boſom of the church. M. Limborch, and the author of the hiſtory of the inquiſition, carry the parallel between the antient and the modern church, in that reſpect, much farther; and notwithſtanding that there have been in all ages, men who were for perſecuting their fellow-creatures; and that the orthodox church, has not always been ſufficiently free from this leaven; we may nevertheleſs affirm, that nothing which could be compared with the inquiſition, had appeared till the twelfth century; notwithſtanding there were always, in the different ages of chriſtianity, ſome churchmen who made a holy and ſalutary uſe of perſecution. Tertullian, in the ſecond chapter of his apology, addreſſing himſelf to the heathens, ſays as follows: ſince we cannot meet with any man, who is deſirous of being honoured by force, much leſs ought we do think that God delights in an involuntary homage *. Man has a natural right and a power, to worſhip what object ſoever he thinks fit; and the religion of one man, does neither good nor harm to that of another. To oblige a perſon to embrace a religion againſt his will, does not merit the name of religion; it muſt be received voluntarily, and not by compulſion, &c. St. Cyprian likewiſe condemns all conſtraint in poſitive terms; and even points out this difference, between the church under the antient diſpenſation, and that under the new, † viz. that whilſt the circumciſion of the fleſh ſubſiſted, all ſuch as diſobey'd the prieſts were killed with the ſword; whereas ſince the time of the ſpiritual circumciſion, the proud and refractory were killed only by the ſpiritual ſword, whenever they were cut off from the church. Cardinal Bellarmine, who quotes this ſaint as tho he had adviſed the putting Hereticks to death, had better not have made ſo unjuſt an application of a paſſage, wherein St. Cyprian exhorts ſinners to ſuffer martyrdom for the expiation of their ſins. This cardinal, by the way, was intirely devoted to the opinions of the Italians; and his prejudice made him turn ſeveral paſſages of the fathers, and the ſcriptures, in ſuch a ſenſe as ſeemed favourable to the court of Rome: but were thoſe paſſages to be read in the original, they would be found to bear a quite different ſenſe. Lactantius carries this matter much farther, as we find by the 20th chapter of his fifth book. The church was always actuated with this ſpirit of peace and gentleneſs, till ſuch time as the emperors having embraced the chriſtian religion, the biſhops began to employ inſenſibly the authority which kings and princes had given them, to oppreſs all ſuch as refuſed to ſubmit to the juriſdiction of the church; and the moment they ceaſed to be perſecuted, they themſelves became perſecutors. At firſt the moſt ſevere puniſhment they inflicted upon Hereticks, was to ſend them into baniſhment; and ‡ Socrates relates in his hiſtory, that the biſhops of the Nicene council only pronounced anathema againſt Arius and his followers; and that the emperor Conſtantine baniſhed Arius, Euſebius of Nicomedia, and Theognis of Nice. However, the above-mentioned emperor afterwards acted with great ſeverity, as may be ſeen in his letter to the biſhops and the people, wherein he ſays, whoſoever ſhall be found guilty of having concealed one of Arius's books, inſtead of throwing it into the fire, ſhall himſelf be put to death.

Ibid. According to the precept of St. Paul. This paſſage which is taken from the epiſtle to Titus, chap. iii. ver. 10. is as follows: a man that is an heretick, after the firſt and ſecond admonition reject.

* Ad Scapulam, cap. 2. † Epiſt. 51 & 62. ‡ Book 1.

Page 194. And an antient writer, who tho he owns. * Sulpitius Severus, not Severus Sulpitius, as our author has it, not only condemns the procedure of thoſe biſhops who prompted the emperor to put Priſcillian to death; but adds two circumſtances that are not very favourable to the inquiſition. Firſt, that the putting this man to death, inſtead of ſuppreſſing his hereſy, did, on the contrary, ſtrengthen it, and made it ſpread the more; for now his followers, who had honoured him as a ſaint in his life-time, began to revere him as a martyr after his death. Secondly, that St. Martin, ſo far from entertaining any ſuch ſentiments, had been always urgent with Ithacius to withdraw his charge, and beſought Maximus not to ſhed the blood of that unhappy perſon. This holy biſhop, as the above cited hiſtorian relates, thought it ſufficient to drive all ſuch Hereticks out of the church, as had been condemned by an eccleſiaſtical ſentence; but that it was A NEW AND UNHEARD OF CRIME, for a ſecular judge to take cognizance of any cauſes relating to the church. The reader might probably think, that he employ'd theſe words merely to favour eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, and to inveſt the biſhops with ſuch an authority, as the emperor himſelf ought not to have aſſumed; but this holy man had no ſuch thoughts. The emperor in thus perſecuting the Hereticks, did no more than execute the ſentence of a great number of biſhops; and St. Martin was an utter enemy to compulſion. During his reſidence at Triers, he ſtopt all proſecutions wherein life was concerned, and would not leave it, till Maximus had promiſed him not to ſhed the blood of the guilty. However, this prince having been afterwards corrupted by Magnus and Rufus the biſhops, and diſſuaded from theſe gentle methods, referred the cauſe to Evodius the prefect, who put to death, Priſcillian, Felicisſimus, Armenius, Latronianus, and Euchrochia, contrary to the promiſe he had made the holy biſhops. Some others alſo ſuffered death, and 'tis on this occaſion that the hiſtorian makes uſe of thoſe words quoted by our author. We ſhall ſhew in one of the following remarks, in what manner St. Martin diſcovered his deteſtation of ſo cruel an action.

Ibid. The cauſes for which Hereticks may be puniſhed are reduced chiefly to four, &c. The firſt which our author mentions is drawn from a political motive, viz. of preſerving the ſtate in peace. 'Tis certain that this ought to be the grand object of policy; and that all ſuch methods as tend to it are allowable, when it is impoſſible to obtain it by any other means; ſalus populi ſuprema lex eſto. All laws ought to center there. But among Hereticks, ſuch are to be diſtinguiſhed, whoſe opinions or actions are a prejudice to the publick tranquillity. There is no room to doubt but the civil magiſtrate may puniſh ſuch as theſe, without being ſollicited by the church to do it. Thus when the anabaptiſts took up arms, ſeized upon Munſter, and ſet up a kingdom in that place in oppoſition to the lawful ſovereign, they became guilty, and merited the havock that was made among them; not for their erroneous principles, but for having been found in arms, and for endeavouring to diſturb the tranquility of the government. But when this ſect, laying aſide their enthuſiaſtick fury, contented themſelves with worſhipping God in ſuch a manner as they thought would be moſt agreeable to him; obſerving at the ſame time to live in obedience to the laws of the country, and confining themſelves to the cares of their reſpective families; the authority of puniſhing an anabaptiſt for his private opinions immediately ceaſed, and the true church has no farther power over them, than to employ exhortation, kind arguments, or, at moſt, excommunication.

The ſecond reaſon which the author gives, agrees very ill with the practical doctrine of St. Martin. The ſame hiſtorian, who informs us how much that ſaint oppoſed the putting of Priſcillian to death, and who applauds him for it; does nevertheleſs take notice at the ſame time, that this hereſiarch was found guilty of ſorcery in two examinations; that he did not deny his having imbibed impure doctrines; doctrines; that he had held nocturnal aſſemblies, in which ſeveral lewd women were preſent; and that he had ſaid prayers in it, being ſtark naked †. Nothing could poſſibly be more oppoſite to that purity, which the goſpel requires in all who receive it; and according to the rule laid down in the memoirs, Maximus was obliged to puniſh ſuch as abuſed religion in this manner, and made it a cloak to their ignominious paſſions. And yet we ſee here at the ſame time, an illuſtrious ſaint, the apoſtle of France, ſtanding between the emperor and them, and oppoſing their puniſhment.

* Hiſt. Sacr. Lib. 2. Cap. 51.

The third reaſon is ſpecious indeed; nevertheleſs upon this pretence of preventing the creator's being diſhonoured by blaſphemous tenets, we thereby open a door to infinite perſecutions. The fathers of the Nicene council treated Arius as a blaſphemer, becauſe he denied the conſubſtantiality of the word. He, on the other ſide, accuſed them of believing in three Gods, and in deſtroying the unity of the Godhead, which certainly would be blaſphemy. Now, according to the maxim of the memoirs, Conſtantine had authority to puniſh the Arians, who denied the divinity of our Saviour; but then, when one of his ſucceſſors declared for Arius, if he did this with ſincerity, he muſt neceſſarily think that the conſubſtantialiſts committed blaſphemy, and that he was bound in duty to puniſh them. This duty muſt naturally reſult from the opinion he had of his being in the right. When Julian was for reſtoring heatheniſm, he * undoubtedly believed that 'twas a more pure kind of worſhip than that of our Saviour; and was it juſt he ſhould therefore force the whole univerſe to return back to paganiſm? ſhall it be aſſerted that ſuch a zeal is lawful in thoſe only who defend the truth? But the anſwer to this is, that every one thinks himſelf in the right. The moment you allow it to be lawful to put Hereticks to death, you acquieſce in the condemnation of all who do not think juſt as they do. The word HERETICK is ſo much abuſed, that it is made to ſignify nothing at all. The moſt extravagant ſectaries look upon all as Hereticks, who do not allow of their idle dreams; and in conſequence of this, have a right to perſecute ſuch as do not favour their tenets. If the prince is allowed to treat ſuch of his ſubjects ill as he thinks Hereticks, and that only becauſe they entertain certain opinions with reſpect to religion that claſh with his; he himſelf is as much a Heretick with regard to them; and a people who are thus prejudiced, will eaſily prefer to him another prince, who is of the ſame principles with themſelves. Nor will they fail to do it, if at the ſame time that he differs from them in opinion, he perſecutes them with ſeverity.

The laſt reaſon is as weak as the reſt. I am even afraid, that the author of theſe memoirs underſtands the meaning of theſe words as little as I myſelf do. Hereticks may be proceeded againſt with rigour, not, ſays he, to compel them, but in order to incline them, by the fear and dread of the laws, to return to the church which they had left. I don't perceive the difference he finds between forcing, and inclining a perſon to any thing, by the dread of laws and puniſhments. We have already ſeen by the execution of Priſcillian, as related by Sulpitius Severus, that it is not fitting to employ ſeverity and rigour to extirpate hereſies. No perſon is induced to enlighten his mind by the dread of the laws; ſo far from it, we find that in all thoſe countries where the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed, every one is afraid of knowing too much. There, when a layman is ſeen to inquire aſſiduouſly into his religion, he becomes immediately ſuſpected; and as it is of dangerous conſequence to a perſon to be knowing, in caſe they have but the leaſt ſuſpicion that he has imbibed fewer prejudices than the common people; the conſequence of this will be, that this man, to preſerve himſelf from ruin, ſhall act the part of a hypocrite, and maſk himſelf; but will immediately throw it off, the moment he thinks himſelf out of the reach of the inquiſitors. When once an Italian gets ſafe to London, Florence, Paris, Lisbon, or Amſterdam, ſterdam, he becomes quite another creature. This wretched policy has produced a great number of atheiſts, who look upon religion as no other than a mere contrivance of the court of Rome; and who, for fear of being one day convicted of unbelief, write, in order to ſcreen themſelves, upon the immortality of the ſoul, and on other ſubjects which they believe nothing of; and all this only, (in caſe they ſhould happen to be proſecuted upon that account) that they may make uſe of this as a handle, in order to prove that they have done their utmoſt to demonſtrate thoſe very things, which they are accuſed of denying. The parallel between the practice of the antient church, and that of the inquiſiters with reſpect to Hereticks, is one of the beſt articles in theſe memoirs; 'tis ſcandalous for the inquiſition to diſpenſe with thoſe laws, which juſtice, humanity, and the principles of chriſtianity have preſcribed to all tribunals in general. But this parallel was already drawn in the hiſtory of the inquiſition and its origin, in pag. 92. & ſeq. of the edition printed in 1693.

Book II. This abounds with faithful extracts, copied verbatim from the treatiſe above-mentioned; but the reader would have been more obliged to the epitomizer, had he given him the particulars of the inquiſition of Venice. As this wiſe republick has reſtrained the ambitious tyranny of prieſts, ſhe is thereby leſs ſubject to the caprices of the inquiſitors, than thoſe nations among whom it is eſtabliſhed. This difference is ſo great, that it deſerves to be ſhewn more at large than the author of the memoirs has done, who has only given us a few indigeſted hints on that head. To ſupply this defect, we ſhall preſent the reader with the thirty nine chapters or ſtatutes, extracted from the ſame work, and compared with the Italian of father Paul.

STATUTES to be obſerved by the INQUISITION at VENICE.

I.

THree ſenators ſhall be always deputed to aſſiſt in Venice, in all the judgments, actions, and proceedings of the inquiſition; and as the ſeveral cities which are ſubject to it, muſt regulate themſelves after the example of the capital city; in all ſuch places where the inquiſition is eſtabliſhed, inſtead of the three ſenators, the rectors of the ſeveral cities, ſhall aſſiſt at all the judgments of the inquiſition by virtue of their office. Beſides the confirmation of this ſtatute by antient cuſtom, and ſeveral decrees of the ſenate, the ſenate has expreſly agreed to the ſame by a concordate made between Julian III. and the republick, anno 1551.

II.

In caſe that in thoſe cities ſubject to the capital, any rector is prevented from aſſiſting at the judicatory proceedings of the inquiſition, then the podeſtat's vicar ſhall be preſent in their ſtead; and in caſe this latter cannot be there, the rector ſhall be obliged to depute a counſellor or ſome other magiſtrate to aſſiſt therein. Decreed in the council of ten, the 29th of November, anno 1548.

III.

In caſe an aſſiſtant has any affair or tranſaction with the court of Rome, wherein his intereſt is concerned, ſuch aſſiſtant is forbid to intermeddle with the affairs of the inquiſition in any manner whatſoever; in this caſe it devolves on his collegue,

or

or to the ſenior great chamberlain, in caſe there happens to be but one rector in the city, and that he had any tranſaction with the court of Rome. Thus decreed in the council of ten, the 9th of June 1574.

IV.

The perſons appointed to aſſiſt in the judiciary proceedings of the inquiſitions, are forbid to intermeddle in any manner whatſoever, either with preparing the trials or ſentences which are pronounced; but are only to attend very carefully to every thing tranſacted therein, and are only to act on four different occaſions.

1. When the affair is of ſo important a nature as to affect the honour of God, the good of the church, the extirpation of hereſy, or the puniſhment of ſome very heinous crime; in theſe caſes, they are commanded immediately to ſee that the ſentences pronounced by the inquiſitors be put in execution; and be aſſiſtant therein to the utmoſt of their power.

2. In caſe that the inquiſitors, upon pretence of performing the duties of their employment, and of puniſhing ſuch crimes as fall under their cognizance, ſhould do any thing that may be prejudicial to the authority of the civil magiſtrate, and the publick peace; or that may tend to the ſcandal and oppreſſion of the ſubjects of the republick; ſuch as aſſiſt in their proſecutions in her name, muſt bring them to reaſon, and oblige them to act conformable to the rules of juſtice and equity; but in caſe their endeavours herein happen to be fruſtrated, they muſt put a ſtop to the execution, till ſuch time as the prince has had notice of all that has been tranſacted, and has ſent his orders how they are to proceed.

3. If they ſhould debate upon any ſubject, which they ſuſpect may tend to leſſen the authority of the ſtate, or the oppreſſion of the people, they muſt ſo order matters as to get the execution thereof ſuſpended, till ſuch time as they have informed the prince of it, and received his anſwer.

4. If it ſo happen that the inquiſitors ſhould be negligent in the exerciſe of their functions, and proceed too ſlowly in the puniſhment of Hereticks, ſo that they may have reaſon to fear, it would thereby give them an opportunity of growing more numerous, the aſſiſtants are bound in duty to admoniſh the inquiſitors to perform theirs; and in caſe it ſhould not proceed from want of inclination, but power, they muſt inform the prince thereof, and procure his orders for that purpoſe, and in caſe it be neceſſary, greater ſervices than uſual.

V.

Whoever aſſiſts, in the name of the republick, at the judiciary proceedings of the inquiſition, is forbid to take an oath of fidelity, of ſecrecy, or of what nature ſoever to the inquiſitors, or any other eccleſiaſtical judge, tho they are obliged to both, but by virtue of that ſecrecy and fidelity they owe their prince. Thus decreed in the ſenate the 5th of September 1609.

VI.

In conſequence of the foregoing ſtatute, they, in quality of officers of the republick, are obliged to give the ſenate an account from time to time, of whatſoever important matters are tranſacted in the inquiſition. Thus decreed in the ſenate the 22d of April 1643.

VII.

When any inquiſitor dies, or any removal is to be made among them, they ſhall immediately give advice thereof to the prince, and the ambaſſador of the republick at Rome, to the end that he may exclude all ſuſpected perſons from being elected inquiſitors. Thus reſolved in the ſenate the 18th of October 1612.

VIII.

No new inquiſitor ſhall be admitted, without the approbation of the prince, and producing a patent to that effect. Thus decreed in the ſenate the day and year above-mentioned.

IX.

The aſſiſtants muſt be preſent at all the proſecutions which are carried on by the inquiſition, as well againſt the laity as the clergy both ſecular and regular, from what place ſoever the informations may have been ſent, and before whomſoever they may have been depoſed. This was firſt decreed by the council of ten, the 30th of June 1568; and by the ſenate the 1ſt of September 1609, and the 9th of Auguſt 1613.

X.

The aſſiſtants muſt be preſent, not only at the ſentences of all proſecutions, but at every thing that may any way relate to them, ſuch as ſummons's, writs for ſeizure, impriſonment, hearing of witneſſes, torturing, abjuration, abſolution, and in general, at whatever is tranſacted from the time of the impeachment to the paſſing ſentence. Thus reſolved in the ſenate the 9th of Auguſt 1603, and the 5th of September 1609.

XI.

The aſſiſtants cannot abſent themſelves from any proceedings of the inquiſition, upon any pretence ſoever, tho they appear to them of never ſo little conſequence; nor can they give leave to have any thing tranſacted in their abſence. The ſenate has declared, that to grant any thing of this nature, would exceed the bounds of their authority. Thus decreed the 5th of September 1609.

XII.

That if any proſecution ſhall be prepared, or any other proceedings carried on in their abſence, they ſhall look upon the whole as null, and put a ſtop to the execution of them. All they can promiſe, is, that the whole proceſs may be begun again in their preſence. Thus determined in the ſenate the 18th of January 1591, and ſignified to the pope's nuncio the 8th of June 1592.

XIII.

They ſhall not ſuffer any informations to be made in their defence, that relate to any trial out of the Venetian territories. The pope deſiring this article might be granted him, was refuſed by the ſenate the 9th of March 1560.

XIV.

They ſhall not only refuſe to permit the carrying on of any ſuit, of what kind ſoever, in their abſence; but ſhall take care that the form of words following be inſerted at the beginning of all the acts; the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent Lords N. N. being preſent and aſſiſtant. This is an expreſs article of the concordate made between Julius II. and the republick anno 1551.

XV.

The aſſiſtants ſhall not ſuffer the inquiſitors to inſert any ſtatutes made out of the dominions of the ſtate, in their proſecutions. But in caſe there come from Rome, or any other place, any good ſtatute, which does not interfere with the authority of the republick, the inquiſitors of the ſtate may put ſuch ſtatute in execution; provided they proceed therein according to the uſual form and cuſtom of the country, by drawing up the new decree in the name of the inquiſitors of the place; in preſence of the publick aſſiſtants, and without once mentioning that the decree came from Rome, no otherwiſe than if the inquiſitors of the place had drawn it up themſelves. This was decreed in the ſenate the 7th of September 1590.

XVI.

They ſhall prevent all proſecutions and priſoners from being carried out of the dominions of the ſtate, tho their accomplices ſhould be in ſuch places, without firſt giving an account thereof to the prince, and having his orders for it. Thus decreed with relation to priſoners by the council of ten, the 27th of June 1567; and with reſpect to proſecutions, by the ſenate the 8th of July 1589.

XVII.

No aſſiſtant can be a conſulter of the inquiſition, thoſe employments being incompatible.

XVIII.

The aſſiſtant cannot allow the inquiſitors to grant writs for ſeizing any perſon ſoever, unleſs it appears by the informations made in their preſence, that the crime is of ſuch a nature as to fall under the cognizance of the inquiſition. Thus reſolved in the ſenate the 5th of July 1597. If it be a dubious caſe, they ſhall give notice thereof to the prince, and in the mean time, the ſuit ſhall be ſuſpended; and ſhall wait for his orders. Thus decreed in the ſenate the 23d of Auguſt 1597.

XIX.

They ſhall not ſuffer the inquiſitors to proſecute wizards and conjurers, unleſs they are manifeſtly guilty of hereſy. This ſtatute agrees with the canon law, and the expreſs reſolution made in the ſenate on this head, the 10th of October 1598. If the caſe is dubious, it ſhall be reſerved to the ordinary judges; which is agreeable to the canon law, and the opinions of the doctors.

XX.

The ſame ſhall be obſerved with reſpect to inchantments and witchcraft, of which they ſhall not allow the inquiſitors to take cognizance, except that ſome of the ſacraments may be thereby abuſed, and conſequently ſome mark or token of hereſy given; that if over and above the ſuſpicion of hereſy, death, ſickneſs, or madneſs ſhould enſue to any perſon therefrom; the inquiſitors ſhall judge of the ſuſpicion of hereſy, and the civil magiſtrate of the evil which may have proceeded from the enchantment, and the two ſentences ſhall be executed by the two tribunals that pronounce them. Thus decreed by the great council the 28th of October 1610.

XXI.

Nor ſhall the inquiſitors take cognizance of blaſphemers, that being the prerogative of the civil magiſtrate, agreeable to the tenor of the laws both civil and canonical, and the practice of all chriſtendom. But in caſe, by the blaſphemy utter'd, any token or ſuſpicion of hereſy may be given, the inquiſitors ſhall judge of the token, and the civil magiſtrate of the blaſphemy. In this manner two ſentences will be paſs'd upon the priſoner; the one of the holy office with reſpect to ſpiritual, and the other of the civil magiſtrate with regard to corporal puniſhment. Thus decreed by the ſenate the 11th of November 1595. The ſame ſhall be obſerved with reſpect to all who ſhall ſtrike holy images, or throw ſtones at them; or ſuch as ſhall publickly ridicule holy things. Thus decreed in the ſenate the 8th and 15th of May 1599.

any

XXII.

Neither ſhall the inquiſition take cognizance of thoſe who marry two wives, except there be a token or ſuſpicion of hereſy; in this caſe the inquiſitors ſhall judge of the token, and the civil magiſtrate of the bigamy; that in caſe there be neither token or ſuſpicion of the hereſy, the civil magiſtrate may take cognizance of it. Thus decreed in the ſenate the 8th of June 1591, the 8th of Auguſt 1592, the 31ſt of July 1598, and the 23d of March 1602.

XXIII.

The inquiſitors ſhall not be allowed in any manner whatſoever to judge in caſes of uſury, the canon law referring theſe cauſes to the civil magiſtrate.

XXIV.

Jews, and all other infidels, ſhall not be ſubject to the judgment of the inquiſition; but of what crime ſoever they may be guilty of, recourſe ſhall be had to the civil magiſtrate, who ſhall puniſh them with more or leſs ſeverity, in proportion to the enormity of the crime. Thus reſolved by the ſenate the 28th of January, and 12th of October 1591, agreeable to the decrees of the pope.

XXV.

The inquiſitors ſhall not be judges over the Greeks, nor of any other people within the dominions of the republick, who have been allowed their ſeveral prelates, and permitted to live according to their reſpective cuſtoms. In criminal caſes, not excepting ſuch as relate to religion, the civil magiſtrate only ſhall judge them; and ſhall puniſh them with more or leſs ſeverity in proportion to the enormity of their crimes, agreeable to the conſtant practice of the republick, and the anſwer which was made to the pope's nuncio by the ſenate the 4th of September 1609.

XXVI.

If any ſubject of the republick ſhall have ſettled himſelf on the other ſide of the mountains, for the ſake of trade or any other buſineſs, and having there committed a crime, ſhould be informed againſt at Rome or elſewhere; the aſſiſtant, in ſuch caſe, ſhall not ſuffer him to be ſummoned by the publick cryer, or by an inſtrument left at the houſe of his relations. But the deciſion of it ſhall be left to the judges of the places where that crime was committed. Thus reſolved in the ſenate the 3d of September 1610.

XXVII.

The goods and chattels of all ſuch as ſhall have been condemned by the inquiſition for hereſy, ſhall not be confiſcated to the profit of the ſaid inquiſition, but ſhall be left to their children and other lawful heirs, with the moſt expreſs prohibition not to give any part of them to the perſons condemned. Thus determined by the council of ten, the 5th of November 1568.

XXVIII.

XXVIII.

The inquiſitors may not publiſh the bull of any pope, nor any ordinance of the inquiſition of Rome, whether of antient or modern date, without the leave of the prince firſt obtain'd for that purpoſe. Thus decreed by the ſenate the 2d of Auguſt 1607.

XXIX.

As to ſuch books as are prohibited by the court of Rome, the aſſiſtants ſhall not allow the inquiſitors to publiſh within the territories of the republick, any other catalogue of prohibited books, than that of the year 1595, agreeable to the concordate made between pope Clement VIII. and the republick, the 24th of Auguſt 1596.

XXX.

The inquiſitors are not permitted to judge the officers of the cuſtoms, vintners, inn-keepers, or butchers who ſell meat in Lent. All ſuch perſons ſhall be judged only by the civil magiſtrate, to whom recourſe ſhall be had in caſe of neceſſity: Thus reſolved in the ſenate the 5th of September 1609.

XXXI.

By virtue of the ſame decree, the inquiſitors ſhall not require an oath of any artificer whatſoever, nor puniſh him for ſuch faults as he may have committed in his art or myſtery; becauſe theſe things come under the cognizance of the civil magiſtrate:

XXXII.

The inquiſitors ſhall not be permitted to draw up any monitory againſt the ſeveral companies of tradeſmen, nor againſt the magiſtrates in affairs relating to the adminiſtration of juſtice; but if there be any ſubject of complaint againſt theſe, the aſſiſtants ſhall be judges of the ſame. Thus decreed by the ſenate, the 3d of September 1568.

XXXIII.

The form and tenor of the edict, which the inquiſitors uſually publiſh at their entrance into their poſts, ſhall be reduced under ſix heads, and to theſe the inquiſitors are not allowed to make any addition.

1. Againſt ſuch as are Hereticks, or who knowing any perſon to be ſo; forbear to impeach them.

2. Againſt thoſe who ſet up conferences and aſſemblies in prejudice of the catholick religion.

3. Againſt thoſe who celebrate maſs; or who preſume to hear confeſſions without being duly qualified for that purpoſe.

4. Againſt ſuch blaſphemers as give any ſuſpicion of hereſy.

5. Againſt thoſe who prevent and interrupt the juriſdiction of the inquiſition; who annoy the officers thereof, and who, with reſpect to the employment, either threaten or abuſe the informers and witneſſes upon that account: or, in other caſes, ſuch, for inſtance, for having annoy'd an officer of the inquiſition in caſes wherein their employments were not concerned, this ſhall be judged by the ordinary magiſtrate.

6. and laſt, Againſt all who either keep, print, or cauſe to be printed, any books that treat of Hereſy, or are written in oppoſition to the eſtabliſhed religion.

In caſe the inquiſition is for proceeding farther, and for adding any new decree, or for inſerting any other clauſe over and above what is expreſſed in the ſix articles abovementioned; the aſſiſtants ſhall not ſuffer him to do the ſame, but ſhall give notice thereof to the prince. Thus reſolved in the ſenate with the conſent of the holy ſee, the 23d of May 1608.

XXXIV.

If any crime, the cognizance whereof belongs to the inquiſition, ſhall be committed in ſuch caſtles and villages where the inquiſition is not eſtabliſhed, the inquiſition of the city, to which the ſaid places are ſubordinate, ſhall judge the ſaid crime in the preſence of the aſſiſtants of the ſeveral places.

XXXV.

If any crime ſhould be committed in places ſubject to juriſdictions, the ſpiritual whereof ſhould be ſituated in places different from the temporal; the cognizance thereof ſhall belong to the inquiſition eſtabliſhed in that place where the ſpiritual juſtice reſides, and the aſſiſtant of the ſaid place ſhall be obliged to be preſent at the ſentence. Thus decreed by the council of ten, the 13th of March 1555.

XXXVI.

If any perſon impeached, ſhall, after ſummons, obſtinately refuſe to appear before the inquiſition; and that, according to the practice of the holy office, he be declared a Heretick, and delivered over to the ſecular arm; the magiſtrate ſhall be obliged to baniſh him, either for a term of years or for ever; from all the dominions and places belonging to the republick. Thus reſolved by the council of ten, the 23d of December 1563.

XXXVII.

Such perſons as having been condemned by the inquiſition, either to a temporary or perpetual impriſonment, ſhall have eſcaped from the priſons of the ſame; ſhall be baniſhed by the magiſtrate either for a limited term of years, or for ever, as he in conſcience ſhall think moſt neceſſary. Thus reſolved in the council of ten, the 7th of April 1564.

XXXVIII.

Such perſons as having been ſummoned to appear to anſwer for their heretical tenets out of the dominions of the republick, ſhall have retired to ſuch places for their own ſecurity, ſhall be condemned by the magiſtrates to four years impriſonment, and be afterwards baniſhed from all the dominions and places ſubject to the republick; which however ſhall not hinder the inquiſition from condemning them to a greater puniſhment. Thus reſolved by the council of ten, the 22d of April 1568.

XXXIX.

The inquiſitors are impower'd to puniſh ſlanderers, and ſuch wretches as ſhall have made falſe depoſitions before their tribunal, provided they can be convicted of falſhood or untruth, by the proceſs itſelf; but if to effect this, it be neceſſary to begin the proſecution a-new, the aſſiſtants ſhall not ſuffer it to be carried on by the inquiſitors; and ſhall cauſe this freſh proſecution to be transferred to the ordinary judges; this being juſt and equitable, according to the opinion of the doctors, who had been conſulted upon this article.

Theſe are the thirty-nine famous chapters or ſtatutes, by which the inquiſition is now govern'd in all the dominions of the republick of Venice, and which confines its authority to much narrower limits than it enjoys in all other places where it is eſtabliſhed. The inquiſitors have frequently complained of this; have been ſupported and encouraged therein by the court of Rome; and have ſet every engine at work, in order to get all, or part of them annulled, but to no purpoſe. As the ſenate have always always been perſuaded, that in caſe they ſhould make the leaſt conceſſions on this head, the ſpiritual power would at laſt deſtroy the temporal; they have for that reaſon always aſſerted and maintained, even the moſt inconſiderable of thoſe ſtatutes, with the utmoſt rigour and reſolution.

It is however obſerved, that the ſenate have neglected to add one farther condition to them, which would certainly have been granted, had they inſiſted upon the neceſſity of it; a condition of ſuch mighty conſequence, that there is juſt room for wonder, how ſo great a number of perſons, and all of them endued with the moſt conſummate wiſdom, could have overlook'd it.

In Spain, the inquiſitors are all Spaniards; and in the Milaneze, the natives of that country are not excluded the holy office: now the Venetians might very juſtly, and indeed ought to have inſiſted, that no foreigner ſhould be permitted to enjoy any employment in the inquiſition eſtabliſhed in their territories. They have indeed applied a remedy to this over-ſight, by obliging the inquiſitors who are ſent to them, to obtain from the doge letters patents, directed to the ſeveral rectors or principal magiſtrates of the ſeveral places; without which they cannot either be received or perform the leaſt function of their employments, in any ſuch place. For whenever the doge does not approve of an inquiſitor, he either wearies him out with repeated delays, or even refuſes his grant, without which that of the pope is wholly uſeleſs.

But as the court of Rome have never been able to remove the antient boundaries which had thus been ſet to their authority, they have in revenge excluded the ſubjects of the republick from all the inquiſitions of Italy and the pope's territories.

In reading theſe articles we find, 1. That the inquiſition of Venice is of a mixt nature, i. e. compoſed of clergy and laity; the former whereof are judges, and the latter no more than aſſiſtants. 2. That it is ſubordinate to the republick and the ſenate, and not to the court of Rome, as the reſt; which is manifeſt from the III^d, V^th, VI^th, and XV^th ſtatutes. One remarkable circumſtance is, that theſe ſtatutes were not made at once, but at different times, according as the ſenate obſerved that the court of Rome incroached on the rights of the republick.

As the lay-inquiſitors are no more than aſſiſtants, we nevertheleſs find that they are impowered to oppoſe whatever they think may interfere with the privileges of the republick. Pope Julius III. imagined he had made a complete conqueſt, when he prevailed ſo far as to have it expreſſed in the concordate, that the clauſe, the moſt illuſtrious lords N. N. being preſent and aſſiſtant, ſhould always be inſerted. Nevertheleſs the court of Rome have ſince found, that what they thought a victory was a real detriment, and have therefore employ'd every artifice to get this clauſe annulled, tho to no purpoſe.

Gregory IV. declared by a bull, that as hereſy was cognizable only in the eccleſiaſtical court, the civil magiſtrate had therefore no buſineſs to intermeddle in it, notwithſtanding the great number of cuſtoms to the contrary, which even the popes themſelves had approved. The ſenate maintained, and very juſtly, that as the very nature of a concordate ſuppoſes the conſent of both parties, conſequently it cannot be made void but by the parties contracting; and that to maintain, that an affair which had been agreed upon between two princes under reciprocal obligations, ſhould nevertheleſs depend upon the will of one of them, implied a contradiction. However matters were carried no farther, and the republick of Venice has been obliged to ſtand eternally upon her guard; to employ the moſt prudent political maxims, and to be unſhaken in her reſolutions, to prevent the court of Rome from uſurping an abſolute authority over the inquiſition at Venice.

Page 228. And tho Jews, Mahometans, and other infidels are not ſubject to the inquiſition, &c. I ſhall on this occaſion relate a ſtory which happened at Rome. A Dutch anabaptiſt going to that city upon ſome affair or other, delivered himſelf with too much freedom on the principles of his religion, upon which he was impeached to the inquiſitors, who immediately ſent their officers to ſeize him. There was no occaſion to employ torture to make him confeſs he did not acknowledge the pope's infallibility, nor allow all thoſe tenets which a man is required to aſſent implicitly to at Rome. They were juſt going to put him to death, when one of the inquiſitors taking pity on his youth, reſolved to ſave him. In one of the examinations the priſoner was aſked, whether or no he believed in ſeveral articles of faith then mentioned? To which he anſwered in the negative. Whereupon the inquiſitor who was prejudiced in his favour, thought proper to aſk him, whether he had ever been baptized? to which he alſo anſwered, no. His friend the inquiſitor hearing this, cauſed him to be declared a heathen, and as ſuch, not ſubject to the inquiſition: ſo that our Dutchman got off by ſubmitting to the ceremony of baptiſm, and the being catechized.

Page 231. 'Tis ſurprizing to conſider the forlorn condition of a perſon who falls under this misfortune, &c. This can proceed from nothing but a dread of the barbarities of the inquiſitors. In all other tribunals, the relations and friends of the priſoner are allowed to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to ſerve him, and to ſet every engine at work, either to prove his innocence or extenuate his crime. 'Tis ſcandalous to conſider that prieſts, who ought to be ſo many angels of peace, have leſs humanity than the laity; and ſhould be leſs indulgent than the pagans, who never deprived the unfortunate of this recourſe, eſpecially till after they were found guilty, and ſentence was pronounced againſt them. We have already ſeen in the foregoing remarks, that St. Martin oppoſed the puniſhment of Priſcillian. 'Twas to no purpoſe that Ithacius the biſhop, who had impeached this hereſiarch, and others who had contributed to his condemnation, implored the protection of Maximus: in vain an aſſembly of biſhops ſeemed to give a ſanction to this perſecutor, by ſtill joining in communion with him. They had but juſt before extorted from the emperor (a man of too eaſy and calm a temper, by the advice of the prieſts, to make uſe of the expreſſion of * Sulpitius Severus) a decree, by which a number of armed men were impowered to go over into Spain in ſearch for Hereticks, and to deprive them of their lives and poſſeſſions: but the arrival of St. Martin at Triers, threw them into the utmoſt conſternation; they foreſaw he would certainly cenſure their proceedings, and condemn them abſolutely: to prevent this, they endeavoured to procure an order to forbid his entrance into that city; they employ'd the vileſt artifices to prevent Maximus from giving them a hearing, well knowing it would be to their prejudice; however St. Martin refuſed to join in communion with them, notwithſtanding the ſynod had juſtified the conduct of Ithacius. 'Tis true indeed, that being terrified, becauſe Maximus, upon finding him inflexible, would have put two officers to death, in whoſe favour St. Martin interceeded; he conſented to join in communion with Ithacius and his accomplices, upon condition that the lives of thoſe two officers ſhould be ſpared, and that the tribunes who had been ſent into Spain ſhould be recalled; all which was granted him. On the morrow he was preſent at the conſecration of Felix the biſhop, and communicated that day with the followers of Ithacius; but being required to confirm this communion in writing, he refuſed to do it; and looked upon the complaiſance he had ſhewed only for two hours, as a great crime, which afflicted him ſo much, that he was reſolved to break off all farther correſpondence with that party. Let us make a reflection or two on this incident, which is found in an author of undoubted credit, credit, and afterwards compare it with the maxims of the inquiſition; we then ſhall find, that Ithacius, according to the modern principles, was an illuſtrious biſhop, and zealous for the purity of the faith; and that in an age like ours, he would infallibly have been made a cardinal, and become a worthy member of the congregation of the holy office. But for poor St. Martin, he, as a favourer of Hereticks, would have immediately been confined in the dungeons of the Inquiſition, and would never have come out from thence but in order to go to execution. And as we may probably ſuppoſe that this ſaint, who was not to be wrought upon either by the favours or threats of Maximus, nor drawn away by the authority of a corrupted ſynod, but would have aſſerted his opinion to the laſt; he conſequently would not have been allowed the favour of fuego revolto, but have been treated as a hardned and impenitent Heretick. 'Tis well that the inquiſitors confine their ſtudies to the caſuiſts and ſuch like authors; for the hiſtory of the church would often force a bluſh from them, were they to examine their conſciences tho ever ſo ſlightly, by the light thereof.

Book III. chap. 3. The author of the memoirs here furniſhes us with ſeveral very curious particulars. But as M. de Vayrac has attempted to give us the proceedings of the Spaniſh inquiſition, and even to juſtify it; it may not be improper to quote what he ſays upon that head, as we find it in his preſent ſtate of Spain, book IV.

" I have not yet made the leaſt mention of the inquiſition, and feel myſelf op-" preſſed, as it were, with the weight of the ſubject I am going to handle. On one
" ſide, I am thoroughly ſenſible of the danger to which I expoſe myſelf, in caſe
" I ſhould, thro' inadvertency, let drop any expreſſion that might give never ſo little " offence to this formidable tribunal; a tribunal which commands ſo much awe and " reſpect, that mankind think they can expreſs it by no other manner, than a " religious and myſterious ſilence. But on the other ſide, as I am to give " my readers a complete idea of the preſent ſtate of Spain, I am thereby indiſ-
" penſably obliged to inform him equally, in whatever relates to the eccleſiaſti-
" cal, no leſs than the civil government; and here, in what manner muſt I begin,
" in order to invalidate the calumny which has ſo frequently been thrown upon " an awful tribunal? a tribunal that claims the veneration of all good chriſtians,
" and which the ſovereign pontiffs and the catholick kings, have always con-
" ſidered as the ſhield and defence of the chriſtian religion.

" I muſt own, that were thoſe who exclaim againſt it, to conſider the quality of " the members of it, they would entertain quite other notions of it. They would " find it headed by a cardinal, at leaſt a prelate of the higheſt rank; that its mem" bers were perſons of the higheſt character in the adminiſtration both eccleſia-
" ſtical and civil; when probably they would not have the boldneſs to deſcribe
" them as a company of barbarous and implacable judges, inclined rather to puniſh
" the innocent, than pardon the guilty; greedy of poſſeſſing the wealth of ſuch " unhappy perſons as fall into their hands, rather than zealous for their ſalva-
" tion; and more inclined to keep up a groteſque fantaſtic devotion, than to " diffuſe a ſpirit of ſolid piety. They would not always repreſent them, as is " their cuſtom, with an arm up-lifted, ready to hurl the thunder on the " heads of thoſe unhappy creatures. They would ſay in themſelves, 'tis impoſſi-
" ble to conceive how, in a ſtate governed by laws, and in which the chriſtian
" religion is profeſſed; a tribunal could poſſibly have been erected, whoſe proſe-
" cutions, according to them, are directly levelled at the deſtruction of mankind, " and calculated to overturn all order, law, juſtice, and humanity. But from an " unaccountable fatality, whether it be that the writers on this ſubject, have

" copied from unfaithful memoirs, or have confounded a holy and ſalutary ſeverity
" with a barbarity of the moſt criminal nature, 'tis certain they deſcribe the holy " office, as a place where there is no ſafety for riches or innocence, becauſe of the " crying injuſtice that is committed therein. But the moſt deplorable circumſtance
" is this; prejudice has taken ſo deep root, that I almoſt deſpair of ever making my " country-men acknowledge, that an inquiſitor is diſtinguiſhed by circumſpec-
" tion, wiſdom, juſtice, integrity, and ſuch-like virtues. I yet will endeavour to " make this appear; and to effect it, believe it will be proper to treat upon the in" ſtitution of the holy office, the judges which compoſe it, and the methods of " its proceedings.

" King Ferdinand the catholick and Iſabella his conſort, having manifeſt proofs
" that the Moors, by a feigned converſion, and the Jews, from the moſt execrable
" policy and a ſordid ſpirit of intereſt, pretended to live as chriſtians in outward " appearance; tho at the ſame time the former ſecretly adhered to the deteſta-
" ble tenets of Mahomet, and the latter followed the principles of the Jewiſh law,
" to the great ſcandal of believers; who by not guarding ſufficiently againſt theſe
" ſecret enemies of the faith and doctrine of Chriſt Jeſus, did themſelves fall in" to the moſt dreadful diſorders by their communication with them; theſe mo" narchs, I ſay, reſolved to check the progreſs of ſuch a multitude of abomina-
" tions, by ſetting up an inquiſition in their dominions, (as had been practiſed in " France in the time of the Albigenſes) in order to revive the holy ſeverity, which
" the eccleſiaſtical laws have enacted againſt Hereticks, Moors, Jews, apoſtates, " atheiſts, impious and ſuperſtitious wretches. For this purpoſe they declared to " his holineſs, the urgent neceſſity there was of puniſhing theſe prevaricators
" ſeverely, in order to prevent the ill example they gave, from corrupting any " longer the purity of the faith of ſuch as publickly profeſſed the doctrine of " the church of Rome; and the pope having granted them leave to erect an inqui-
" ſition in Spain, they laid the foundation thereof in 1478, and on this the ſove-
" reign pontiffs have, by different bulls, devolved all their power and authority in " whatever relates to the catholick faith, and alſo that there ſhould lie no ap" peal from its ſentence: and on the other ſide, kings have in its favour, given up
" all their authority in whatever relates to the judging of the confiſcations of all
" ſuch as are convicted of hereſy, idolatry, judaiſm, apoſtacy, atheiſm, irreligion, " ſuperſtition, &c.

" This tribunal is compoſed of a preſident, with the ſtyle and title of inquiſitor-
" general, and lieutenant of the Roman pontiff in Spain; of ſix counſellors, by the " ſtyle and title of apoſtolical inquiſitors; of one fiſcal, or attorney-general; one
" ſecretary of the chamber, two ſecretaries of the council, one alguaſil-major; a " receiver, two reporters; four porters, uſhers, or door-keepers; a ſollicitor, and
" of ſeveral qualificators and conſulters, whoſe number is not fixed, there being " ſometimes more and ſometimes leſs, one whereof is by right and title to be of " the order of St. Dominic, by virtue of a decree of Philip III. of the 16th of " December 1618, by which that privilege is granted to that order, but not the ab-
" ſolute government of the council, as ſome ſpurious writers have affirmed, and " which indeed the generality of people take to be fact, grounded upon a fabulous " tradition.

" The poſt of inquiſitor-general is ſo eminent a dignity, that if one of the " king's ſons was to be a clergyman, he would not think it beneath him to " fill that place. This is ſo true, that I have been aſſured Philip IV. having " given one of his ſubjects the choice either of the archbiſhoprick of Toledo, or
" the employment of inquiſitor-general; and finding he preferred the former, he
" ſaid, I have been miſtaken in my opinion of the capacity and talents of this man,

" ſince

" ſince he has choſe rather to be archbiſhop of Toledo, than inquiſitor-general. And " indeed his power is ſo abſolute and unlimited, that his catholick majeſty can- " not boaſt of having one ſubject in his dominions who is exempt from it. He " is nominated by the king and confirmed by the pope. He only, in conjunction " with his majeſty, has the filling up of vacancies which happen among the in- " quiſitors, and the latter can never confer them without his holineſs's conſent. " 'Tis he who nominates, with the conſent of the council, to the ſeveral poſts of " ſuch tribunals of the inquiſition as are ſubordinate to the ſupreme council, which " are eſtabliſhed at Sevil, Toledo, Granada, Corduba, Cuença, Validdolid, Murcia, " Llerada, Logreno, St. Jago, Saragoſſa, Valentia, Barcelona, Majorca, Sardinia, the " Canary Iſlands, Mexico, Cartagena and Lima.

" Each ſubaltern tribunal conſiſts of three inquiſitors, two ſecretaries, one algua- " ſil, one receiver, a certain number of qualificators and conſulters, with whom the " inquiſitors adviſe upon any affairs that happen; deſcribe or characterize pro- " poſitions; examine and correct ſuch books as are printed either in Spain or " abroad.

" All the officers of the ſupreme council, and of the other tribunals of the " inquiſition, are obliged to give authentick teſtimonies of their good life, capa- " city, and pureneſs of their blood, i. e. to prove that none of their families were " ever Hereticks, Moors, or Jews.

" I have indeed been ſometimes ſurprized, that the inquiſitors ſhould ſeize " upon perſons on a bare information, or on ſigns and tokens; but I was no " longer ſo, when I was informed that the holy office never proceeded to that act " of ſeverity, without having firſt made the moſt diligent inquiry into the character " of the informer, and taken the utmoſt care that the informations made, were " not the reſult of hatred or revenge; and indeed they frequently give notice to " one who is impeach'd, either to reform his conduct in caſe he be guilty, or " clear himſelf if he be innocent. Beſides, we are to obſerve, that the law of " retaliation is made uſe of againſt the informer; but unluckily ſuch as follow this " trade take great care to conceal their names.

" It may be proper to acquaint the reader by the way, that thoſe who affirm " that ſuch perſons as are impriſoned by the holy office are obliged to gueſs at " the crime whereof they are accuſed, aſperſe that tribunal unjuſtly; ſince 'tis no- " torious, that the moment a priſoner is ſeized, they begin to prepare his trial, " and ſend him a counſellor and an attorney to * defend his cauſe. I muſt indeed " own, that they ſuffer a great deal in their impriſonment; but on the other ſide, " as they are never ſeized but for the moſt flagrant crimes, we muſt not wonder if " they are kept under a very ſtrict confinement.

" We are to obſerve, that the ſubaltern tribunals cannot impriſon prieſts either " religious or ſecular; any knights of the military orders, or any of the nobility, " without firſt giving notice thereof to the ſupreme council. They are likewiſe " bound to give the ſaid council an account monthly of the ſtate of ſuch goods and " chattels as have been confiſcated; and are obliged to make a faithful report an- " nually of all the cauſes they have heard, and alſo give in a liſt of their priſoners. " As thoſe of Majorca, Sardinia, the Canary Iſlands and the Indies, cannot maintain " a frequent correſpondence with the above-mentioned ſupreme council, becauſe of " their great diſtance from it, they never give an account of their ſeveral tranſ- " actions but once a year. No inferior tribunal is allowed to ſolemnize an act " of faith, without firſt obtaining the expreſs leave of the ſupreme council for " that purpoſe, who, to make it the more ſolemn, generally ſends a counſellor " thither.

" The political conduct both of the ſupreme council and of the other tribunals of the " inquiſition, is ſurprizing and wonderful; and the moſt inviolable ſecrecy is therein " obſerved with regard to obedience and the exactneſs of the ſeveral proſecutions. " The inquiſitors, qualificators, conſultors, commiſſioners, receivers, familiars, and " alguaſils belonging to the ſupreme council, make an almoſt numberleſs multitude. " They reckon upwards of 20000 familiars in Spain only: theſe are diſperſed up and " down the ſeveral provinces of that kingdom, and they accept of this poſt rather " in a view to make a figure in the world, and command awe and reſpect, than " from any intereſted motives; which is the reaſon why in ſo great a number there " are ſcarce 2000 of them in actual imployments. Theſe familiars are as ſo many " exempts, appointed to ſuper-intend the actions of all above them, and to ſeize " upon ſuch as are impeached.

" To conclude, the moſt fatal circumſtance attending thoſe who have been " impeached to this tribunal, is, that tho they ſhould be wholly innocent, it yet " throws a blemiſh upon their character as long as they live; and that ſuch as are " convicted, are thereby diſqualified for ever from holding any poſt under the " government."

Unluckily for the inquiſition, its apologiſt has been forced to lay aſide the ſimplicity of the hiſtorical ſtyle, and to employ the higheſt ſtrains of rhetorick, in order to juſtify it. This manner of ſetting out, plainly diſcovers the difficulty of the attempt; the author ſhews he is ſenſible of it; and the arguments he employs, in order to deſtroy the prejudice the world entertains againſt the inquiſition, ſeem to be a more full juſtification than any we meet with in his book. However, as he profeſſes a greater love to truth, than reſpect for the inquiſition, his ſincerity extorts ſuch confeſſions from him as do no way juſtify this tribunal. We have obſerved that he contradicts himſelf, when he ſays that the holy office never give orders for the ſeizing of any perſon, without firſt making the moſt diligent inquiry into the character of the informer; and taking the utmoſt care his depoſitions are not the reſult of hatred and revenge: and a little after he owns, that unluckily as ſuch as follow this trade, take great care to conceal their names. Nor is there leſs contradiction when he ſays, that as perſons are never ſeized but for the moſt flagrant crimes, we muſt not wonder that they are kept under a very ſtrict confinement; expreſſions which claſh very much with thoſe we find at the concluſion of the ſame chapter. The moſt fatal circumſtance, ſays he, attending ſuch as have been impeached to this tribunal, is, that altho they ſhould be wholly innocent, it yet throws a blemiſh upon their character as long as they live; and that ſuch as are guilty, are thereby diſqualified for ever from holding any poſt under the government. In the whole, I don't believe this author is ſooner to be believed, than the writer of the hiſtory of the inquiſition, who has given us the particulars of the proceedings of that tribunal, and who relates that the priſoners are confined ſeveral years before they are called to a trial. Whoever reads the third chapter of the third book of the memoirs, muſt look with horror and deteſtation on a ſett of eccleſiaſticks, for keeping an unhappy wretch ſo many years in ſuſpence, which muſt infallibly raiſe the moſt gloomy ideas in his mind, becauſe he is ignorant what fate his enemies are preparing for him.

First FIGURE.

THE firſt plate repreſents the hall where the priſoner is carried in order for examination.

A The inquiſitor who examines the priſoner.

B The ſecretary taking down all his anſwers.

C The priſoner ſitting on the ſtool with his face turned towards a large crucifix, and the inquiſitor's table.

D The goſpel, on which he is obliged to ſwear that he will truly anſwer to every article that ſhall be put to him.

EEE Seats for the abſent officers.

The fourth chapter of theſe memoirs muſt ſtrike all who have the leaſt ſenſe of humanity with horror. A * chriſtian philoſopher of our age ſaid, that torture is a wonderful invention, perfectly well adapted to ruin innocent perſons of weak conſtitutions; and to ſave the guilty, provided they are but ſtrong and vigorous. Several learned lawyers have thought that theſe rigours were the ſource of numberleſs abuſes; and indeed the moſt notorious criminals have been found to bear up under the tortures, both ordinary and extraordinary, without making the leaſt confeſſion; and on the other ſide, ſeveral innocent perſons have confeſſed themſelves guilty of crimes, which, after their deaths, were found to have been perpetrated by others. In the mean time, as the juſtice of all tribunals conſiſts in judging conformable to the laws, we cannot blame the civil magiſtrate for not aboliſhing it, after it was once eſtabliſhed; but 'tis ſurprizing to conſider, that ſo ſoft and gentle a miniſtry as that of the goſpel, has not diverted prieſts from adopting an uſage which owes its original to paganiſm. The three kinds of torture which the inquiſitors employ to extort confeſſions, are all repreſented in the ſame plate.

Explication of the ſecond FIGURE.

THE ſecond plate repreſents a ſubterraneous grotto, called the place of torments, where the torture is given in three different manners.

A The inquiſitor preſent at the torture, who puts a ſtop to it, after it has laſted an hour, or otherwiſe when he thinks proper.

BB Two aſſiſtants.

DD A priſoner who ſuffers a kind of ſtrapado.

* La Bruyere.

EEE The tormentors raiſing the priſoner to the top of the cieling, and afterwards letting him down with a jerk within half a foot of the ground; by which means his arms are put out of joint.

F The bench on which the criminal is laid, in order to ſuffer the torture of water.

G A criminal in whoſe mouth water is poured thro' a funnel.

HHH Servants belonging to the inquiſition who prepare the water; that is to be poured thro' a funnel.

I The torture by fire. The criminal whoſe feet are broiled in order to extort a confeſſion from him.

K One of the tormentors rubbing his feet with bacon, to make his torments more exquiſite.

L The phyſician of the inquiſition, who commands the tormentors to ſtop, when there is any danger of the criminal's dying under the torture.

All the ſervants who are employ'd in this dreadful office, are muffled up in ſuch a manner that it is impoſſible to know them again; and look like ſo many apparitions, rather than men.

Chapter the fifth of the above-mentioned book.—— The ſame ceremonies are not always obſerved at the reading of proſecutions and ſentences. We may obſerve, that here 'tis made on a great theatre or ſcaffold, erected for that purpoſe in Madrid, and we read in the inquiſition of Goa, that the auto da fe thereof, deſcribed by Dellon, who was ſo unhappy as to be a very near ſpectator of it, was celebrated in the church of St. Francis. A learned engliſh gentleman, who after his return from Italy publiſhed three letters, printed in 1688, informs us, that the condemnation of Molinos was ſolemnized in the church of Minerva at Rome. The dreſs the criminals appear in, are pretty near the ſame in all countries; and we ſhall not make any mention of them in this place, becauſe all the reſt of the figures are relative to the inquiſition of Goa. I ſhall only relate in what manner Molinos made his laſt appearance in publick.

" Curioſity had drawn a prodigious concourſe of people to the church of Mi- " nerva —— but piety was alſo made to bear a part in this ceremony; for his
" holineſs had granted a plenary indulgence to all who ſhould aſſiſt at it.——
" Molinos appeared in a very neat dreſs, with his beard newly trimmed; in his " ſacerdotal habit; with a ſmiling countenance, which his enemies ſaid had all the " charms that recommend a man to the fair ſex. He was brought out of priſon
" in an open coach, with a Jacobin along with him. He was brought at firſt, for
" ſome time, in one of the galleries of the Minerva, and looked freely on all the " ſpectators, and returned a bow to all who ſaluted him." (Such ſalutes to a victim of the inquiſion, are very remarkable, as we have ſeen) " and all he was heard " to ſay, was, that they ſaw a man who was defamed, but that he was a penitent;
" infamato ma pentito. After this he was carried to dinner, and indeed he had a " very good one provided for him, becauſe 'twas to be his laſt good meal. Dinner be" ing ended, he was carried to church in a triumphant manner, in an open chair,
" on the ſhoulders of the Sbirri. Being ſeated in his place, he made a very ſub-
" miſſive bow to the cardinals, and did not, in any one action, give the leaſt token of " fear or ſhame. He was chained, and had a wax taper in his hand, when " two luſty friars read his proſecution aloud; and orders had been given that
" the multitude ſhould cry, to the fire, to the fire, at the reading of every article.
" Being brought back into priſon, he enter'd his cell with the utmoſt compoſure,
" calling it his cloſet; and in his taking leave of the prieſt who attended him,
" pronounced theſe words: Farewel, my good father, we ſhall ſee one another again at

" the day of judgment, when it will appear, whether truth is on your ſide, or mine:
" He was confined in this place till he died."

It may be proper to obſerve, that this was a very particular caſe. For the inquiſitors being deſirous of cruſhing a ſect that attempted to aboliſh a numberleſs multitude of pious exerciſes which brought great ſums to the prieſts, gained a conſiderable advantage, in forcing the leader of it to make a publick recantation: Molinos had a great number of admirers, not only in the ſeveral provinces of Spain and Italy, but alſo in the congregation of the holy office; and if we may give credit to the engliſh author above cited, the pope himſelf being ſuſpected to favour Molinos, was obliged to give an account of his faith to the commiſſioners of the inquiſition, who were appointed to examine him in private for that purpoſe. Petruci, who had imbibed the ſame ſentiments with Molinos, and had aſſiſted him in the ſpreading them, being raiſed to the dignity of cardinal had rid out the ſtorm, which gave occaſion to the following latin diſtich:

Crimine ſunt ſimiles ambo, ſed diſpare ſorte;
Oſtrum Petrucius, vincla Molinos habet.

That is,

They both were guilty of the ſame crime, but met with a very different fate, for Petruci was raiſed to the purple, but poor Molinus was thrown into priſon.

The above-mentioned engliſh writer gives afterwards an inſtance of the great temper and moderation of an inquiſitor, a temper which one would ſcarce imagine them to be capable of. He tells us in pag. 128. " That one of Molinos's diſciples had the " courage to tell the inquiſitors to their faces, that they were a ſociety of unjuſt, " cruel and heretical wretches; and compared their treatment of him, to that of " the Jews to our Saviour; notwithſtanding which, adds the ſame writer, we are " told that they afterwards releaſed him upon his recantation."

Chapter the ſeventh, Michael de Monſarratte. That which follows to theſe words; after ſuch dreadful examples, &c. is not to be found in the hiſtory of the inquiſition and its original, but is tranſcribed from a book that was printed many years after. But after this quotation, the author of the memoirs again tranſcribes a great many things from the hiſtory of the inquiſition. The ſharp reproaches that are afterwards thrown on the inquiſitors, are juſtly grounded, and we find in the * original treatiſe whence theſe memoirs are chiefly extracted, three ſtrong proofs of the ill uſe which the inquiſitors make of the exceſſive power and authority that they aſſume. The firſt is the irrefragable teſtimony of Clement V. who in the council held at Vienna, made grievous complaints againſt the adminiſtration of the inquiſitors, for carrying their authority to very undue lengths. He owns that complaints had been often juſtly made to him upon that account; and ſaid farther, that if things were ſuffered to go on in that manner, it would follow, that what had at firſt been eſtabliſhed for the good of the church, would in the end turn to its prejudice. And added, that the only method to put a ſtop to theſe unjuſt proceedings, would be to draw up good ſtatutes, which being duly executed, would effectually remove all ſubject of complaint. This was accordingly done, and they are ſtill found in the body of the canon-law.

Secondly, pope Clement VI. gave a particular commiſſion to Bernard cardinal of St. Mark, and his legate in the dominions of his holineſs, which impowered him to take cognizance of the cruelties which the inquiſitors committed, and to do juſtice to all who ſhould complain of their oppreſſion.

These

These two instances are more than sufficient to prove, that the inquisitors are capable of exercising such cruelties as ought to be restrained for the good of mankind.

Here follows a third. In 1518. a great number of wizards were discovered in the province of Brescia. The magistrates in those parts, either thro' negligence, or from the persuasion that the cognizance of their crime belong'd properly to the spiritual magistrate, surrender'd them up to them; but the extortion and oppression which resulted from hence were so flagrant, that the council of ten found themselves obliged to annul all their proceedings; to summon the grand vicars of the several bishops and inquisitors, who had been guilty of the above-mentioned male-practices, to appear at Venice; and to appoint other judges, who, in conjunction with the ordinary assistants, should revise the several prosecutions, and do justice to all those who should offer up any complaints against the inquisitors. And notwithstanding that all this was done, continues the above-mention'd historian, they yet were scarce able to keep the people from making an insurrection.

The inhabitants of Rome have not yet forgot the dangerous seditions which broke out in that city after the death of pope Paul IV. who had carried the cruelty of the inquisition to a very great height. The statues which had been erected in his honour were thrown down, and dragged ignominiously up and down the city for several days together; the people who were particularly exasperated against the inquisition, forced open its prisons; and set at liberty all such persons as were imprisoned in them; they afterwards set fire to the palace of the holy office, and did not give over their fury till they had plundered and burnt all the writings belonging to it. Anno 1568, Mantua had like to have been destroy'd by another sedition of the same nature, which had been raised upon account of the inquisition.

Chapter the eighth of the same book. The author of the memoirs has extracted from the so often mentioned work, all the particulars he relates concerning the authority which the inquisitors assumes with respect to books. It must be confessed, that much venom is contracted by reading; and that many people would have preserved a purity both as to faith and manners, had they not unhappily met with books that depraved their understandings, and taught them to take a greater delight in committing vice. Nothing can be of such bad consequence in this case as the works of the casuists; but then the inquisitors never attack these authors, but on the contrary, spend all their fury against such pieces as have met with the most universal approbation. The new testament of Mons; the reflections of father Quesnel; Baillet's lives of the saints; St. Austin's works, published by the congregation of St. Maur; these are the books which the inquisitors commit to the flames; at the same time that they shall suffer such books as the following to be sold at Rome, viz. Ragionamenti d'Aretino; De Matrimonio by SANCHEZ, and other infamous writings of the same stamp; and also canonize the writings of cardinal Sfondrato, notwithstanding they had been unanimously proscribed by a kind of national council, composed of the most learned body of clergy in the world.

Bayle has justly observed in his dictionary, that these very inquisitors who exercise so much severity against the most edifying pieces, have not taken the least notice of the frantick notions of Beata Maria d'Agreda, who, having a crazy imagination, arising from an ill-grounded devotion, wrote things injurious to the majesty of the Creator. We don't find that they have censured the scandalous tax of the datary or chancery at Rome, a book which is justly considered as the greatest ignominy and reproach of the court of Rome; or in case they prohibit the reading of it, 'tis upon pretence that it has been corrupted by Hereticks, i. e. published with reflections which laid open the scene of knavery contained in it.

And yet there was found a man who either thro' want of judgment or modeſty, was ſo ſilly as to write an hiſtorical elogium of the inquiſition. The perſon I mean is father Macedo, a Franciſcan friar, who in the Schema ſacræ congregationis ſancti officii Romani, printed at Padua in 1676, had the impudence to make the ſeat of its inſtitution in the terreſtial paradiſe or garden of Eden. This learned hiſtorian pretends, that God began to execute the office of inquiſitor in that place, and that he continued it out of Eden againſt Cain, and thoſe who built the tower of Babel; that St. Peter acted in the ſame quality againſt Ananias and Saphira, and devolved that power on the popes, who inveſted St. Dominic and his ſucceſſors therewith. 'Tis ſurprizing that the inquiſitors ſhould not be afraid of becoming the laughing ſtock and contempt of the world, in ſuffering ſuch books to be printed. Before I leave this idle prattle, I ſhall take occaſion from St. Dominic and his order, to obſerve, that in a very waggiſh little poem entitled the Arriere-ban (i. e. aſſembly of the vaſſals) of the church militant, written on occaſion of the ſiege of Candia; the poet ſuppoſes that the pope raiſes an army of prieſts and monks, in order to force the enemies to leave that place; and gives to each order, ſuch a poſt as is ſuitable to his habit and his manners. And as for the Dominican friars, he gives them the employment following:

Les Jacobins inquiſiteurs,
Feront punis les deſerteurs.
That is,
The poſt beſt ſuited to St. Dominic's fry 's
To puniſh ſuch as from their colours fly.

The motive which occaſioned this order to have the preference in this employment, has been ſhewn before. The founder of the Dominican friars, or Jacobins, having alſo founded the inquiſition, is the reaſon why St. Dominic, is repreſented, in the ſtandard of the inquiſition, with his proper characteriſtick, namely a dog carrying a torch near a globe; becauſe when his mother was with child of him, ſhe dreamt ſhe ſaw a dog lighting the world with a torch. In his right-hand is a branch of olive, as a token of the peace he will make with ſuch as ſhall declare themſelves good catholicks; and in his left, a ſword, to denote the war he makes with Hereticks, with this motto, juſtitia & miſericordia. See what has been ſaid on this head in the memoirs; and the fourth compartment.

But the ſtandard of the Spaniſh Inquiſition is different, it being a wooden croſs full of knots, with a ſword and an olive branch, as repreſented in the third compartment. This ſtandard has been deſcribed in a very different manner in theſe memoirs.

EXPLICATION of the FIGURES repreſenting the habits of the criminals condemned by the INQUISITION.

THE fifth compartment repreſents a priſoner whom the inquiſitors have found too guilty to be acquitted, and yet not criminal enough to be condemned. He is clothed in a ſan benito, which is a ſleeveleſs coat of a yellow colour, with a great red St. Andrew's croſs before and behind. Theſe are generally perſons who readily accuſe themſelves, gueſs their accuſers, and diſcover a ſorrow for the crimes they have committed. See what has already been ſaid in theſe memoirs. The male-priſoners have a waſtcoat under their ſan benito, the ſleeves whereof deſcend to the wriſt, and a pair of drawers which reach to their heels, both made of black linen ſtrip'd; but the women wear their own peculiar habits under the ſan benito, as we ſee in the ſixth compartment, repreſenting a nun condemned by the inquiſitors, and clothed in the habit of her order, with the ſan benito over it; and in the eighth and ninth compartments, obſerve that thoſe men who wear the ſan benito are bare-headed.

In compartments ſeven and eight, a man and a woman are repreſented, who having been condemned to the flames, have eſcaped them by making a confeſſion in the very critical minute, after their ſentence had been read, and before they are taken out of priſon, provided nevertheleſs that they are not ruled. Their under-dreſs is the ſame with the above-mentioned, with the difference only of the paſteboard cap ſhaped like a cone, which is worn by men as well as women. Theſe caps are called carrochas. Their ſcapulary called ſammaria, differs from the ſan benito in this; the ground of it is grey, with flames painted upon it, and the points turned downward, and is called fuego revolto; to denote that they, by their confeſſion, have thrown down the pile on which they were to have been burnt.

The ninth and tenth compartments repreſent a man and woman who have no hopes of pardon left. Theſe, in like manner as thoſe above, wear the carrocha and the ſammaria, but then the points of the flames are pointed upwards, and have alſo devils painted on them armed with hooks. At the bottom of the ſammaria is a figure repreſenting the condemned criminal.

Obſerve firſt, That in the eighth and ninth compartments, the engraver has repreſented the women in their hair, whereas it was before ſaid, that all priſoners of both ſexes, and of what condition ſoever, have their hair cut off; and as this is done to prevent their harbouring lice, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe that they cut it from time to time.

Secondly, That he has repreſented the women with their ſhoes and ſtockings on, a diſtinction not taken notice of by the memoirs, where we find, on the contrary, that, in the proceſſion, they all go bare-footed; and that the priſoners are not ranked according to their ſex, but the crimes they have committed.

The eleventh plate is ſo accurately deſcribed in the ſixteenth chapter of the fourth book, that it were needleſs to give an explication thereof in this place.

The laſt plate, repreſents the place of execution.

The reader is to take notice, that in ſome places the piles are not raiſed from the ground as in this plate; but a very wide and deep hole is dug, in which a great fire is made over night, ſo that it is full of live coals, by that time the priſoners get to it. If they are Jews who perſiſt obſtinately in their principles, they are carried thrice round this dreadful grave, when if they ſtill perſiſt in their opinions they are thrown into it. In Spain, not many years ſince, a beautiful Jew of about eighteen, being greatly importuned by a monk to abjure her religion, was ſo much offended at it, that ſhe threw herſelf into the flames, which conſumed her body in a very little time.

The clergy extort from him a decree, by which they are impower'd to put hereticks to death. St. Martin oppoſes them. This conduct compar'd with that of the modern inquiſitors, 329. A perſon impeach'd has no aſylum, ibid. Forlorn condition of a perſon impeach'd, 231. How cruelly ſeiz'd, ibid. No perſon dares make reſiſtance. How barbarouſly treated when in the clutches of the inquiſition. The priſoner is exactly ſearch'd. Several perſons who have made away with themſelves in priſon. Inquiſitor and his officers ſearch the houſe of the criminal. Every thing ſeiz'd. Proſecution carried on vaſtly ſlow. Priſons are dreadful. Dungeons under ground, and ſtink wretchedly; way to them frightful: ever gloomy. Priſoners ſee no one: if they ſpeak to their fellow-priſoners, whipt with great ſeverity, ibid. A very odd invention by which the perſons are enabled to hold a ſlow converſe, 232. The priſoner is at laſt told, he may be admitted to audience. He appears before the inquiſitors. Queſtions put to him. Familiars how cloſe they ſtick to a man's heels, ibid. When a perſon is ſeiz'd a ſecond time by the inquiſitors, 233. how treated. Inquiſition vaſtly magnificent, tho the dungeons ſo horrid, ibid. If a priſoner refuſes to take the oath, ſentence is immediately pronounc'd, ſuppoſing him not a chriſtian, 234. If he takes the oath he is queſtion'd in numberleſs circumſtances, in order to entrap him. Hitherto he neither knows his crime nor his accuſers. Inquiſitors enſnare priſoners by a promiſe of pardon in caſe they make a confeſſion. The priſoner charg'd with many pretended crimes. Villany of the inquiſitors, ibid. Priſoner has a counſellor, which is only ſpecious, he not being allow'd to do him any ſervice, 235. He is never told the names of his accuſers. The unhappy wretch carried from the dungeon to audience, and from audience to jail for ſeveral years. Depoſitions againſt the priſoner ſhewn him. He may challenge his witneſſes, but muſt firſt gueſs them, ibid. Rules obſerv'd with regard to witneſſes, practis'd by no other tribunal; the horrid barbarity in this caſe, 236

Impediments of marriage, viz. 1*ſt*. Error. 2*d*. Condition. 3*d*. Vows made in any religious order, 110. on the clandeſtine marriage of monks and nuns, 111. 4*th*. Conſanguinity. 5*th*. of fascinating a married couple with a wolf's pizzle, &c. The charm how dissolv'd. Publick trial of a person's procreative ability: when sinful to exercise it, ibid. Some farther reflections on impotency, 113, 114

Indulgences, to what pilgrims only granted, 172. Great efficacy of them. Some briefs wash away all sins at the point of death, by only pronouncing thrice the name of Jesus and Mary. If a sick person recovers, he may lend these indulgences to a friend. Whimsical particulars on this occasion, ibid.

Inhumanity, injustice, and cruelty of the inquisition, 245. The Spaniards would give every thing in the world to be rid of it. A great happiness to have religion preserv'd pure and unspotted; but there are no countries where the inhabitants are more dissolute, than where the inquisition is settled, nor more hypocrites, ibid. The inquisition occasions this ignorance and hypocrisy, 246. Even kings liable to be prosecuted by the inquisitors. Henry III. excommunicated and depos'd by Sixtus V. The inquisition of Castile condemn the last will of Charles V. to the flames. ibid.

Injustice committed in the inquisition with regard to persons accus'd of judaism, from Dellon, 293. A new christian, tho sincere, yet, when imprison'd, loses all his goods and chattels, ibid. Is call'd to audience, 294. Questions ask'd him; is remanded to his cell. Again call'd to audience. Falsly accus'd of judaizing. Exhorted to confess, and promis'd a pardon. Given over to the secular arm. A confessor sent to him. Tortur'd and burnt if he pleads not guilty. If innocent he yet must plead guilty, otherwise will be punish'd. Is order'd to guess who are his accusers, and to reveal his accomplices. Folly of this, ibid. Perplexity a prisoner is under upon this occasion, 295. He is forc'd, as it were, to accuse several innocent persons, who are often burnt, ibid. Prisoners accuse one another. Injustice of this, ibid. Goods and chattels of all prisoners who plead guilty confiscated, 296. Tortur'd inhumanly. Prisoners when releas'd by the inquisitors, tho treated never so barbarously, are yet oblig'd to publish they were us'd with great humanity, otherwise would be seiz'd and burnt. Multitudes of real christians put to death upon a false accusation of their being Jews, which is plain, from their calling upon Christ in their dying moments. Great injustice with regard to such as are accus'd of magick, ibid. Tho the king of Portugal allows liberty of conscience, yet the inquisitors won't permit it. In what manner the christian religion is hindred from spreading. Notwithstanding there is a jail-delivery every two or three years, yet two hundred or more persons are tried every sessions, ibid.

Pope Innocent VI. publishes a crusade against some Princes, 207

Inquisition, difficult to write upon it impartially, 315. Founded by persons of great sanctity. Those who preside over it men of great probity. But on the other side, vastly barbarous. Friars belonging to it assume an authority over kings and bishops. A reflection on this, ibid. Founded in a great measure on human motives, 316. This tribunal applauded and condemn'd by different writers. M. de Limborch's book against the inquisition, to prove it is founded on cruelty and persecution. Particulars of M. Limborch's work, ibid.

Inquisition, dreadful cruelties of the inquisition, 197. Inquisitors generally monks, 198. Formalities and methods of prosecution intirely new. Prosecution here, extends even beyond the grave; to the ashes of the heretick. All natural duties forbid by the inquisitors; a Wife must impeach her husband, a son his father, ibid.

Inquisitors, not invested with so much power originally, 206. Their authority how limited at first; afterwards enlarg'd; still more by the emperor Frederick II. An obstinate heretick condemn'd to be burnt, 207

Inquisition receiv'd with very little difficulty, 213, The pope publishes a bull, subject of it. Reasons why the inquisition was first establish'd in those provinces only: feign'd and real ones. Bull strongly oppos'd, during several popes. Opposition grounded on the excessive severity of the inquisitors, ibid. Accus'd of extorting money, 214. Protests against it from several cities, &c. six grounds of this protest. The inquisitors, to soften matters, forego several things. Inhabitants, where inquisitions are establish'd, eas'd. Bishops allow'd a little more power. The court of Rome draw two considerable advantages from this concession, ibid.

Inquisitors accus'd of imprisoning women who refuse to indulge them in their criminal passions, 248. An exclamation against them, ibid.

Inquisitors-general, cruel wretches. Their conduct, 255. They punish children for the real or imaginary crimes of their parents, ibid.

Several of the prime nobility accuse the Inquisitors of cruelty, 261. Their names. The prosecutions of the inquisition suspended. His holiness addrest upon this occasion, is very much griev'd at the prosecutions. The inquisitors order'd to send him the originals of four trials, ibid. The inquisitor-general suspended, and the rest excommunicated, 262. They refuse to obey; but afterwards send him four trials, and are pardon'd. The inquisitors set the pope's incroachments on the crown, in the most odious light to his majesty. Don Pedro the king impos'd upon by these reasons. The inquisitors endeavour to bribe his majesty's embassador in Rome, but without success, and therefore get him recall'd. A creature of their own sent embassador. He insinuates several things to the pope against the new christians, ibid. And that the Portuguese would perhaps rebel; break off from the See of Rome, 263. and have a patriarch of their own. The pope is impos'd upon, and matters still continue upon their former foot, ibid.

Inquisition in Goa; from Dellon, 289. Its situation. A magnificent edifice. Apartments of the inquisitors. Dungeons very dark; description of them. Walls vastly thick, a wicket to receive victuals in. Each prisoner allow'd an earthen pot, a water-vessel, a dish, a broom, a mat, and a vessel to ease nature, ibid. Food of the prisoners, 290. Of the whites and blacks, Have light suppers. Reasons of it: out of thriftiness, and to prevent indigestion. Of very dangerous consequence: throws into violent fevers which are often mortal. Description of that distemper. An infallible remedy for it, by applying a red hot iron bar to the prisoner's foot. Bleeding vastly dangerous. Prisoners not allow'd candles, ibid.

Inquisition of Spain, treated of by M. de Vayrac, 329. How much the author was embaras's'd to treat upon it, lest he should let drop any expressions that might give offence. To consider the quality of those who preside in it, we could hardly think it an unjust tribunal, nor draw it in such frightful colours. They would imagine it to be all mildness, ibid. The prejudice conceiv'd against the inquisition so great, that it will be scarce possible to make the world consider it in a favourable light, 330. Rise of the inquisition under Ferdinand and Isabella.

The ſubaltern tribunals, of whom they conſiſt; their employment. In what manner the officers of the inquiſition qualify themſelves: that the inquiſitors never order perſons to be ſeiz'd, but after making the moſt diligent informations: that priſoners are not oblig'd to gueſs at the names of their accuſers. Never ſeiz'd but for the moſt flagrant crimes. Subaltern tribunals, how reſtrain'd, ibid. The political conduct of the inquiſition very ſurprizing, 332. Upwards of twenty thouſand familiars in Spain; ſcarce two thouſand in actual employment. M. de Vayrac's aſſertions examin'd, prov'd to be contradictory. That no great credit is to be given to this author, ibid.

Don John of Portugal oppoſes the eſtabliſhment of the inquiſition, 258. A monk introduces it in 1557, by a fictitious brief, and is ſent to the gallies for it. Some nobles remonſtrate to the king againſt the inquiſition. The pope commands the inquiſitors to releaſe all their priſoners: they obey, but fill their priſons again immediately, ibid. John IV. would willingly have aboliſh'd the inquiſition, 259. Orders the goods and chattels of priſoners ſhould not be confiſcated. The inquiſitors offended at it. They obtain a brief from the pope which interferes with the king's orders. They deſire to read it to his majeſty. A pretty ſtretch of the king's, by which he eludes the inquiſitors. They wait upon the queen after the king's death, and tell her he had incurr'd the ſentence of excommunication. She conſents that the king's corps ſhould be abſolv'd, ibid.

Negative convicts in the inquisition, how punish'd, 283. Story of one James de Mello, a native of Lisbon, a knight, and captain of the horse, partly a new christian; always delighted when any new christian was seiz'd by the inquisitors, 283. one whose misfortunes he had insulted, accuses him, ibid. Himself, his two sons and wife, thrown into prison, 284. All three accuse the poor gentleman; who is burnt as a negative convict. A gentleman of Villa-Viciosa thrown into prison. His son and daughter accuse him: as he is going to the flames, his son, struck with remorse, begs forgiveness on his knees: his father forgives him; but won't give him his blessing. He dies with great constancy. John of Sequira and his brother seiz'd. The archbishop of Lisbon's vicar seiz'd at the same time. The two brothers plead not guilty. The vicar-general pleads guilty; impeaches many people, and among the rest the two brothers. They deny the charge, and prove the incoherence of it. hereticks. That all ſovereign princes would oppoſe it, ibid. The pope hits upon two expedients which remov'd thoſe difficulties, 212. Firſt, that biſhops ſhould judge hereticks, jointly with inquiſitors: that at laſt the biſhops would have only the ſhadow of authority left. Second objection anſwer'd: that magiſtrates ſhould, like the biſhops, be ſatisfied in outward appearance; ſhould diſpoſe of the lower offices in the inquiſition, and appoint an aſſiſtant to the inquiſitors in their viſitations. A freſh obſtacle is ſtarted, viz. how to defray the expences of the inquiſition for priſons, ſalaries, priſoners, executions. A fund neceſſary for this purpoſe. Mighty ſtate of the inquiſitor-general of Goa; his great power. Priſon of the inquiſition of Goa, a dark, dirty, ſtinking, dreadful place. Dellon, how brought to audience at Goa. He is loaded with irons, and carried to audience. His irons are knock'd off. Deſcription of the hall of audience, its furniture, ibid. At his coming in, throws himſelf at the inquiſitor's feet, 299. he orders him to riſe, and aſks him ſeveral queſtions. Dellon begs with tears to be heard. Is told there's time enough for it. Is carried to a long gallery. His trunk brought and open'd before him; is cloſely ſearch'd, and every thing, to the very buttons of his ſleeves, his beads and handkerchief excepted, taken from him. An exact inventory of his things taken, which is of no ſervice to him. The jailor carries him to the dungeon, where he is confin'd alone; not allow'd a book or a comb. His hair is cut off. Was flatter'd with the hopes of being treated with great lenity at his firſt impriſoning, and told he might be admitted to audience whenever he deſir'd it. Is again call'd to audience. Comes out of the dungeon bareheaded and bare-footed, the jailor before, and the turnkey behind him. They come to the hall of audience, ibid. falls upon his knees before the inquiſitor, 300. Is again remanded to the dungeon. The inquiſitor's exhortation juſt before. Comes again to audience: again exhorted to confeſs. Queſtions aſk'd him: the names of all his relations; whether he isr a new chriſtian? Many Portugueſe chriſtians obſerve ſeveral Jewiſh ceremonies; ill conſequences of it. Is aſk'd who baptiz'd him? In what dioceſe? what city? by whom confirm'd? order'd to kneel down, ibid. Again exhorted to confeſs all his crimes, 301. Had ſpent all his confinement in inceſſant tears, but now is abandon'd to deſpair. Endeavours to ſtarve himſelf, cannot ſleep, is very ſick. Recapitulates all the errors of his paſt life. Comforted by his reflections. Implores the aſſiſtance of the bleſſed virgin. Finds himſelf greatly ſupported. Again admitted to audience. Hopes he ſhall be ſet at liberty. Again remanded back to priſon. Again brought to audience, but is ſo weak he can hardly ſtand; lies along the floor. The inquiſitor reproaches him; is hand-cuffed, and an iron collar put about his neck, ſo that he could not ſtir his arms: beats his head againſt the floor and walls, ibid. His irons knock'd off and us'd more gently, 302. A black, who is very unſociable, put into his cell to keep him company. Many kill themſelves in the dungeons. The black is two months with him, and taken from him when he grows better. After eighteen months confinement, again ſent for to audience. Articles exhibited againſt him. Is allow'd to make his defence; ſubſtance of it. His notion concerning baptiſm, the worſhip of images, &c. ibid. Surprizing ignorance of the inquiſitors, 303. Accus'd of ſpeaking contemptuouſly of the inquiſition, of fomenting hereſy, and therefore ought to be deliver'd over to the ſecular arm. He is greatly terrified at theſe menaces, and yet has ſpirits left to make his defence. Particulars of it: that he had continu'd a good catholick; had frequently defended the faith againſt hereticks: yet owns he had ſpoke too freely before the inquiſitor: but had not utter'd any thing againſt his holineſs. Is order'd to recollect all he had ſaid, and remanded back to priſon; which exaſperates him very much, ibid. & 304. Call'd four times more to audience. The priſoners tortur'd. Auto da ſé generally ſolemniz'd the firſt ſunday in advent. Thinks the jail-delivery is at hand, ibid. his joy upon that account, 305. Very much damp'd, becauſe of the uncertainty of his deſtiny; ſpends the evening in deep anguiſh; ſleeps, and is awak'd at midnight by the jailor. Is order'd to dreſs himſelf. In great terror. Recommends himſelf to heaven. The turnkeys carry him at two in the morning to a long gallery. Upwards of two hundred priſoners in it. Their dejected ſtate. Female priſoners in another gallery. Severity againſt excommunicated perſons, founded on what, 86

Severity towards perſons impriſon'd in the Portugueſe inquiſitions, 263. difficult to diſcover, becauſe of the inviolable ſecrecy obſerv'd. What is ſo conceal'd muſt be of a horrid nature. Perſons impriſon'd on the oaths of evidences who diſagree intirely. The evidences themſelves are priſoners. When a priſoner is ſeiz'd, his Wife and children are turn'd out of doors. If the priſoner is afterwards releas'd, he never recovers any of his effects, or at moſt a very trifle, ibid. The great diſtreſs to which the children of perſons ſeiz'd are reduc'd, 264. their babes ſtarving about the ſtreets, and their daughters and wives often forced to proſtitute themſelves. The familiar ſeizes the priſoner, adviſes him to make a full confeſſion. Priſoner carried to jail; his pockets are ſearch'd, every thing taken away, even his prayer-book; is not allow'd a confeſſor, nor to receive the ſacrament, ibid. He is treated like an infidel, 265. Allow'd a confeſſor at the point of death. Great inconveniences of theſe confeſſions. The ghoſtly father not allow'd to abſolve him. Great piety of the priſoners under their confinement. Their fellow-priſoners pray fervenly for them. That pious perſons ought to be ſuffer'd to viſit the priſoners. How laudable it would be, would the inquiſitors perform the duty of paſtors, ibid. Objections to this, 266. that they would derogate from their dignity. The objection anſwer'd, ibid.

Count Simon de Monfort ſtyled general of the church, in the war againſt the Albigenſes, 203. Great preſents, and greater promiſes made him, ibid. Was brave and fortunate. His lady comes with a body of men to his aſſiſtance, ibid. Attack the ſtrong caſtle of Menerbe. Sack'd, 204. Declares war againſt Raymond count de Toulouſe. Count de Monfort's great conqueſts. King of Arragon abandons him, and checks the ſucceſſes of the Cruſaders. Marches againſt count de Monfort. A bloody battle. King of Arragon kill'd. Twenty thouſand Albigenſes ſlain. All defeated, ibid. Monfort takes ſeveral places, 205. Beſieges Toulouſe. Kill'd by a ſhot from a croſs-bow. All the Cruſaders routed. The counts of Toulouſe, Foix and Cominges, recover all their ſtrong holds, ibid.

Spain, inquiſition eſtabliſh'd there, 217. Receiv'd in Arragon. Soon becomes odious, but rendred flouriſhing by Ferdinand of Arragon, and Iſabella of Caſtile, ibid. Owed its eſtabliſhment in Spain to John de Torquemada, a Dominican, 218. The promiſe he had obtain'd from queen Iſabella. Levell'd againſt the Moors, who are forced to leave Spain and fly into Africa. Great numbers ſtill continue in Spain. They and the Jews forc'd to renounce their religion, which they do only in outward appearance. This hypocriſy of great prejudice to the government. Torquemada's repreſentations to the queen. Fatal conſequences of this hypocriſy. That violent methods would be neceſſary. His arguments make an impreſſion on the queen, ibid. & 219. She wins the king over, and 'tis eſtabliſh'd all over Spain. Torquemada created cardinal and inquiſitor general. He perſecutes in fourteen years upwards of an hundred thouſand perſons, of whom ſix thouſand were condemn'd to the flames, ibid.

Spain, inquiſition there, 225. Supreme council of whom compos'd. Number of familiars very great. Its great power: all other inquiſitions of Spain ſubordinate to it. The greateſt ſubjects tremble at it. The king himſelf does not dare to interfere in it. The inquiſitors vile treatment of don Carlos, &c. Philip II. rid by the inquiſition. Names of the inquiſitions of Spain ſubject to the principal one, ibid.

Spaniards, moſt of them very illiterate, 254. Never read either the ſcripture or the fathers; uninform'd with true piety, hypocrites, ſtrongly devoted to their paſſions. ibid.

Spiritual beneſits which excommunicated perſons are deprived of, viz. partaking in publick prayers, right of adminiſtring and receiving ſacraments, right of aſſiſting at divine offices; being intirely excluded from common converſation, being buried in conſecrated ground; not allow'd an active or paſſive voice with regard to benefices, &c. the exerciſe of ſpiritual juriſdiction, 86

This how remedied in part. By the ſtatutes we find that, 1ſt. the inquiſition of Venice is of a mix'd nature. 2dly, that it is ſubordinate to the ſenate, and not to the court of Rome. Tortures in the inquiſition, 236. of three kinds. 1*ſt*. Of the rope; the priſoner is drawn up to the cieling with ropes, then let down with a jerk, which puts all his limbs out of joint. 2*d*. Of water; the priſoner forc'd to ſwallow a great quantity: when he is ſqueez'd, and his back-bone broke. 3*d*. Of fire; which is the moſt rigorous: the ſoles of the priſoners feet rubb'd with ſome unctuous ſubſtance, and ſet to broil againſt a large fire, 236. Continues an hour, and ſometimes more, ibid. Theſe ſeverities inflicted in the place of torments, 237. 'Tis a ſubterraneous place. The inquiſitors and biſhop of the place preſent. Lighted only by two dim torches. Frightful habits of the tormentors. The priſoner ſtrip'd almoſt naked. The priſoner often brought to the laſt gaſp under the torture. Tortur'd a ſecond time, and carried back to his gloomy dungeon. Fellows ſuborn'd by the inquiſitors, to exclaim againſt their cruelty to the priſoner, in order to force ſeveral things from him, ibid. The inquiſitors alſo ſooth him artfully. Venice, the inquiſition there, 221. Unſullied with hereſy till the year 1232, ibid. Upon the diviſions between the emperor Frederick II. and Innocent IV. many hereticks ſtart up in Venice. The ſenate enact laws againſt them. That they ſhould be judg'd by the biſhops, and ſentenc'd to the flames. That ſtatute put ſeverely in execution. The pope endeavours to introduce the inquiſition in Venice. The Venetians would not conſent to it. Sermons of the inquiſitors create great diſturbances. Cruelty of the inquiſitors, ibid. All Italy exclaim againſt the inquiſitors, 223. The ſenate, at the requeſt of pope Nicholas IV. receive the inquiſition, but with great reſtrictions. Siecle des Mexicains.
Les Mexicains expliquoient leurs penſées, & donnoient une idée des choſes ſenſibles par des hieroglyphes, à la façon des anciens Egyptiens; c'eſt de cette maniere que leur ſiecle & leur année etoient repreſentez. Une roüe peinte contenoit l'eſpace d'une ſiecle, diſtinguée par années, & chargée des evenemens memorables. Le ſiecle étoit de 52 années ſolaires, chacune de 365 jours, 4 indictions, de 13 ans chacune, formoient la diviſion de la roüe, & repondoient aux 4 parties du monde, de la maniere ſuivante.
Un ſerpent environnoit cette roüe, & marquoit par ſes 4 noeuds, les 4 diviſions. L'hieroglyphe de la premiere, qui marquoit le midi, étoit un lapin, ſur un fond bleu, que l'on appelloit Tochtlila: de la ſeconde, pour l'orient, une canne ſur un fond rouge; on l'appelloit Acatl: de la troiſiéme pour le nord, une epée avec une pointe de pierre, ſur un fond jaune; on l'appelloit Tecpatl: de la quatrieme pour l'occident, une maiſon ſur du verd, on l'appelloit Cagli. Entre ces quatre diviſions, il y en avoit 12 petites, dans leſquelles les 4 hieroglyphes étoient diſtribués ſucceſſivement, en donnant a chacun ſa valeur numerale, juſqu'a 13, qui étoient le nombre donné, qui compoſoient l'indiction. On faiſoit la méme choſe dans la ſeconde indiction, avec les meſmes noms depuis un juſqu'a 13: dans la troiſiéme, & dans la quatriéme, juſqu'a ce que le cercle de 52 ans fut fini, de la maniére qui ſuit.

The Mexican year.
The Mexicans uſed to expreſs their thoughts, and gave an idea of ſenſible things by hieroglyphicks, after the manner of the ancient Egyptians; 'twas thus their age and year were repreſented. A painted wheel contain'd the ſpace of an age, diſtinguiſhed by years, and fill'd with the moſt memorable events. The age conſiſting of 52 ſolar years, each of 365 days, 4 indictions, of 13 years each, form'd the diviſion of the wheel, and correſponded to the 4 parts of the world, in manner following.
A ſerpent went round the wheel, and denoted by its 4 knots, the 4 diviſions. The hieroglyphick of the firſt, which pointed to the ſouth, was a rabbit, on a blue ground, which was called Tochtlila: of the ſecond, for the eaſt, a cane on a red ground; 'twas called Acatl: of the third for the north, was a ſword with a ſtone point, on a yellow ground; 'twas called Tecpatl: of the fourth, for the weſt, a houſe on a green ground; 'twas called Cagli. Between theſe four diviſions, there were 12 ſubdiviſions, in which the 4 hieroglyphicks were ſucceſſively diſtributed, by giving to each its numeral value, ſo far as 13, which number of years compoſed the indiction. The ſame was done in the ſecond indiction, with the ſame names from one to 13: in the third, and the fourth, till the circle of 52 years was compleated, in manner following.

On This

On obſervoit cette maniere de compter par 13, non ſeulement dans les années, mais auſſi dans les mois: ils recommençoient lors qu'ils arrivoient a 13.

L'année ſolaire de 365 jours, & les mois de 20: leurs noms & leurs hieroglyphes ſont marquez dans la figure par 1, 2, 3, & ainſi de ſuite juſqu'a 18.

Pour faire l'année complette de 365 jours, les Mexicains en ajoutoient 5 aux 18 mois, de 20 jours chacun, qui faiſoient l'année.

Cet explication eſt tirée de Gemelli Careri, tome 6. de ſes voyages, chap. 5.

This method of computing by thirteens, was uſed not only with regard to the years, but alſo for the months: when they were come to 13, they began again.

The ſolar year was of 365 days, and the months of 20: their names and hieroglyphicks are pointed out in the plate by the figures 1, 2, 3, &c. to 18.

To make the year of 365 days complete, the Mexicans uſed to add 5 to the 18 months, of 20 days each, which made the year.

This explication is extracted from Gemelli Careri, vol. 6. ch. 5. of his voyages.

A DISSERTATION ON THE AMERICANS, AND THE Conformity of their Cuſtoms with thoſe of other Nations, antient and modern.

CHAP. I.

Of the Original of the Americans.

IF the antients have in any thing excell'd the moderns, we may boldly affirm 'tis not in navigation; ſuch as have any knowledge of antiquity, will not offer to diſpute this point with us. 'Tis true indeed that the antients traded to the Indies, and doubled the cape of Good-Hope, that they knew Iceland under the name of Thule; that they enter'd the Hyperborean or frozen ocean, and knew cape Tabin, vaſtly beyond the river Oby; but all this is not to be compar'd to the diſcoveries of the moderns: and ſuppoſing the former had known much more than what is generally allow'd 'em on this head, it yet could not poſſibly have been of any great advantage to them, becauſe of the ſlowneſs and defects in their navigation, which is now univerſally allow'd; the little knowledge they had of the winds, and the belief that prevail'd ſo much among 'em with reſpect to the torrid Zone's being not habitable; not to take notice of their ſmall knowledge in aſtronomy: all theſe reaſons, I ſay, ſufficiently prove they were not able to make long voyages, and conſequently, that tho' they might have ſome knowledge of countries as far diſtant as thoſe of America, it muſt have been entirely owing to chance. 'Twou'd be but to little purpoſe for us to repeat repeat what has been ſaid on this ſubject, or to dwell on an article that wou'd carry us to very great lengths, were we to go through with it; ſuffice it therefore that we obſerve, there is no probability the antients had any regular correſpondence with the inhabitants of the continent which we call America, or had ever form'd any deſign of ſending colonies thither. So that the prediction of Seneca the tragic writer, and what we meet with in Ælian, Plato, and ſome others, relating to unknown lands, ought to be conſider'd no otherwiſe than as mere conjecture or the product of fancy. But how America was firſt peopled, and when it was ſo; how the inhabitants happen'd to loſe their firſt cuſtoms, and neglected a correſpondence that might have been perpetuated from father to ſon by the help of tradition, is what we are ignorant of: however, we ſhall preſent the reader with ſome obſervations on this ſubject, that will relate chiefly to the original of the Americans; and afterwards make ſome others with reſpect to the conformity of the cuſtoms of that people with thoſe of our hemiſphere.

Purchas in his Pilgrim is of opinion, that 'tis not many centuries ſince America was firſt peopled, and grounds his conjecture on that continent's not being ſo well peopled at the time of its diſcovery by the Europeans, as it muſt naturally have been, had it begun to be peopled about Abraham's time, or even about that of our Saviour. If this continent, ſays he, has been inhabited from the infancy of the world, whence is it that we find ſo many deſarts in the midſt of it? or that countries, ſo fruitful and agreeable as theſe are, had not colonies ſent to them, ſince they deſerve to be peopled much more than the northern parts of Europe and Aſia? The Mexicans, who conſider themſelves as the moſt antient inhabitants of America, and who pretend to have ſent colonies to Peru and Chili, cannot trace a thouſand years backwards. But theſe reaſons are not ſolid enough. For 1ſt, 'tis very probable that the cruel cuſtom of devouring one another, which is practis'd by moſt of theſe nations; the bloody wars they were continually engag'd in with one another; and the * ſacrifices they made of men, may, for many ages, have thinn'd the number of the inhabitants of theſe countries. 2dly, 'Tis true indeed, that the hiſtories of Mexico and Peru, which are the two principal monarchies in America, do not go very high into antiquity; but can this be ſufficient to perſuade us, that thoſe two empires remain'd deſolate and unpeopled, for four or five thouſand years? Ought we not rather to ſuppoſe, that the ignorance of the firſt inhabitants occaſion'd their neglect of tranſmitting to poſterity the hiſtory of their original? The chronicles of moſt nations of Europe don't go higher than the time of the Roman common-wealth, and Odin, the great legiſlator of the northern nations, can hardly go ſo far backwards into antiquity, as two thouſand years. Rome and Greece indeed go higher, but they can hardly prove an antiquity of above a thouſand years over the reſt of the nations of Europe; beyond this all is fiction and chimæra. In fine, no People in the world, the Jews and Chineze excepted, can boaſt an hiſtorical exiſtence of more than four thouſand years; not to mention that we are oblig'd to allow the Chineze a great number of incidents, which we are not able to diſpute with 'em, for want of a ſufficient knowledge in their hiſtory, and the progreſs of their ſciences.

Beſides we can ſcarcely perſuade ourſelves, that the eſtabliſhment of the different nations in America, did not require a long ſeries of ages, if we conſider, that the Spaniards when they firſt diſcover'd America, found the iſlands thereof as well peopled as the Continent; and likewiſe if we reflect upon the great variety of languages that travellers have obſerv'd to be in uſe among 'em, which could not poſſibly have arriv'd at ſo great perfection in ſeven or eight hundred years. Thoſe who have ſtudied the progreſs of the living languages, know very well, that tho' it be not above eight or nine hundred years, ſince the French, the Italian, the Engliſh, and ſome other dialects of the Latin, of the ancient Saxon or German, were firſt form'd; they yet have not been been able to loſe the ſenſible marks of their origin, which ſurely will ſufficiently evince the antiquity of the American Languages, whoſe variety might probably be owing to the firſt confuſion of tongues.

'Tis very probable, that the colonies which firſt ſettled in America, came thither by land, and that if any happen'd to come by ſea, 'twas owing to chance rather than deſign *.

We may naturally ſuppoſe that ſome Phœnician or Carthaginian Sailors having been thrown on the coaſt of America by a ſtorm, neceſſity had forc'd them to ſettle there, and that they there loſt their language and the little knowledge they might have had of the arts and ſciences of their country. What makes this more probable, is, that ſea-faring men have in all ages been very ignorant, and but a degree above barbarians. The Peruvians had antiently ſome footſteps of thoſe involuntary voyages: the firſt Spaniſh writers who have collected the ſcatter'd remains of their hiſtory, make mention of certain people who came from that part of their country which lies toward the ſea, and that they afterwards made a conqueſt of their country.

† Tradition made the above-mention'd writers conſider theſe men, whoſe original appear'd ſo extraordinary, as ſo many giants; and indeed 'tis not unlikely they were ſuch, ſince we are aſſur'd that bones of a prodigious ſize have been dug up about Puerto Viejo, and in the valley of Jumbez. We have many learned men in the world, who, in raptures at this diſcovery, would conſider theſe giants as the poſterity of the children of Anak, of whom mention is made in Deuteronomy; and would bring the Lord knows how many far-fetch'd conjectures, to prove that the poor Canaanites whom Joſhua had driven out of their dwellings, had fled to Peru for refuge. But to be ſerious, 'Tis hardly poſſible to make a voyage of even a few leagues, with their Balſes, Pieroques, and canoes; neither have the Aſians, the Africans or Europeans ever had courage enough to venture over a wide extended ocean in ſuch weak veſſels; and as on the other ſide, it does not appear that the Americans were ever acquainted with any other kind of ſhipping; we may naturally ſuppoſe, that if chance did at any time throw ſome unhappy wretches on a deſart coaſt of America, in an age when mankind had little knowledge in the building of ſhips, ſuch perſons were ſoon forced to forget their former cuſtoms and manners, and to comfort themſelves for this loſs, by the propagation of their ſpecies in thoſe regions, into which fortune had thrown them againſt their wills.

In reality 'tis more natural to ſuppoſe that the firſt colonies which ſettled in America, came thither by land; by this means we avoid the difficulties that might be ſtarted concerning the paſſage of wild beaſts thither.

How-

* Several learned men have been of opinion that America was peopled by the Phœnicians and Carthaginians. They grounded their conjecture on the long voyages thoſe people us'd to make, who fitting out very conſiderable Fleets, us'd to ſend them beyond the ſtraits of Gibraltar, the Canary Iſlands, and thoſe of Cape-Verd, known to the antients, as is believ'd, under the name of the iſlands Gorgades. 'Tis true indeed, that the iſlands of Cape-Verd are the neareſt land to America, but this does not prove the Phœnicians had viſited the American coaſts. As to the cruizings of thoſe Phœnicians beyond the Gorgades, they might probably have been made towards the ſouth rather than towards the weſt. We in that caſe ſhould therefore look into the ſouthern parts of Africa for thoſe unknown lands, which the antients tell us the Phœnicians had diſcovered. On the other ſide, if it be true that the Antilles were known to 'em under the name of the iſlands of the Heſperides, and that the voyage from the Gorgades to the Heſperides, which is not now above 25 or 30 days ſail, might have taken them forty; which is but a ſhort time, conſidering their little experience; we ſhall find that no other people than the Carthaginians could have been able to undertake ſuch voyages. The ſituation of their Country, and the talents they knew they had for trade, might probably have excited them to rove up and down that great expanſe of waters between Africa and America, having firſt ſettled a pretty regular Correſpondence between Cadiz and the Caſſiterides, now call'd the Azores. If all this were true, we might probably ſuppoſe that the Carthaginians and the other Phœnicians, who were ſettled in Spain and Africk, had carried people to the Azores, the Antilles, &c. and from thence to the continent of America. And then, after having ſail'd ſeveral hundred leagues, from the coaſts of Africa to the gulph of Mexico, 'tis not impoſſible but that thoſe mariners might have attempted another as far as the main land.

† 'Tis very well known, that the ancients always endeavoured to ſet the foundations of conſiderable cities, and the original of great Men, &c. in the moſt conſpicuous light; and on the other hand, that the credulous multitude were too fond of the agreeable and glaring deceit, ever to be diſſuaded from the belief of it.

However 'tis impoſſible to fix the Æra when this happened, which perhaps may be as old as the flood, whereof the Peruvians have preſerved ſome * idea; this is the only footſtep remaining among them relating to remote antiquity, for in all other reſpects the Peruvian annals ſcarce comprehend the hiſtory of four centuries: And then what are theſe annals? Only Guappas or Quippos, that is, certain ſtrings with knots in them to point out the ſeveral tranſactions. Notice will be taken of them in the ſequel of this work: But before we come to a deciſion with reſpect to the original of the Americans, it may be proper to examine whether the affinity which ſome pretend to find between the manners and cuſtoms of the Americans, and thoſe of the Phœnicians, may reaſonably induce us to conclude that the former are deſcended from the latter.

We ſhall not take notice of the affinity that has been found between the cuſtom of living in huts, and that of roving from place to place: The Americans in this reſpect reſemble as much the Nomades, the Arabian Scenites, the Scythians, &c. as the Phœnicians.

The compariſon that might be made of the idolatry of thoſe Nations, would alſo hold with that of other nations of our hemiſphere. The following affinity, could it be proved, would deſerve our notice infinitely more; I mean that of languages. But without affecting a great depth of erudition in this place, which our etymologiſts are generally ſo laviſh of, we ſhall content our ſelves with ſaying, that a dozen words, whoſe ſound and ſignification are the ſame in the languages of two diſtant nations, is hardly capable of proving that they are both deſcended from the ſame progenitors; however, if it were true that the Carthaginians, after their diſcovery of the Heſperides, had known the continent of America, they might probably have left their language, with ſome of their people behind them; and this language might have been ſo far confounded with the American tongues, as to remain only in twelve words. Let us endeavour to maintain this kind of Paradox, though to ſpeak the truth we are almoſt perſuaded that the American ſettlements were firſt made by land, and that the Phœnicians of Africa have had very little ſhare in it. 1ſt, 'Tis certain that the Phœnician language was in proceſs of time ſo much corrupted in Africa, that it degenerated to a meer jargon, mixt with the Lybian, and other wild languages of the neighbouring Nations. 2dly, This language thus degenerated, being carried into America by a ſmall number of people, who † ſetled there, muſt naturally have been ſoon loſt, ſo that ſmall remains of it muſt have been left.

The reader may probably look upon this as the mere product of our fancy; butif it be duly conſidered, it will not appear altogether improbable. In the whole, what man of learning will dare to aſſert, that the languages of thoſe countries which lie neareſt Africa, are not mixed with Punic, with Lybian, or even broken Cantabrian words? Who is able to boaſt his having ſo thoroughly ſtudied the genius and etymology of thoſe American languages, as to be able afterwards to affirm, that there are not ſome footſteps of the African idioms, and of thoſe places which the Carthaginians poſſeſſed in Spain, to be found therein? Theſe conjectures might have been carried much farther, had not the language of the Antilles been loſt, after the Spaniards had deſtroyed the inhabitants of thoſe iſlands.

Some authors are of opinion that the Americans owe their original to the diſperſion of the ten tribes of the Iſraelites. Something has already been ſaid on that head, in

* They tell us that ſix people ſaved themſelves in an univerſal deluge; that they reſtored mankind, and that Mangocapac the firſt Incas deſcended from one of them, &c.

† Emanuel de Moraes is of opinion, that the beauty of the American climate, having engaged great numbers of Carthaginians to go thither; the common-wealth being afraid of loſing its inhabitants, was obliged to forbid thoſe voyages upon pain of death; ſo that the abandoned colonies ſunk into ſavages, the families ſeparated from one another, and diſperſed themſelves up and down. Their language grew corrupt, new words were coined, and in proceſs of time a jargon was formed, that was neither Carthaginian nor American.

in the third diſſertation on the Jewiſh ceremonies. 'Tis true indeed, that ſome traces of the Jewiſh religion have been found in Jucatan, and the coaſts of the South-Sea; as for inſtance, a kind of circumciſion, which we might with great probability impute to neceſſity, ſo far from being forced to ranſack the Jewiſh religion upon that account. * Emanuel de Moraes, a Portugueze, who had travelled many years in America, has endeavoured to prove that the Jews and Carthaginians are the common parents of the Americans. We have juſt now quoted his opinion with relation to the migration of the Carthaginians into foreign countries. Here follows his reaſon to prove that of the Jews into Braſil. The Braſilians, ſays he, marry only into their own families, in like manner as the Jews married only into their own tribes. Both of them call their uncles by the name of father, and their aunts mother; their couſins, brother, &c. both of them paſs a month in deep mourning, and wear gowns that deſcend to their feet. But theſe affinities are of little weight, ſome of them being forced, and the reſt entirely falſe. But we ſhall leave the reader to his private opinion.

The great Grotius † thinks that the Americans of Panama came originally from Norway. The Norwegians went firſt into Iceland; from Iceland they went into Groenland by the way of Frieſland: from Groenland they ſpread themſelves into Eſtotiſland, which is a part of the main land of north America, and from thence they ſent colonies to the Iſthmus of Panama. We muſt own that there is one circumſtance which ſeems to prove that the inhabitants of Panama and Mexico are originally of the north, and that is the tradition of the Mexicans who formerly declared to the Spaniards, that their anceſtors came from that quarter. As to Eſtotiſland, we are told there is a city in that country, that goes by the name of Norumbegue, which ſtill preſerves in its name ſome marks of the paſſage of the Norwegians. But unhappily for this opinion there are not the leaſt footſteps remaining of any city in the north parts of America; and the natives of the country, if we except thoſe who dwell in the cities built by the Europeans, form what can at moſt be called but ſmall villages, made up only of a few houſes. Beſides, all that Zeni who firſt diſcovered Frieſland and Eſtotiſland, relates of his diſcoveries, appears altogether romantic and as fictitious at leaſt, as the diſcovery of the Terra Auſtralis by * Sadeur. De Laat in his diſſertation on the original of the Americans ſeems to have thoroughly refuted the reaſons which Grotius alledges to prove that the inhabitants of Mexico and Panama came originally from Norway.

As to the Peruvians and other nations of the ſouth part of America, Grotius has pretended to prove they came originally from China. The ſprightly and penetrating genius of both thoſe nations; their common idolatrous worſhip of the ſun; the hieroglyphic characters of both; and above all the voyage of Mancocapac, who came from beyond the ſeas to people Peru, and made himſelf the law-giver of its inhabitants; all theſe, I ſay, appeared reaſons ſufficient to this great man, to induce him to maintain his opinion.

To this De Laat anſwers, that the Peruvians were never ſuch skilful artiſts as the Chineſe, and that the moſt excellent pieces of handicraft of Peru, are greatly inferior to thoſe of China; but to this we might juſtly anſwer, that no conſequence can be drawn from hence, why the Peruvians ſhould not be deſcended from the Chineſe. The Peruvians would not have been the firſt people that had degenerated from their anceſtors. He adds, that before the coming of the Spaniards among them, they were wholly ignorant of the uſe of ſailing veſſels; and that 'tis very unlikely the Peruvians ſhould have wholly loſt all remembrance of their country, and the art of ſailing; particularly if we conſider, that becauſe of the winds which generally blow from from the eaſt under the equinoctial, 'tis eaſier to go from Peru to China, than from China to Peru.

The Chineſe junks are no way able to croſs the vaſt ſea which lies between China and Peru; beſides it was much more natural for the Chineſe to ſend people into Mexico, as that country lies much nearer to China. The adoration which the Peruvians pay to the ſun, has no manner of affinity with the idolatry of the Chineſe, who do not worſhip that planet; whereas it is adored by ſeveral nations of the north parts of America, from whence it is very natural to believe that the Peruvians came by the Iſthmus of Panama. 'Tis ſurprizing that Grotius ſhould tell us, that thoſe people had the uſe of writing, ſince the Incas Garcilaſſo tells us expreſsly in his hiſtory, that they were ignorant of that art.

Mancocapac was not a Chineſe, the Peruvians ſaid that he was born of a * rock, which they ſhew to this day near Cuſco.

It muſt be confeſſed that the original of the Americans is hid in great obſcurity; but it would be otherwiſe, had this people been leſs barbarous and ſavage in their infancy, or had afterwards known the methods which thoſe of our hemiſphere make uſe of, to tranſmit their hiſtory to poſterity; but America does not furniſh one ſingle monument to this purpoſe.

Thoſe people minded only the preſent moment, and never troubled their heads with the time paſt, or that to come; a cuſtom which ſtill prevails among ſuch ſavages as inhabit countries not yet frequented by the Europeans. But let us be juſt in our own caſe: Are we very certain of our own original? Do we know that of the French, the Spaniards, and the Germans? Would it not be impoſſible to trace the original of the firſt inhabitant of Europe?

All the difference we may find between the Americans, and our ſelves, is, that chriſtianity has fixed the Æra of our hiſtories; and has forced us as it were to leave to the diſcuſſion of the criticks, the fictions and prodigies of paganiſm that preceded it. The ages of European idolatry are an inexhauſtible fund of fictions and conjectures, which the Greeks and Romans themſelves have not been free from, as has been already obſerved; ſince the true hiſtory of the Greeks is not to be traced higher than the firſt olympiad, and that of the Romans than the foundation of their city. We ſhall now give our conjectures with reſpect to the original of the Americans. 'Tis very probable that America was as populous a few centuries after the deluge as it is at this time; after which ſtates and kingdoms were ſoon formed, however this was done progreſſionally according as families ſeparated, and that the children themſelves becoming parents of a numerous progeny, were obliged to quit their native countries.

Theſe ſeparations gave riſe to ſtates, in which ambition and a deſire of ſuperiority might even in thoſe ages have had ſome ſhare. Nevertheleſs 'tis probable that Aſia did not ſend out any colonies, till after having been forced to drive out ſuch young people as were capable of ſubſiſting by themſelves.

But theſe ſettlements were very eaſily made in thoſe times, Husbandry was then the only employment; mankind then ſpent their lives in leading their flocks to paſture, and 'tis by the opportunities which rural occupations gave to people whoſe paſſions were as yet but in their infancy, that the firſt conqueſts were made in Aſia, and the ſending out of the firſt colonies. A ſhepherd, who was at the head of a numerous family; maſter of ſeveral flocks; and who found himſelf well ſettled in Chaldea, ſent one of his children or dependants ſeveral leagues off, with a detachment of oxen, aſſes and camels.

The flock went gently on, grazing in their paſſage, and inſenſibly drew farther from the true owner. In the mean time the detachment grew more numerous; from this flock there there ſprung another. The ſhepherd, who at firſt was no more than a deputy, became himſelf the maſter and father of a family; he then alſo ſeparated part of his Wealth, and gave it as an inheritance to that ſon whom he intended ſhould ſettle in a foreign country; or to ſome dependant that was going to ſettle further off. We preſume that in this manner an hundred years was time ſufficient to people Europe, Aſia and Africa very conſiderably; and an hundred more to people the continent of America. Let us ſuppoſe for this purpoſe, that at the flood, * Shem, Ham, and Japhet had each twelve children, and that all theſe children were fit for marriage about fifteen or eighteen years after the flood. 'Tis very probable, that after they had been married twelve years, they might ſee a poſterity of four hundred and thirty two perſons. In this manner Noah might have been at the head of above five hundred deſcendants in the ſpace of thirty years; and if we then ſuppoſe that every one of Noah's great grandchildren had ten children, theſe four hundred thirty two perſons might have begot four thouſand three hundred and twenty children in ten years time. All this might have happened in the ſpace of half a century; ſo that multiplying them always by ten, and leaving an interval of about twenty or five and twenty years between one generation, and another; Aſia, Europe, and Africa may have been peopled with four hundred thirty two millions of inhabitants, an hundred and fifty years after the flood. Methinks this could not be diſputed, were we only to have regard to the ordinary Methods of propagation; 'tis true indeed that we ſuppoſe every head of a family to have had ten children, when probably ſeveral of thoſe chiefs might not have had near ſo many. But then how many do we ſee in our days who have more than ten, and if we conſider what Biſhop Burnet has told us concerning Meſſieurs Tronchin and Calandrin of Geneva, † "the former of whom at the age of 75, had 115 children, "or perſons married to his children that could call him father; and the other at the "age of 47 had 105 perſons, who were all his nephews or nieces by his brothers or ſi"ſters:" if, I ſay, we conſider theſe two inſtances, 'twill be found that our computation is modeſt enough, for an age when poverty and the cares of life had not yet deſtroyed man's vigour, nor reduced him to the neceſſity of refraining from marriage, (the lawful method of propagation,) for fear of his not being able to ſupport his family. But altho' the increaſe of our ſpecies had for one hundred and fifty years been much leſs than we have ſuppoſed it, and that only four hundred millions of people had come into the world; nay farther, tho' we were ſtill to ſubſtract thirty millions from that ſum, for the immature or violent deaths, diſeaſes and wars, which in all probability were not ſo bloody in thoſe ages, as they have been ſince; 'tis very natural to think that ſome millions might detach themſelves from the remaining three hundred and ſeventy millions in order to ſeek their fortunes in America. And though we afterwards ſuppoſe that propagation may have been very much prejudiced by reaſon of the fatigues they laboured under in their voyage, and from the change of climate, &c. we ſhall nevertheleſs find that ten or twelve millions of people may have been able to furniſh America with forty millions of ſouls in fifty years time. What is here advanced ought not to be looked upon as a paradox, nor ſhould any difficulties be raiſed with reſpect to our calculation; difficulties which are founded only on the length of man's life in our days. Mankind in thoſe ages had not invented all thoſe pernicious arts, which at the ſame time that they ſhorten life, do alſo leſſen propagation.

The rural life which mankind led in the firſt ages; the indolence of the Americans, which has been continued from father to ſon to lateſt poſterity; and the tranquility of that people, unperplexed with thoſe cares which now prey upon us, were incapaincapable of ruining health, or of making men grow old before their time. But we will not purſue any farther a ſubject that would carry us to too great lengths. 'Tis ſufficient for our purpoſe that we have proved the poſſibility, and even the probability, that this part of the world began to be peopled about an hundred and forty years after the flood, and ſome years after the confuſion of tongues at Babel.

Theſe colonies paſſed over into America, from the north of Aſia, by the way of Tartary; there are ſeveral reaſons which induce us to be of this opinion. " 1ſt, * Fa" ther Hennepin relates that four ſavages came as embaſſadors to the Iſſatis and the " Nadoueſſans, while he was among them. They came from a country above five hun" dred leagues to the weſtward of that place, and had been four moons in their jour" ney. They added, ſays he, that their country lay weſtward, and that we lay eaſt-
" ward with reſpect to their country; that they had journey'd on continually during " all that time, except that which they employ'd in ſleep, and in hunting for their " ſubſiſtence. Father Hennepin concludes from thence, that there is no ſuch thing as the " ſtraits of Anian, for theſe ſavages aſſur'd us, ſays he, that they had not croſſed any " great Lake, for that is the name they give to the ſea. They told us further, that " all the nations with whom they were acquainted, that live to the weſt and " north-weſt of the Iſſatis, have not any great Lake near their wide extended " countries, but only rivers, which coming from the north, paſs thro' the countries " of thoſe people who inhabit near their confines, on that ſide the great lake lies,
" which in the language of the ſavages ſignifies ſea." Theſe people undoubtedly inhabit the north part of California, and extend perhaps to the frontiers of eaſtern Tartary, Japan, and the land of Jeſſo.

This conjecture appears probable enough. † The north part of Japan has not yet been diſcovered, and 'tis ſtill unknown whether it be an iſland, or Terra Firma; whether it is joined to the land of Jeſſo, or ſeparated from it by a ſtrait. The Japoneze themſelves alſo are ignorant, or pretend to be ſo in this matter; " They tell us that the peo" ple who live above them, that is to the north, and north-eaſt of them, are ſavage and
" untractable: they nevertheleſs own that theſe countries are of a vaſt extent; that they " have gone very far up into them, without being ever able to come to the end of them,
" or of finding the extent of them by the journeys they themſelves took, or the re" lations of the inhabitants of the country; that they had undertaken ſeveral jour" neys for that purpoſe; and that the want of neceſſaries had forced them to return
" back without finiſhing their diſcoveries, &c." From all this we may conclude they had made excurſions very far up into thoſe countries, and that they are a little better acquainted with thoſe countries than we are, a ſmall part of it only being known to us, under the name of Jeſſo. Nevertheleſs this country muſt neceſſarily contain a vaſt tract of ground, if it be true that it joins to Aſia on one ſide, and to America on the other, which according to de Liſle is an extent of a thouſand or twelve hundred leagues from  the borders of California, to thoſe of Tartary. Here follows a particularity which proves that thoſe people are acquainted with countries which extend very far to the north, north-eaſt, and eaſt of Aſia.

We read in the relation of the Dutch Embaſſies to Japan, that a map was ſhewn them, in which the land of Jeſſo was contiguous to Japan on that ſide towards the province of Occhio. The coaſt of that country extended north eaſtward towards America. They did not there find the leaſt marks of the pretended ſtraits of Anian, and conſequently no communication between the north and ſouth ſeas. The Japoneze ſhewed that map to the Dutch, to prove to them the impoſſibility of going round Tartary by ſea, as they were ſuppoſed to have deſigned. 2d, Thoſe 2d, Thoſe who were perfectly acquainted with the weſtern parts of America, have obſerv'd that they are much better peopled than the eaſtern parts which lie towards Europe; but this proof appears to us to be of little weight: here follows what we think a better. Tartary may be called the * Nurſery of all nations. † Almoſt all the old world is at this time governed by the northern nations, who all came originally from Great Tartary, the inhabitants whereof in all ages, accuſtomed to a laborious and active way of life like the Americans, have but very few if any ſettled habitations, and cannot brook the confinement of cities.

The Tartars, in the ſame manner as the northern Americans, are making perpetual inroads into the territories of their neighbours, and continually engaged in war. In a word, if Tartary has from time to time pour'd, as it were, its inhabitants into Europe and Aſia, why may it not have done the ſame thing with reſpect to America?

3d, Beſides this ſimilitude in the manner of living, we meet with another in the face and ſtature. To this it may be objected, that theſe muſt have been loſt in a ſucceſſion of ſo many ages. Our anſwer is, that the Americans may have preſerved the air and cuſtoms of the Tartars their anceſtors, which we prove from the inhabitants of Lombardy, who have not degenerated much from the ancient Lombards; no more than the Normans of France, the inhabitants of Granada in Spain deſcended from the Moors, or the Turks in European and Aſiatic Greece.

The modern Lombards are in general at this day the moſt bearded people in all Italy, in which they reſemble the ancient Lombards, who are ſaid to have been ‖ ſo called from their long beards. The Gaſcoons and inhabitants of Languedoc, have preſerved the loud and terrible voice, and ſtern air of the antient Goths their predeceſſors. The Spaniards ſtill retain the cold and haughty air of thoſe people, which uniting together inſenſibly, have at length form'd what has been long called the Spaniſh Gravity; which they carried along with them to Naples, and left ſome traces of it among the Netherlanders. The Normans retain the complexion, the phlegm, and cunning evaſions of the northern nations from whom they are deſcended.

The inhabitants of Granada, particularly thoſe called ‡ Alpuxares, have inherited the dexterity of the Moors, and though chriſtians, they yet abſtain from wine in the ſame manner as the Mahometans. The Turks have introduced part of their Scythian manners, and the Tartarian air, into thoſe countries they have ſince ſettled in. On the other ſide, new-comers inſenſibly acquire the air and cuſtoms of thoſe places in which they ſettle, and in proceſs of time form a mixture, which may nevertheleſs be diſcovered, when ſtrictly examin'd into. The phyſiognomy of antient nations is always viſible in the faces of their deſcendants; and the many revolutions in Italy, during which the blood was ſo often diverted from its true channel, have yet not been able ſo to change the features of the modern Italians, but that it plainly ſhews they are either direct or indirect ſucceſſors and deſcendants of the antient inhabitants of Italy. In fine, to confirm the opinion of thoſe who are of opinion that the Americans came originally from Tartary, we will quote the teſtimony of Furbiſher; he relates that  the ſavages he met with to the north-weſt of Europe on the American coaſt, "had a Tartarian air, long black hair, broad faces, flat noſes, a ſwarthy complexion; "that they rove about like the Tartars, and are divided into herds without any ſet-"led habitation, &c."

We might moreover mention ſeveral cuſtoms, which are very well adapted to prove that the Americans are of Tartarian extraction; with ſome of theſe we ſhall preſent the reader. Whenever a Prince or Cacique among the Tartars, or the greateſt part of the Ame-

Americans, leaves the world, ſome of his domeſticks are always buried along with him. Both have riches, trade, and the ſciences in contempt; and preſer to theſe domeſtick employments, the diverſion of hunting, and making inroads, which they very often do, for above four or five hundred leagues, from the places where they uſually fix their tents. The antient inhabitants of the north parts of Europe and Aſia, painted their bodies; as is manifeſt from what hiſtory relates concerning the * Picts, a people of Scythia, who us'd to paint themſelves much after the ſame manner as travellers tell us the Americans, and particularly the inhabitants of Mexico and Florida, do at this time. The Goths alſo painted their face and bodies with vermillion. In fine, the manner of making war by ſurprize, and ambuſcades, ſo much practis'd by the Tartars and Americans; the irreconcilable hatred of both; their contempt of death; their cuſtom of yielding to their old men the honour of being counſellors, whilſt the youngeſt and moſt vigorous go to the wars; which cuſtom is obſerv'd by ſeveral Tartars to this day; and was alſo for many ages practis'd by the Goths, and other nations that came from the north parts of Europe and Aſia, and is ſtill obſerv'd by the Americans; that ſavage temper which inſpires them with the cruel cuſtom of drinking the blood of their enemies; that ſubordination of their youth to the aged in their military affairs, and in the councils of war; the natural impatience of all theſe people in general, ſeems to authorize the original we have given to the Americans: but after all, we don't look upon the reaſons we have now given as ſo many convincing proofs, and we willingly ſubmit them to the conſideration of the criticks.

Before we conclude this chapter we will produce two or three etymologies, which † Vander Myl had form'd in his own imagination, to prove that the antient language of the Tartars differ'd but very little from the German; and that it ſtill ſubſiſts in a few words on the borders of Tartary and America. Tenduc, which is the laſt province of Tartary towards America, ſignifies, ſays he, ‡ extremity or end: Anian, the name of another Tartarian kingdom near California, ſignifies ‖ entrance. Near Anian is a great extent of country, which is called  Bergo; Vander Myl happily meets with a very remarkable hiſtorical circumſtance therein, which is, that the Scythians, after having abandon'd their country, went and ſhelter'd or hid themſelves in that country of Bergo. Theſe etymologies may be put in the ſame claſs with thoſe of †† Laquais (or footman) and tire-larigot, (or to drink copiouſly) which Menage has oblig'd us with.

Goropius Becanius, who was alſo ſeiz'd with the ſame etymological frenzy, had a long time before deriv'd the Hebrew tongue, and the names of the antient patriarchs from his native Flemiſh. He tells us that ‡‡ Adam, Methuſelah, and ſome other patriarchs, diſcover'd in their names the moſt palpable marks of their original. The herd of etymologiſts may very well be put in parallel with the makers of anagrams. We may juſtly apply to both what Colletet has ſaid, and boldly affirm:

Que tous ces renverſeurs de noms,
Ont la cervelle renverſée.

He, who in torturing words employs his pains, by one Madoc, of Welch extraction, towards the north parts of America. Madoc's people being afterwards abandon'd by the Engliſh their countrymen, ſoon degenerated into ſavages: the only footſteps they preſerv'd of their original were a few Welch words, which David Ingram, an Engliſh mariner, obſerv'd in their language; and the * adoration of the croſs, the worſhip of which, either themſelves or their poſterity carried into Cumana and Cozumela. Others are of opinion that the Welch went aſhore on the Azores. As to the pretended St. Andrew's croſs, which the Spaniards who firſt went into Cumana found there, and which, they tell us, had been long worſhip'd before their arrival there; we muſt put them in the ſame claſs with thoſe circumſtances, which are either doubtful, or downright falſe. The ſame may be ſaid of the croſs, which was alſo worſhip'd by the inhabitants of Cozumela or Acuzamil, before the arrival of the Spaniards. We ſhall take notice of this adoration in the ſequel of the work. The above-mention'd Spaniards found alſo ſome Negroes at Caracas, between Santa Martha and Carthagena. 'Tis very probable ſome of 'em might have been carry'd by a ſtorm, from the African coaſts to thoſe of America: 'tis not impoſſible but that ſome † Indians of the ſouthern parts of Aſia, and the neighbouring iſlands, might have enter'd America by the ſouthern countries which lie next to Aſia, and from thence have convey'd recruits to Chili, Paraguay and Peru. It may alſo have happen'd, that America may have been peopled from the north parts of Europe: as for inſtance, the Laplanders and Samoieds may have been carry'd into Groenland, either on the ice, or in their canoes; that from thence their Poſterity might have extended themſelves to Eſtotiſland, and ſo further by degrees: be that as it will, it yet does not deſtroy our opinion, viz. that the firſt Americans came into America by the way of Tartary. A writer who ſhould entertain a notion of Præ-Adamites, might eaſily ſolve all theſe difficulties, by making the Americans ſpring from another Adam. They themſelves believe they owe their original to a ‡ lake, or fountain, or that they came from certain ſubterraneous places; in this they diſcover'd as much ignorance as the antient Barbarians of our hemiſphere, who included the oaks among their anceſtors.

CHAP. II.

Of their Idolatry; Notions with reſpect to the Deity, Paradiſe, &c. and of their Sacrifices.

WE do not intend to treat this ſubject philoſophically, as that wou'd carry us to too great lengths, not to mention that it wou'd be unſuitable to our deſign, which requires only an hiſtorical narration of things. There are two kinds of idolatry, both of them as old almoſt as mankind. The firſt occaſion'd the giving to the ſtars and elements, what was due to God only; the ſecond, which was much more various than the former, had man for its object; both roſe originally from the pride and fear of man. On the one he has rais'd, if I may be allow'd the expreſſion, all the figures, all the characters, every thing in general which he imagin'd might be of uſe to make the Deity ſenſible, to his mind; and rather than be too narrow in his conceptions of it, he has multiply'd its idea in a thouſand different manners. Neither has he forgot human nature, whoſe dignity he has alſo endeavour'd to raiſe, by aſcribing to it all the knowledge which Adam and his immediate poſterity had of the Deity. On the other, he has built a ‖ ſumptuous edifice, in which he compris'd an infinite number of things he imagin'd would be agreeable to the gods, not forgetting the leaſt trifles or gewgaws. 'Tis from this ſtore-houſe, which was open to the whole univerſe, that has iſſued the great great number of rites and ceremonies which have ſpread up and down the world for ſo many centuries; and the numberleſs whimſical opinions that have never ceas'd ſtarting up, ever ſince the ſtore-houſe was firſt open'd. Whatever favour and regard ſome may have obtain'd more than the reſt, they yet are all in the main of the ſame texture, becauſe they all proceed from the ſame manufacture. 'Tis not always neceſſary that nations ſhould have correſponded with one another, and have mutually communicated their ſentiments, to have a ſimilitude of ideas and opinions: but it would be much more difficult to give a reaſon for the conformity they are found to have with one another in that reſpect, if every country produc'd a different ſpecies of Men. Are all thoſe different forms of worſhip, all theſe romantic notions, leſs agreeable to the ſupreme Being, than the infidelity of an atheiſt? The matter will admit of diſpute. The celebrated * Bayle has determin'd for infidelity; but Leſcarbot, author of a hiſtory of New-France, had declar'd before him, "that he would have a greater eſteem for a man, who was to "worſhip nothing, than for one who was to adore creatures, uninform'd with either life or "ſenſation; for, continues the ſame writer, how wicked ſoever he may be, he yet is not "guilty of blaſphemy, nor aſcribes to another, the glory due to God only: he indeed "leads ſuch a life as is not many removes from that of the beaſts; but that man is ſtill "more brutiſh, who adores an inanimate thing, and puts his truſt in it. A man who "has not imbib'd any erroneous opinion, is much more capable of learning the true "worſhip, than another that has; he being like the canvas, which is ready to receive "whatever colours may be laid on it." Such as have converted atheiſts and idolaters may decide the juſtneſs of this compariſon.

All the antient idolaters had their ſubaltern deities, whom they look'd upon as deputies or lieutenants to one ſupreme God. This opinion, which is leſs ſurprizing than atheiſm, was imbib'd among the moſt ſavage idolaters. Travellers aſſure us, that the Canadans, and other ſavages of North America, ſtand in fear of the † devil, and believe there are ‡ Genii even in inanimate things: but they nevertheleſs believe in a ‖ God, "the creator of all things; tho' they ſay that there are, beſides this God, a ſon, a "mother, and the ſun, making four in all. God, ſay they, is above all things. The "ſon and the planet of the ſun are good beings; but the mother who eats them is "good for nothing: and that they cannot boaſt too much of the father's goodneſs." The Virginians, who alſo believe there are ſeveral deities, of different degrees, make 'em all ſubordinate to one ſuperior God. One would think that the Floridians acknowledg'd the ſun for the ſupreme being; in which caſe their worſhip wou'd have an affinity to that of many antient heathens, who conſider'd it as the greateſt and moſt powerful of all beings. The Zemes of the Indians of Hiſpaniola were ſubject to a Being, eternal, unchangeable and infinite. In fine, 'tis manifeſt, that the bare light of reaſon tells mankind they ought to depend on a Power, who is greatly ſuperior to human ſtrength; and how diſtant ſoever the practice of the moſt ſavage American idolaters may appear from this idea, it may nevertheleſs be obſerv'd, that many arguments need not be employ'd to reduce them to this grand principle.

The

The Braſilians alſo ſtand in fear of the devil, whom they call Anian. We ſhall omit the different names that are given him by the moderns. The greateſt part of them aſſociate him with God, and worſhip them both equally, but they ſtand much more in fear of the devil. Theſe ideas which the American ſavages have form'd to themſelves of both God and devil, have a pretty near affinity to the two eaſtern principles, known to the antient Perſians under the names of Arimanes and Oromaſes. The worſhip of the noxious gods and evil genii was eſtabliſh'd upon the ſame foundation among the Greeks and Romans.

‡ The ſavages of New-York are of opinion, that the evil genii are the cauſe of bodily pains. Thoſe of South America aſcribe genii to arrows. In the main, might not this opinion have as much reaſon in it, as that the antients had of the ſoul of the world, and of an univerſal ſpirit that pervades every Being.

Spiritus intus alit, totamque infuſa per artus,
Mens agitat molem.———

‖ Leſcarbot, book 2. chap. 11. relates that of the Canadans.

The little knowledge the idolatrous Americans have preſerved of the ſupreme being, is abſorb'd as it were in an infinite number of ridiculous and trifling fictions, the natural conſequences of the falſe notions they entertain of his nature and ſubſtance. It wou'd be difficult to produce any thing that has the leaſt ſhadow of reaſon in juſtification of the riſe and original of theſe idle fictions; or to prove that the extravagancy of their notions ſhould reſult from any thing but their wild and crazy imaginations, and an habitual ignorance.

We ſhall make but one remark on this head, which is, that if we carefully examine the idea and character the ſavages aſcribe to the deity, we ſhall find, 1ſt, That like children, they form to themſelves a God, proportionable to the ſtrength of their capacities. 2. That they make him act conformable to their practices and inclinations. 3. That they ſuppoſe his omnipotence to conſiſt in giving them whatever may gratify their inclinations. 4. That the ſupreme felicity of this deity, conſiſts in a perfect enjoyment of whatever is the object of the happineſs of thoſe who adore him. 5. That theſe notions are tranſmitted from father to ſon, and that there is room to believe they have been always improved by the ignorance of the firſt Americans.

This may be proved from our ſelves. An ignorant father will inſtil the idea of a God into his child, before he is ſcarce able to ſpeak. He indeed tells him that he is the moſt powerful of all beings, but then he never fails to blend with it a great many qualities and frailties which are found in the creature.

If the child loves play-things, his father will be ſure to tell him, whenever he wants to keep him within due bounds, that in caſe he behaves himſelf well, God will give him play-things; and his other threats and promiſes will all be of the ſame ſtamp. His whole diſcourſe to his child ſhall turn wholly on ſenſual pleaſures, dainties, toyings, and ſuch like puerilities; in the midſt of which, with an air of ſerioufneſs, he will introduce this eternal being, of whom he himſelf has but a very imperfect idea; then cloathing this being with a body, but more beautiful and perfect than his own, he will aſcribe to him all thoſe paſſions, by which he himſelf is actuated; and cannot forbear to blend it with certain errors, which through ignorance he ſhall always have conſider'd as laudable qualities. The child brought up in theſe ideas, and deſtitute of all opportunities of acquiring a more perfect knowledge than that he received from his infancy; adds his own extravagant notions to thoſe he had imbib'd when he was a child. To purſue this matter further: Let us ſuppoſe that a chriſtian prince ſhould prohibit his ſubjects from holding any manner of correſpondence with their neighbours; that he ſhou'd deprive them of the uſe of books; ſhou'd baniſh arts and ſciences out of his dominions; ſhou'd command his people to ſpend their lives in hunting, in roving about the woods, &c. and that his ſucceſſors ſhou'd exactly follow his ſteps; we will not ſcruple to affirm, that in two or three centuries, this people, then become as ſavage as thoſe of Braſil, wou'd intermix what little remain'd in their minds of their own religion, with the moſt extravagant notions, and that they wou'd be as ignorant as the Americans. Hence we may eaſily conclude, that the Americans were capable of themſelves to eſtabliſh their erroneous principles; and that if there be any affinity between them and the idolaters of our hemiſphere, with reſpect to the idea they may have form'd to themſelves of the divine being, it muſt be owing to chance only.

The ſame may be ſaid with regard to the notions the Americans have formed to themſelves of paradiſe and hell. The Canadans believe that after death they ſhall be tranſported into beautiful green fields, embelliſh'd with all kinds of trees, fruits and flowers. They have not forgot to give hunting, and the bartering of skins, a place in their paradiſe. * The Virginians admit none but their fellow-citizens into their para-

* They believe that after this life, the good are at reſt, and the wicked in miſery. Now who are the wicked? Their enemies, and themſelves the good; ſo that they are of opinion they will all be happy after death, particularly if they have defended their country with vigour, and killed a great number of their enemies. Leſcarbot's hiſt. of New France.

paradiſe: Nevertheleſs the author quoted in the margin, tells us, that they have retained ſome idea of the reſurrection of the body, and of the immortality of the ſoul. "They tell us, ſays he, ſome fictions concerning the reſurrection of certain perſons "from the dead—as of one—who after his death had come near the mouth of Popoguſſo, "which is their hell; but that a God reſcued him, and gave him leave to return "back to the world, that he might tell his friends what they ſhould do, in order to "prevent their going into that place of torment."

This Popoguſſo, the hell of the Virginians, as we juſt now obſerved, is a great ditch, which they place at a vaſt diſtance to the weſt of their country, in which they tell us their enemies are continually burning. The Braſilians who inhabit a very hot climate, that naturally inſpires them with the ſprightlineſs and gaiety of temper, which travellers have obſerved to be in all thoſe ſavages, aſſure us, * "That the "ſouls of the virtuous will go and meet thoſe of their anceſtors, beyond the high "mountains; that they will dwell with them in delightful gardens, where they will "laugh, dance and ſing to all eternity. To live a life of virtue, is with them to "make a great havock of their enemies, and afterwards to devour them." The natural bravery of this people, made them conſider all thoſe as in a ſtate of damnation, who had led an inglorious life, and had not oppoſed their enemies with vigour; theſe they give up to the devil, and believe he will torment them eternally. In a word, all theſe ſavages proportion the rewards and puniſhments of the next life, according to the ideas they have either acquired or formed to themſelves of virtue and vice, of the happineſs and unhappineſs of this life; and in this only they agree with the antient and modern heathens of our hemiſphere. I believe 'twou'd be needleſs to purſue this conformity; men are apt enough of themſelves to form the moſt extravagant abſurdities. Our notions of the next life are always conformable to that we may have led in this; and as a proof of this aſſertion, we need only conſider the Elyſian fields and †Tartarus of the ancients, the Surgam and Patalam of the Eaſt-Indians, &c. Theſe notions have inſinuated themſelves into other religions, and have been imbib'd by nations whom we are far from conſidering as ſavage. Of this the paradiſe of the Mahometans is one inſtance; nor can the chriſtians themſelves forbear employing the moſt ſenſual ideas in their repreſentations of hell and paradiſe.

The reſult of theſe ſeveral reflections, is, that all nations are ſenſible of the neceſſity they are under, of adoring one ſupreme being. This neceſſity ſuppoſes a dependance in man, and conſequently what idea ſoever we may form to our ſelves of his being, we muſt neceſſarily repreſent him greater than our ſelves. This dependance gives even the moſt ſavage part of mankind ſome notion of ſin, and points out to them the neceſſity of prayer and repentance; that we muſt endeavour to obtain the favour, and reconcile our ſelves to the deity. Sin draws puniſhment after it; but reconciliation, which naturally ſuppoſes the practice of virtue, makes us hope reward. The Americans have preſerved theſe notions which lead inſenſibly to the immortality of the ſoul, and even to the reſurrection of the body, whereof ſome of theſe nations were not ignorant. The Peruvians who had more knowledge than the reſt of the Americans, obſerving that the Spaniards dug up the bodies of their Incas's to plunder them of the riches that were buried with them; inſtantly beſought them not to diſperſe their bones, for fear it ſhould prevent their reſurrection. We muſt indeed confeſs that the Americans have ſullied theſe pure, theſe plain principles, by the mixture of the moſt ridiculous notions; however this is not ſo great a matter for ſurprize, ſince they might juſtly reproach us, notwithſtanding all our boaſted underſtanding, with having been guilty of the ſame errors.

Sacrifices and ‡ perfuming with incenſe were uſed only by the Mexicans and Peruvians. This manner of ſerving God, eſtabliſhed among all nations before the birth birth of our Saviour, might have been preſerv'd by tradition in America, ever ſince the ſettling of the firſt colonies there. As for the human victims, whoſe blood has been ſhed on the altars of the nations of both hemiſpheres, it would be very difficult to ſay any thing that was reaſonable on that head. Wou'd it be poſſible to find the leaſt footſteps of humanity in thoſe cruel ſacrifices? 'Tis however probable, that the firſt victims of this kind were offer'd up in order to appeaſe the divine vengeance on certain occaſions, in an age when they thought the angry Gods cou'd be appeas'd with nothing but human blood. This is perhaps the moſt reaſonable conſtruction that cou'd be made in this caſe; and one would think, that the original we have given to this cuſtom, might be juſtified by the death of the deſcendants of King Saul. 'Tis moreover probable, that theſe barbarous ſacrifices might afterwards have been continu'd in order to perpetuate the events which had given birth to them; and as the mind of man, in all things which relate to falſe worſhip, is much more apt to give into exceſs, than to keep within due bounds; mankind could not prevail upon themſelves to quit that cruel ſpecies of devotion. Every foreigner and enemy was devoted to their Gods; ſuch might have been the motives of a worſhip, in which hatred, pride, and ſuperſtition were equally gratified; and which conſequently might have eſtabliſhed it ſelf in America, without the inhabitants borrowing the idea of it from other nations. In our opinion, the cuſtom which the Braſilians and other American ſavages have of putting their captives to death, ought to be rank'd among theſe ſacrifices.

CHAP. III.

Of their Soothſayers, Prieſts, and ſome of their Prophecies.

WE cannot comprehend the reaſon why Leſcarbot * refuſes to beſtow the title of prieſts on thoſe who perform the ceremonies and invocations of the Demons among the Weſt-Indians, but as far as they preſerve the uſe of ſacrifices and oblations, which they offer to their Gods. This notion is not very juſt. The title of prieſt may be beſtowed on all thoſe who are appointed to guide and inſtruct people in their religious worſhip, of what kind ſoever. There are in all men certain ideas which, from their ſimplicity, may be called original ones. The name of prieſt preſents us with one of this nature. This word, which is deriv'd from the Greek, ſignifies antient. It therefore ſuppoſes that a prieſt ſhould be old, and this is founded on a plain and ſimple reaſon, which the ſavages form to themſelves as well as we. For perſons of an advanc'd age, are more prudent, more devout, and naturally more capable of reſiſting the paſſions than young people, and conſequently fitter to preſent themſelves before God, and to offer up prayers for man. Having acquired more underſtanding, they are conſequently more capable of giving inſtruction. 'Tis therefore much more natural to commit the adminiſtration of religious worſhip to the elder, than to abandon it to young people, who generally have leſs prudence and devotion; are over-run with paſſions; without experience, underſtanding, and whoſe character cannot but be obnoxious to the ſupreme being. The Americans have preſerv'd the original idea, which the word prieſt preſented formerly to the mind; but we loſt it a little after the birth of Chriſtianity. All thoſe among them who preſide in religious worſhip, are choſe out of the elders of the people, and this was generally the practice in the moſt remote antiquity.

* Hiſtory of New France.

The Mexican clergy had formerly a ſuperior, whom we may compare to the * Pontifex Maximus of the antient Romans; he might alſo have had ſome affinity with that perſon to whom the Lutherans of Germany have given the name of Antiſtes, Super-intendant, or chief Overſeer; a kind of prelate, who though he has neither the croſier or the mitre, has nevertheleſs a great influence over the eccleſiaſtical affairs of the Lutheran churches.

We are not ſufficiently acquainted with the eccleſiaſtical ſtate of Mexico, to compare the deacon, or chief of the clergy of that empire, to the pope or even the Mufti. 'Tis not to be doubted but that the prieſts of the other American nations have their ſuperiors, who, as in other countries, have the direction of religion, and its worſhip. Men patiently ſubmit to a dependance which leaves thoſe who are ſubordinate, the hope of governing one day in their turns.

Moſt of the American prieſts are at the ſame time phyſicians. The Floridians always carry along with them ſcrips or wallets full of herbs and drugs for the uſe of their patients, † to whom they preſcribe in the triple quality of prieſt, phyſician and quack.

Prieſts are alſo phyſicians in other countries beſides the Weſt-Indies: we meet with the ſame circumſtance in Aſia and Africa; ſo natural is the ‡ belief, that Heaven beſtows in a peculiar manner, the healing arts on thoſe who are the depoſitaries of religious worſhip. This notion may perhaps be as old as the world. All Pagan antiquity was of opinion that the Gods were the inventors of phyſick, and in conſequence of this belief, the phyſicians were by the heathens enrolled in the number of their Gods. Theſe antient phyſicians made uſe of ſpells and inchantments in their art, as the Americans do at this day: whether it were, that they thereby intended to make themſelves be conſider'd with greater awe by theſe impoſtures, which the groſs and ſuperſtitious multitude took for favours from heaven; or that the people look'd upon every thing as magic, which they could not account for. Be that as it will, the Europeans, with all their learning and politeneſs, have not yet been able to purge themſelves entirely of that groſs idea, which has given riſe to a prodigious number of pernicious books of ſecrets whoſe authors pretend to aſſociate phyſic with incantations.

But it is now no longer look'd upon as an art, that is aſſociable to the prieſthood only; though 'tis common enough in Germany, to meet with ‖ clergymen, who are phyſicians and ſurgeons at the ſame time. To conſider things in a certain ſenſe, we ſhall find that all ſciences are allied to one another. Is it not probable, that the conjunction which the Germans have made of phyſic with theology, may owe its original to the antient German prieſts, who, in imitation of the Druids among the antient Gauls their neighbours, had alſo united theſe two branches together.

The religion and counſel of prieſts, have the ſame influence on civil affairs in America, as among us in Europe. The ſame prejudice which makes us truſt the prieſts with the cure of our bodily diſtempers, gives them no little authority in ſtate-affairs. They play their parts ſo well, that they are no ways inferior to their brethren in other parts of the world. We have an inſtance of this cunning and artifice in one of the moſt ſavage nations of America. " The Braſilians, ſays Leſcarbot, have their Caraibes, who " go from one village to another, and impoſe ſo far on the people, as to make them " be-

Moreover, the man who is able to diſcover ſuch abſent particulars as give " us uneaſineſs, is juſtly honoured by us, and particularly when to this is added a knowledge in ſuch medi- " cines as are proper to cure bodily diſtempers; circumſtances highly efficacious to gain credit and autho- " rity among men." Leſcarbot's hiſt. of New France. There is ſo natural a connection in theſe ſeveral ideas, that 'tis no wonder the ſavages of America, as well as ſeveral other nations, whom we look upon as Barbarians, have preſerved it in its primitive ſimplicity.

‖ Nay, quacks, which is ſtill worſe.

" believe they held a correſpondence with * ſpirits, by which means they were not " only able to give them victory over their enemies, but that to them was owing " the fruitfulneſs or barrenneſs of the earth." They delude the people to that degree, ſays † Coreal ſpeaking of the Braſilian prieſts, " as to make them believe they " carry on a ſecret intelligence with Agnian; and that they can invigorate whomſoever " they pleaſe with ſtrength and courage ſufficient to conquer their enemies. Theſe " prieſts are old men among the Aldeas, who boaſt that to them only, the growth " of plants and fruits is owing. They are artful enough to act the part of Ag- " nian to the life, and afterwards to perſuade the ſavages, that 'tis he torments " and uſes them ill. They complain of this particularly in the night, becauſe that ſea- " ſon is moſt favourable to their impoſture." The prieſts of other religions exact the ſame confidence from their people, by aſſuring them in the ſtrongeſt terms, that victory, plenty, and the reſt of the bleſſings of Heaven flow only from their zeal and prayers. We may add, that there is not one eccleſiaſtic in any other part of the world, who does not wiſh to be conſider'd as the agent or ambaſſador of his God: and as this character which he arrogates to himſelf, is the moſt glorious that cou'd poſſibly have been invented, 'twill ſcarce excite humility.

The clergy of all religions, endeavour univerſally, in the firſt place, to eſtabliſh their dominion over the minds of men; and to effect it, they think 'tis their buſineſs to perſuade the credulous vulgar, that by the virtue of certain private ſecrets they obtain the diſpoſal of the celeſtial bleſſings. Let it not be objected, that thoſe of the Braſilians are contemptible; for ſince it enables them to work wonders upon the ſavages, 'tis ſufficient to juſtify what we have advanc'd in this place.

Though his method be different from that of the Bramin, the Dervis, the Bonza, and the Talapoin, yet the plan is not therefore leſs the ſame; and we may be aſſured that a Boié who breathes courage on an aſſembly of ſavages, reaps as much advantage from this pretended myſtery, as a Bramin does from his water of the Ganges, or from an ablution with cow-dung.

The Weſt-Indians have their oracles and prophecies, as well as other nations. Such were thoſe which gave the Mexicans notice of the approaching deſcent of a foreign people, a little before the arrival of the Spaniards in America. Theſe prophecies are of the ſame nature, with thoſe which the Greek and Roman hiſtorians have tranſmitted to us. They were all of them given in equivocal terms; might have been as applicable to any other event, as that to which they were pleas'd to apply 'em; and were often made after the events had happened. The ſame judgment is to be form'd of all thoſe prodigies that accompanied the fall of ‡ Montezuma, which were trifling and contemptible, had chance ſo order'd it, that they had met with events of an indifferent nature; but they had the moſt profound regard and reverence paid them, as they either proceeded or accompanied the revolution of Mexico, which alſo was not a little heightned by the natural ſuperſtition of the Mexicans.

Their oracles may be put in the ſame claſs with thoſe of the antient heathens, that is to ſay, they were always ‖ doubtful, generally falſe, and ſometimes true by accident. They,

'Tis well known that Numa Pompilius taking advantage of the credulity and ſuperſtition which in his time had ſo great an aſcendant over the Romans, made uſe of a pious fraud to complete his intentions, by telling them, that he held a private correſpondence with the nymph Egeria, who was ſuppoſed to forward the delivery of children, and that all his actions were influenced by her immediate inſpirations.

† Vol. 1. of his voyages. ‡ Emperor of Mexico.

‖ The deceit and covetouſneſs of the prieſts are not a little concern'd herein. Here follows an inſtance, that may be put in parallel with any of thoſe we read of that kind among the antient heathens. An Indian going through a wood, perceived a motion in the trees, which he took to be ſupernatural. Frighted at the prodigy, he addreſs'd himſelf to that tree which he fancied ſhook the moſt; but the tree not condeſcending to conſabulate with him, it ordered him to go to a Boié, with whom it afterwards entred into converſe; commanding him to conſecrate an image, a temple, and ſacrifices to the God who was afterward ador'd by thoſe Indians, under the name of Tocharwagamaracotti. Upon which, on the bare word of the Boié they immediately decreed divine honours to this God. We find this circumſtance in Purchas, quoted from Jeronimo Romano.

They, as well as we, have the * art of working on the affections of their hearers, by certain affected preliminaries, with ſuitable geſtures and poſtures; which though they appear ridiculous to us, are yet uſeful in preparing the attention of the auditors, and by that means have a wiſh'd-for effect on the minds of thoſe who wait for the deciſions of a juggler. We will allow that theſe arts are not to be practis'd on any but Americans; nevertheleſs we muſt own that they are founded on ſuch prejudices as few perſons are free from, viz. 1ſt, That God is always wonderful. 2dly, That ſimplicity is obnoxious to him: and 3dly, That he never communicates himſelf to men, but in a manner directly oppoſite to the common courſe of nature. 'Tis on theſe three prejudices, that the antient as well as modern heathens have founded all the ridiculous extravagances of their oracles; and as theſe prejudices are univerſal, we muſt not be ſurpriz'd, that even the chriſtian religion it ſelf is not entirely exempt from them.

Dancing and ſinging are in great vogue among the Americans; but notwithſtanding there may appear ſome marks of religious worſhip in both of them, we yet cannot ſafely determine on this article. Probably they may dance only for pleaſure-ſake, and to exerciſe themſelves; as to their ſongs, they relate always to the illuſtrious actions of their anceſtors, and the deſtruction of their enemies.

We muſt not omit, that the prieſts, of the moſt ſavage Americans, have, as in all other countries, certain † characteriſticks, peculiar to their profeſſion. We have already taken notice of the little ſcrips, which the Jouanas among the Floridians carry at their girdles in quality of phyſicians. The Braſilian Boies carry Maracks in their hands, which is the name they give to certain hollow gourd-bottles, adorn'd with feathers, and filled with little ſtones. They ſtalk along with theſe Maracks in their hands, with as grave and haughty an air, as a fryar hugging his crucifix. We are likewiſe aſſur'd, that the prieſtly dignity is ‡ hereditary among the American ſavages, and that the ſecrets of the art are tranſmitted from father to ſon to the lateſt poſterity. 'Tis exactly the ſame in the Eaſt-Indies, where the Bramins make all their children Bramins. The Jews excluded all but the tribe of Levi from the prieſthood; the prieſthood was alſo hereditary among the antient Egyptians, but the chriſtians have laid aſide that cuſtom.

* A bricklayer, who was almoſt tir'd with the long exordium of the preacher, ſaid he ſpent a long time in raiſing his ſcaffolding. See Menagiana.

† If we were better acquainted with the prieſts of other nations, we ſhould find in them, as well as in our own, certain marks which cleave to the mind, and are never effac'd. Theſe marks among us conſiſt in certain habits, which are contracted by inſenſible degrees; an air that diffuſes it ſelf over the whole countenance; certain peculiar methods of ſaluting, a quaint manner of expreſſion, that inſinuates it ſelf into the moſt polite and unaffected converſations. The eccleſiaſtick is diſtinguiſhed by his eye, his voice, his geſture, his gait, and even the attitude of his body; but we are not to think that the clergy are the only body of men who carry about 'em the peculiar marks of their profeſſion. Every trade has its characteriſticks, which are almoſt indelible.

‡ Jeronimo Romano, quoted by Purchas, tells us in his Commonwealth of the Indians, that the chief of the Mexican Clergy was of the royal family, or at leaſt of one of the moſt illuſtrious familes of the empire. Among the quality, the eldeſt ſon inherited his father's eſtate, and the ſecond was devoted to religion.

CHAP. IV.

Of the birth of children; ſome cuſtoms of lying-in-women; of Polygamy; manner of educating their children; the love their parents bear 'em, and of the naming them.

MAN has but one way of coming into the world, but his birth has introduc'd a numberleſs multitude of cuſtoms, the greateſt part of which have grown up into ceremonies. Among theſe cuſtoms ſome owe their riſe to neceſſity, and are probably the ſame in all countries; ſuch for inſtance are thoſe of waſhing and naming children as ſoon as they are born. As to the cuſtom of covering and wrapping 'em in ſwadling-clothes, the moment they come into the world, 'tis very far from being of univerſal practice either among the antients or moderns. As for inſtance, the Cimbri us'd antiently to * plunge their new-born infants in ſnow, the better to inure 'em to cold and labour. The Spaniards us'd to dip 'em in the river: † in Braſil, the men who perform the office of midwives to their teeming conſorts, receive the infant from the mother, and fairly tear the navel-ſtring to pieces; and having waſh'd the infant, paint it with red and black. They are unacquainted with the uſe of ſwadling-clothes; but carry the child, as ſoon as it is born, to the hammock; when, if it be a boy, the father lays by his child, a little wooden bow, a few ſmall arrows, and a little knife. The lying-in woman does not meet with better treatment than her new-born infant: the moment ſhe is disburthen'd, ſhe immediately goes and waſhes herſelf, ſets about her work, and does not find herſelf the worſe for it. If it be ſaid, that this is owing to the climate, 'twould be a very wrong aſſertion, ſince the wives of the Livonian peaſants uſe the very ſame cuſtom, both with reſpect to themſelves and their children; as likewiſe the ſavages of North America, according to father ‡ Hennepin.

'Twou'd be needleſs to quote all the barbarous nations, to ſhew the conformity of their cuſtoms on this article; and to prove to the Europeans, that the delicacy of their complexion is much leſs owing to the climate, than to the effeminacy which they have inherited from their fathers, and tranſmit to their poſterity. The children of poor people, notwithſtanding the misfortunes their parents may labour under, grow ſtrong and robuſt, and are inur'd to labour and fatigue; whilſt the rich bring either weak or deform'd children into the world: like to thoſe tender plants, the culture of which gives inexpreſſible trouble, at the ſame time that they are a diſhonour to nature.

We juſt before mention'd the vigour of the American women. In ſome parts of South America they not only go to work immediately after their delivery, but even wait upon their husbands, who act the part of the lying-in women ‖. The antient Spaniards, and the Tibarenians, a people bordering on Cappadocia, had alſo this cuſtom.

* Mr. Locke has told us the great advantages of this way of hardning children, his words are theſe: "The "firſt thing to be taken care of, is, that children be not too warmly clad or cover'd, winter or ſummer. "The face, when we are born, is no leſs tender than any other part of the body: 'tis uſe alone hardens it, "and makes it more able to endure the cold; and therefore the Scythian philoſopher gave a very ſignificant "anſwer to the Athenian, who wonder'd how he cou'd go naked in froſt and ſnow. How, ſaid the Scythian, "can you endure your face expos'd to the ſharp winter-air? My face is us'd to it, ſaid the Athenian. "Think me all face, reply'd the Scythian. See his Education, Sect. 5.

cuſtom. We could hardly think it poſſible that nations which lie at ſo great a diſtance from one another, ſhould have communicated ſo odd and unjuſt a cuſtom, which is ſo far from appearing to be founded in nature, that on the contrary, ſhe ſeems to dictate, that the husband ought to aſſiſt his wife, at a juncture, which is frequently fatal to our women. It would be impoſſible to juſtify this cuſtom, but by ſuppoſing that theſe women have a ſurprizing vigour, even in the delivery of their children. We muſt further ſuppoſe, that this vigour aſſiſts their natural activity; and that their exerciſe, which is infinitely more wholeſome than an indolence of ſeveral weeks, like that of our lying-in women, helps the American women to throw off thoſe uncleanneſſes which attend upon delivery. As for the other part of this cuſtom, I don't believe it can be accounted for in any reaſonable manner.

Theſe obſervations on the American women, oblige us to make a few more. Travellers aſſure us, that as ſoon as women have conceiv'd, they break off all commerce with their husbands *, which ſeems ſuitable to the dictates of nature. They tell us farther, that menſtruous women withdraw from ſociety; which agrees very well with that natural decorum, that men never fail to obſerve in their cooler moments. The deſign of nature is to create ſound and perfect creatures; but it is impoſſible for this to be done, during the periodical uncleanneſs of women. The Jewiſh religion, which agrees very well with the laws of nature, is no leſs exact in the obſervation of this cuſtom. But we ſhall wave a ſubject, which properly belongs to the province of the phyſician.

'Twou'd be more difficult to juſtify the conduct of the Americans, and their ſentiments, with reſpect to the plurality of wives: but then, a very ſtrong precedent immediately preſents itſelf in their favour, I mean the polygamy of the antient Jews. To this cuſtom we ſhall oppoſe an argument, which cannot be thought foreign to our purpoſe, viz. that we do not meet in polygamy with that conſtant and uninterrupted friendſhip, which ought to be reciprocal between man and wife; the affection that ought to reign in a family; nor the happineſs which a good father ought to procure his children. 'Tis impoſſible to defend the polygamy of the Jews by the divine laws, tho' examples ſeem to favour it. The laws of Chriſtianity are ſilent with regard to the plurality of wives; it wou'd nevertheleſs be eaſy to produce indirect prohibitions from that religion, founded on its morality, and that ſpirit of juſtice and humanity, which ſo viſibly diſtinguiſhes it. Theſe arguments are ſtrong; but the objection that might be made to them is not ſo; viz. that ſovereign princes ought to prohibit polygamy, for the good of their ſubjects, and to prevent domeſtick broils. This argument does not appear convincing enough, ſince both theſe things might be conſiſtent with polygamy. The ſcriptures furniſh but few inſtances of theſe domeſtick broils; that of the Mahometans, with few more. The latter take proper meaſures to ſecure inheritances, and to check the jealouſy and ambition of their women; to which may be added the unbounded authority of fathers and husbands, who take care that order be obſerved in their families, and don't ſuffer the members to oppoſe the will of the maſter of it. A ſtickler for polygamy will ſay farther, that tho' we were to ſuppreſs all that nature, corrected by virtue, dictates to mankind; and whatever the morality of the chriſtian religion inculcates particularly againſt polygamy, we ſhould nevertheleſs find, that 'twou'd be impoſſible ſtates ſhould be overthrown, and families ruin'd, by a multiplicity of wives: that provided, women were kept in a ſtate of ſlavery, and conſider'd as objects given to man for his pleaſure, and the propagation of his ſpecies; that they were treated as beings inform'd indeed with ſouls, but with ſouls greatly inferior to thoſe of men, this wou'd entirely prevent all domeſtick tumults in families. In fine, wou'd he continue, no more ſhou'd be allow'd them, than that imperious perious friendſhip which a maſter indulges a ſervant who pleaſes him. This is the notion which all nations that allow of polygamy have of women. 'Twou'd therefore be impoſſible to juſtify polygamy from the principles of religion; but let us endeavour to plead the excuſe of thoſe who argue for it from other principles. One wou'd imagine it was founded in nature, and that it allows us to compare women to fields, which are plough'd and manur'd. It will be ſaid, that one * man is able to cultivate ſeveral at the ſame time, to keep them in order, and to allow them all reaſonable attendance, and all this without doing the leaſt prejudice to himſelf, or the ſociety he is a part of. Such is the notion of the Americans †, and ſome other nations. But to wave theſe reflections.

The American women nurſe their own children, which is a duty that nature requires from all mothers. The Jews and Germans were formerly nurſes to their own children, as alſo the ancient Greeks, as is manifeſt from Homer, &c. nevertheleſs the cuſtom for women to ſuckle children that were not their own, became afterwards very common in Greece and Rome. We ſhall not ranſack all antiquity, to ſhew in what manner mothers us'd antiently to treat their children; enough has been already ſaid upon that head. ‡ Another remarkable cuſtom among the North Americans, is their faſtening their children to a board, wrought very ſmooth, and to wrap them up in a beaver's skin without either ſwathes or bedding, after the European manner; if they wrap them up in ſwadling-clothes, they are only ſwathes cut from large skins, which don't any way hurt the tender babes ||. The female ſavages take care to hold the children, that are thus bundled up, in ſuch a manner, that their heads lie much higher than their feet; and to prevent their excrements from prejudicing their health, they ſet the rind or ſhell of a birch-tree, which is made in the ſhape of a gutter, at a little diſtance from 'em, and this they fix in ſuch a manner, as to carry off all the filth that comes from 'em. Leſs care is taken of children in South America, ſince thoſe ſavages have no manner of uſe of ſwadling-clothes; but on the contrary, they give their tender limbs full liberty, by laying 'em ſtark naked on the ground, or in a hammock, till ſuch a time as they are able to go alone. Notwithſtanding the little care that is taken of them, we yet never

* The Mahometan law ſays, that 'tis not only poſſible, but that it ought to be ſo. One wou'd think that chaſtity, according to their principles, were a ſin againſt nature. One of their ſacred books ſays, "that in the day of judgment, the earth on which a man, who had always liv'd in a ſtate of continence, "was us'd to lay himſelf down, ſhall riſe up againſt him, and ſay, what crime had I been guilty of, that this "man, in oppoſition to the dictates of nature, ſhould have trod me under foot; I who labour'd inceſſantly "to the generation and production of beings?" This paſſage is too beautiful not to merit an interpretation, as agreeable to our paſſions, as conformable to the intentions of nature. The Perſian doctors teach, that the moment a youth begins to feel any emotions of luſt, he muſt immediately be indulg'd in it, by giving up a woman to his embraces; and that to ſooth the paſſion of love, is a meritorious action. In conſequence of this principle, they don't ſcruple to give a ſhe-ſlave or a concubine to the arms of a young lad, the moment they diſcover in him the leaſt tendency to copulation: whence it may be inferr'd, that he who makes ſuch a demand, commits no greater indecency, than if he were to ask for victuals when he is hungry. See Chardin's voyages, vol. 2. p. 257. Amſterdam edit. 1711. A circumſtance, continues Chardin, that is very particular in a conduct ſo worthy of nature unenlighten'd by reaſon, is, that Mahometans only are indulg'd in this privilege, and that 'tis lawful for them only to make uſe of concubines, or to have a plurality of wives. This maxim may indeed make a great number of converts to Mahometaniſm. They palliate this prohibition, with an argument that is rather waggiſh than ſerious: all religions, ſay they, have their auſterities and their pleaſures, which are inſeparable. The Chriſtian religion allows the drinking of wine to chear the heart, but will permit one wife only: that of the Mahometans allows a plurality of wives, and prohibits the uſe of wine.

† "A man that cultivates ſeveral pieces of ground, has a much greater produce, than if he were to plough "one piece only. Old women are conſider'd as lumber, and are employ'd in the moſt ſervile offices, as "long as they have any ſtrength left." Marriage among them is never the reſult of love, and ſeldom gives birth to it. Coreal's voyages, vol. 2. All the American Indians are great ſticklers for nature, and are of opinion, that ſhe muſt not be ſuffer'd to lie idle, which exactly tallies with the notion they have of the female world.

|| Let your ſons clothes be never made too ſtrait, eſpecially about the breaſt. Let nature have ſcope to faſhion the body as ſhe thinks beſt: ſhe works of herſelf a great deal better, and exacter, than we can direct her: and if women were themſelves to frame the bodies of their children in their wombs, as they often endeavour to mend their ſhapes when they are out, we ſhould as certainly have no perfect children born, as we have few well-ſhap'd that are ſtrait-lac'd or much tamper'd with. Locke on education, ſect. 11.

never meet with any of them who are either lame, crook-legg'd, or crump-back'd: ſo * true it is that the ſimplicity of nature, is often preferable to the over-fondling of an European mother. It may perhaps be objected, that our climate would not permit of childrens being treated after this manner: however, it cannot be deny'd, but that we truſt too little to nature.

The reflections we have now made, leads us naturally to the love which parents bear their children. † We are told, that the Americans carry this to a much greater height than the Europeans; eſpecially the Greeks, who us'd to expoſe theirs to the wide world; and the Romans, who always ſold their children, when they were not able to maintain them. We are aſſur'd, that the Livonian peaſants have the ſame cuſtom, but then they juſtify this uſage, which indeed at firſt ſight appears cruel and barbarous, by ſaying, that their children meet with a much better fate among ſtrangers, being then no longer expos'd to the tyranny of the Livonian nobility, whoſe chief characteriſtic is pride, and who treat their vaſſals worſe than they do their dogs. The Americans alſo love to have a great number of children; and tho' they probably may not, like the Jews, look upon a numerous offspring as a peculiar bleſſing from heaven, they yet think it anſwers the deſign of nature. We may generally obſerve, that men ſeldom doubt the truth of this laſt reflection: even thoſe who get children involuntarily, and whoſe ſole object in the commerce they have with women, is pleaſure, are yet oblig'd to let her take her own courſe. Perſons of either ſex, who give into theſe irregularities, rather hate than love their children; and 'tis this that creates an eternal ſtruggle between nature and honour; a ſtruggle that gives riſe to numberleſs diſorders, and which will laſt as long as the world. Nature is pleas'd that all thoſe, whoſe only aim is the gratification of their paſſions, ſhould meet with the puniſhment due to their criminal abuſe of her, by giving them children contrary to their expectations. Honour, which is only the effect of that probity that is engrav'd on the heart of every man, purſuant to whoſe dictates we are, in our ſerious reflections, oblig'd to confeſs, that every irregularity in life is a kind of violence to the laws of nature; deſtroys creatures, which ſhe can conſider no otherwiſe than as ſo many inſults put upon her by man. We think that 'tis this gives riſe to the cruelty of thoſe who deſtroy the offſpring of their unlawful embraces, or ſuch as are the fruits of the lewdneſs of both ſexes. As marriage among the Americans is a more unconfin'd ſtate than among us, it follows, that how ſavage ſoever they may appear in our eyes, they yet don't carry their inhumanity and barbarity to ſuch lengths, as to deſtroy the fruit produc'd by the commerce of man and woman. To carry this reflection further; intereſt, and the cares of life, do not bear that ſway among them as with us; they put themſelves to no manner of pain about marrying beneath themſelves; entirely free from any ſuch troubleſome notions, they marry when, and in what manner they pleaſe. The children they bring into the world are by them conſider'd as a help, whereas we often look upon them as a burden: ſo true it is, that in ſpite of all the boaſted delicacy of our manners, we in this reſpect deviate much more from the dictates of nature than the American ſavages; but this is not to be wonder'd at, when we conſider that their occupations are much fewer than ours; their way of life more conformable to the ſimplicity of nature; and their minds independant on the greateſt part of thoſe circumſtances, in which we make our happineſs to conſiſt. Experience juſtifies the truth of theſe aſſertions: we daily ſee that thoſe who are burthen'd with the feweſt cares, are much more careful of their families;

* Narrow breaſts, ſhort and ſtinking breath, ill lungs, and crookedneſs, are the natural, and almoſt conſtant effect of hard bodice, and clothes that pinch. That way of making ſlender waiſts and fine ſhapes, ſerves but the more effectually to ſpoil them. Nor can there indeed but be diſproportion in the parts, when the nouriſhment prepar'd in the ſeveral offices of the body, cannot be diſtributed as nature deſigns; and therefore what wonder is it, if it being laid where it can, on ſome part not ſo braced, it often makes a ſhoulder or a hip higher or bigger than its juſt proportion. Locke on education, ſect. 12.

families; and that ſuch as confine their happineſs to a few circumſtances, meet with numberleſs charms in that medium, with which nature is always ſatisfy'd.

We ſhall dwell but very little on thoſe exerciſes to which the Americans accuſtom their children. 'Tis well known that as ſoon as they are capable of running alone, they are taught only to handle the bow and the arrow, or a kind of club, with which they knock down their enemies: they are alſo taught to run and hunt. Theſe ſeveral exerciſes make 'em nimble and vigorous; they are very ſeldom troubled with thoſe diſeaſes, that ſeize the nerves of the Europeans; and nature, whoſe courſe they take care not to divert, by a ſoft or ſedentary life, which our children are ſo much indulg'd in, takes a pleaſure in indulging ſavages that extent of * body, and proportion of all the limbs, which a human creature ſhould naturally have. Beſides, 'tis certain that theſe people who owe but very little to nature, have learn'd by experience, that †exerciſe throws off numberleſs ill humours, which by their ſtagnating in the body, prevents the circulation of thoſe, which were deſign'd to feed it and give it growth. No one can doubt the truth of this aſſertion, it being manifeſt from the methods they employ, to cure moſt of the diſeaſes they are ſubject to. Beſides 'tis obſerv'd, that the number of people, who are both deform'd and ſickly, is very great in ſome parts of Europe, where the activity of the body is diſregarded; and that 'twould be no difficult matter to levy whole bodies of lame and crooked people. The antient Greeks alſo made frequent uſe of bodily exerciſes, particularly the Lacædemonians, who us'd to conſider all thoſe almoſt as infamous, who did not apply themſelves to gymnaſtic exerciſes in their youth; ſo that their women us'd to learn to wreſtle as well as the men. Children of five years of age were taught a tireſome ‡dance, which by theſe people was thought a proper introduction to military exerciſes. Theſe bodily exerciſes were not carried to theſe lengths among the Romans: in the infancy of their republick, its members were all either ſoldiers or husbandmen; but afterwards devoting all their thoughts to the conqueſt of the world, they ſcarce allow'd a few hours to the ſtudy of arts and ſciences, which they receiv'd but late from the Greeks: be that as it will, we may juſtly preſume they were more active than we are. As to the antient Germans, and other nations, of whoſe antiquity ſome footſteps are ſtill remaining, 'tis certain they brought up their youth much after the ſame manner as the Americans.

This is all the education the above-mention'd people beſtow on their children; they ſeldom have any regard to the cultivating the mind, a circumſtance ſo neceſſary to fit man for reflection, and to raiſe him above the brutes. They are wholly ignorant of the ſciences, and have no notion of any arts, but ſuch as owe their invention to neceſſity, to enable them to ſpend their lives with greater pleaſure. All thoſe ſlight principles they have preſerv'd with reſpect to the Deity, their original, and their condition in the next life; all thoſe duties of humanity, which they indulge only to their friends, and generally refuſe their enemies; all thoſe faint glimmerings of virtue they are obſerv'd to poſſeſs, and thoſe notions of equity, by whoſe informations they ſettle pretty juſtly the proper bounds between lawful poſſeſſion and uſurpation; all this reſults entirely from their imitation of their parents; an effect of that natural light, which is ſcarce ever extinguiſh'd in man, notwithſtanding we meet with ſome people towards the ſtraits of Magellan, who appear ſuch brutes, as would almoſt perſuade us that they were altogether deſtitute of it. But were it poſſible for us to ſpend a few months among theſe ſavages,

* 'Tis generally known, that the women in China (imagining I know not what kind of beauty in it) by bracing and binding them hard from their infancy, have very little feet. I ſaw a pair of China ſhoes lately, exceedingly diſproportion'd to the feet of one of the ſame age amongſt us; their women's ſhoes would ſcarce be big enough for one of our little girls. Beſides this 'tis obſerv'd, that their women are alſo very little, and ſhort-liv'd, whereas the men are of the ordinary ſtature of other men, and live to a proportionable age. Theſe defects in the female ſex in that country, are by ſome, imputed to the unreaſonable binding of their feet, whereby the free circulation of the blood is hindred, and the growth and health of the whole body ſuffers, &c. Locke on educat. ſect. 12.

ſavages, we then ſhould ſoon find, that they are forc'd to obſerve a certain order, as well as precepts, which nature herſelf dictates to them, and which are only enlarg'd and improv'd by education. Though we juſt now obſerved, that the Americans neglect to cultivate the minds of their children, and to inſtil ſuch principles into them as may be of uſe in the well regulating of their lives; we ſhall nevertheleſs meet with ſome exceptions to this, in the ſequel, it being known that the Mexicans committed their children about fourteen or fifteen years of age to the care of their prieſts, in order to their being inſtructed in the knowledge of their religion, and the duties of civil ſociety; and alſo that the Peruvians, and ſome other American nations had certain principles of education among them.

We ſhall borrow from Leſcarbot, whom we have already made uſe of in ſeveral places, what relates to the naming their children. * This author tells us, that in New France, the eldeſt ſon goes by his father's name, with this difference only, that he adds a particle at the end of it, by way of diminutive. As for inſtance, ſays he, the eldeſt ſon of Membertou will go by the name of Membertouchi, which is as much as to ſay the little or young Membertou. The ſecond has whatever name his father pleaſes to beſtow on him; and if there be a third ſon, he is call'd by the name of the ſecond ſon, with a diminutive, as in the firſt; ſo that if the name of the ſecond is Actaudine, that of the third will be Actaudinech. This diminutive is ſo varied as to ſuit with the name to which it is joined. Thus in Italian of Fanciullo a child is made Fanciullino a little child; and of Ragazzo a boy, Ragazzetto. Whenever the father or elder brother dies, the ſurviving children change their names, in order to remove thoſe gloomy ideas, which would naturally ariſe at the mention of the name of the deceaſed. We ſhall obſerve by the way, that Leſcarbot cenſures thoſe who give chriſtian names to ſavages, and declares that 'tis direct prophanation, and to this purpoſe inſtances Alexander the Great, who would not ſuffer any one to be called by his name, whoſe virtuous actions did not render him worthy to bear it.

The Braſilians give their children whatever name firſt comes into their heads, or the name of whatever object is moſt agreeable to them. Thoſe which the Mexicans and Peruvians give their children, are ſomething like theſe. They have alſo ſome, by which they expreſs certain ſhining qualities, or conſiderable defects. We ſhall not take notice of ſuch as bear ſome affinity to the names of the antient Hebrews, which were often of uſe to revive the memory of ſome remarkable event. This is alſo obſerv'd to this day, in the names of the modern Eaſterns. As for the other obſervations, they might be made in general on all thoſe ſorts of names.

CHAP. V.

Of the American languages, &c.

THE American languages, in the ſame manner as ours, have peculiar provinces, bounds and revolutions; and even the † languages of different ‡ provinces, vary among them, as much as with the Europeans. Theſe languages muſt neceſſarily be ſubject to very ſurprizing and ſudden revolutions, if it be true that the Canadan dictionary, or vocabulary, compoſed by James Quartier, who made ſome expeditions

* Hiſt. of New France, Book 3. chap. 2. † Leſcarbot's hiſt. of New France. Book 3. chap. 7.

‡ Leſcarbot ſays, in the ſame province. One would think that by Province, he means a whole country, ſuch as Virginia or Florida. This diverſity of tongues muſt be much greater, if it be true that an interpreter muſt be made uſe of, in order for people to underſtand one another at thirty miles diſtance. Hennepin. diſcov. of North America, pag. 305. Edit. Utrecht 1697.

tions into that country about anno 1533. was not underſtood by the * French, that went to Canada in Leſcarbot's time, who made that obſervation eighty years after James Quartier's arrival in that country. Theſe ſudden revolutions muſt be aſcrib'd to the corruption which the Europeans have introduc'd in the American languages, and to the voluntary and often forc'd removals of theſe people, whoſe cantons and villages fall always to the ſhare of the ſtrongeſt, till ſuch time as theſe are drove out by others.

The Peruvians had formerly a language that was peculiar to the myſteries of their religion, and was underſtood by their prieſts only. 'Tis the ſame with ſeveral nations of our † hemiſphere, and this affectation extends even to thoſe things which relate to the ſciences, the ſecrets whereof they, as it were, lock up in a language that is unknown to the people.

We ſhall now preſent the reader with ſome obſervations on the Canadan languages, which are borrow'd from Leſcarbot. The Canadans cannot pronounce certain ſyllables or letters; but whether this be owing to inattention, or a vicious habit, which might poſſibly be rooted out by reflection, we cannot determine. 'Tis in this manner, they change V into B, F into P; and when the vowel U comes before another vowel, they pronounc'd it Ou. To this we may add, that every tongue has certain difficulties in its pronunciation, which a foreigner can never get over, but by an habitual attention.

The French and Dutch cannot pronounce the Engliſh th clearly; nor does the German ch give a Frenchman leſs trouble, particularly if a conſonant follow after; and the Germans have no better ſucceſs in pronouncing the French liquids ll ll. A perſon who has even made a foreign language pretty familiar to him, finds it often a very difficult matter for him, to keep himſelf from tranſporting, as it were, the particular ideas, and the turn of his native tongue, into the language he has learnt. But this is not all: we imprint, as it were, the peculiar character of our own nation, on the very accent and expreſſion of the language in which we diſcourſe. The Dutchman ſhall transfer the heavineſs and ruſticity that is natural to his country; the German, the harſhneſs and bluntneſs of his; the  Engliſhman, the ficklenеſs of his nation; the Spaniard, his bravadoes; the Italian, his effeminacy; and the Frenchman, his haughtineſs. We may with great probability ſuppoſe, that the ſame genius is found in the Weſt-Indians.

The American languages furniſh us with two or three more obſervations. We find by the ſpecimens which travellers have given us of thoſe tongues, that the moſt unpoliſh'd are the leaſt compounded; the reaſon of which is very natural. The Americans may be almoſt compar'd to children, neither of them have ſtrength enough to deviate from the ſimplicity of nature; and this want of capacity or experience, obliges them to reduce their language to a ſmall number of terms and expreſſions, which may repreſent to the mind a variety of different ideas, according to the object that is ſpoken of. Thus ſeveral American ſavages give the name of Sun of the night, to the moon; and in like manner the Jews call'd the grave, The houſe of the living. The above-men-

* Leſcarbot obſerves in his Hiſt. of New France, Book 3. chap. 7. "That the ſavages of Canada, have "a particular language that is underſtood by themſelves only; which makes me, ſays he, doubt the truth "of what I ſaid, viz. that the language which was in Canada in James Quartier's time is no longer "uſed; for they ſpeak a language that is more familiar to us, which is mixed with a great many Biſcayan "words, in order to make themſelves the better underſtood.

† The inhabitants of Siam and the Chineſe. This is generally practiſed all over the Eaſt-Indies.

‖ As in tranquille.

 The fickle temper of the Engliſh is made part of their character, and ſome pretend to impute it to their climate; but in my opinion they would not appear more fickle than other people, were it not that they give themſelves leſs pains to bridle their tongues, and dare let the world ſee what they really are, viz. idle and courageous. And if it be objected that they change their conduct with reſpect to their princes, that may perhaps be, becauſe their princes, tired of reigning within due bounds, alter their meaſures, which obliges the people to change theirs in their turn, and this may ſometimes be the effect of prudence. Another proof that the Engliſh are not ſo fickle as is imagined, is, that advice never makes the leaſt impreſſion upon them; for when once they have taken a reſolution, which indeed they often do raſhly, they execute in the ſame manner. This is manifeſt from the great number of people that lay violent hands on themſelves, and their unequal marriages. Letters on the French and Engliſh nations, by Mr. Muralt.

mention'd Jews have a term which ſignifies both * to open, and put off, becauſe theſe two ideas have a near reſemblance to one another: by the ſame rule, a child who ſhould want his nurſe to pull off his gloves, or ſhoes, wou'd deſire her to open them.

This natural ſimplicity, alſo gives riſe to thoſe infinitives, which the Americans and children often imploy inſtead of the imperative mood and the preſent tenſe. In a word, 'tis to this ſimplicity we are to impute the want of articles and conjunctions, ſo common in the languages of the ſavages, and in the expreſſions of children who juſt begin to ſpeak.

We muſt make another obſervation on the radical or primitive words and monoſyllables. The radical words are, as it were the infancy of a tongue. This compariſon is manifeſt from the firſt † articulate ſounds form'd by children when they firſt learn to ſpeak, which are all monoſyllables; but no ſooner is ſpeech become a little more familiar to them, than they apply themſelves particularly to words of two ſyllables; but as for polyſyllables, they are a conſiderable time before they can be able to pronounce 'em.

Wou'd it be a paradox to advance, that children who ſhou'd be left to themſelves, (tho' they had before liv'd among grown people) and deſtitute of any means of converſing together, but by the help of thoſe few words, which they might have learnt, till the age of five or ſix years; wou'd of themſelves form a conciſe and ſimple language compoſed chiefly of words of one and two ſyllables! We believe that this remark will extend to ſeveral of the American languages. Theſe tongues have continued in a kind of infancy, which is owing to the little correſpondence they have had with the reſt of the world. In a word, both the ſimplicity of their languages, and that of their ideas, flow from the ſame original.

We don't find that the Americans had the uſe of letters. We ſhall take notice in their proper place of the hieroglyphicks of the Mexicans, and the Guappas of Peru, which were alſo uſed by ſeveral other nations of South America. Father Hennepin and ſome other travellers tell us, that the wild Americans wonder prodigiouſly how it can be poſſible for us, to communicate, by writing, our thoughts at a diſtance. They are perſuaded that it can be the effect of nothing but magic or witchcraft.

CHAP. VI.

Of the attire of the Americans.

ALL the American ſavages don't go naked, and there are very few of thoſe who do ſo, but what cover thoſe parts which modeſty would have veil'd: however, we are far from ranking baſhfulneſs among thoſe ideas ‡ which are called innate. 'Tis entirely the reſult of ‖ education and cuſtom, for nature has nothing immodeſt in her ſelf. Children dren who never deviate from her, are not aſhamed to appear naked; nor do they in the leaſt bluſh at it: but no ſooner are they taught the conſequences of nakedneſs, and the idea which all men ought to annex to it, but immediately they are conſcious of what we call baſhfulneſs, and bluſh like their parents, or their maſters. Whence is it therefore, that certain ſavages who have not the ſmalleſt tincture of education, or the leaſt idea of politeneſs and civility, cover that part, which if unveil'd would be ſhocking to us? To this we anſwer, that this cuſtom may have been preſerv'd by long tradition, though time may have obliterated the cauſe of it. Their firſt anceſtors might probably have preſerv'd the remembrance of the diſobedience of the firſt man, which has made nakedneſs ſo immodeſt, that perſons of the leaſt chaſtity, ſeldom behold a naked object without bluſhing, as if ſuch a ſight was a real pain to them. Some ſavages are ſo unacquainted with the uſe of clothes, that they preſent themſelves before ſuch as are dreſs'd with as much ſimplicity and ignorance, as a child of three or four years of age would do. 'Tis not that they are in reality more unpoliſh'd than the reſt, but 'tis becauſe thoſe ideas have been ſooner extinguiſh'd in them, which other ſavages, though of as brutiſh a nature as themſelves, have yet been ſo happy as to preſerve by mere accident.

† When a man wants words to expreſs a ſurprizing noiſe, or ſome ſenſation with which he is affected, he generally endeavours to mimic the ſaid noiſe, and to paint his thought in inarticulate ſounds. Nature teaches us to deſcribe with the above-mentioned ſounds, the noiſe of the falling of an houſe, the confuſed murmurs of a tumultuous aſſembly, the countenance and diſcourſe of an angry man, and a thouſand other circumſtances. Inſtinct teaches us to ſupply the barrenneſs of our tongue, or the ſlowneſs of our imagination, by theſe inarticulate ſounds. Thoſe who have been concerned in the education of children are ſenſible of the care that is required to correct the propenſity they have to uſe theſe inarticulate ſounds, which are ever look'd upon as ill breeding. Men of no education, ſavages, and the common people, often make uſe of them as long as they live. Du Bos, critical reflections on poetry and painting, Vol. 1. pag. 306.

The antient Picts went ſtill naked in the time of the emperor Severus, but the correſpondence they afterwards had with the Romans, gave a ſofter turn to their manners, and the cuſtom of wearing clothes, which was afterwards introduced among thoſe people, was owing to the politeneſs and decorum with which the Romans inſpired them; for 'twas no way the reſult of neceſſity. The Hotentots of the Cape of Good Hope, and ſeveral other African nations, as alſo certain Iſlanders bordering upon Aſia, go ſtill naked. Their jetty hue, and natural dirtineſs ſerves as a kind of veil to one part, as colours do to the others. The time may poſſibly come, that theſe people will give into modes, and vary their dreſs as much as we do. The baſhful part of them, hang a piece of linnen cloth or skin before them, which is tied about them after their way; and thus equipp'd, they ſtrut about with as much vanity, as the proudeſt European in the fineſt dreſs. Let us not therefore imagine that the cuſtom of going cloth'd is the effect of reaſon and religion; wou'd it not be poſſible for a man to go naked, and be both rational and religious? and uſe our ſelves to view the human body in the ſimplicity of nature, in the ſame manner as we accuſtom our ſelves to look on nudities.

We don't however pretend to juſtify the cuſtom which the ſavages have of going naked; not to mention that the fair ſex wou'd loſe a great many charms, were they to imitate them; a man ought never to be a ſchiſmatic in things relating to cuſtom, which ſo far from being prejudicial to either religion or politeneſs, may be of ſervice to both.

Coreal tells us in his voyages to the Weſt-Indies, vol. 1. pag. 143. "That men in-"cloſe in a kind of caſe, what modeſty will not ſuffer to be reveal'd to ſight; "and adds; that in thoſe places which are not frequented by the Spaniards, "theſe caſes are ſet off with gold and pearls." Compare this place with another in Brantome's lives of the ladies of gallantry of his time, where mention is made of the uſe which ſome ladies made of certain knick-nacks.

Such ſavages of North America as are clothed, wear a cloak over their ſhoulders made of beaver skins, and ſew'd together; others wear only a bear's skin, or of ſome other wild beaſt, which they throw lightly over their ſhoulders. This is the plaineſt and moſt natural dreſs, and the firſt that was ever * us'd. Thoſe who cover themſelves with feafeathers dipp'd in a viſcous liquor, to faſten to their bodies, are one remove from this ſimplicity, and give into the vanity of dreſs. The Canadans faſten their skin-cloaks to their necks, ſo as generally to leave one arm bare; but they don't wear their cloaks in their huts, unleſs the weather be cold.

The women gird their cloaks about them; in winter both ſexes put warm ſleeves made of beaver skins to their cloaks. Their dreſs in this particular, differs but very little from that of the * antient Germans. Other ſavages cover themſelves with † a kind of mat. As to their legs, Leſcarbot relates, that the Canadans, when they go a hunting, wear a kind of thick ſtockings which came as high as our ſplatter-daſhes; theſe they tie to their girdles, and the ſide outward, is filled with tags that have no points to them. This part of their dreſs is ſomething like our pantaloons. They ſometimes, inſtead of ſtockings, wrap a piece of ſtuff round their legs, which is faſten'd under the thigh, and this they call Mittaſſe, as we find by a relation inſerted in the collection of voyages to the North, Vol. 5.

‖ Theſe ſavages go generally bare-headed, and with their ‡ hair hanging uncurl'd on their ſhoulders. The men ſometimes tie part of it over their foreheads, and let the reſt hang down; ſome let their hair grow, and others either cut it quite off, or burn it with certain ſtones made red-hot. Several northern nations let their hair fall down on one ſide, whisker-wiſe, and burn the other with the above-mentioned ſtones.

The nations to the ſouth of Canada burn it quite cloſe to their ears. The Floridians and ſome other ſavages bind them up like a horſe's tail; the men afterwards ſtick ſeveral feathers on it, as it were a plume; and the women, as we are told by Leſcarbot, put in a kind of three-pointed bodkin. Several of theſe people rub their hair with oil, in the ſame manner as the Europeans do with eſſence, after which they ſtick down or ſhort feathers of birds on their heads. This ornament is indeed a little whimſical, but is it in fact more ſo than the gold duſt of the antients, or the powder with which our modern ſops affect to whiten their hair, or their peruques?

We look upon the cuſtom of wearing long hair, ſo general among the Americans, as one of thoſe which nature herſelf dictates. It was formerly the practice of the Gauls, and the reſt of the Europeans. As for the Gauls, 'tis well known that one part of their country went by the name of Gallia Comata. We muſt indeed own, that it afterwards became a particular cuſtom; the French us'd to wear their hair very ſhort, and none but the kings of France of the firſt race, wore them very long. The cutting off the hair of any of the children of France, was in thoſe days a declaration, that he was diſabled from ever ſucceeding to the crown. Before the conqueſt of China by the Tartars, long hair was as much a mode among the Chineſe, as ever it had been among the Old French. They flatter'd themſelves, ſays Maffæus, with the notions, that the moment they expir'd a good genius would carry them up into heaven by the hair of the head. Their Bonzas indeed wear it ſhort, becauſe the quality they enjoy of privy counſellors of the deity, diſpenſes them from ſtanding in need of any ſuch aſſiſtance.

The antients us'd often to go bare-headed, and 'tis obſerv'd that the †† Egyptians never covered it, but when oppreſs'd with grief. The Romans obſerved that cuſtom in in the infancy of the common-wealth, but afterwards laid it aſide. This cuſtom was perhaps grounded on an opinion, which indeed appears reaſonable enough, viz. that air hardens the head, which advantage it would want, were it to be cover'd. If this be true, we are not to wonder that the * Engliſh butt ſo ſtoutly with their heads in boxing, ſince they generally go with it uncover'd from their very infancy.

Before we conclude this article, we ſhall borrow two or three obſervations from Leſcarbot, wherein he ſhews the conformity between the Americans and ſome other nations, with reſpect to the adorning of the head. "The Goths, ſays he, us'd to let "their hair hang down in large curls on their ſhoulders, as was before obſerv'd of "the North-Americans. The Suabians, a people of Germany, us'd to twiſt, knot "and faſten it to the top of their heads, as has been already related of the Souriquois "and Armouchiquois. The Armouchiquois differ in one reſpect from the Souriquois "and other ſavages, viz. that they pull up the hair that grows before by the roots, "and by that means are half bald, in which they differ from the reſt. Pliny on the "contrary informs us, that at the foot of the Riphean mountains, was formerly the "country of the Arympheans, who are the Muſcovites of our days; that both ſexes "among theſe people, us'd to be ſhav'd, and look'd upon the wearing of hair as a "badge of infamy." Thus a cuſtom that is approv'd in one country, is condemn'd in another.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Ornaments of the body.

THE Americans adorn their bodies with a kind of paint, but ſomething coarſer, and laid on with leſs art, than that of our ladies and ſops: however we may probably ſuppoſe, that the Weſt-Indians are partly prompted to it from the ſame motive, and that the plain, unaffected beauties of nature, do not always appear ſo engaging in their eyes as to pleaſe altogether, without ſome foreign aſſiſtance. Our ladies and ſops, when on the decline, do alſo paint themſelves, in order to repair the injuries made by debauchery and years: but the Americans do not carry their refinements to that exceſs, and employ colours merely as an ornament.

The cuſtom of painting is of antient date, and the Jews were reproached by the prophets upon that account. The Romans uſed ſometimes to paint themſelves, and even their deities, with a red colour. The Ethiopians, and ſeveral other African nations, did the ſame. The Picts were not ſatisfy'd with barely colouring, but uſed to † matacher, or paint their bodies with figures of all kind of animals, even from the moſt tender infancy. They were ſo much delighted with theſe ornaments, which in our eyes would appear ſo extravagant, that they could not for a long time be perſuaded to clothe themſelves, for fear of ſpoiling the fine paintings which adorn'd their bodies. The Americans have different colours for this purpoſe; as to the face, their complexion was frequently compos'd of blue, red, black and white; however they allow every one to follow his peculiar taſte. They alſo paint the head, the arms, the legs, and the thighs in the ſame manner; and in order to preſerve the marks of this painting during their ‡lives, they firſt ſketch the out-lines of it upon the ſkin, then prick them with a needle

* Mr. Locke ſpeaks in favour of this cuſtom—— "Our bodies will endure any thing that from the be-"ginning they are accuſtomed to; and therefore amongſt other things, I think that when nature has ſo "well covered a child's head with hair, and ſtrengthened it with a year or two's age, that he can run "about by day, without a cap, it is beſt, that by night a child ſhould alſo lie without one, there being no-"thing that more expoſes to head-ach, colds, catarrhs, coughs, and ſeveral other diſeaſes, than keeping "the head warm."

† This is the term made uſe of in America to expreſs that way of painting.

‡ Voyages to the North, vol. 5.

needle or a little ſharp bone, till the blood comes, and afterwards rub the places ſo prick'd with a powder, of the colour that is moſt to the guſto of the perſon who is thus embelliſh'd. The Picts * did the ſame with an iron inſtrument, but the Goths uſed to paint the body and face with vermillion.

Let us now take notice of ſome other ornaments, which are more whimſical and extraordinary than painting. The Virginians † ſtamp certain marks on their backs, which denotes the chief to whom they are ſubordinate. We find an inſtance of this among the Romans, the ſoldiers among whom were ſtamp'd with the imperial mark; which in the time of Conſtantine the Great was a croſs upon the ſhoulder. 'Twas a principle of zeal and devotion for the croſs of Chriſt, that prompted the primitive chriſtians to ſtamp it on their hands or arms: and in our days, very few go on pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, and viſit our Saviour's ſepulchre, but bring from thence a like teſtimony of their ſpiriritual enliſting under Chriſt's banners. The Braſilians have a way of cutting and flaſhing themſelves, which is unknown in Europe. "Such among them, ſays ‡ Coreal, as "deſire to be conſider'd as perſons of figure and reputation, and have devour'd a great "number of enemies, cut and flaſh their breaſts, and ſeveral other parts of their bodies, "and afterwards fill the wounds with a corroding black powder, that gives them a "hideous and frightful air. Any one who was to ſee theſe cuts at a diſtance, wou'd "take 'em for doublets cut and chequer'd after the manner of our anceſtors."

Tho' we have no example of this cutting and flaſhing among us, we yet cannot ſay the ſame of ſome other ornaments of the Americans. The difference between them and us, is, that in Europe theſe ornaments depend entirely on faſhion, whereas the Americans, who are leſs fickle, always diſcover the ſame beauties in their dreſs; and that becauſe, regardleſs of the cenſure or approbation of others, they only conſider what may pleaſe their ſenſes 'Tis from this principle that they employ ſuch colours, as naturally pleaſe the eye; that in their holidays they are delighted with the brighteſt; and are pleas'd with their cuts and flaſhes, as they are a mark of their bravery and valour. Tho' faſhion among us extends its power over colours, and varies them as it thinks proper, 'tis nevertheleſs certain, that the ſenſes will at laſt prevail, ſo that we are oblig'd to form the ſame judgment of them as the ſavages do. We ſoon, were honour concern'd in the caſe, might be brought to declare in favour of cuts and flaſhes, were our ſovereigns to publiſh a proclamation, by which all who ſhould not hack themſelves after the Braſilian mode, ſhould be conſider'd as infamous, and unworthy of the publick regard. We then ſhould ſoon ſee thouſands of people diſtinguiſh themſelves by their flaſhes; probably ſeveral of the moſt faint-hearted among us wou'd, when excited by punctilio, be as forward on this occaſion, as the moſt courageous. Such as wou'd be afraid of pain, would invent ſome method to hack themſelves, ſo as not to feel any; and when once they had got ſo far, we all ſhould embelliſh theſe cuts after the manner of the ſavages, and then it wou'd ſoon grow into a ‖ faſhion over all Europe. What we have here advanc'd is no  paradox; mankind in general have a natural averſion for contempt. A certain glory and honour, which ſome of the moſt illuſtrious Braſilians annex'd to cutting and mangling, was alone ſufficient to make their deſcendants pay a blind deference to this odd cuſtom, the neglect of which, wou'd have brought 'em into contempt.

The Americans as well as the Europeans have ear-rings, bracelets and necklaces: but with this difference, that they are worn by both ſexes among them. The antients alſo

‖ He might have ſaid, a mode with all the ridiculous part of mankind.
 We may very well conclude from this, the folly there is in giving into every mode, without examining the reaſonableneſs of it. How unhappy is the man whoſe Felicity depends upon the caprices of others! The wiſe man, on the contrary, makes it his continual ſtudy to think and act conformable to the dictates of reaſon, and never to ſuffer himſelf to be carry'd away with the tide of cuſtom, tho' ever ſo rapid and violent.

alſo uſed to adorn their faces with jewels. The Americans have likewiſe pendants for the noſe and lips. The antient Hebrews uſed to wear rings on their * foreheads, and even on their noſes, which cuſtom prevails to this day in the Eaſt-Indies. The Braſilians bore a hole thro' the lower lip of their young children, thro' which they run a bone as white as ivory, by way of ornament; and ſometimes inſtead of a bone they uſe a jaſper-ſtone, or a falſe emerald, and often fix them in their cheeks. 'Twere needleſs to enumerate all the nations that uſe ear-rings, or thoſe who wear bracelets and necklaces. The Americans carry that cuſtom to a much greater length; for they embeliſh their legs and bodies with them, whereas we only wear them about the arm and neck; but they do not always adorn themſelves with pearls and emeralds. The Braſilians and ſome other nations eſteem prodigiouſly the ſhells and glaſs baubles, which the Europeans carry them. Some ſavages, when they cannot procure the above-mention'd gewgaws, make uſe of little pieces of copper, colour'd ſtones, and even fiſh-bones; but indeed this whimſical taſte, is infinitely preferable to that in vogue among the Hottentots of the Cape of Good-Hope, who garniſh themſelves with guts. Some nations of Canada, whom † Leſcarbot calls the Armouchiquois, "have, as he relates, a cuſtom "to fix on their wriſts, and on their legs above the ancle-bone, thin copper-plates, "ſomething like hand-cuffs; and to gird themſelves with copper tubes, each about the "length of one's middle-finger, all which are ſtrung together, about the length of a "girdle; which agrees exactly with the deſcription that Herodian gives us of the "Picts, whom, he tells us, girded their ‡ bodies and necks with iron, and look'd "upon this as a great ornament, and the mark of a very rich man; in the ſame manner "as other Barbarians valued themſelves on their gold."

Since we are diſcourſing of the ornaments of the head, we muſt not omit the frontlets of feathers of ſeveral colours, in great eſteem among the Braſilians; the tuft of feathers worn by the Mexicans, nor the crowns of elk's-hair painted of a red colour, and fix'd to a ſelvage, which the Canadans faſten upon their heads. The Europeans have formerly had theſe ornaments in no little eſteem; a man muſt be a great ſtranger to it, who does not know, that a plume of feathers was once look'd upon as a mighty ornament; and tho' the natural ficklenefs of the French has almoſt baniſh'd them from among them, they are not yet wholly laid aſide by ſome other nations of Europe. The Ladies for a long time wore feather-caps, and tufts of feathers, and they are not yet quite diſcarded; probably they will one day or other come in faſhion. Faſhions are laid aſide, and revive again over and over, for the truth of which, we need only appeal to experience.

The bird call'd the Tochan has little thin yellow and red feathers about its neck; theſe the Braſilians uſe as patches: they ſtick them on their cheeks with wax, but wear 'em only on holidays. It might be made a query, ſuppoſing our ladies were to put ſuch red feathers on their cheeks, inſtead of patches, whether or no they would look frightful? But the ſolution of this we ſhall leave to the fair ſex, to our ſops and finical fellows.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Beauty of the Americans.

AS there are certain beauties which ſtrike equally on all men; ſo the deformity of a perſon may be ſo great, as to appear ſuch to all eyes. We do not think there can be any people in the world of ſo groteſque a taſte, as to admire the ſhape of a cripple, or that of a crump-back; or that any one could poſſibly be charm'd with the beauty of a man who was to have his mouth where others have their ears. 'Tis poſſible that we may not have a juſt idea of the proportions of animals; but 'tis impoſſible we ſhou'd loſe our ſenſes ſo far, as to admire a man whoſe head was to be as big as the reſt of his body, or a horſe, whoſe four legs were unequal both in ſhape and proportion: 'tis plain the beaſts themſelves abhor theſe deformities, ſince 'tis obſerv'd that they either ſhift or abandon whatever monſters they bring into the world. Let it not be objected, that the Author of nature might have created the whole ſyſtem of beings very different from what they are now; he certainly might have done ſo-if he pleas'd; but then ſuppoſing he had thought proper to make man naturally crump-back'd, he in that caſe wou'd have given certain proportions to that deformity, of which we have no notion, but whoſe beauties wou'd nevertheleſs have been as affecting and natural, as thoſe of a fine and eaſy ſhape.

We are of opinion, that thoſe ſavages who bruiſe the noſes of their children, or flat their heads, have not a juſt * idea of proportion; but we don't ſay the ſame of ſuch as love little foreheads, or red hair, &c. for this is not claſhing with the rules of proportion. As to the former, we know that the African blacks prefer flat-noſes and wide-noſtrils to large and Roman-noſes. We meet with people of the ſame, and even of a more depraved taſte, among the Americans. The Braſilians bruiſe the tips of their children's noſes, which odd way of deforming the moſt beautiful part of the face, with the holes they have in their cheeks, wou'd have no pleaſing effect on an European Eye. The inhabitants of Miſſiſippi have as extravagant ideas of beauty: they love mightily, ſays an anonymous traveller, ſuch † heads as are almoſt in the ſhape of a mitre. The particulars of his relation are too remarkable to be here omitted: "The "mother lays her infant on a board, which is cover'd with a piece of the skin of ſome "beaſt. A hole is made at the end of this board, where the head is plac'd, which "is lower than the reſt. Then putting the child, who is ſtark naked, upon it, ſhe "lays its head backward into this hole, when ſhe fixes a piece of clay on its forehead "and under its head, and binds it as tight as poſſible between two little boards. The "child ſcreams, looks black in the face, but the mother pulls the boards ſo tight, "till ſhe at laſt forces a white clammy liquor out of its noſe and ears. In this "ſituation it lies every night after, till ſuch time as the head is moulded into the "modiſh form."

'Tis obſerv'd that the ſavages of North-America are of a very dusky colour, or at leaſt of as olive a hue as the Spaniards and Portugueze. We are told, that this colour is compos'd of greaſe and oil, with which they rub themſelves, in order to ſecure themſelves againſt the flies and Maringoins, a kind of gnat; but we don't believe this to be the reaſon; for the Samoieds and Groenlanders, who inhabit a climate vaſtly colder than that of the Canadans and Miſſiſippians, and who conſequently are not ſo liable to be ſtung by gnats, are yet much more ſwarthy than the above-mention'd people. 'Tis ſurprizing that the Americans, who inhabit between the tropicks, ſhould not be be as black as the Africans, ſince they both live under the ſame climate. Thoſe who aſcribe the blackneſs of the Africans to Noah's curſing the poſterity of Ham, give ſuch a reaſon for it, as is tolerable only in a ſermon. To deſtroy it, we need only appeal to the teſtimony of the Egyptians, who bore the name of * Ham their progenitor, for many ages, and yet are but a little ſwarthier than the Spaniards. We chuſe rather to adhere to the reaſons that Leſcarbot gives us †: "The burning heats "of Lybia, that makes the inhabitants of it ſo black, are generated by the prodigious "tracts of land, over which the ſun ſhapes his courſe in his paſſage thither, whence "a more intenſe heat is always carry'd by the rapid motion (of the ſun) which is alſo "increas'd by the boundleſs ſands, that are very ſuſceptible of heat, and are the more "ſo, becauſe they are not water'd with many great rivers, as America, wherein are as "many rivers and brooks as in any part of the world; by this means they enjoy a "perpetual cool, and the country is made more temperate: the ſoil alſo being richer, "and imbibing the dew better, which falls in great abundance in theſe parts, and the "rains alſo. Moreover, the ſun, after he goes off from Africa, darts his rays ſo long "during his vaſt paſſage over the ocean, that he thereby draws up a great quantity "of vapours, which he afterwards lets fall on thoſe countries: whence it is that the "cauſe is very different with regard to the colour of thoſe two people, and the nature "of their ſoil." We cannot but think that the blackneſs of the Ethiopians and of the inhabitants of Guinea, &c. proceeds from the climate they inhabit, and the qualities which the ſperm, whence they are produc'd, acquires in thoſe countries, and which they afterwards preſerve from father to ſon.

Let us paſs from the complexion to the hair. The inhabitants of both North and South-America have generally ‡ black and long hair; but we are told, they are not ſo ſubject to grow grey as thoſe of the Europeans: they are indeed leſs addicted to riot and exceſs, nor ſo much conſum'd with the cares of life; circumſtances which haſten old ‖ age. We alſo are very whimſical in our taſte, with reſpect to the beauty of the hair: formerly we us'd to like that which inclin'd a little to carotty , and now they are intolerable: the ††Egyptians alſo had an averſion to the yellowiſh and carrot-pated, and that becauſe the hair of Typhon, the ſworn enemy to Oſiris, was of that colour: and probably the expreſſion, Typhon's hair, might have been a term of reproach among them, as Judas's hair ‡‡ with us. However 'twou'd be pretty difficult to determine, whether the fair or the brown are moſt beautiful, becauſe they both have their merit. Some like the languiſhing charms of the fair, and others the ſprightlineſs and vivacity of the brown.

‖‖ Qui dit brunette il dit ſpirituelle,
Il dit auſſi vive comme un demon.

In Engliſh thus:
The Brunes, in wit, excel the fair,
And have a demon's ſprightly air.

But if we allow the deciſions of the antient poets, we muſt pronounce in favour of the * fair. Beards are not in great repute among the ſavages: the French and moſt other

‖ We are alſo told, that the ſavages don't grow grey as ſoon as the Europeans, and that becauſe they go bare-headed.

 This rule was not without exception; the Romans hated carotty hair as much as we do, as is manifeſt from Martial, who, in one of his epigrams, imputes it as a blemiſh to Zoilus. We are told that the Jews ſeem'd to like carotty hair, and 'tis pretended that king David had fair hair a little inclining to red.

 The antient poets generally made their goddeſſes fair.

other European nations agree with them in this particular; for there are but very few Europeans, the Switzers, the Friſons, and the Lutheran doctors in Germany excepted, but are againſt wearing long beards; tho' the Arabians look upon them with the utmoſt awe and * veneration.

The antients lov'd large blue eyes; we don't much diſlike them, however we like large black eyes ſtill better. Wou'd it be believ'd, that eyes of a greeniſh caſt were formerly highly eſteem'd by the French; and that a people, whoſe taſte regulates that of all Europe, could have ever been ſo odd and whimſical in theirs? 'tis however matter of fact. Monſ. de Coucy praiſes green eyes in a † ſong of his making. But that taſte prevails no longer among us: the large black eye has triumph'd over the blue, the green, and the grey. However we don't much diſlike a black and ſparkling ſmall eye, call'd by us a Chineze eye, becauſe thoſe people have very little ones, tho' by the ſame rule we might as juſtly call them a Tartarian or Scythian eye. The ſavages of North-America have generally pretty large black eyes; but thoſe of Miſſiſippi are ſmall and agreeable.

The Americans are tall and well-ſhap'd, extremely nimble and active, which having already accounted for, it would be needleſs to repeat in this place. The ſavages who inhabit the mountains, are nimbler than thoſe that live in the plains and valleys; their food alſo contributes to their activity; but we may ſuppoſe that the air of the climate does likewiſe contribute very much to it. We depend as much on the ſoil as the trees and plants; if the bud from which we ſpring, is tranſplanted into another climate, it inſenſibly loſes its firſt qualities and acquires others. Theſe changes depend as much on the influence of the air, as an infinite number of other things. Were we to draw the Miquelets from their mountains, and people the marſhes of the low-countries with them, their deſcendants would in proceſs of time, be as heavy as the natives of the country: but if on the other ſide, we were to carry theſe latter into the Pyrenees, they would ſoon be as ſprightly as the Miquelets, and the Flemings their anceſtors wou'd not find in their deſcendants that obeſity, they ſo much delight in; and that extenſive corpulence, in which, tho' the mind has a greater room to range, is yet not better tenanted upon that account. But to carry this matter yet farther; the inhabitants of a country may be made to degenerate, by changing their government, polity, cuſtoms and religion. Thus the Tartars have deprav'd the cuſtoms of the Chineze, and the Japoneze thoſe of the Chineze their anceſtors. The chriſtian religion has occaſion'd numberleſs more changes in Europe than thoſe above-mentioned; nor has that of Mahomet occaſion'd leſs in Aſia and Africa. A proteſtant in his addreſſes to God, obſerves certain decorums which are not proper for a Roman catholic. Both of theſe at laſt accuſtom themſelves ſo much to their peculiar decorums, that they become as it were natural to them; and tho' they ſhould afterwards ſhift each other's religion, any one who ſhou'd examine both attentively, wou'd find that each of them would ſtill preſerve ſome tincture of their former notions. We have another very ſtrong inſtance to prove, that a nation may not only change their manners, but even their bodily qualities, as appears from ‡Ammianus Marcellinus and Cæſar. The former relates, that the Gauls are very tall, fair hair'd, have a white complexion, a ſtern look, a ſtrong and terrible voice, brave, great lovers

Qu'onc ne cuidai pour li maux endurer,
Mes ſes clers vis & ſa fréche bouchette
Et ſi bel oeil vert, & riant & cler,
M'ont ſi ſurpris, &c.

The meaning of which is; That ſhe appear'd at firſt ſo beautiful in my eyes, that there's nothing I wou'd not have ſuffer'd for her ſake; but her roſy countenance, her ſweet lips, her green, rolling eye, have inchanted me to that degree, &c.

‡ Book 15. chap. 12. Cæſar, book 6.

lovers of wine, and very neat in their dreſs. * Cæſar deſcribes them as great lovers of novelty, fickle, and very ſuperſtitious. Would it be poſſible to diſcover the modern French, by the character theſe two hiſtorians have given of them? the French in general have loſt thoſe bodily qualities which Ammianus Marcellinus aſcribes to them. They are at this time of a middle ſtature, black hair'd, or of a brown or cheſnut colour, the complexion the ſame; a maſculine, but not a ſtern look, a ſtrong and reſolute tone of voice, that is no way terrible. They are ſober enough, and drink rather to excite mirth, which they are naturally inclin'd to, than purely for drinking ſake. However it muſt be own'd they have ſtill preſerv'd their neatneſs; their love of novelty, as is but too manifeſt from their † modes, and the fickle temper with which Cæſar reproaches their anceſtors: but were that emperor now living, he would clear them of being inclin'd to ſuperſtition, which ſurely the modern French can hardly be reproached with. As to politeneſs, an article in which the French are univerſally allowed to excel, Cæſar allows it to the Gauls of his time, and declares they were more ‡ polite than the ‖ Germans.

Hence 'tis manifeſt, that 'tis not impoſſible for a nation to change its manners and habits; as alſo for the deſcendants of an active and vigorous man to loſe all their vigour, which may be owing to the habit of mind they may have contracted, either from certain principles of religion; their compliance to the government; or their ſubmiſſion to that tyrant faſhion. Almoſt all nations, not excepting thoſe that lie moſt north, have undergone changes; and if the American ſavages have not been ſuſceptible to any, they owe that happineſs to their ſtrict adherence to nature. Entirely devoted to her, they ſeldom do any thing but in conformity to her dictates, and deviate but very little from the maxims ſhe inſpires; but then on the other ſide, they are as unpoliſh'd almoſt as brutes: they have neither the ſentiments, the diſtinctions, the ceremonies, nor the cuſtoms which in Europe are the genuine characteriſtics of a human creature. Would a ſavage but live and dreſs after our manner; be a polite debauchee, and ceaſe devouring his fellow-creatures, we then might rank him in the ſame claſs with our ſelves. Our very whims and exceſſes ſtill diſcover ſomething of the rational creature.

A Cacique who drinks out of a kettle with two handles, and quaffs it almoſt off at a draught; or who takes the firſt woman that pleaſes him for his wife, will ſtill be a Cacique; but a nobleman who empties ten flasks of wine at one ſitting, and goes to twenty diſorderly houſes in a night, does no way derogate from the dignity of a human creature.

* Book, 4 and 6.

†A foreigner that ſtays in France, is ſurprized at the perpetual changes which Faſhion cauſes in dreſs: He imagines he ſees a people who try it in all its varieties, without finding one that fits them, but in the end there's not one but does fit them. Every time they get a new faſhion, they affirm very ſeriouſly, and prove by good arguments, that 'tis more becoming, or more convenient than that they left off, and a man would almoſt believe there is ſome truth in it. But however at the end of an hundred changes, all from good to better, they return to the old faſhions, that is, after a great deal of motion, they find themſelves in the place from whence they ſet out. Lettres ſur les François, par Mr. Muralt.

‡ Cæſar, book 4.

‖ The moſt inconſiderable action, and the ſmalleſt motions of a Frenchman are embelliſh'd with politeneſs; he ſtretches out his hand, and draws it back politely; he offers it to a woman going from one room into another, and runs to do it, juſt as if the way was difficult or dangerous. He runs in the ſame manner to take up a glove, or a handkerchief fallen to the ground, with as much precipitation, as if he were to take them out of the fire; for there's ſomething more than barely taking up a glove, or an handkerchief—This is a play not much unlike that of the flies that paſs away their time in going under one another; or to ſpeak more honourably of the French politeneſs, I ſay that all the curious toys that come to us from France, and are admirably well wrought and finiſhed; all theſe trinkets in caſes, all theſe little moveables with their ſprings and hinges, are a compleat figure of the pretty people of that nation. Muralt's Letters.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Exerciſes, &c. of the Americans.

WE will begin with dancing, which is perhaps as old as our grand progenitor. Though he himſelf might not have invented it, he probably might have ſeen the firſt rudiments of that art, and there is no room to doubt but that the immediate poſterity of Adam had acquir'd a good ear, which in proceſs of time regulated and meaſured the ſteps in that exerciſe. 'Tis even * probable that dancing was firſt invented in the infancy of the world, when man was not yet a prey to the cares of life; and in a climate whoſe fertility and excellent produce might naturally inſpire felicity and mirth. The antient Hebrews us'd to dance to the glory of the Creator, and the † Pagans in honour of their idols, as has already been obſerv'd in the diſſertation prefixed to this work. The Eaſt-Indians antient and modern, and the Americans made dancing a part of their religious worſhip. The Floridians dance by way of thanking the ſun, for any ſignal favour they may have received; the Canadans alſo addreſs their prayers to the Gods in dancing. In a word the Virginians, the Mexicans, the Peruvians, &c. have not only introduced dancing in their religious worſhip, but even the moſt frantick geſtures and motions, nor have the Mahometans themſelves excluded it their devotions.

From ſacred hiſtory, let us paſs on to prophane. The Weſt-Indians are of opinion, that dancing is a very healthy exerciſe, and for this reaſon often preſcribe very violent ones to their ſick. ‖ Socrates and ſome other antients had the ſame opinion with reſpect to this art. We have not any way leſſened the merits of it, but have rather carried it to an exceſs in the oppoſite extreme. It muſt be owned that dancing is now practiſed, rather in order to acquire a good air, and for the ſake of ſhining in aſſemblies, than from any view to health; be that as it will, 'tis now ſo much in vogue, that the want of it, would be looked upon as a  defect. The †† ladies can hardly bear to hear it run down: they preſer the nimbleneſs of a caper, and the regular ſteps of a minuet, to the moſt ſolid arguments of a man of ſenſe, who has made no other uſe of them than to walk with. The ſavage Americans perform this agreeable exerciſe after their manner, and from the ſame motive with the Europeans, viz. to give pleaſure to their gueſts, to entertain thoſe they honour, and divert one another. As we are leſs nimble than they, we may reaſonably ſuppoſe they would carry that art to much greater perfection, were their motions but more exact and regular, they being not only very active, but have alſo a very good ear. The dances of the ſavages of New France are generally ‖‖ circular, and without ſhifting places; they dance very nimbly by ſtamping their feet on the ground, and afterwards raiſing themſelves up with a half leap. They clench their fiſts, and extend their arms upwards in a threatning poſture. Some of our country dances bear ſome reſemblance to this Canadan dance.

* Lucian tells us, that dancing was firſt invented by the goddeſs Rhea, and preſerved the life of Jupiter himſelf from the cruelty of his father Saturn, and that there were ſome Theſſalian ſtatues erected in his time to the honour of their beſt dancers.

† The Romans inſtituted an order of dancing prieſts under the name of the Salians.

‖ Socrates, whom Apollo pronounced to be the wiſeſt man, was not only a profeſſed admirer of dancing in others, but learned it himſelf when he was an old man.

 So much of dancing, at leaſt, as belongs to the behaviour and an handſome carriage of the body, is extremely uſeful, if not abſolutely neceſſary. Cowley.

†† Cleomira dances with all the elegancy of motion imaginable; but her eyes are ſo chaſtis'd with the ſimplicity and innocence of her thoughts, that ſhe raiſes in the beholders admiration and good-will, but no looſe hope or wild imagination. The true art in this caſe is, to make the mind and body improve together; and if poſſible to make geſture follow thought, and not let thought be employ'd upon geſture. Spect. N° 66.

dance. One of the dancers, probably he that leads it up, ſings alone, for they never ſing in chorus as in our brawls, except that the dancers break out into a kind of exclamation at certain intervals. We muſt not forget that dances make a part in their publick debates, and the moſt ſerious affairs of the council. Some nations of South America have a cuſtom ſtill more extraordinary; they proclaim war * againſt their enemies with a dance. The conformity we might here take notice of between the Virginian and North American dances, and thoſe of our own nation, would carry us to improper lengths, not to mention that it would be tedious.

Let us now make ſome mention of the ſinging of the Americans, which though it be altogether rude and artleſs, is yet apply'd to the ſame uſe as the reſt of the world make of it, viz. that of praiſing their Gods, and their great men, in diverting themſelves, and regulating the ſteps in their dances. Tho' we are pretty ſenſible that the ſongs of the ſavages are rude and inelegant; they yet are not unadorn'd with figures, and with flights; with expreſſions that differ from the common forms of ſpeaking; a myſterious and intricate ſenſe; inverſions of phraſes, ſallies that flow from what we call fire, and in a word all that wild enthuſiaſm which reſults from that poetical fury, which has impoſed on the bulk of † mankind in all ages, and made them fancy it to be the language of the Gods. But why ſhould not the ſavages have as great a ſhare of this frenzy as our ſelves? Are they form'd in a different manner from the inhabitants of our hemiſphere? Are not their organs the ſame as ours, or is the conſtruction of their brain different? And conſequently are they leſs ſubject than we, to that enthuſiaſm which gives life to poetry, and to that irregularity of imagination which poets themſelves have called a drunkenneſs, without perhaps conſidering at the ſame time the juſtneſs of the compariſon, or having judgment enough to conſider, that all who are delighted with theſe wild extravagancies, do in ſome meaſure reſemble drunkards. A mind thus form'd will run into poetry without the aſſiſtances of literature, or a long detail of incidents; but then it will require ſome culture in order to embelliſh nature, and give a poliſh to talents, which we muſt allow the Americans to poſſeſs, unleſs we will contradict all the teſtimonies of the American conquerors, and our moſt authentick relations on that head, who aſſure us the Americans are acquainted with poetry; that they compoſe ſongs in honour of their Gods and heroes, as the Europeans at this day, and the nations of antiquity, not excepting the Scythians, the Cimbri, the Goths, and Germans, &c. and in a word, that 'tis by the help of poetry they have preſerv'd the memory of ſeveral remarkable incidents, and many footſteps of their own hiſtory. This was even the practice in the firſt ages of the world, viz. in the time of Orpheus, Linus, and Muſæus, who perhaps were at the ſame time poets, prophets, and hiſtorians. Are we therefore to wonder that the firſt ages of the world ſhould be overſpread with a cloud of fictions, which, by the aſſiſtance of poetical enthuſiaſm, have, as it were, ſwallow'd up antient hiſtory, and robb'd us of the knowledge of that of our anceſtors? for the antient Europeans were everlaſting ſongſters, and uſed to throw every incident which they thought remarkable into inharmonious jingle, the better to tranſmit them to poſterity. We know that poetry has this ad-

* See what has been obſerved thereupon in the preface to the 4th vol. of collection of voyages to the north, and on the Calumet dance.

† It may not be improper to anſwer this accuſation, and ſhew the uſe of poetry to mankind, as we find it in Mr. Welſted's writings. "Does not poetry inſtruct while it pleaſes?" Does it not inſtruct more powerfully too, through its ſuperior charm of pleaſing?—Does not poetry oblige as much as books of Humanity? Does it not give us the ſame profit and pleaſure, and that in a livelier and more indirect way? beſides that it impreſſes more ſtrongly on the memory whatever it inculcates, by the natural help of numbers. Moral writers recommend virtue, but poetry adorns it; the moraliſt gains his reader to approve of it; the poet to be in love with it; the one ſimply propoſes truth and virtue to us; the other ſhews them in a flood of light, and enforces 'em as it were with the power of inchantment. Is it not, laſtly, the privilege of poetry, that it moſtly gives us truer ideas, and always more elegant ones of the thing in queſtion, than any other ſort of writing? is there any thing, that ſo much poliſhes men's manners, or gives ſo fine an edge to their wit? is it not this which gives the ſtrongeſt tincture of good-nature to the heart? and does it not keep men in good humour with themſelves, and guard them from that gloomineſs which care and diſappointment are apt to ſpread over the ſoul? &c.— advantage, and that cadence, rhime, and meaſure, are of great advantage to memory. We are of opinion, that the Weſt-Indians have experienc'd this as well as our ſelves, who to this day work up our prayers in rhime, for the uſe of children and the vulgar. As to what we juſt now obſerv'd, viz. that ſongs were the hiſtorical monuments of the antient Europeans, and of the Americans at this time, no one is ignorant of the advantages of ballads, which are particularly in vogue all over France; but then every one has not heard, that "* Charlemain, ſenſible of the advantages of this vulgar ſpecies of poetry, commanded " odes and ballads to be compos'd, —— in which the actions of their anceſtors were " contain'd, and gave orders for their being got by heart and ſung by children, in " order that they might be tranſmitted to lateſt poſterity."

The other employments of the ſavages, as formerly of the antient Europeans, were war and hunting. Thoſe who live on the ſea-ſhore, and on the banks of rivers, employ themſelves in fiſhing. The canoos of the latter were alſo us'd by the antients: they are made of skins ſew'd together; of oſiers, very neatly wrought; or of barks of trees, in the ſame manner as the Egyptian barks, which, according to †Lucan, were made of the ſame bark as the antients made their paper of. We may ſuppoſe, that the ark into which Moſes was put, when he was expos'd on the Nile, was a kind of canoo. The Engliſh, the Saxons, and the ‡ Scotch had oſier canoos lin'd with leather. Leſcarbot thinks that 'tis to the canoos we owe the poetical fiction of the Sirens ||. Perſons who ſaw theſe little boats at a diſtance, which were made to hold only one perſon, were ſimple enough to think the man and boat were a monſter, half man and half fiſh.

The American ſavages have neither walls nor gates to incloſe their dwellings; and in this they imitate the firſt inhabitants of the world. In South-America, not far from Nova-Andaluſia, each ſavage encloſes and marks out the limits of his land with a kind of  net-work made of Bexuco, a ſort of cotton, and raiſes this wall to about half the height of a man. We are told that the Indians look upon the breaking or unravelling this net-work, as a very criminal action: a manifeſt proof they ſtill preſerve the principles of natural equity, even in that thick miſt of ignorance with which they are ſurrounded. The Lacedæmonians would not ſuffer their capital to be ſurrounded with walls, from a different motive; ſaying, that the bravery and valour of their citizens ought to be their only defence. The Germans and Engliſh were formerly ignorant of the uſe of brick and lime.

The confidence or ſincerity of theſe ſavages obliges us to make ſome obſervations on theft, which has not been conſider'd in the ſame light in all ages. Travellers aſſure us, that the Americans ſeldom filch from one another. Their little wealth, and the eaſe with which they procure the neceſſaries of life, prevent their giving into a crime, which the Lacedæmonians look'd upon as a Legerdemain trick, or rather as a remedy againſt indolence, and the †† antient Germans as an exerciſe proper to preſerve their youth from idleneſs: but the latter allow'd of no theſts but what were committed out of their own dominions. The Americans mayprobably be of the ſame opinion, for they don't ſcruple to plunder the Europeans and the reſt of their Enemies. Be this as it will, 'tis certain that theft is abſolutely contrary to the laws of natural juſtice, and 'tis ſurprizing the Romans ſhould have indulg'd this crime ſo far, as to allow it in certain feſtivals, call'd by them ‡‡ Quadrigariorum luſus. That hiſtorian indeed tells us, that 'twas done out of diverſion as it were, but then how many knaviſh actions were ſcreen'd under this veil! |||| The Egyptians had formerly a prince, leader, or captain of of thieves among them, as at this time in Paris, and ſome other great cities. The above-mentioned author quotes another, who aſſures, that the dominions of the Abyſſinian monarch are infeſted with ſuch like wretches. However theſe examples don't give the leaſt ſanction to theft, and it would be a very unjuſt way of arguing, ſhould any one pretend to prove from thence, that theft is conſider'd as honourable by the Egyptians, the French, &c. On the other ſide, the Japoneze will not ſuffer any kind of theft, and puniſh it with ſo much ſeverity, that they may always leave their houſes open with ſafety.

We paſs on to the employments of their women: Leſcarbot begins by that of giving birth to beautiful children; and to this purpoſe is very particular in his exhortations to all ſuch women as go to inhabit New-France, whom he adviſes to be very prolific, and to bring forth a great many children, who may ſing the praiſes of God. He proves this employment from the etymology of the Hebrew * word, and ſhews, that God form'd woman, that living ground, with the ſame diſpoſitions as that we inhabit. The wives of the ſavages employ themſelves wholly in domeſtic affairs, ſuch as the care of the family, husbandry, &c. but they are not admitted into the publick councils, nor allow'd to eat with men. As the Americans cannot be accus'd of being jealous, neither can they in this reſpect be compar'd to the Italians and Spaniards, who exclude their women as much as poſſible from all ſociety with men; nor to the Turks and other eaſtern nations, who ſhut 'em up in ſeraglio's. We may therefore ſuppoſe that this is owing to the contempt they have for the ſofter ſex, which they certainly would not have, were they leſs ſavage. The Gauls, and even the Germans, deſcrib'd by the Romans as a rude clowniſh people, did nevertheleſs treat the fair ſex with greater curteſy and civility; for they admitted their wives into their entertainments and councils; and there were very few parties of pleaſure but their women bore a part in them. Since chriſtianity, the taſte for politeneſs and gallantry has been greatly improv'd. How many noble feats of arms, in honour of the ladies, do we meet with in the annals of our gay anceſtors! how many lances broke for their ſakes! how many terrible conflicts to defend their beauty! how many duels were fought to force every body for four or five hundred miles round 'em, to own the ſuperiour charms of their reſpective miſtreſſes! Notwithſtanding this, 'tis certain, that the politeneſs which was ſhewn the ladies on this occaſion, had ſomething ſavage in it. The faſhionable devoirs of our age with regard to the fair ſex, ſeldom extend ſo far as to oblige a man to venture the being run thro' the lungs for the ſake of his miſtreſs; and was any woman now-a-days ſo blind as to expect ſuch a piece of gallantry, ſhe very probably would run the hazard of growing grey in her old-faſhion'd notions. Politeneſs is more natural in this age, or to ſpeak more juſtly, 'tis now a beautiful varniſh for the greateſt irregularities. Our gallantry, being leſs affected and more fickle than that of our anceſtors, has thereby open'd a door to contempt and debauchery. Let us advance a paradox; the ſavage Americans, notwithſtanding all our boaſted underſtanding, do yet govern themſelves with greater uniformity.

We ſhall conclude theſe remarks with the ſubmiſſion which the American women pay their husbands. We meet with leſs of this among the Americans than with us. As they always confine themſelves religiouſly to their domeſtic concerns, they never once think of giving themſelves any airs, like our European wives; which certainly makes the married ſtate infinitely more happy. 'Tis obſerv'd, that thoſe marriages are generally happy, where every thing is kept within its due bounds, and each member thereof knows his proper employment: a family regulated on this foot, makes the wife neither ſuperior nor equal; becauſe the nature of the employments of the wife, are ſuch, as naturally ſpeak her inferior and ſubmiſſive. Such of our wives as have not ſeen ſeen the ſplendid part of the world, eaſily acquieſce with this principle of ſubmiſſion; but as for the reſt of them, they think ſubmiſſion becomes none but the wife of a Topinambou, or a Hottentot.

CHAP. X.

Of the Commerce between the two Sexes, and of the Marriages of the Americans.

THERE is no nation in the world, whoſe natural fierceneſs is not ſoftned by love. The moſt brutiſh Savages have their peculiar ſyſtems of gallantry, and a tenderneſs which the fire of love refines. In this caſe there is form'd between them a contraſt or oppoſition of ſoftneſs and ſeverity, which would appear as ridiculous in our eyes, as the ſight of our peaſants making love, tho' in reality neither of them is more odd or fantaſtical than that of our courtiers. The principle which gives riſe to love, is born among the Savages in the ſame manner as among us. In what manner ſoever this principle, which is the ſource of love, may diſcover itſelf either in the heart of a Savage, of an European, or of an old peeviſh fellow, the difference will be only in the manner of its revealing itſelf. The Canadan Savage who lies down at the feet of his miſtreſs, till ſuch time as the cruel maid condeſcends to blow out the match he preſents her with, does therein not act more contradictory to reaſon, than a very polite European, who dreſſes his miſtreſs in all the perfections of nature, and as eaſily ſtrips her of them the moment the fire of love is extinguiſh'd in his breaſt; or like the old churl in * Moliere, who after having made a declaration in terms ſuitable to his character, lays aſide all his natural peeviſhneſs to aſſure his miſtreſs,

Que ſon amour le touche au dernier point
Qu'il veut qu'il ait ſa recompenſe.

That is, He is paſſionately in love with her, and is reſolv'd ſhe ſhall reward his conſtancy.

But who afterwards finding himſelf deceiv'd, wiſhes not only his miſtreſs, but † the whole ſex at the devil. In a word, the Europeans and Americans are equally ridiculous on that head. An old Iroquois dances as gracefully, with his match in his hand, in preſence of a young girl of his own country, as an old gentleman among us careſſes a blooming maid of fifteen; and love wantons as elegantly in the heart of a Boié as in that of a prelate. Conſequently the old gentleman has no reaſon to laugh at the Iroquois, nor the prelate at the Boié: they ought to do each other juſtice, and allow that they differ only in the manner; but that nature is always the painter: they ſhould ſay to themſelves, that ſuch ideas as are raiſed by gallantry, delight us from habit, not by reaſon.

As to the American art of making love, 'tis plain from what has been ſaid, that we ſhould hardly ever give into that taſte. However 'tis confin'd to fewer rules, becauſe they go to the mark at once; but notwithſtanding that the ſimplicity of this art gives an eaſy opportunity of gathering roſes, yet thorns will ſometimes ſpring up at the ſame time. The American lover makes his advances to his miſtreſs, and ſhe, as among us, often draws up her own conditions. The only ſweetneſs which is here found, is, that they are generally leſs cruel than the European ladies, and we are firmly perſuaded that they have very little regard to decorum. Cupid, who here knows very well what he is about, attacks the Americans with no other weapons but thoſe of nature. They are ignorant of the art of bluſhing at their wounds, becauſe they don't know the leaſt immodeſty there is in it; they alſo are as little acquainted with the languiſhments and delays which cuſtom has introduced among us, in the different methods that are eſtabliſhed to heal theſe ſort of wounds; but as for them, they have immediate recourſe to the cure. The notion the ſavages have of a young maiden, whom they look upon as a free uncultivated piece of ground, that ought to be the property of the firſt comer, muſt naturally make the cure of theſe love-wounds more eaſily effected; and conſequently is a great obſtacle to that delicate gallantry which employs the moſt beautiful ſeaſon of life among us. But unhappily it is to this way of thinking, that we are alſo to aſcribe the terrible diſorders which happen but too frequently among the Americans, and the ſcandalous proſtitution of their marriageable women, which was carried to ſuch great lengths in certain * provinces of Peru, that the moſt diſſolute women, who had abandon'd themſelves to all kinds of luſt, ſooner got themſelves huſbands, nay much better men, than thoſe who had all the ornaments of modeſty. Several Pagan nations allow'd antiently theſe obſcenities, nor are they altogether laid aſide in the † Eaſt-Indies; and what is a thouſand times more to be lamented, is, that in chriſtian countries the ſhameful marks of theſe debaucheries, ſo oppoſite to the ‡ dignity of the religion which our Saviour came to eſtabliſh, are ſtill preſerv'd.

'Tis an eſtabliſh'd rule among all the Americans, as well as the Europeans, that whenever a man makes love to a girl with intention to marry her, he muſt firſt ask her father's conſent, for he is not allow'd to have her but on theſe conditions. The lover muſt alſo be induſtrious enough to maintain his family. The former cuſtom is agreeable to the law of nature, the latter is owing to the love which parents have for their children.

The name of Savages which we have given to theſe people, makes us falſly ſuppoſe that they muſt have ſtifled all theſe tender emotions. We may perhaps meet with ſome, who are ſo brutal as hardly to diſcover any ſuch ſymptoms; but then there are none ſo very unnatural as to have loſt them entirely. On the contrary, the Americans ſeem in general to deviate leſs than we do from theſe two cuſtoms. We have innumerable inſtances among us, of children who have withdrawn from the obedience which they ow'd to their parents, either from wantonneſs, or ſome other criminal motives; of young women carried off, and of others who get young fellows to ſteal them; of clandeſtine and ſcandalous marriages; of young people who marry tho' they have neither inclination nor abilities to procure themſelves a maintenance: but ſhould the reader ask, whether the Savages ever fall into theſe errors; our anſwer is, that we cannot tell. It would be a pretty difficult matter on this occaſion to ſtate ſuch bounds as might be juſt between the conduct of the Savages and that of the Europeans; however, if we may believe travellers, the Savage adheres more ſtrictly than we do to thoſe rules which nature here preſcribes. Let us ſay further, that they have leſs inducements to violate them than we, as they are not ſurrounded with a numberleſs multitude of agreeable and amuſing objects that dazle our eyes, and make us ſometimes almoſt forget the moſt common precepts of virtue, which are continually preſenting themſelves to our imaginations, and raiſe the moſt horrid conflicts in the ſoul, when nature and reaſon refuſe to obey their call, which at the long run encourages us to imitate thoſe among whom we live; a vicious inclination, whoſe tyrannical yoke we yet are † Travellers have told us, that there are certain houſes in China where curtezans are entertain'd, who have each their ſeparate cell, over the door of which, ſome emblematical ſentence is writ, deſcribing the age and beauty of the tenant, and alſo the price. Petronius tells us, that there were houſes of the ſame nature in Rome in his days——video quoſdam inter titulos, nudaſque meretrices furtim conſpicientes tardè, &c.

‡ Every one has heard of the places at Rome, &c. where the moſt infamous gallantry, and all the diſorders of licentious love are carried on.

are afraid to throw off, for fear of being expoſed to cenſure and † ridicule, which often attend thoſe who preſume to live in a different manner from their neighbours. We are told, that the grand art of politeneſs, is to ſhape our conduct after ſuch cuſtoms as have been long eſtabliſhed, and are practiſed by perſons of a diſtinguiſh'd rank; but then how many of theſe cuſtoms are pernicious, that only inflame the paſſions, and maintain an eternal war with thoſe duties which religion inſpires? Woe to the Timon who ſhall take it into his head to attack them.

Il faut parmi le monde une vertu traitable;
A force de ſageſſe on peut être blamable.
La parfait raiſon fuit toute extremité,
Et veut que l'on ſoit ſage avec ſobrieté.
Cette grande roideur des vertus des vieux ages,
Heurte trop nôtre ſiecle, & les communs uſages. Moliere's Miſantrope.

Thus engliſh'd,

The virtue which the ſocial life requires,
Is ſuch as ſoft benevolence inſpires:
But that which flows from a too rigid mind,
Juſtly deſerves a cenſure from mankind.
Reaſon, when perfect, keeps its proper bounds,
And claims a wiſdom no exceſs confounds.
That ſtubborn virtue on the mind beſtow'd,
Which fix'd in Greece and Rome its chief abode,
Offends the preſent age, and ſhocks the reigning mode.

The licentiouſneſs of the preſent age would furniſh us with an excellent commentary on theſe maxims.

Let us now ſee the notions the Americans have of the neceſſity of marriage. If the rules of politeneſs oblige us daily to ſoften the ſeverity of virtue, and allow us to prefer the practice of the world to the auſterities of wiſdom, 'tis not ſo with regard to women. Men have taken it into their heads, to make the fair ſex ſlaves to a duty which they call honour. This honour, not ſatisfy'd with forbidding them to extinguiſh the raging fire of love any other ways but in the marriage-bed, prohibits them alſo from diſcovering the leaſt deſire of entering into the married-ſtate, or declaring their paſſion in the uſual form; it obliges the weakeſt ſex to ſuppreſs the leaſt ſymptoms of the moſt violent of all paſſions. If there are any women in the world, who being inſpir'd with a greater boldneſs than the generality of their ſex, do ſometimes break thro' all reſtraints, and with an unparallel'd courage, freeing themſelves from the captivity of the tyrant honour, generouſly diſcover the ſentiments of their hearts; ſend challenges to their lovers; and not ſatisfied with captivating their hearts at the firſt onſet, are for ſeizing their perſons alſo; all ſuch examples as theſe will ever be look'd upon as ſo many bold deviations from thoſe rules of modeſty, which men have laid down for the conduct of the fair ſex: the ſmall number of theſe inſtances inhances their merit. But has every young woman reſolution enough to follow them, and don't we know that the ‡ ſublime is above all rules? vulgar ſouls dare not once depart from them, and the only refuge they have, is to conceal from the world all thoſe remedies they employ againſt love; to exclaim againſt the injuſtice of men; and cry out with Amaryllis in Paſtor Fido,

Que vôtre bonheur eſt extréme,
Cruels lions, ſauvages ours,

Traduction de l'Abbé Regnier des Marais.

Thus engliſh'd.

Ye bears that haunt the pathleſs grove,
Ye lions that in foreſts ſtray,
How happy is your ſtate in love!
Since you kind love alone obey.
But in our breaſts what torments reign!
When we reflect on woman's breath;
We, whom man's cruel laws ordain
For ſpotleſs love to ſuffer death.

The ſavages are undoubtedly more unpoliſh'd, but at the ſame time more human in this reſpect. Their ignorance of the rules of decorum, makes them indulge the liberty of *loving and declaring their paſſions; but here a maid ſeldom pines for love; her ſighs are anſwer'd, and her father, in compliance with the inſtitutions of nature, ſoon ſurrenders up his daughter into the arms of her husband. One circumſtance very much facilitates the marriages of the American women, which is, the little expence they are at to maintain their families. We have already obſerv'd, that a bride's father requires induſtry in a ſon-in-law, a little of which will go a very great way. The only implements a ſavage wants to procure him a livelihood, are, a bow and arrow: he dwells in a hutt; and the principal articles in his furniture, are a hammock and ſome beaver skins. Can we think that ſuch a ſettlement brings much care and trouble along with it? children are born; the family increaſes; theſe they bring up to labour. And till the children are able to ſhift for themſelves, they range the woods for their ſubſiſtence; and as all this only coſts them a little pains in hunting, they are ſure their arrows will procure 'em proviſion.

The preliminaries of marriage laſt ſix months at leaſt among the Canadans, and ſometimes a year; during which time the "lover, as Leſcarbot informs us, paints his face, "to make it more beautiful, and wears a new gown made of beaver's, otter's, or ſome "other kind of skin, &c." But the Braſilians, who have leſs patience in their amours, leave no interval between love and marriage. As ſoon as a youth is of age to have any correſpondence with the other ſex, he is allow'd to look out for a wife; when he addreſſes himſelf to the young woman's parents, or in caſe they are dead, to her friends and neighbours. If they agree, the match is made, and ſhe immediately becomes his wife; but in caſe of a refuſal, he goes away, and makes choice of ſome other woman: however they don't ſtick to one only.

† The cuſtom of proſtituting their marriageable women, ſhews the vaſt difference there is between the taſte of the American, and the delicacy of the European husbands. The former have no regard for the virgin flower, ſo highly eſteem'd by the Jews, ſo much ſought after by our young libertines, ſo little known to phyſicians, and ſo difficult for a woman to keep. ‡ The Eaſt-Indians agree almoſt in taſte with the Americans

* O happy ſtate where ſouls each other draw, &c.

† We are aſſur'd, that the inhabitants of Ceilan courteouſly offer their wives and daughters to their gueſts; but they add, that he muſt be of ſuch quality as may entitle him to that honour! La Peirere tells us, in his account of Iceland, printed in the 1ſt vol. of the collection of voyages to the North, "that "the Iceland maidens offer themſelves as bed-fellows to all ſuch ſtrangers as are not married——and that "even their fathers preſent them to ſtrangers; that they think it a great honour when they get 'em "with child."——but a certain Icelander pretends that this is mere calumny.

‡ The antient Thracians did not believe that the gallantry of their maidens was any way criminal; but they were carefully watch'd, after they were married; and the violation of the conjugal faith was look'd upon as a capital crime.

cans on this head, as we ſhall ſee hereafter. A certain privilege of the lord of the mannor, which formerly prevail'd in ſeveral parts of Europe, proves that the vaſſal had not always the firſt fruits of his wife's virginity. "We are ‖ told, that this right or "privilege was upheld in Scotland, a long time after the eſtabliſhment of the chriſtian "religion in that kingdom; and that Malcolm II. found it a very difficult matter to re-"peal it: the wives were oblig'd to pay to the lord——a certain ſum of money. We "are alſo aſſur'd, that the gentry of Savoy and Burgundy, enjoy'd the ſame privilege "for many years; and that the prebends of the cathedral of Lions had alſo a finger "in the pye." Did the inſpirations of piety prompt thoſe people to yield to theſe eccleſiaſticks, what the Eaſt-Indians devote to the ſervice of their prieſts and idols? If every one was of * his opinion, who ſaid, that the getting of a maiden-head was porter's work, there might be ſome room to juſtify the cuſtom practis'd in both the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies; and it might be ſaid that the vaſſals had acted a cunning part, in leaving this flower for his lordſhip's cropping. The † Turks have a much better notion of the merit and ſcarcity of the lordly privilege: they are ſo far from indulging it to any body, that they flatter themſelves their wives will riſe perfect virgins at the reſurrection, and give them, at their firſt meeting in paradiſe, what they had taken from 'em when they were upon earth. To this odd cuſtom we may add that of hiring a woman for a certain limited time, which was formerly practis'd by the Romans, and at this day by the Chineze; tho' if duly conſider'd, this is no more than the fornication known to all nations, not excepting the chriſtians themſelves; the communities or ſocieties of women ‖‖ eſtabliſh'd in the kingdom of Calecut and ſome parts of Braſil; the trial and purchaſe of women ‡, indulg'd in ſome countries to thoſe who are not willing to enter into the bands of wedlock for life; the plurality of husbands, which, as we are told, is a  privilege allow'd to ſome women in the Eaſt-Indies; and laſtly, the marriage of †† widows, condemn'd by the primitive church, notwithſtanding the precept of St. Paul, who

* This ſaying is generally aſcrib'd to our gay monarch, Charles II.

† So much the more ſcarce, that tho' a girl has not that forward dexterity of Quartilla in Petronius, ſhe yet may loſe that ſeveral ways, which gives the right of ſovereignty to the husband. There are very few but what are bit in this occaſion. "Some of whom, as Brantom obſerves, are nevertheleſs after-"wards entirely well ſatisfy'd, and firmly believe that they had, like brave and reſolute ſoldiers, made "the firſt onſet, and accordingly make their boaſts of it the next morning to their friends and com-"panions, and perhaps ſometimes to thoſe very men who had been before-hand with 'em; theſe laugh "heartily in their ſleeves, and with their miſtreſſes too, who applaud themſelves for having play'd their "cards ſo cunningly."

‖‖ The Parthians and Lacedæmonians obſerv'd the ſame cuſtom, nor did the wiſe Cato himſelf diſdain to give an example of it to the Romans, by lending his wife to his friend Hortenſius the orator. The Author of the Letters hiſtorical and gallant, tells us of an incident of much the ſame nature with this; and Brantom, in his memoirs of the ladies of gallantry, relates the ſtory of an antiquated husband, "who al-"low'd his wife to make love, and chuſe herſelf a grand-vicar, adviſing her only to pitch upon a diſcreet "and modeſt man; promiſing at the ſame time, to maintain as his own, all the children that ſhould "ſpring from this commerce: whereupon ſhe brought him two or three children, which the husband, be-"cauſe he ſometimes had a finger in the pye, fancied were partly his, and the reſt of the world were "ſilly enough to believe: thus both husband and wife were very well ſatisfy'd, and had a fine family "between 'em." Could we believe, that the wife Solon had himſelf preferr'd a law, viz. if a woman was not ſatisfy'd with her husband, ſhe might have recourſe to her parents, and make them ſupply her husband's impotency?

‡ In Pegu. The men here purchaſe women on condition of trying their humour, behaviour, &c. if they don't approve of 'em, the husbands are allow'd to ſend 'em back, after having had a taſte: the parents, who are the ſellers, take her back and return the money, but the taſter is oblig'd to keep the children he gets. The Eſſenes, a conſiderable ſect among the Jews, made a trial for three years together, whether the woman they intended to marry, was vigorous enough to bear children. Joſephus, book 2. chap. 12. of his war againſt the Romans.——It were to be wiſh'd, that there were not in London, &c. ſo many inſtances of parents who proſtitute their own children for a pecuniary conſideration.——See a moſt generous inſtance of a gay gentleman, who had compaſſion on an unhappy creature that was brought to him for this purpoſe, Guardian, N° 17.

 We are told that ſeveral Naïres of Viſiapour belong to one woman. But is it not a miſtake? The ſame cuſtom probably reigns among the Naïres, as among the noble Venetians, ſeveral of whom, as S. Didier tells us, club together to keep a girl between them.

†† This prohibition appears natural enough, for according to the length of man's life, we are not to expect the diſſolution of the marriage-tye till the age of 60 or 80 years, by the death of one of the parties; and what is love at that age, but a vain and uſeleſs fire? An old widow who marries again, is not in a condition to bring children into the world. What ſhould ſhe then do, but feed on penance in ſome convent let-who ſays, 'tis much better to marry than to burn (with the fire of concupiſcence) practis'd both in Europe and Aſia. Captain * Quartier, ſpeaking of the Canadan women, tells us, "that they never marry a ſecond time, but bewail the death of their husbands as "long as they live; ſmearing their faces with pounded charcoal and greaſe, which are "the characteriſtics of a widow: but as for the men, they are allow'd two or three "wives." Polygamy is eſtabliſh'd in all parts of Aſia, Africa, and America; but then is there not as much licentiouſneſs in this, as in thoſe husbands who have their kept miſtreſſes? If it be true, that there are more females born than males, the polygamiſts follow the order of nature, who has ſome deſign in all ſhe does. Theſe make ſome uſe of an infinite number of women, who otherwiſe would be altogether uſeleſs in the world. But nature may argue as ſhe pleaſes in this caſe; ſince the purity of the chriſtian religion muſt ever make us diſallow a plurality of wives. Leſcarbot is of opinion, that the ſavage Americans are chaſter than the people of our hemiſphere, and gives three reaſons for it; firſt, their going naked, eſpecially the head, from which part the ſeed ſprings; ſecondly, their abſtaining from ſpices, ſalt, and wine; and thirdly, the uſe of tobacco. If the Americans are chaſter than other people, 'tis owing to the little difficulties they meet with in love, of which the reaſon has already been given; to their marrying as ſoon as they feel the impulſes of nature; and to that variety of objects with which polygamy furniſhes 'em. Beſides, we ſhould contradict ourſelves were we to inſiſt on the chaſtity of the Americans, after having obſerv'd in what manner they proſtitute their young women; as alſo of what is related of ſeveral among them, who are ſaid to be very ſubject to that infamous diſeaſe which is the conſequence of looſe and diſorderly love. The † Floridians are ſaid to love in a ſhocking manner. Their girls have loſt their virginity by that time they are ten or twelve years of age. They employ perfumes ‡, diſtillations, fomentations, and other arts to force nature beyond her bounds. As for the women in Florida, they ‖ employ the juice of certain herbs to a uſe, mention'd by Brantome's Ladies of gallantry, and by Venette in his Picture.

The Americans (tho' perhaps we are to except ſome ſavages of Terra Auſtralis, whom travellers aſſure us, have no rule or order among them) never marry in three degrees of conſanguinity; a ſon with his mother, a father with his daughter, or a brother with his ſiſter. Their marriage-contracts, promiſes, and divorces, are barely verbal; and let her then with a good grace bid adieu to all the fruits of love, and employ all her thoughts on the next world. The Canadans have a better rule, for no one among them will marry women after their nine and fortieth year. What is paſt is no more than an agreeable dream: this laſt recollection of my paſt delights gives me a great deal of pleaſure, ſays an old woman in Brantome, who was taking her leave of a male-friend of her's, before ſhe took the veil.

Felicité paſsée,
Qui ne peut revénir,
Tourment de ma penſée,
Que n'ai-je en te perdant perdu le Souvenir!

That is, O my paſt happineſs, that is to return no more! 'tis this caſts a gloom on every thought; why did I not, in loſing thee, forget I ever had been!

In Canada 'tis otherwiſe than in Europe, where the original ideas of nature are leſs blotted from the mind, or more ſtrictly adher'd to than among us. Our antiquated widows, when, to uſe the expreſſion of Brantome, they have not ſix teeth left in their heads, will yet marry again like ſo many young girls; and with one foot in the grave, make a laſt ſtruggle to force from Hymen what he is no longer oblig'd to furniſh 'em with. But the worſt of it is, that thoſe old matrons are ſo very vigorous and alert, that they often ſend their young husbands packing into the other world: but this does not prevent young fellows who live in a trading country, and have their fortune to make, from making love to old rich widows. We will conclude this obſervation, which perhaps is too ludicrous, by a very odd cuſtom, which Brantome tells us prevail'd in his time, in the iſland of Chio, viz. that every woman who was reſolv'd to die a widow, was oblig'd to pay a ſum of money, by way of tribute for her being untenanted, and this tribute was call'd argomoniatic.

and as for jointures, 'tis hardly known among them. Solon and ſome other Greek ſages, would not have any portions given with women; but then 'twas from a motive different from that of the Weſt-Indians. The indifference which theſe latter have for riches, is the ſole cauſe of their deſpiſing a bait, at which moſt of our European huſbands nibble; but Solon's deſign was to preſerve the domeſtic peace and equality among his countrymen the Athenians. He was apprehenſive that the cuſtom of giving portions with their women, which undoubtedly was us'd by the greateſt part of their neighbours, would be the deſtruction of both.

Let us in the next place conſider the duties of their women. We ſhall not take notice of the husbandry of the Americans, which is generally the buſineſs of their women; nor of their family concerns, nor of the care they are oblig'd to take of their children. There is no country in the world in which the wife has not ſome part of this province, how odd and particular ſoever their cuſtoms may be in other reſpects. All we ſhall take notice of, is the conjugal fidelity which the ſavages oblige their wives to keep ſtrictly; tho' themſelves will not ſubmit to it. We are told, that the American women are pretty faithful to their husbands, and that all of them in general have the utmoſt deteſtation, and even puniſh with death, the incontinence of their married women; tho' at the ſame time, they don't much trouble their heads tho' their daughters are ever ſo gay, as has been already obſerv'd. 'Tis eaſy to conceive that this is a very natural notion, and it wou'd prevail equally among us, did not religion and reaſon correct our natures; at leaſt, if what the world calls honour, did not force us to conceal our irregularities. But to ſpeak out,——if it were poſſible to ſuppreſs theſe notions of honour, we ſhould immediately ſee thouſands of our girls turn ſavages, and wou'd ſeek for thoſe joys in a Braſilian celibacy, which they hope to find in a virtuous married life. Be this as it will, we are told that an American dates the time of his wife's virtue from the firſt day of their marriage, and then relies entirely on her fidelity; whereas among us, the greateſt debauchee would not willingly run the hazard of marrying a woman that had the leaſt blot in her reputation, whatever teſtimonies ſhe might have given him of her fidelity. But a ſavage argues in a quite different manner; his notions are, that as a young woman is a free agent, ſhe may make what uſe ſhe pleaſes of her body: but the moment ſhe has made a promiſe, ſhe is immediately the property of the man who is to take her for his wife; and ſhe has from that inſtant loſt the power which her liberty gave her. Such is the principle of the Americans, and 'tis on this perhaps that their jealouſy is grounded, which, if they really have any, differs vaſtly from that of the Italians and Spaniards, ſince the Americans have neither bolts nor grates to preſerve an honour, which all the ſtrong holds in the world would not be able to defend, in caſe a woman had once made a reſolution of getting rid of it; that they don't put their women under the guard of eunuchs; and that, in fine, they are unacquainted with a numberleſs multitude of arts, "which poor, jealous cuckolds, "as * Brantome calls 'em, put in practice, to bridle, ſhut up, perplex, and keep un-"der their eye their wives, for fear they ſhould launch out, tho' in vain; for when a "woman has once got that deviliſh crotchet into her head, the beſt remedy, the beſt "guard, a jealous husband can put over his wife, is to leave her at full † liberty." A ſavage has recourſe to divorce, the moment he has proofs of his being a cuckold; in

† Prior's rule for keeping a wife virtuous,

Receive her with extended arms,
Seem more delighted with her charms,
Wait on her to the park and play,
Put on good humour, make her gay:
Be to her virtues very kind,
Be to her faults a little blind:
Let all her ways be unconfin'd,
And put a padlock—on her mind.

in which caſe, we are told that the woman being at her own liberty, and become her own miſtreſs by this infraction of the marriage-contract, is allow'd to marry another husband. The cuckold muſt be very jealous indeed, who puniſhes the woman who has violated his bed, with death. A French man ſeldom has recourſe to divorce, much leſs does he attempt to kill his wife, which neither the laws of chriſtianity, nor thoſe of man do any way autho-rize; but 'tis neither a motive of religion, or a dread of the laws, that check the violence of his rage. He takes ſuch a reſolution as his free and fickle temper inſpires, and pays his faithleſs partner in the ſame coin, and has twenty intrigues; and indeed he acts a thouſand times more prudently in this than the Italian Cornutos, thoſe gloomy Argus's, who are eternally watching over the pretended cauſe of their diſhonour.

A Paris ce n'eſt pas comme à Rome;
Le cocu qui s'afflige y paſſe pour un ſot;
Et le cocu qui rit pour un fort honnête homme.
Quand on prend comme il faut cet accident fatal
Cocuage n'eſt point un mal.

The ſenſe of which is,

'Tis not at Paris as at Rome; for in the former place, a whining cuckold is look'd upon as an aſs; but one who laughs at his being ſo, paſſes for a very honeſt man. When a man behaves with temper under this circumſtance, cuckoldom is far from being an evil.

As to the duties which a husband owes his wife, they are not carried to any great lengths among the Americans. From what we juſt now obſerv'd, it does not appear that the condition of their wives is better than that of our ſervants: but the jealouſy above-mention'd makes the Eaſt-Indian women to be much more ſlaves than thoſe of America. Could any thing more dreadful have poſſibly enter'd into the mind of man, than a perpetual priſon where their women are ſurrounded, waited upon, and watch'd by a ſett of eunuchs, who are often frightfully black and ugly, where they are given up a prey to a thouſand criminal reflections, which * idleneſs gives birth to, and which would never ariſe were they to aſſociate with the reſt of the world. We muſt own that jealouſy loves to blind itſelf; the principles of chriſtianity oblige us to have certain regards for the fair ſex which are not obſerv'd in Aſia. The ſcripture has depriv'd us of the power of † life and death over women; it enjoins us to behave ourſelves with the utmoſt humanity towards them; and commands us to treat like a ſecond-ſelf, a ſex which the alcoran allows to uſe as a maſter does his ſervant. We are not ignorant, that we meet with many exceptions to the goſpel-injunction among us; and that ſeveral husbands treat their wives with more rigour and contempt, than the moſt odd and unaccountable Turkiſh husband could poſſibly do; that a great many others cannot perſuade themſelves that a wife who is married in preſence of the whole church, is any better than a good ſervant, who is ſolemnly bound to him for life; in a word, there are ſeveral, who not ſatisfied with keeping their wives in a perpetual ſtate of ſlavery, and to deny them every thing that may make life agreeable, take a pleaſure in expoſing them to the contempt of ſtrangers; rob 'em of that privilege which nature has given 'em of being reſpected by their children; and think it a kind of merit in making 'em the objects of ridicule: but the behaviour of theſe husbands is as much deſpis'd by men of honour, as that of coquets and female libertines. The principles of the chriſtian religion make us deteſt as much the cruelty of a husband, as the lewdneſs of a woman. The behaviour of the Americans is vaſtly more regular, and much more conformable to their notions. Travellers tell us, that that the friendſhip theſe men have for their wives, is not like that between equals; but that it may be compar'd to the friendſhip which a maſter ſometimes has for his ſervant, who is oblig'd to ſupport and protect him. They imagine them to be born for ſervitude, and that no more ſhould be indulged them, than the pardoning their faults. This friendſhip therefore ariſes only from the neceſſity the human ſpecies are under of ſatisfying the cravings of nature, and the indiſpenſible obligation of propagating it. We are told, that where theſe motives are not, their friendſhip immediately ceaſes, for which reaſon they conſider their old women as ſo much lumber. We muſt however own, 'tis very ſurpriſing, that notwithſtanding theſe principles, Coquets are as rare to be met with in America, as they are common in Europe.

* This made Laberius ſay, that a woman when alone, has her head always fill'd with evil thoughts, mulier quæ ſola cogitat, male cogitat.

† The old Romans treated their wives with great inhumanity, which was owing to the rude ignorance that prevail'd in the infancy of the Republick.

We will conclude theſe obſervations with the notions which different nations have of baſtards. We make them in ſome meaſure reſponſible for the crime which thoſe who gave 'em life committed, and deſpiſe 'em as if they themſelves were guilty: but if all is true that is related of the proſtitution of the American women, baſtards in thoſe countries are not ſubject to thoſe diſagreeable diſtinctions: and yet we are aſſur'd, that ſome American* nations are ſo jealous of keeping their blood pure and unmix'd, that they exclude from the throne the very perſon who among us would be the true heir; and on the contrary ſet the crown on the head of the ſiſter's ſon. The ſame is obſerv'd in other inheritances. But how ſhall we reconcile theſe notions? Be that as it will, the Jewiſh religion antiently excluded baſtards from the prieſthood, and the †chriſtian church has imitated them in this reſpect; but they don't meet with ſuch hard uſage in ſome other religions, and we are aſſured that the Mahometans look upon all ſuch children as their wives ‡ bring into the world during their pilgrimage to Mecca, as legitimate; that they are alſo adopted into the poſterity of Mahomet, and have the privilege of wearing a green turbant, as being the genuine off-ſpring of that prophet; ſuch an effect has devotion in the heart of a Muſulman: 'tis this makes one give a ‖ character of holineſs, to what at another time would raiſe the utmoſt fury of jealouſy. Some Chriſtians would perhaps go as great lengths as the Muſulmen on ſuch an occaſion. The antients had not always baſtards in abhorrence. The continual cuckoldom of their Gods have been particularly taken notice of, as alſo that heaven was peopled with baſtards during the time that the Pagan ſyſtem prevail'd in the world. 'Twas but reaſonable that the flaws in the birth of their Gods and Demi-gods ſhould plead an excuſe for thoſe of men; but ſo far from thinking worſe of themſelves for being of a doubtful original, ſome  famous conquerors were reſolv'd to have themſelves look'd upon as the baſtards of ſome Gods; ſeveral great men among the antients have been willing to paſs for the baſtards of nymphs, or demi-gods; which in thoſe days was the ſame as if any one ſhould now ſay, the baſtard of ſome He or She-ſaint. Let us not omit the expedient the Lacedæmonians made uſe of, after having loſt the greateſt part of their men during their bloody wars with the Meſſenians. They ſent a body of ſtout young fellows to their wives: gave their unmarried women leave to lie with their ſlaves; and allow'd the firſt comers to cohabit with them in what manner they thought proper. If it be true, that the natural way of making love, is often more likely to give inhabitants to a ſtate, than marriage; we need not wonder that a race of baſtards which ſprung from the unlawful commerce of the Lacedæmonians, ſhould be powerful enough to lay the foundation of Tarentum in one of the fineſt ſpots of all Italy. The Lacedæmonians indeed ſent theſe baſtards packing, but they could not juſtly reproach them with their birth, or drive them out of their country. But our notions are different from from theirs; we think more juſtly than the antients, tho' at the ſame time we don't live with more regularity; we would not ſuffer recruits of baſtards to be raiſed among us; for ſuch levies would be very prejudicial, and depopulate whole provinces. 'Tis more prudent to bear the evil with patience; to ſay nothing, and mutually aſſiſt each other in the marriage-ſtate.

* In Virginia and Canada. They have the ſame cuſtom in Cochin, and in the kingdom of Loxando in Africa. See the preface to vol. the 4th, of the collection of voyages to the north.

The ſenſe of which is,

The tie of marriage claims reſpect, fidelity, and virtue. If unhappily either of the parties ſhould violate it in any manner, they muſt take care not to let it come to the notice of the world.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Diet of the Americans.

WE are neither to look for luxury or delicacy in the American diet. Their life is an image of that of the firſt inhabitants of the world; of thoſe ages when mankind fed only on roots, acorns, and fruits. We are no more to wonder how it is poſſible for them to live without a thouſand things which we make uſe of, than that we cannot bring ourſelves to abſtain from them. But to be more particular: the Americans did not know the uſe of bread before the Europeans came among 'em. They firſt uſed to dry roots, and afterwards grind or bruiſe them, and theſe they work'd up into a dough, of which they often made cakes. Whenever they went a hunting, on any incurſion, or to war, they uſed to bake their bread hard, like our biſcuits, to ſerve them in their journeys. The Savages have preſerved all theſe cuſtoms to this day. Some of theſe uſe Maiz, a kind of corn which they commonly eat parched; and 'tis in this manner that the * Jews, and ſeveral other nations of antiquity, always eat their corn. The food of the old Romans was almoſt as ſimple as that of the Weſt-Indians. The Romans in the infancy of their republick, liv'd as theſe latter on thick milk and roots, which were often baked on the aſhes with their † general's own hand: but they afterwards learnt the art of making bread, tho' it was many years after the foundation of the city.

The

† Caius Fabricius was as eminent for probity and frugality, as his valour.——He refuſed the preſents which the Samnites ſent him. Their Embaſſadors, after having taken notice of all the favours their nation had received from him, ſince the concluſion of the peace, begg'd him to accept a conſiderable ſum of money which they were order'd to offer him, particularly as he wanted ſeveral neceſſary pieces of furniture, and had not an equipage ſuitable to his rank and great merit. Upon which Fabricius laid his hand upon his ears, his eyes, his noſe, his mouth, &c. and then ſaid to the Embaſſadors, I ſhall never ſtand in need of any thing ſo long as I ſhall be able to command the ſeveral parts I juſt now laid my hand on; ſo that having no need of money, I ſhall never receive any from thoſe that want it themſelves. All his plate conſiſted in a cup and ſalt-ſeller; and he would not allow the commanders of armies to have more than himſelf. He liv'd upon roots which he cultivated and dreſs'd with his own hands.

The reſt of the food of the Americans is compoſed of the fruits of the earth, fiſh, and fowl, and their only ſauce is hunger; for they are entirely unacquainted with ragouts, or any ſuch high-ſeaſon'd meats; we are even aſſur'd that the North-Americans are entirely ignorant of the uſe of * ſalt, which was ſo much eſteem'd by the antients, that they gave it the epithet of divine. The latter uſed it both at their tables and their altars, and would often make a meal upon a piece of dry bread and a little ſalt. The American Savages to keep their meat from ſtinking, either broil it over the fire, or dry it in the ſun; which is very much like the ſmoaking of fleſh, ſo much uſed in Germany.

As to the drink of the Americans, we muſt firſt conſider it in its greateſt ſimplicity. One drinks water out of neceſſity, and wine, or ſome other liquor for pleaſure. The moſt natural and only liquid our firſt progenitors were acquainted with, was water. Wine, and other ſtrong liquors were not found out till after the flood. However, they did not quite leave off drinking water after theſe artificial liquors were invented, and the very † Heroes themſelves often drank it at their meals, as appears from Homer. The American Savages do alſo drink mere element; but as this cold liquor has not the power of reviving the ‡ ſpirits; of inſpiring joy, or creating an ‖ appetite; 'tis no wonder they invented ſtrong liquors, which however are all very different from thoſe of Europe. As the Caouin of the Braſilians is a ſpirit drawn from Maiz, it may perhaps be ſomething like the ſpirit that is extracted from malt, or Holland's geneva, with which the vulgar in that country ſuddle themſelves, was not this Braſilian liquor made after a quite different manner. Be that as it will, the Americans drink to as great exceſs of their ſtrong liquors, as the people of our hemiſphere do of wine, &c. A Braſilian drowns all his anxiety, and finds an inexhauſtible ſpring of comfort in his Caouin, in the ſame manner as our tiplers do in their beer, wine, or other ſtrong liquors. A Floridian taſtes as much pleaſure in getting drunk with his Caſiné, as our ſailors do in ſuddling themſelves with Holland's gin; and the former ſhall ſtupify himſelf as compleatly in battle with this liquor, as our ſoldiers do with gun-powder ſteep'd in brandy, when they go upon an aſſault. The Aſiaticks make the ſame uſe of the juice of opium. It has already been obſerv'd, that the Americans are as great drinkers as many of our European nations; and if  travellers are to be believ'd, a Floridian tipler would knock down the greateſt German or Swiſs bacchanal. They would conquer the greateſt tipling heroes of antiquity, notwithſtanding they uſed to drink out of bowls that were of ſo capacious a ſize, as immediately to knock a young fellow down; nor would be daunted at the ſight of the prodigious Muſcovite goblets, which a ſtranger is obliged to quaff off, and not leave a drop, tho' he were to ſink under the table after it; and if the Virginian and Floridian Boiés manfully make head againſt their Caſiné, the Clergy among us are no leſs valiant in triumphing over Bacchus. The American women are ſaid to be as great drinkers as their husbands; nor are our European women wholly free from that vice. The women in the north parts of Europe are ſaid to love ſtrong liquors: Engliſh women drink † Nay, they were ſo very abſtemious, that very often when the army labour'd under a great drought, the Generals themſelves refuſed to drink any water when only a little had been found, as Mr. Addiſon has finely expreſs'd it, ſpeaking of Cato.

If ſome penurious ſource by chance appear'd
Scanty of waters, when you ſcoop'd it dry,
And offer'd the full helmet up to Cato,
Did he not daſh th'untaſted moiſture from him?

‡ Wine whets the wit, improves its native force,
And adds a pleaſing flavour to diſcourſe,
By making all the ſpirits debonnair,
Throws off the lees, the ſediment of care.

‖ We ſee however, that thoſe who uſe themſelves to drinking of water, generally enjoy a great fluſh of health, a chearful conſtitution, and a clear mind. See a pamphlet publiſh'd not long ago, wherein the ſeveral excellent properties of water are diſcover'd.

 Leſcarbot, Coreal, &c.

drink * punch and † ſtrong beer to exceſs: Dutch women are as fond of ſweet wine, brandy, &c. ‡ none of theſe look upon the frequenting of taverns as any way derogatory to their ſex. The ladies among the French no longer dilute their wine with water, but begin to accuſtom themſelves to the ſtrength of the juice of the grape; tho' the Romans for many years forbad their women the uſe of it, becauſe of its ſometimes fatal conſequence to their honour. 'Tis certainly a very difficult matter to preſerve virtue unſully'd amidſt the fumes of Bacchus: wine takes off the troubleſome veil of modeſty; gives life to love, and throws an agreeable ſhade over thoſe ſcruples, which temperance lays too much open. All the eloquence and wit of that love-declaration which is uninſpir'd with wine, is cold and languid, in compariſon of that intrepidity which wine raiſes in the ſoul.

Eſperés peu de vos diſcours,
L'amour ne cede pas toujours,
A l'ardeur la plus raiſonnable.
Souvent en beuvant de bon vin,
On trouve le plus court chemin,
Pour rendre la belle traitable.

That is, Don't flatter your ſelf, that you will gain your point by your amorous diſcourſes; love does not always yield to the moſt juſt and reaſonable paſſion. But wine frequently points out to us the ſhorteſt way, to make the fair-one kind and complying.

We muſt own, that the ſimplicity and unpoliſh'd manners of the ſavages, which conſequently muſt be ſo oppoſite to the politeneſs which is almoſt become natural to us, does not give us an advantageous idea of their manner of eating. They eat in a very ſlovenly manner on the ground, and with their fingers, without any cloth or covering whatſoever, and they never wipe either their mouths or hands. They often give to every gueſt his portion of the entertainment, ‖ as antiently among the Greeks. They are ignorant of the uſe of forks and napkins, but as thick milk is one of their chief diſhes, neceſſity has taught them to make  ſpoons, which have a clumſy reſemblance to ours. †† Travellers tell us alſo of certain ſticks, which ſome of theſe nations eat with inſtead of forks, in the ſame manner as the ‡‡ Chineze. The Americans hardly knew the cuſtom of cutting their meat, for before the coming of the Europeans they us'd to tear it to pieces without any other ceremony. ‖‖ In ſome parts of North-America the maſter of the feaſt does not eat himſelf, but employs himſelf entirely in waiting upon his gueſts: in others, he ſings during the whole entertainment, and when he himſelf does not perform the part of choriſter, he ſubſtitutes ſome of his dependants to officiate for him. 'Tis plain, that all theſe cuſtoms are ſo very odd and barbarous, that one can hardly forbear looking upon 'em as ſavage: nevertheleſs there are as many odd cuſtoms to be met with in our hemiſphere. We are told that the * Chineze don't aſſiſt at the entertainments they give; that the Perſians don't make uſe of knives, but ſet their meat ready carv'd before their gueſts. But to wave the cuſtoms of diſtant nations, let us look nearer home for inſtances of that ruſticity which we find among the ſavages. 'Tis not many years ſince the Dutch were unacquainted with the uſe of table-cloths and napkins:

* I believe the author has not hit upon the liquor; ſo far from it, that our Engliſh ladies abhor the very name of it. One who hated punch, call'd to her ſervant to bring her ſome water, a few lemons and a lump of ſugar, but above all not to forget brandy.

† This cannot be ſaid of any of our Engliſh women, but ſuch as are the mere refuſe and dregs of the Society.

napkins: a piece of blue linnen-cloth us'd to go round the table, and paſſing from hand to hand, ſerv'd to wipe the mouths and fingers of the gueſts. Theſe people were not acquainted with any other fork but their fingers, which alſo very often ſupply'd the place of knives and ſpoons. 'Tis true indeed, that the over-great neatneſs which the Dutch ladies are ſo fond of in their houſes, was partly the cauſe of the loathſome ſimplicity in their manner of eating: but this motive does not render the Dutch ſimplicity either more amiable or worthy of our imitation than that of the Americans. We ſhall by the way obſerve, that the * Dutch and other European nations have had their taſte with reſpect to eating, very much refin'd by the French cooks. The principles on which they were built, will not be laid aſide very ſoon.

The antients had their religious banquets; the ſavages have alſo theirs: in theſe they often treat on military affairs, and they are always accompanied with ſome religious ceremonies. Theſe feaſts are always heighten'd with ſongs in honour of their gods and heroes, intermix'd with imprecations againſt their enemies. We have now laid aſide all ſuch ceremonies, but will obſerve, that the † Germans us'd to treat of peace and war in their entertainments. We meet with nothing in our feaſts that has the leaſt affinity to that piety which is aſcribed to thoſe of the antients, unleſs it be the ſolemnity of certain days, which often excite us to eat and drink with our friends and companions from quite different motives than thoſe which religion inſpires: but after all, who can aſſure us that the religious feſtivals of the antients had much religion in them? Let us diveſt our ſelves of our blind prejudice with regard to antiquity, and no longer break out into enthuſiaſtic commendations of the virtues of our anceſtors. Antiently the preliminaries of the feaſt were devoted to the gods: they ſacrificed in their honour; libations were pour'd out before them, and prayers were offer'd up to them. A ſign of the croſs or benedicite are the preliminaries of ours. The grace which the Germans make uſe of, is juſtly proportion'd to the length of their meals.

In Canada the women don't ‡ eat with the men, but have a ſeparate apartment for themſelves. The ſame cuſtom is obſerv'd in Spain and Italy, but from motives which probably are unknown to the Canadans; but a Frenchman, who is a more reaſonable creature, and almoſt the only one that is born with an eaſy and unaffected freedom, does not value the fineſt entertainment in the world, unleſs it be heightned by the company of || women. The Gauls, their predeceſſors, had the fair ſex in equal eſteem; and the Germans, who are unjuſtly accus'd to love good wine only, were as fond of the converſation of women as the antient Gauls, and both theſe nations admitted them into their feaſts and councils. The antient Romans, who thought of nothing but the conqueſt of the univerſe, deſpis'd every thing that had not ſome relation to war, and treated their women and children in a very rigorous manner. Gallantry was not introduc'd among the Romans till they began to be ſoften'd with luxury; and their ladies did not grace their entertainments, till ſuch time as the Romans, who in proceſs of time

* What ſervice have they done in the world, but only in ſhortning the life of man and oppreſſing it with infinite diſeaſes? How finely does the excellent Cornaro inveigh againſt luxury!——Let us accuſtom ourſelves to eat only to ſupport nature; what is more than neceſſary for our nouriſhment ſows the ſeeds of ſickneſs and death: 'Tis a pleaſure for which we muſt pay very dear, and which cannot be either innocent or excuſable, ſince it may be ſo prejudicial to us. How many have I ſeen cut off in the flower of their days by the unhappy cuſtom of high feeding? how many excellent friends has gluttony depriv'd me of, who might ſtill have been an ornament to the world, an honour to their country, and have occaſion'd me as much ſatisfaction in enjoying, as I now have ſorrow in loſing 'em?——O unhappy Italy! doſt thou not perceive that gluttony and exceſs rob thee every year of more inhabitants than peſtilence, war and famine could have deſtroy'd! thy true plagues are thy frequent feaſtings.

|| As Frenchmen give too much into trifles, which makes them ſcarcely men, the women have too much boldneſs and are ſcarcely women. The continual commerce between both ſexes, is, as it were, an exchange of characters, which makes each ſex derogate from its proper character; but the women fall into a miſtake, and excel in a great many things that are out of their province: they ſing airs that are too licentious, and ſing 'em well: they drink at table, and they do it agreeably: they underſtand gaming as well as the men: they go a hunting with them, and come ſo near the men in every thing, that they are ſcarcely women. I ſpeak this of the ſex in general, for there are a thouſand exceptions. Muralt's letters on the characters and cuſtoms of the Engliſh and French nations.

time were become vaſtly more polite, but leſs warlike than their anceſtors, had quitted the banners of Mars, to fight under thoſe of Cupid. The Dutch have their parties of pleaſure with women, but then they might as well be abſent; for nothing is more common than to ſee men and women ſeparated from one another in the ſame room. Both ſexes on theſe occaſions have their diverſions apart; and the lover ſhall take leave of his miſtreſs with as much gravity and reſpect, as if he was not acquainted with her. But the Savages don't withdraw from their women from any motive of reſpect, but merely from the contempt they have for 'em; 'tis an air of ſuperiority they aſſume over a part of the creation, which they imagine was made for their uſe only. 'Tis very probable that this principle of the Dutch might at firſt flow from the ſame original with that of the Savages of Canada. The clowniſh haughtineſs of this nation gives us room to believe, that the male part among them think themſelves vaſtly ſuperior to the women; and the rude notions they have of liberty, hardly allows them to pay any regard to thoſe laws of politeneſs with reſpect to the ladies, which are ſo ſtrictly obſerv'd by other nations. To prove in ſome meaſure what we have advanced in this place, let us conſider the ſignification of that word, which in Dutch ſignifies a married woman. It cannot be tranſlated into French but by the two words * femme domeſtique, in Engliſh a domeſtick woman or houſe-wife. But after all, it would be very unjuſt to affirm that the Dutch deſpiſe the fair ſex in our age: 'tis plain they do their utmoſt endeavour to conquer the prevailing character of their country: however 'tis certain that their manner of education makes their young men not ſeek after the company of the virtuous of the oppoſite ſex, becauſe they don't teach 'em to behave with politeneſs on theſe occaſions; the conſequence of which is, that they have no more notion of love than † Father Philip's ſon had when he was twenty. In a word, we may affirm of this people in general, without affronting any particular perſon, who may be excepted from the national character;

‡ Qu'ils ſont trés neuf hors la boutique,
Et quelque peu d'Arithmetique.

That is,
They know nothing but juſt how to caſt up a ſum, and look after their ſhops.

On the other ſide, as their young women are but ſeldom admitted into the company of the other ſex, they are quite ignorant how to defend themſelves againſt their ſtratagems, and fall ſo eaſily into their ſnares, that 'tis plain they are but little acquainted with the ficklenеſs of mankind. 'Twould be difficult to name a country where the women are more unaffected and ingenuous in love; nor who more fondly perſuade themſelves, that when a young fellow is profuſe of ſoft expreſſions he certainly intends to marry them.

We are aſſur'd, that the American Savages are exactly obſervant of every duty of humanity. As they don't thirſt after riches, they mutually partake of whatever they may have got by hunting, and their other proviſions, nor are ever ruffled by thoſe cares, which in other nations diſturb the tranquillity of mankind; and which fill them with ſo much dread whenever they think of futurity, that we may juſtly apply to them what the Chevalier de Cailli has obſerved of a covetous fellow, Qu'ils veulent avoir dequoi vivre aprés leur mort.

That they are reſolved to lay up ſtore to ſubſiſt upon after death.

" The Savages, ſays ‖ Leſcarbot, whom we have quoted ſo often, obſerve that mutual " love and charity to one another, which was laid aſide the moment the words meum and " tuum

Whatever the author has obſerv'd of the North-Americans, may be apply'd to thoſe of the South.

" tuum were known among us. They obſerve the laws of hoſpitality, the diſtinguiſhing " characteriſtic of the antient Gauls, who uſed to force ſtrangers and travellers to come " into their houſes, and accept of whatever proviſion they had." We may juſtly ſay in praiſe of the French, that they exactly copy after the hoſpitality of the antient Gauls; for no nation in the world diſcovers more humanity for ſtrangers. The Germans have inherited this laudable character from their anceſtors, and which was ſo religiouſly obſerv'd by the firſt inhabitants of the world, that they ſtrove to rival each other in their kindneſs and benevolence towards ſtrangers and travellers. 'Tis alſo ſaid, that the ancient Greeks, and afterwards the Romans, uſed always to keep part of whatever was left at meals for ſtrangers. Charity to ſtrangers was alſo ſtrongly inculcated by the Jewiſh law.

Whenever the Savages of North-America aſſemble on any private or public affair, they open their debates with a pipe. 'Tis certain that tobacco is as much uſed in Aſia as in America. 'Tis one of the greateſt delicacies of the Turks; nay, their paſſion for it is ſo great, * that ſometimes Turks impaled alive, ſhall, as they writhe on the ſtake, beg a pipe of tobacco of travellers as they paſs along. This weed has been known in Europe about † 150 years, ſince which time it has been in very great ‡ repute, and has gain'd itſelf a reputation among us, that will probably laſt as long as the world. The Engliſh and Dutch eſpecially, ask their gueſts to take a pipe. We ſhall make no further reflections on the merit of a weed that is a friend to wine, and an agreeable help to the meditations of the learned. Leſcarbot tells us, that the Savages of Canada will ſometimes live for a week together on tobacco.

CHAP. XII.

Of their Diſeaſes, and their methods of curing them.

THE Americans often cure their diſeaſes by violent exerciſe. This method is very agreeable to nature, which, by the motion of the body, throws off a thouſand noxious ſuperfluities; breaks thoſe groſs particles which clog the blood, and by giving it its neceſſary fluidity, enables it by its circulation, to diſſolve thoſe groſs humours which before corrupted it. Theſe principles are founded on nature; a deſire of prolonging life and preſerving health inſpire us with them; but ſtill they are the product of repeated trials, which both we and the Americans have made uſe of. 'Tis certain that ‖ bodily exerciſe alone would cure more people than all the preſcriptions of the moſt able phyſicians, were it not for our luxury, and did not the fear of death ſink our ſpirits in ſickneſs. The continual exerciſe of our working people preſerves them from a thouſand infirmities to which they would be infallibly ſubject, had they leiſure to be ſick. We are therefore not to wonder, that the Americans are more healthy and robuſt than we, ſince they uſe ſo much exerciſe.

The Floridians have the uſe of vomits as well as the Europeans, but ſeldom employ them except in violent diſeaſes. They lance all thoſe parts that are troubled with the rheumatiſm. The Braſilians and thoſe of New-Andaluſia alſo uſe vomits; but they cure cure rheumatic pains by rubbing. 'Tis probable, that the extreme heat of the day, and the great coolneſs of the night, in the ſouthern climes, may have taught theſe people the good effects of rubbing. "However ridiculous, ſays Coreal, the American "manner of curing diſeaſes may appear to us, we yet muſt ſuppoſe that they are "grounded on ſome juſt reaſons." The Braſilians preſcribe a long courſe of abſtinence to their patients, which they authorize by that true aphoriſm; the beſt way to cure diſtempers is to ſtarve them out. The Americans alſo ſweat their ſick. Our phyſicians, both antient and modern, have work'd all theſe different practices into a ſyſtem, which mere experience has eſtabliſh'd among ſeveral nations in different parts of the world. The Peruvians employ'd only ſimples in curing their ſick; but in defluxions and other external diſeaſes, they made uſe of natural or artificial fires, as was antiently the practice of the Egyptians, who not only made uſe of it to heal defluxions, but even diſeaſes of a ſtill more dangerous nature. The Moors alſo uſe fire in their diſeaſes, particularly to cure the head-ach.

Every one knows that perſons of the ſtrongeſt conſtitutions are liable to dangerous diſeaſes; that a ſingle atom may be the cauſe of incurable evils, and that we are * all naturally ſuſceptible of numberleſs infirmities. We need but caſt an eye on the anatomical deſcription of a human body, to be ſenſible that the vigour of man, his capacity, knowledge and underſtanding, hold, as it were, but by a thread; and that the mechaniſm of the ſeveral ſprings by which he moves, are vaſtly more wonderful than thoſe of the moſt † perfect watch. 'Tis this delicacy in his conſtruction, that has given occaſion to thoſe ſayings, viz. the tranſition from health to ſickneſs is imperceptible; life and death are contiguous; that we bring death into the world with us.

That ſome portion of him dies away inſenſibly.

To conſider man in this ſtate of miſery, there will be juſt room to wonder how it is poſſible for him to bear up for even but fifty years againſt a numberleſs multitude of cares and fatigues: he yet deſpiſes 'em; lays himſelf open to them; and bravely ſtruggles with the evils which ſurround him, and ſpins out his life beyond the narrow bounds which are ſet to it. 'Tis not to phyſic that he owes his ſtrength, but to a ſeries of unperplexing cares; to that uniform courſe of life, and that tranquility and eaſe which we are but too apt to deprive our ſelves of, in ſpight of thoſe ideas which nature inſpires, and ſo plainly points out to the Americans; and in a word, to that diſregard of wealth which is ſeldom found but among ſavages. Travellers inform us, that they prolong life to an ‖ hundred and upwards, by theſe methods.  Leſcarbot, after having related that the ſavages of North-America generally live to an hundred and forty, or an hundred and ſixty years of age, adds, that the ſavages of New-France have all their teeth in the moſt moſt advanc'd age: whereas we have generally loſt ours by that time we are fifty; nor do we ſeldom ſee above ſixty winters. Neither the courts of princes, nor great cities, can furniſh us with many inſtances of perſons that live to fourſcore; but we meet with many of that age in the country, in the woods and mountains, where cares, paſſions, and deſtructive pleaſures do not ſo eaſily invade. In the north parts of Europe, the mountains of Switzerland, and ſome provinces of France, we meet with perſons who live to a very advanced age; however the oldeſt among theſe are young, in compariſon of the vigorous old age and long life (if travellers may be credited) which the Americans attain to.

The Medico-prieſts among the ſavages often employ ſpells and enchantments to cure their ſick. We have a ſett of wretches among us, who impoſe upon the credulity of the vulgar, much after the ſame manner as theſe American impoſtors. The * Enſalmiſts, or rather Anſelmeſts, pretend to cure wounds by muttering over a few words: the Saluеurs, or Saluters, make the Spaniards believe they have the ſame power, by uttering St. Catherine's name; others in Italy heal the bite of a ſerpent by the virtue of St. Paul's name, and others by that of St. Huber. 'Twere needleſs to run over the numberleſs ſuperſtitious practices, which have been employ'd in healing diſeaſes; ſome of them are laid aſide, others ſtill ſubſiſt, and are in great credit with the vulgar; and no ſooner will theſe ridiculous cuſtoms be deſtroy'd, but new ones will immediately ſucceed. The antients alſo gave into theſe follies, and we now laugh at them; but the Americans might as juſtly reproach us with others of the ſame ſtamp. The † ſavages ſometimes diſplay their patience and reſolution with great oſtentation. They lay lighted coals on their arms ‡, and make inciſions in the fleſh, &c. To wave many inſtances of this nature, the hiſtory of the diſcovery of America furniſhes an ‖ eternal monument of the bravery and courage which theſe idolatrous people diſcover'd, in the midſt of the cruel torments the zeal of the Spaniards made them ſuffer, in order to bring them over to the chriſtian religion. The penances, the auſterities and diſcipline of Mexico, Peru, Virginia, &c. are found in the antient and modern forms of worſhip. But what is moſt remarkable, is, the diſcipline of theſe young ſavages; but the probation of the capuchins is not leſs ſo; and if we look among the Mahometans, we ſhall meet with crouds of devotees among them, who ſuffer for the glory of God and Mahomet. The antient Lacedæmonians us'd to try the patience of their children before the altar of Diana; their boys of 15 or 16 years of age us'd to whip themſelves, ſtark naked, in preſence of the chaſteſt of all the Goddeſſes, till the blood followed the ſtroke. The antient Perſians us'd to make all who were candidates for a ſeat in the college of the Magi, undergo a very long and ſevere probation; one of the leaſt was that of fire and water.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Civility of the Americans, their Virtues and Vices.

THE American Savages have not that ſhowy politeneſs, which cuſtom obliges the modeſt Europeans to obſerve towards one another; they are ignorant of that exchange of complements, and that agreeable, but tranſient affability, which are the two ſources from whence flow all the miſtaken judgments we are apt to make with regard to the character of thoſe we converſe with.

They are ignorant of every thing we call decorum, and lay the leaſt reſtraint imaginable on the impulſes of nature; they neither have that reſervedneſs, that neatneſs, nor that diſcretion which the arts of politeneſs inſpire us with; and have but a very imperfect knowledge of the reſpect which is to be obſerv'd among equals, or between maſter and ſervant. Theſe ſeveral qualities cannot be very ſuitable to a way of life, in which ſocieties are form'd rather from neceſſity than pleaſure. To which we may add, that theſe are never acquir'd but in the commerce of the world; by frequenting perſons to whom we owe a certain deference, either on account of their age, their rank, or their being foreigners, or ſtrangers. The American Savages, who look no further than the providing themſelves with the neceſſities of life, which nature never carries to the leaſt exceſs, have no notion of thoſe regards which give riſe to dependance among us. In a word, if we except the ſubmiſſion they pay to their reſpective Chiefs; the reſpect they pay their elders; and that of children for their parents; we may affirm, they deſpiſe all thoſe principles on which politeneſs is founded.

Savages may be juſtly compar'd to children; the natural ideas of both are not ſatisfied but with ſuch things as authorize their independance; and they freely give up every thing that puts 'em to the leaſt reſtraint. From thence we may draw theſe maxims, that the more independant a people live, the leſs they are apt to give into politeneſs; that pride and ruſticity are generally the conſequences of a republican government; and, on the contrary, that the ſubordination which is eſtabliſh'd in monarchical governments, heightens and improves politeneſs. Such as are acquainted with the manners of our modern republicans, and are well read in the hiſtories of the commonwealths of antiquity, will not look upon theſe maxims as paradoxes.

We don't pretend to comprehend the Mexicans and Peruvians under the general character we have here given of the reſt of the Americans. The hiſtory of thoſe two nations furniſhes us with many ſhining inſtances of their politeneſs; which, tho' it be different from ours, is yet not leſs valuable upon that account, ſince 'tis founded on the ſame rules on which our ſo much boaſted good breeding is eſtabliſhed. The Mexicans uſed to ſoften the ruſticity which is ſo natural to children, by education; they faſhion'd their inclinations, * taught them modeſty and civility, and even the very gait they ſhould have in walking; they uſed to correct the errors and lapſes of youth, and check the progreſs of the infant paſſions. Nor were the Peruvians leſs careful in forming the minds of their youth. Both thoſe nations maintain'd a ſubordination which is very eaſily borne with, when founded on a birth which providence has allotted us, or a rank which it aſſigns us, when it is no way influenced by tyranny. Without this ſubordination, men have no real regards for each other, and that becauſe they all naturally aim at a proud and inſolent equality. This is manifeſt in ſome countries, where the moſt worthleſs and inſignificant fellow ſhall cenſure the conduct of of * kings, and haughtily compare himſelf to the moſt illuſtrious perſonages of his country; and the only title he has to do all this, is his vaſt and ample poſſeſſions, which ſuſpend the judgment of his fellow-citizens; but were he once ſtript of them, he would appear as rude and unpoliſh'd in their eyes as the moſt ſavage American.

† The Savages of New-France don't obſerve any of thoſe preludes which are practiſed among us at our viſits. As for theſe, they go at once where they are to viſit; ſit down the moment they are got in; begin to ſmoak, and give the pipe from one to another, till it has gone round. The Germans and Flemmings make the glaſs circulate in the ſame manner as the Americans do the pipe. They all drink round out of the ſame glaſs, and he who gives the treat, drinks firſt; however their people of faſhion begin to lay aſide this cuſtom. The Floridians at their firſt coming into aſſemblies mutually ſalute one another, obſerving firſt to pay their compliments to the principal man, and the moſt aged perſons in it. We obſerve the ſame order in our ſalutations.

We ſalute perſons who ſneeze, and often compliment them with ſome propitious wiſh at the ſame time. The antient Pagans had alſo this cuſtom; and Incas ‡ Garcilaſſo de la Vega relates, that the ſame was obſerv'd in Florida.

The Savages have the ſame principles of virtue and vice as we. This is an inconteſtible propoſition. No one doubts but that an American infant, and that of an European, when juſt born, are directly upon the ſame level, and that God deſign'd 'em equally for reaſonable beings; but ſtill we cannot forbear to make a wide difference between them and us. Nay, we have almoſt gone ſo far as to conſider 'em of another ſpecies. Let us endeavour to root out a prejudice, which at the diſcovery of America, occaſion'd the death of many millions of its inhabitants; and which but too much authoriſes us at this day, to violate the laws of humanity, with regard to their poſterity. We meet with illuſtrious inſtances of valour and bravery in the hiſtory of the diſcovery of this part of the world: North-America exhibits an intrepidity and courage, which are not the ſmalleſt branches of heroic virtue; in a word, all theſe people have the utmoſt dread of reproach, and that infamy which attends on baſe actions. "They are, ſays Leſcarbot, prompted to laudable "actions from a principle of honour, becauſe he who performs any gallant action, is always "honour'd, and is ſure to gain reputation." But then on the other ſide, it muſt be own'd, that they are ſubject to a vice which is the very reverſe of magnanimity, I mean revenge; this all the Americans in general are but too fond of, and of that kind of it which degenerates into brutality: but ſtill there is a kind of generoſity in it; for they exerciſe it only againſt man, and that becauſe he has ſtrength to oppoſe it; but ‖ then it never breaks out againſt their women and children, who are made ſlaves for life; which alſo was the practice of the antients.

The Peruvians cauſed the firſt principle which nature dictates to man, viz. that of doing as we would be done by, to be ſtrictly obſerved in all parts of their empire. We have already given inſtances of this natural equity, which is engrav'd, as it were, on the hearts of all men. The Americans obſerve the moſt inviolable fidelity to one another, and ſtrengthen the bands of their ſocieties with ſuch a noble and diſintereſted ſpirit, as is not often met with in other parts of the world. Stratagems, over-reachings, and perjury, all which are the effect of the natural pride of man, are reſerv'd only for their enemies; for we have a natural propenſity to exclude from their natural rights, all ſuch as are not of of the ſame ſociety with ourſelves: but this propenſity, which is found more eſpecially in war-time, does not reign with equal violence in all. Be that as it will, 'tis probable that from this diſpoſition of mind, may ariſe our contempt of foreigners and their cuſtoms; and thoſe injurious forms of ſpeech which the French themſelves have not yet laid aſide: ſuch as theſe, he's a German; he takes me for a German; he's as heavy as a Swiſs. We muſt indeed own that theſe expreſſions hit the characters of theſe nations very exactly; but then might not a German as juſtly retort, in caſe he were to give the idea of a man of a fickle and wavering temper, by ſaying, that he's a Frenchman?

The Americans abhor covetouſneſs. Inſenſible to all thoſe pleaſures and uneaſineſſes which ariſe from wealth that has been amaſſing many years, their only care is to procure ſuch proviſions as may ſuffice for the ſupport of life; but all beyond this they look on as ſuperfluous. 'Tis obſerv'd, that in their barterings with the Europeans, they generally purchaſe ſuch things as are uſeful; and if travellers may be credited, they eſteem 'em much more than we do. One, among the reſt, obſerves on this occaſion, that they value things only in proportion to the uſe they think they will be to them; whereas among us, the value of things depends often on fancy and caprice, and a miſtaken eclat that only ſooths our vanity. However 'tis certain, they are as vain and proud as the Europeans; but then it breaks out in a quite different manner, and their ideas are leſs deprav'd.

They love to beſtow gifts, and ſeldom viſit one another without making and receiving preſents. But for their temperance and ſobriety, they cannot be applauded on that account. We have already obſerv'd how ſubject they are to drink to exceſs, nor are they leſs moderate on the article of eating. Theſe are the particulars we thought worthy of notice, with regard to the virtues and vices of the Savages. To have ſaid more, would be needleſs, and have even made the truth of what we ſhould advance on that head, very much ſuſpected. We affirm, that they follow nature more cloſely than we; but then they are born with the ſame paſſions; and theſe will, perhaps, diſplay themſelves one time or other. Let them be once ſurrounded with all thoſe dangerous objects which deprave our judgments; when if they continue proof againſt temptation, we then may juſtly ſay, that nature has been kinder to them than ſhe has been to us.

CHAP. XIV.

Of the American Husbandry.

WE have but few obſervations to make on this head. Theſe people don't till their ground as we do. † "They turn it up with wooden hooks, (or rather ſharp-"pointed pieces of wood) grub up all the weeds that come in their way, and burn them "as they lie on the ground. They employ the aſhes of theſe weeds to fatten the ſoil, "which cuſtom is alſo practiſed in ſeveral parts of Italy. They alſo manure the ſoil with "fiſh-ſhells; which being done, they make little clods of earth, and ſet them about "two foot diſtance from one another, and in the month of May they ſow their corn here-"in, in the ſame manner as we do our beans, ſetting up little ſticks, and putting four "corns, at ſome diſtance from one another, in the hole, and ſet beans between every bed "of corn. Harveſt being over, they hoard their corn in pits, which they dig on the ſide "of ſome hill, in order that the water may run from them, and line theſe pits with "matting. This they do, becauſe their houſes have no apartments above ground, nor "cheſts to put it in; the corn thus hoarded, cannot be either ſpoil'd, or devour'd by rats "or mice.

" Several nations of our hemiſphere, continues the ſame Author, have kept their corn in " pits: which Suidas takes notice of; and Procopius tells us, in the ſecond book of the " Gothic war, that when the Goths were beſieging Rome, they often fell into pits, in " which the inhabitants uſed to hoard their corn. Tacitus alſo mentions this cuſtom " among the Germans; and, without going any further, corn is hoarded in the ſame " manner in ſeveral parts of France at this day." At ſowing-time, their old men aſſemble the people, in order to plough or dig up the ground, and at the ſame time prepare for mirth and feaſting, as was formerly practiſed, and is ſtill the cuſtom of all nations.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Wars of the Americans.

THE Americans never war with one another, either from a principle of covetouſneſs or ambition, but from a kind of punctilio which will not ſuffer either party to yield, and generally for injuries received, which are tranſmitted from father to ſon like an inheritance. This warlike temper may perhaps be as antient as the firſt ſettlement of the Aſiaticks in America. Here follows what we think may be advanced on this head, Man is born a free agent, and with an averſion to reſtraint; but at the ſame time he loves to triumph over his fellow-creatures: he cannot bear a competitor, and yet loves to meet with emulation; he has no ſooner found one, but not ſatisfied with diſputing for precedency, he is reſolv'd to conquer; and when once he has conquer'd, he does all in his power to humble his rival. And where are theſe rivals to be met with! Heaven is out of his reach; the beaſts are not capable of diſputing with him on the ſubject of honour: Man is therefore obliged to ranſack his own ſpecies for ſubjects capable of exciting his emulation. This is the ſource of the continual wars which reign among the Americans. If we carefully examine the diſputes, the punctilios of honour, the petty-wars, and hatreds of children, we ſhall find 'em owing to the ſame principle. Their quarrels ariſe from emulation, they deſpiſe, humble, and mortify the vanquiſh'd. This latter recovers himſelf, ſhakes off the yoke, and revenges his cauſe. The * quarrel becomes a ſerious affair, when emulation is ſucceeded by hatred. 'Tis alſo to this jealous emulation, the natural effect of the pride of man, that we are to aſcribe the love the antient Greeks had for war. They were ſo much prejudiced in its favour, that they look'd upon this propenſion as the greateſt of all the virtues; and the better to diſcover the veneration they had for it, they borrow'd from the name of the god of war the † word that ſignifies the excellence of goodneſs. They were always arm'd, even in their entertainments, their recreations, and on thoſe ſolemn feſtivals which were inſtituted in honour of their gods; and never loſt ſight of that delightful emulation, which was the peculiar characteriſtic of the antient heroes of Greece. The Americans, in whom that heroic virtue which we are pleaſed to venerate in the Greeks, and even in the Romans, is is leſs conſpicuous, are always arm'd. The ſame genius has been alſo obſerv'd in the warlike nations of Aſia, and in the antient people of the north. In a word, would one not be apt to imagine that the Spaniards were deſirous of preſerving the ſhadow of a cuſtom, which their progenitors the Cantabers and Iberians were as fond of as the warlike nations of antiquity. 'Tis well known how zealouſly the modern Spaniards wear their ſwords by their ſides, and that the meaneſt artificer of that country makes it the characteriſtick of his nobility.

* All this ſhews the great neceſſity of forming the mind by education. Mr. de Crouſaz has expatiated finely on this ſubject in his treatiſe on that ſubject, vol. 1. p. 9. his words are theſe: Education is of the utmoſt importance to children; every thing is of the higheſt concern in an age, which all are negligent of cultivating. The habits of men give the deciſive ſtroke to their probity and imperfections, their happineſs and miſery; every one has his own, and each man knows which are the moſt predominant. Theſe habits take root in our tender years, they grow up and get ſtrength even to old age, and we ſeldom are able to eradicate them entirely. If it were poſſible for us to call up in our minds all the circumſtances that had paſs'd in the dawn of our lives, we there ſhould find the true cauſes of all thoſe ſecret inclinations which govern the man; of thoſe averſions which give riſe to all our prejudices; of thoſe whims and caprices which we wonder at ourſelves for being ſo implicitly ſubject to; of that inequality of temper that degrades us; and of thoſe taſtes which we cannot poſſibly juſtify. Every thing is new to children; every thing raiſes their attention and admiration: a mere nothing ſhall delight, or frighten them; every object makes the deepeſt impreſſion on their tender brain.

The Americans in general are always prompted to war from motives founded on the law of nature, viz. the making of repriſals. If their countrymen, their friends, their relations, been cut to pieces, they muſt be revenged. The old men are their orators; theſe ſpirit 'em up to war, give the ſignal for marching, and never fail, as they march along, to inſpire the warriors with a thirſt of revenge. 'Tis well known that the Greeks had the ſame cuſtom, and that verſes conſiſting of exhortations to fight manfully, and deſpiſe death, were ſung as the prelude to the battle. Muſic was of ſuch a nature as to cauſe the ſame effects as poetry.

We * are told that the ſpeeches of the Braſilians laſt ſometimes ſix hours. Some nations of New-France have a whimſical way of trying the fate of war: they make their † women attack 'em, and fight reſolutely againſt them, as if the battle were againſt ſo many men; if the females are victorious, 'tis a good omen; but if the men come off conquerors, 'tis a mark of their ill-ſucceſs. The North-Americans denounce war by ſending back the Calumet, and thoſe of the South, by not accepting the dancers they ſend 'em. We ſhall take notice of all the ceremonies of the Calumet in another place. Thoſe who take back the rejected Calumet, withdraw as ſoon as the warlike dance is ended, and go off unmoleſted by the enemy, who never offer to violate the law of nations. May not theſe ceremonies be juſtly compar'd to ours, of proclaiming war by heralds, and by ſound of the trumpet? &c.

The engagement is firſt begun with ſhouts, the ſame as among the moſt civiliz'd nations. We are told, that the antient Lacedæmonians did juſt the contrary, and began the battle with the utmoſt coolneſs, and with a profound ſilence. The Braſilians play on a kind of flute made of the leg-bones of their priſoners. The ſight of theſe bones, and the ſound of this fatal inſtrument, ſerve equally to raiſe the courage of theſe people, of whoſe inexpreſſible obſtinacy we have ſeveral inſtances among chriſtian nations. The ſavage warriors are never allow'd to take quarter, and they are under ſtill greater obligations to die with their weapons in their hands, and after having cut to pieces great numbers of their enemies. Their courage is not a tranſient fury, that yields to a ſlight oppoſition; nor is it a fire that blazes one moment, and the next is extinguiſh'd; all which is the reſult of a violent hurry of the ſpirits, which afterwards ſinking too ſuddenly, leaves the ſoul a prey to reflections, that ſet death before it in its moſt dreadful ſhapes. They are invincible, unleſs come upon by ſurprize, and never yield, unleſs they are ſo wounded, as to be depriv'd of the power of periſhing manfully in their own defence. They fight with equal intrepidity to prevent their dead from falling into the hands of their enemies. The antient Greeks, who were almoſt as fierce and ſavage as the wild Americans, left their enemies a prey to beaſts, after having maim'd them; but to prevent theſe inſults, they uſed to fight for the ſlain, when they had no other way to reſcue them; and if there were any princes or generals among theſe, they uſed to redeem their dead bodies with money. A cartel was often drawn up between both parties for the burying of the ſlain, which cuſtom has been obſerv'd in all ages by civiliz'd nations. We are told that the Savages of North-America kill all ſuch as are able to make any ‡ reſiſtance; whereas thoſe of the South carry their priſoners along with them in order to ‖ fatten, and afterwards eat 'em, which is perhaps a kind of ſacrifice, or at leaſt a religious ceremony. Several nations of antiquity ſacrificed their enemies enemies to their gods; which cuſtom was alſo obſerv'd by the Mexicans, the Peruvians, and Floridians, as travellers aſſure us. We meet with ſome inſtances of this religious havock in the ſcriptures: ſuffer us to give this name to the methods which the Jews took to extirpate the Canaanites, and other unbelievers. God was pleaſed to have it ſo for his glory; and as the Canaanites acted in the ſame manner in honour of their idols, he commanded the Jews to make uſe of theſe repriſals. We ſhall not take notice of the other reaſons which Divines give to juſtify this proceedure.

The Braſilians make him their Leader or Cacique who has kill'd the greateſt number of enemies. If * Leſcarbot may be credited, who ought to have been very well acquainted with a country in which he had liv'd for ſo many years, the heads or commanders of Savages of Canada, arrive at this honour by an hereditary ſucceſſion of valour; that is, the ſon is choſen to fill up his father's employment, in caſe he be as brave; but if he degenerates, they chuſe another. Some faint traces of this antient cuſtom is preſerv'd to this day among ſome nations of the old world. As for the Savages, 'tis very probable their governments may be founded on the following natural maxims: viz. "That the Chief ought to owe "his dignity to thoſe only who have conſented to be his ſubjects; that nothing but his "abilities and courage can qualify him for that office; that the moment his capacity be-"gins to fail, he muſt ſubmit himſelf to another Chief." Theſe maxims are admirable in a ſtate that is wholly founded on perpetual wars; in this caſe, the neceſſity they are under of defending themſelves, determines them intirely to make choice of a judicious and brave man; but this method might be of dangerous conſequence in the European ſtates, where the boundleſs views of the moſt artful politicks, and the innumerable ſprings of faction and cabal, would ſoon throw thoſe nations into a ſtate of diſcord and miſery, and perhaps into an anarchy, that is much more to be dreaded than the government of a prince, who wants the qualities requiſite in a monarch. Among us, war gives riſe to a body abſtracted from politicks, which is the reaſon why its employments are elective: but in the firſt ages of the world, men made no difference between the general and the king; ſo that power neceſſarily devolv'd on the moſt valiant. This power was unlimited in caſe of war, but had bounds preſcribed to it in their councils and domeſtick affairs. A judicious author has finely obſerv'd, that † Agamemnon was oppoſed at the council-board, but that when he led the Greeks into the field, he commanded in an abſolute manner. The Britons, before the Romans had made a deſcent into their iſland, choſe commanders to lead 'em into the field; reſerv'd the political government of the ſtate to the aſſemblies of the people; and uſed to go arm'd to theſe aſſemblies, which might probably have a great affinity to thoſe of the Canadans and Iroquois, both in the manner of going to, and holding them. Some people of Germany had antiently the ſame cuſtom; however they at the ſame time elected a prince or king, who was no more than general of the army, (Dux;) and in order to prevent him from doing any thing at home that might be prejudicial to the ſtate and the publick ſafety, the chief among the people uſed to inſpect all his actions with a watchful eye, and preſided in all their publick aſſemblies, in the ſame manner as the old men among the ſavage Americans. The Floridians, tho' they are govern'd by Chiefs who are inveſted with a more abſolute authority, have almoſt the ſame cuſtom among them; ſince, as travellers tell us, thoſe Chiefs are always the greateſt warriors of their nation.

The Arms of the Americans are a bow, arrows, and a club; for by this name we may call the Tacape of the Braſilians, and the Iroquois and Canadan bludgeons. Theſe weapons are almoſt as old as the world, and were the only ones uſed in the firſt ages of the world. All theſe nations go ‡ naked into the field, but they carry a large ‖ ſhield along with them, that covers the whole body after the manner of the antient Gauls; among whom, "ſuch of them as could not ford the rivers, got upon their ſhields, which ſerv'd 'em inſtead "of

" of boats. Each of them has, beſides theſe ſhields, his wooden club, his quiver at his " back, and his bow in his hand, and walks with a kind of dancing ſtep ;" and inſtead of enſigns and ſtandards, they carry aloft * the hair of ſuch enemies as they have knock'd down in their wars. La Potterie, in his hiſtory of North-America, tells us, " that " they generally carry their curtezans along with 'em into the field, to amuſe their " young men, and to baniſh from their minds the remembrance of their having left their " country." Tho' our idea of the merit of the heroes of antient Greece be ever ſo great, we yet ſhall take the liberty to compare 'em to the warriors of Miſſiſippi and Canada. They always carried their concubines and miſtreſſes along with 'em into the field, in the ſame manner as the Iroquois and Hurons ; and theſe concubines were generally priſoners of war.

The ambuſcades and skirmiſhes of theſe Savages has a great affinity with the Tartar way of fighting. Of this ſome notice has already been taken at the beginning of this diſſertation. The Parthians and Maſſagetes, &c. uſed to fight antiently after this manner. As ſoon as the battle is ended, the combatants return home with great haſte and precipitation, and cut off the hair of the ſlain ; but they don't do this to their priſoners, till after having firſt made 'em ſuffer the moſt inexpreſſible torments, which always concludes with an action of the moſt horrid cruelty, call'd by them, the † drinking the broth of their enemies. And indeed, they drink the blood of their enemies ‡, and give it their children to drink. The taking off of the hair, is to take off the skin of the head with the hair along with it, call'd in Engliſh, ſcalping ; theſe they preſerve as ſo many monuments of their bravery, and he who brings off a great number of ſcalps, is look'd upon as a compleat warrior. Were we to take the Scripture in a literal ſenſe, we ſhould find that the Jews were as proud of carrying off the fore-skin of a Philiſtine, as an Iroquois in carrying off the ſcalp of a Canadan: be this as it will, the antients did not content themſelves with killing their enemies, for they afterwards cut off their heads ; return'd to the camp with this trophy of their victory ; ſometimes carried thoſe heads hanging at the breaſt-leathers of their horſes, and afterwards hung 'em in a ſolemn manner on the gates or walls of their temples. They often embalm'd them, and preſerv'd them very carefully, to ſhow theſe teſtimonies of their valour to their friends. The Boiens uſed to take the ſkulls of their enemies, after having clear'd 'em of the brains, and adorn 'em with gold or ſilver, in order to make drinking-bowls of them. All theſe cuſtoms ariſe from the ſame principle, viz. that of eternizing their valour, or rather 'tis that ferocity and ſavageneſs to which the Greeks and Romans have given the name of virtue.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Love of one's Country.

THE love which a virtuous man has for his country, is not always the reſult of reaſon or duty: we are not to imagine, that every time we think on our native country, all our regards are employ'd on the happineſs of the government; the advantage of our ſovereign, and the preſervation of our countrymen. This affection, which

* This bears ſome affinity to the cuſtom of the Turks, who have a horſe's tail for their ſtandard.

‡ We ſee the great averſion the Romans had to this cuſtom, by what Saluſt obſerves of Catiline; his words are theſe : Some ſaid at that time, that Catiline, in order to prevent the conſpirators from betraying one another, and to unite 'em the more firmly together, by making them aſſociate together in a moſt horrid action, preſented to each of them a cup fill'd with wine mix'd with human-blood; and that after having taken an oath, they all drank a little of it; and that he then open'd his deſign to 'em. As for my part, ſays that author, I don't know what to ſay of it; and tho' this circumſtance is ſo very flagrant, I yet cannot give any good account of it.

which was ſo much eſteem'd by the antients, as to be rewarded with ſtatues, is very often no other than *a * phyſical or natural charm, which, as it were, binds us down, and fixes us to that ſpot of ground on which we firſt ſet our foot.* 'Tisthe effect of education, of cuſtom, and complexion; a conſequence of that prepoſſeſſion which our bodies receive from tranſplantation, which like plants, cannot ſuit themſelves to every climate, and even often grow weaker, and loſe their good qualities in a foreign ſoil. 'Tis certain that many people are troubled with what the French call la maladie du pais, or the diſeaſe of one's country, which is a hankering a man has always to it; but the worſt circumſtance is, that this diſeaſe is generally attended with an indiſpoſition of mind, which the fineſt arguments cannot cure, and which triumphs over all the preſcriptions of the ableſt phyſicians.

We find in the moſt ſavage people certain characteriſticks, that form a rational love for one's country, and by which this hankering after their country is diſcover'd. The antients furniſh us with excellent inſtances of the former; nor is modern hiſtory leſs fruitful of examples equally remarkable: and if we caſt our eye on the Spaniſh conqueſts in Mexico and Peru, we ſhall there ſee people ſacrificing their lives and fortunes for the love of their country, and fighting with all the intrepidity with which a ſoldier can poſſibly be inſpir'd, who is brave but undiſciplin'd, and who abhors the hateful tyranny of thoſe cruel conquerors. Why therefore ſhould we not be as juſt to the Americans as we are to the Greeks, the Romans, the French, the Swiſs and the Dutch, and to all thoſe whoſe fame has been immortaliz'd by our hiſtorians, for the glorious ſtruggle they made for liberty and their country's ſake. The Americans were inform'd with the ſame ſpirit of bravery as the Europeans; born as free as our ſelves, they were not under any obligations to deliver up their liberty and properties into our hands. Could it be poſſible for us to be ſo unjuſt as to aſcribe to a ſavage brutality, the glorious actions which the Americans perform'd for the good of their country? Don Antonio de Solis, author of the hiſtory of the conqueſt of Mexico, owns that the Mexicans made the braveſt ſtruggles, and diſcover'd the utmoſt efforts of bravery and patience in the glorious defence they made for their country. Add to this the heroick ſpeech which the emperor Guatimozin made to Cortez after the loſs of his empire, which has all the ſpirit, the greatneſs of ſoul we ſo much admire in our own heroes. The Peruvians did not ſubmit to the Spaniſh yoke, till after having fought with the utmoſt reſolution, and made the ſtouteſt reſiſtance, notwithſtanding the civil wars which at that time rag'd in the bowels of their country. The Chilians have for theſe two hundred years maintain'd continual wars for the ſake of their liberty, and the Floridians are not yet ſubdued. There is no doubt but we ſhall meet ſome genuine characteriſticks of one's country's love, even among the moſt ſavage Americans. The brutality of the natives of Braſil, Paraguay, New-Mexico, the river of Amazons, &c. conceals as ſolid principles under it, as thoſe by which we are actuated.

As to that other love for one's country, which rather deſerves the name of ſickneſs or infirmity, men of ſenſe will never pretend to conſider it as a virtue. 'Tis on the contrary a very dangerous indiſpoſition, which makes us cenſure unjuſtly the moſt valuable things, prompts us to deſpiſe the moſt laudable qualities in foreigners, and is apt to raiſe the moſt unjuſt prejudice in us againſt their ſenſe and underſtanding. A man who is infected with this diſeaſe, is no longer a reaſonable creature. He is diſguſted and diſſatisfy'd with every thing: the trees, the plants, the fruits of all other regions are every way inferiour to thoſe of his native country. He tells us that a foreign ſoil depraves and corrupts nature; that they deprave themſelves: that the elements do there contract quite different qualities, and ſuch as are always noxious; that the air is infected with the moſt pernicious influences; the manners are odd and whimſical, and the cuſtoms extravagant and ridiculous. They will ſcarce allow a foreigner the privilege

lege of being a reaſonable creature. Every thing that is not of their native growth is clowniſh, barbarous and frightful. Whole nations, not excepting the moſt learned, cannot forbear giving into this abuſe. The Greeks and Romans gave the epithet of barbarous to all but themſelves. The Chineze boaſt themſelves to be the only knowing people in the world. When the Spaniards firſt began their conqueſts in America, the Mexicans were prodigiouſly aſtoniſh'd at the induſtry and valour of thoſe new-comers, and imagined that politeneſs and knowledge were confin'd to Mexico only. * The Engliſh haughtily boaſt of their own merit, to the prejudice of that of foreigners; and contemn the manners and cuſtoms of other nations, and even take a pleaſure in aſſuming an air of ſtrangers among their very neighbours. The French themſelves are pretty near of the ſame character, and 'tis well known that they are as blindly fond of their own peculiar cuſtoms as the people above-mention'd. All nations prefer their own country to any other in the world; and how barren and unfruitful ſoever it may be, 'tis yet inexpreſſibly beautiful in their eyes. Many a man is delighted with the croaking of frogs in his native fens, whoſe ears, were he at ſome diſtance from his country, wou'd be grated with the muſick of the nightingale. Another enjoys the utmoſt ſatisfaction tho' ſurrounded with wolves and bears, the tenants of his mountains, and is more delighted with the clowniſhneſs of his † Canton, than with the ingenious politeneſs of the French. One wou'd imagine, that ſuch people are ſomething a-kin to thoſe wild plants, which will not thrive out of their muddy bogs, or mountains. After all, if the ‡ ſavages of Groenland, notwithſtanding the kind treatment and civility they met with at the king of Denmark's court, cou'd not yet forbear regretting the poverty of their native country; or keep them, tho' at the hazard of their lives, from attempting to re-viſit the frozen || regions: we are not to wonder that people who travel and poliſh themſelves by dealings and converſation with foreigners, ſhould yet preſer their barren fields to thoſe of their neighbours, tho' ever ſo ſmiling and fruitful; that they ſhould chuſe to inhabit among rocks, and under everlaſting ſnows, rather than in the neighbourhood of vines and orange-trees; in a word, that they ſhould fondly applaud themſelves at home for the heavineſs of their complexions, and ſo coolly preſer it to that ſprightlineſs of genius ſo much eſteem'd by other nations. We naturally love to form

* Mr. Muralt, the author of the letters upon the Engliſh and French nations, is pleaſed to make ſome apology for the former: his words are as follow. "Their pride (or if I dare make uſe of the uſual term) "their inſolence is neither ſo extravagant nor ſo general as people are apt to imagine.——I have not ob- "ſerv'd any inſolence among them towards foreigners, at leaſt in the common affairs of life: ſo that I "cannot ſee any reaſon for diſtinguiſhing them from other nations upon that account: and generally ſpeak- "ing, their behaviour is far from being either ſo harſh or diſagreeable as moſt people imagine."

† The above-mention'd Mr. Muralt is of opinion, that the Swiſs have greatly corrupted themſelves by frequenting the French: his words are as follow. "If by the unpoliteneſs and ruſticity the Swiſs are "reproach'd with by the French, is meant their manner of doing and ſaying all things naturally, and "anſwerable to their own proper and eſſential character; if they term ſimplicity the incapacity of coun- "terfeiting or diſguiſing; of attempting to deceive or impoſe on others by borrowed qualities, it is a "freſh eulogy given them.——The clowniſh, unpoliſh'd commonwealth of our anceſtors, gives "the idea of a fabrick rais'd out of unwrought fragments of a rock, that hath both majeſty and ſolidity. "That of this day, tho' our nation ſtrives to embeliſh it with the utmoſt ſplendor and politeneſs, repre- "ſents nothing but paint and varniſh to the imagination; and I am perſuaded, that the cuſtoms, man- "ners and characters of our anceſtors, had more real decency and decorum in them, than the manners and "characters we now affect."

‡ Collection of voyages to the north, vol. I. "'Tis obſerv'd that the Swiſs, whom we look upon as the "heavieſt people in Europe, tho' they nevertheleſs have ſeveral fine genius's among 'em of all profeſ- "ſions, do yet diſcover a weakneſs in this reſpect.——The greateſt part of ſuch of them as quit their wild "and barren cantons, to travel into France or elſewhere, are troubled with a diſeaſe which they call "Heimvei.——The ſole deſire of returning to their country makes 'em ſo weak and conſumptive, that they "endanger their lives, if they dont re-viſit their poor cottages and barren mountains." La Mothe le Vayer, vol. II. folio edit. 77 letter.

|| I have read ſomewhere, that two Hottentots, or inhabitants of the Cape of Good Hope, who are a very ſlovenly people, that garniſh themſelves with guts, being put on board a ſhip in order to be brought into England, were inconſolable at the thoughts of leaving their native country. One of them, I think, died in the paſſage; the other came into England, and was treated with the utmoſt civility and candor. They cloth'd him in an Engliſh dreſs, and gave him all the baubles to pleaſe him, that his countrymen are delighted with, but all to no purpoſe, for he was continually regretting his native woods and mountains. After he had learnt a little Engliſh, he us'd to roll himſelf along the ground, and cry out, Coree (for that was his name) home go, home go. When they found that he pin'd, they ſent him back again to his own country. He had no ſooner ſet his foot aſhore, but he run ſwiftly, in the greateſt tranſports imaginable, to his countrymen, and in a little time recover'd his former vigour of body and conſtitution.

form to ourſelves the moſt advantageous ideas of our birth, our character, and our condition; we do our utmoſt to make foreigners ſenſible of our pretended advantages, and endeavour to aſſume a ſuperiority over them, as far as the laws of decorum will permit. Such perſons as have never ſeen any other country but their own, have generally this weakneſs. A young Frenchman that has not yet ſeen the world, will tell us that France is the moſt potent empire in the world; he fondly imagines that every knee muſt ſubmiſſively bow to his monarch; whenever he ſpeaks of the advantages of his country, 'tis in the moſt pompous and emphatical terms: and ten to one but he calls upon the * Topinamboux and Margajats as witneſſes to the truth of what he advances.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Traffick of the Americans, their Law-ſuits, Slaves, &c.

THE Americans, and particularly the ſavages, don't employ money in their commerce; it conſiſts wholly in barter, as was the cuſtom in the infancy of the world, when thoſe arts were not known, which avarice has ſince invented to enrich the trader. Antiently the Eaſt-Indians, and ſeveral other nations, knew no other way of trading than this. † Lycurgus himſelf enacted a law among the Spartans, which tended to make gold and ſilver much leſs neceſſary than in our days.

We don't find that the Americans have any notion of what we call pleading and the wrangling of the bar, and conſequently have no occaſion for lawyers, and ſuch like vile agents of the injuſtice of mankind. The Mexicans us'd to determine all civil affairs by the authority of a tribunal, from which there was no appeal. Every ſentence was conciſe, and deliver'd vivâ voce; both parties were preſent, and always brought their arguments and witneſſes along with them, ſo that the cauſe was immediately diſpatch'd. There was no other method of delaying a ſuit, but by appealing to the higheſt tribunal, and here the king preſided in perſon. Thrice happy country! where he who pleaded for his own againſt an uſurper, was not expos'd to loſe his ſuit, by the ſtudied quibbles of ſuch as pretended to defend his right. Nor was juſtice adminiſtred with leſs diſpatch in Peru than in Mexico. The Floridians have recourſe to umpirage, and the deciſion of their Caciques; from theſe there lies no appeal. We are alſo told, that the ‡ Turks are not plagued with the captious formalities of our laws; and that there are more lawyers in the city of Paris only, than in the whole extent of the Ottoman empire. In ‖ Perſia every one pleads his own cauſe, not excepting the very women, and they have neither ſcriveners, lawyers nor counſellors. 'Tis true indeed that their law-proceedings are pretty much embaraſs'd, but then they have the advantage of not being perplex'd with long-winded wranglers, who very often make no other uſe of the moſt juſt cauſe, than to fill their own pockets. Whence is it therefore that chriſtians, who profeſs a religion which is founded chiefly on juſtice and moderation, ſhould diſcover a greater ſpirit of †† wrangling than all the people above-mention'd? is it the reſult of their ſuperior underſtanding, which makes them more ingenious and ſubtle? But is not this caſt of mind owing rather to the mixture of laws and cuſtoms which were form'd in Europe, by that of a numberleſs multitude of barbarous nations, who invaded them from the North?

The Americans have no other ſlaves than their captives, in the ſame manner as the nations of antiquity. The latter us'd often to ſell them, and this was a very conſiderable branch of their traffick: the Americans never do this; but keep 'em in their ſervice, and upon occaſion give 'em their liberty, or adopt 'em into their families. Nevertheleſs theſe ſlaves are generally ſacrific'd to their revenge, and perhaps the miſerable havock they make of thoſe unhappy wretches, their priſoners, muſt be conſider'd as a kind of ſacrifice, as has been already obſerv'd. * We are told that the inhabitants of the iſland of Chio, were the firſt people among the antients, who travelled into foreign countries to purchaſe free people, not priſoners. To which the Greek hiſtorian adds, that theſe avaricious merchants drew down the anger of the gods upon themſelves, being cut to pieces by thoſe very ſlaves whom they had depriv'd of their liberty. Such of our people as carry on this traffick at this day, and go to Africa for Negroes, which they afterwards ſell in the Weſt-Indies, have juſt reaſon to dread the ſame fate.

Of their Burials, &c.

HOW odd and ridiculous ſoever the various methods of bewailing the dead, eſtabliſh'd in different parts of the world, may appear to us, 'tis certain nevertheleſs, that 'tis grounded on a juſt, a rational, and natural principle. No man can forbear beſtowing this laſt teſtimony of his affection on ſuch as have been united to him, either by the tyes of conſanguinity or friendſhip; but then the tranſports of this grief are the effect of complexion or inclination. The idea which men afterwards form'd to themſelves of the ſtate of mankind after death, whether from tradition or religion, may probably have occaſion'd the adding of ſeveral things to complexion and inclination; at leaſt might have made this juſt, this reaſonable grief, grow up into a national cuſtom. We believe that this is what chiefly gave riſe to all ſuch funeral rites as are known to us, not excepting the moſt ridiculous. We ſhall endeavour to make good theſe aſſertions, by inſtancing the genealogical proofs, as it were, of two cuſtoms obſerv'd in ſome funeral rites. We are aſſur'd, that 'tis a cuſtom among certain nations for people to cut off their hair in token of their ſorrow; to ask the deceas'd why they left the world; and to enquire of them in the moſt ſerious manner, whether they had not every thing they wanted in this life; whether care had not been taken of them; what was the ſubject of their grief, &c. Probably this cuſtom may have had its riſe from what follows: ſome perſon of diſtinction having loſt a perſon who was dear to him, gave himſelf up to tears and affliction; ſtripp'd himſelf of all his ornaments, and in the height of his affliction tore his hair, addreſs'd his plaints to the deceas'd, chang'd his wailings to invectives, was again mov'd with that affectionate tenderneſs which always breaks out in the firſt ſenſations of grief; addreſs'd the deceas'd in a variety of tones, and would almoſt force him to tell the reaſon of his death. No one will diſpute but that ſorrow is naturally violent, and is the reſult of a friendſhip equally ſo; but then 'tis of a very vivacious nature, and is not ſatisfy'd with dumb paſſions. We before took notice, that the above-mention'd was a perſon of ſome rank; this circumſtance alone was enough to raiſe him a multitude of imitators, ſubjects and ſervants, who copy'd his tears, cut off their hair out of friendſhip for him; and directed their moan to him, &c. We are not to forget, that as the perſon lamented, and his chief mourner, are both people of diſtinction, there might be celebrated for his ſake an annual ſolemnity, exactly reſembling the violent, the natural affliction before deſcrib'd. This

* Feithii antiq. Homeri, book 3.

This ceremony being imitated by others, grew inſenſibly into a cuſtom. If to this we add thoſe notions with which ſuperſtition generally heightens all * ceremonies relating to the dead, and thoſe which the moſt ignorant nations have imbib'd with regard to the immortality of the ſoul; we may by that means probably trace the original of ſeveral cuſtoms, that are altogether as whimſical as that of asking a dead perſon why he left the world.

† The ſavages of North-America bewail the dead, and keep their corps by them. The author juſt now quoted tells us, that they uſe a kind of balſam to keep the body from rotting: but a more ‡ modern writer alſo takes notice of a kind of red-lead which they ſpread over the face of their dead, which balſam is by them called the oil of animals. 'Twou'd be needleſs to take notice of the antiquity of embalming, and its uſe among the Egyptians, Jews, Peruvians, &c. Theſe Americans alſo bewail their dead for ſeveral days together, and ſing funeral ſongs in their praiſe: this part of the ceremony is perform'd by their old women and the relations of the deceas'd; which cuſtom was alſo obſerv'd by the Romans, who uſed to hire old ‖ women to weep on theſe occaſions, and had certain  funeral ſongs, which were acompanied with flutes. Among the Greeks, their funeral ſolemnities were ſung by men only; but the Jews heighten'd their ſongs, tears and lamentations, with faſtings, ſackcloth and aſhes. The Romaniſts and Lutherans ſing alſo at their funerals. We leave to relations and friends that tribute of tears which they owe to nature or tenderneſs; 'tis even with ſome †† ſatisfaction that we behold the tears which flow only from decency, tho' they appear as natural as the former, in thoſe affectionate impulſes which ariſe in the ſoul at the ſight of a perſon who while living was united to thoſe who mourn him by a variety of relations. 'Tis not our buſineſs to paſs a conſtruction on thoſe tears, which frequently are deceitful; have been ſo common in all ages; and which women can ſo eaſily command. Some of theſe ſhall break out into the utmoſt tranſports of grief, as naturally as if they had really lov'd. ‖‖ We are told, that the ſorrow of the women of Gaſcogne and Languedoc is, as it were, a ſpring, that is very productive of new and out-o'the-way fits, which dries up two or three days after the deceaſe of the perſon bewail'd: theſe fits exhibit themſelves in tears, groans, exclamations and ſobs. The ſhe-friends of the inconſolable woman mix their tears with her's: they weep becauſe they ſee others do ſo, and ſigh as bitterly as if they were really afflicted: the concert of ſighs and tears echoes thro' all the neighbourhood, and while the harmony laſts, the particular virtues and good qualities of the deceas'd are the grand topicks of converſation. The natural ſprightlineſs of the inhabitants raiſes a thouſand tender images in their minds, which, from the ſame cauſe, die away as ſuddenly: the afflicted woman is ſoon able to give conſolation to thoſe who ſympathiz'd with her in her ſorrow.

Some American ſavages ſmut their faces with black, in token of their grief; the Jews us'd to put aſhes on their heads; the heroes of Homer and Virgil roll'd themſelves up and down in the duſt, and cover'd their heads with it. The North-Americans, during the ſolemnity of mourning, don't cut off their hair, but affect to expreſs their affliction by going in a very poor dreſs. The Greeks us'd alſo to wear dirty, thread-thread-bare clothes, but then they cut off their hair, and threw it on the corps, which cuſtom is ſtill obſerv'd by the women of Florida at the death of their husbands, whereof notice will be taken in the ſequel. The Egyptians, the Jews, and ſeveral other Aſiaticks, uſed to tear their garments in token of their ſorrow: the firſt did not cut their hair off, but then they uſed to daub their faces; abſtain'd from ſeveral ſorts of food during ſeventy two days; never waſh'd themſelves, or took any kind of pleaſure, but wept continually during that ſeaſon. The Mexicans employ'd ten days in ſolemnizing the funerals of their dead, and the antient Thracians three days after their death. We quote theſe inſtances to ſhew the affinity between the funeral rites of the Americans and thoſe of other nations; but it would be needleſs to be more particular on that head, ſince we ſhall be obliged to take notice of 'em afterwards.

The Americans burn or bury with their dead, whatever they made uſe of in their life-time, and even part of their wealth: the Mexicans and Peruvians uſed alſo to furniſh their dead with domeſticks, to keep them company, or wait upon them in the next world. In Homer *, Achilles cauſes weapons to be laid on the funeral pile of his dear Patroclus; puts twelve young men to death for his ſake; gives him dogs, horſes, and every thing he thinks may be agreeable to him in the next life. The ſame cuſtom was alſo obſerv'd by the antient Gauls, the inhabitants of Great-Britain, and the Germans †.

The Jews and Chriſtians bury their dead, which cuſtom is of great antiquity, and was practis'd before that of burning, and 'tis obſerv'd that the Romans us'd it in the infancy of their common-wealth. The Americans in general bury their dead, but the Braſilians ‡ ſet 'em upright in pits dug in the ſhape of a cask, which are generally made in their Aldeas. The antient Romans and ſome other nations, us'd frequently to bury the dead in their houſes and gardens, whence, as Servius tells us, aroſe the cuſtom of worſhipping the houſhold gods, to which the antients gave the name of Lares: it was nevertheleſs enacted by the laws of the twelve tables, that the Romans ſhould bury their dead out of the city ||. The Braſilians have another remarkable cuſtom, which is to ſing in honour of the dead every time they paſs by their graves: this is a kind of comemmoration which theſe ſavages make of their dead.

The ſavages of Canada, of Miſſiſippi and ſeveral other nations of South-America, preſent giſts to their dead, which cuſtom is much the ſame with that of ſeveral nations of antiquity, who carried with great liberality to their dead, whatever they thought might be agreeable to them in the next world.

† We are told that theſe people buried with their dead whatever they had been poſſeſs'd of; not for them to make uſe of in the next life, but that nothing might be left, which might put the living in mind of them, and of the loſs they had ſuſtain'd. In New-France the ſavages are not allow'd to once mention the name of a perſon deceas'd; and they look upon every thing of this nature as an affront.

CHAP. XIX.

In what manner the Americans tranſmitted any memorable Incident to Poſterity.

WE have aſſerted that the Americans are ignorant of the art of writing; however we are aſſur'd that the inhabitants of New-Spain, particularly thoſe of Jucutan, made books with leaves of trees, and therein either writ down, or repreſented their memorable events. We there ſaw their method of dividing time; the idea they had of the courſe of the ſtars, and their knowledge in phyſicks: we may therefore ſuppoſe, that their paper was ſomething like that of the antient Egyptians. The deſtructive zeal of the Spaniſh monks and prieſts, who took every thing they did not underſtand, for ſome magical operation or ſuperſtitious practice, made them condemn all thoſe precious monuments to the flames; ſo that 'tis impoſſible to know preciſely, what affinity thoſe books bore to ours. What we may affirm with greater certainty, is, that they conſiſted of hieroglyphicks and paintings, under which, hiſtorical events and the phænomena of nature, were repreſented. We ſhall take notice of the Mexican year in the ſequel of this work, and ſhall now only give a general idea of theſe characters, or hieroglyphical paintings. Thoſe people, to point out the year when the Spaniards enter'd Mexico, painted on a wheel, which among them is the emblem of the revolution of the year, a man, clothed after the Spaniſh manner, with a hat on his head; but as this way of repreſenting thoughts, did not give an idea of the ſeveral circumſtances, they ſupply'd this defect, by learning by heart ſeveral pieces of poetry or proſe, compoſed by their learned men. Theſe pieces were as ſo many commentaries to their hieroglyphicks, and were learnt by heart from father to ſon, and by this means were tranſmitted to poſterity.

As to the Peruvians, they had neither letters nor characters after the manner of the Chineze, nor figures as the Arabians, nor hieroglyphicks after the manner of the Egyptians. However, they had ſome notion of painting, but then it was after a very rude and artleſs manner. They had in general no other regiſters or memorials than oral tradition, and the Quappas or Quippos. Theſe Quippos were ſtrings made of cotton or guts, with other ſtrings ty'd to them, and knots at certain diſtances, and of different colours, according to the incidents they had a mind to repreſent; and were made either larger or ſmaller according to the events they were deſirous of repreſenting. 'Twou'd be a difficult matter to conceive all that theſe ſtrings repreſented, or how far it aſſiſted the memory. Suffice it that we ſay they ſerv'd them for annals, codes, laws, rituals, ceremonials, &c. and that, with theſe ſtrings, knots, and colours, they made as many different combinations, as we with the letters of our alphabet. Theſe Quippos were kept by certain publick officers, call'd Quippocamaios, whoſe employment bore ſome affinity to thoſe of our notaries and ſecretaries of ſtate.

The Peruvians alſo made uſe of little ſtones, which they threw into the ſhape of a wheel, when they wanted to learn any thing by heart, and remember any remarkable incident; tho' this did but ill ſupply the place of writing, it yet ſhews what ſurprizing inventions the human mind is capable of.

At the time when America was diſcover'd, thoſe Peruvians, whom the Spaniſh miſſionaries converted to the chriſtian faith, were taught the principles of religion by theſe little ſtones laid in the ſhape of a wheel, one of which expreſs'd the Credo, another the Paternoſter, a third the Ave, &c.

Let us next conſider the order in which the Mexican characters, or rather hieroglyphicks were rang'd. Theſe were often diſpoſed in a circular manner, from bottom to top, or from the center to the circumference. All theſe ſeveral methods have no affinity with the way of writing uſed by the Romans, the Greeks, the Hebrews, or Chineze.

SUPPLEMENT

To the preceding

DISSERTATION,

IN WHICH

The RELIGIOUS CEREMONIES of the Americans are explain'd.

The Religion of the Savages of Hudſon's-Bay, &c.

WE are ſo little acquainted with the north parts of America, and the accounts we meet with of it are ſo very uncertain, that 'twould be almoſt impoſſible to give a rational deſcription of the religion of its inhabitants. Here follows what we have been able to collect on that head: The ſavages about Hudſon's-Bay have no diſtinct principles of religion, and [a] every one, as a traveller has told us, who has given a pretty exact deſcription of that bay, forms to himſelf a god according to his own fancy, to whom he addreſſes himſelf in his neceſſities, as when he is ſick,—&c. But this is ſaying little or nothing. We are not better acquainted with the notions which the ſavages of the Straits of Frobiſher, and thoſe of the coaſts that lie to the north-weſt of Europe, have form'd to themſelves of the Deity; they may perhaps be the ſame as thoſe of the reſt of the ſavages of North-America: but as we are not able to give an exact account of their idolatry, it were better to be ſilent on that head, than to entertain the reader with idle fictions.

La Potterie, in his hiſtory of North-America, vol. I. 1722. obſerves very juſtly, that the licentious and vagrant life of the ſavages, prevents their attaining to the knowledge of the true God. This reflection is juſt, and is verify'd by the conduct of the libertines among us. "However, continues the ſame writer, [b] the ſavages are not in-"ſenſible to the good or ill fortune that happens to them: they ſeem to have a prin-"ciple ſomething like that of the Manichæans, by their acknowledging a good and "evil ſpirit: they give the name of [c] Quichemanitou to the god of proſperity; 'tis to "him they fancy themſelves indebted for every ſuccour, and that he preſides over all the "happy effects of nature." The evil ſpirit they call Matchimanitou, who is an enemy to the happineſs of mankind; they imagine that 'tis he afflicts 'em, and to him they aſcribe all the evils they ſuffer. They believe the ſun to be the good, and the moon to [b] This is meant only of the inhabitants of the moſt northern parts of America, who trade with the Engliſh and French for beaver and other skins.

[c] Manitou is the name that all theſe people give to a genius, which they believe reſides not only in ſuch beings as have life, but even in inanimate things. They worſhip this genius in every thing that ſtrikes their ſenſes. A bird, an ox, a bear, an arrow, have each their Manitou; every ſavage has his particular Manitou, whom he looks upon as his tutelar deity: which opinion is agreable to that of ſeveral nations, ancient and modern, who believ'd that every man had his familiar or genius, who preſided over him all his life-time. "They ſet it forth in their huts, and ſacrifice dogs or other animals to it. The warriors "(Ilinois) carry their Manitou in a mat, and are perpetually invoking it, to give 'em victory over their "enemies. The quacks, that is, their jugglers, addreſs themſelves alſo to their Manitous,&c." See Father Mareſt the miſſionary's letter to the Ilinois. Collection 11*th of curious and edifying letters.*

to be the evil principle, which has ſome affinity with the opinion of the antients, who aſcrib'd evil and [a] pernicious effects to the moon. The ſavages in queſtion ſeem to look upon the ſun as the ſovereign maſter of the univerſe. They offer him tobacco inſtead of incenſe, which they call [b] ſmoaking the ſun. Here follows their manner of performing a religious ceremony to which, we believe, we may give the name of incenſing. 'The chiefs of the families aſſemble by day-break at the houſe of one of their principal men: the latter lights the calumet, offers it thrice to the riſing-ſun, and waving it with both his hands according to its courſe, till he comes to the point from whence he firſt begun, he addreſſes his prayers at the ſame time to the ſun, implores his protection, beſeeches him to direct him in his undertakings, and recommends all the families of the canton or province to his care. After which the chief ſmoaks in the calumet, and preſents it to the aſſembly, in order that every member of it may ſmoak the ſun in his turn.

It may not be improper, before we proceed further, to give a deſcription of the calumet in this place. [c] "'Tis a kind of very long [d] pipe made of red ſtones, adorn'd "with the heads of [e] wood-peckers and of a kind of ducks that perch upon trees. "The head of thoſe birds is of the fineſt ſcarlet in the world, and is beautify'd with "fine feathers." In the middle of the tube, or body of the calumet, they hang or fix certain feathers, taken from the wings of a bird, which they call kibou, a kind of eagle. They always dance the calumet before they undertake any conſiderable enterprize. Father Hennepin gives us a much more accurate deſcription of this inſtrument: [f] "The calumet, ſays he, is a great ſmoaking-pipe of red, white or black marble. "'Tis pretty much like a poll-ax; has a very ſmooth head, and the tube, which is a- "bout two foot and a half long, is made of a pretty ſtrong reed or cane, ſet off with "feathers of all ſorts of colours, with ſeveral mats made of woman's hair, variouſly "interwoven: to this they fix two wings, which makes it ſomething like Mercury's "caduceus, or the wand which embaſſadors of peace held formerly in their hands. "They thruſt this reed thro' the necks of huars, which are birds ſpeckled with black "and white, and about the bigneſs of our geeſe, or thro' the necks of the above- "mention'd ducks.——These ducks are of three or four different colours. Every "nation adorns the calumet, as cuſtom, or his own fancy ſhall ſuggeſt. The calumet "is a paſſport to all who go to the allies of ſuch nations as ſend it.——'Tis a "ſymbol of peace, and they are univerſally of opinion, that ſome great misfortune "would befall any perſon who ſhould violate the faith of it. 'Tis the ſeal of all "undertakings, of all important affairs, and publick ceremonies." La Hontan relates, that the [g] tube of the calumet is four or five foot long, and the body of "this pipe is "about eight inches (in diameter, I ſuppoſe) and the bowl in which the tobacco is "laid, three."

But to return to the religion of theſe people: the ceremony of ſmoaking the ſun is never perform'd but on important occaſions; for they addreſs themſelves, in their common worſhip, to their manitou, which they carry always along with them, and which is commonly given them by their jugglers. La Potterie tells us, in his firſt volume of the hiſtory of North-America, that certain ſavages who live towards the north coaſts,

[a] They aſcrib'd to Pluto the god of hell, and to Proſerpine his wife, who according to the opinion of the antients is the ſame as the moon, the direction of every thing that was tranſacted between the earth and the moon: theſe two nocturnal deities were the faithful depoſitaries of our evils.

[b] La Potterie, ubi ſupra. [c] Ibid:

[d] La Hontan relates in his voyages, that calumet is a Norman word, deriv'd from chalumeau, or pipe: the Romans introduc'd it in the firſt voyages they made to Canada: the Iroquois call it Ganandoë, and the other ſavages Paogan. All relations agree that the ſavages of North-America have the utmoſt veneration for the calumet: that they look upon it as a myſtery, and as a preſent made by the ſun to mankind. Further mention will be made of it when we come to give an account of the warlike ceremonies of the Americans.

coaſts, are of opinion, that ſtorms are rais'd by the ſpirit of the moon's lodging itſelf in the bottom of the ſea: to pacify it therefore, they ſacrifice to it the moſt valuable things they have in their canoo, and throw every thing into the ſea, not excepting their tobacco. This ſacrifice is heighten'd with ſinging, and certain ceremonies which they think efficacious in driving out this evil ſpirit.

To know the iſſue of any affair they addreſs themſelves to their jugglers, who pronounce their oracles with great ceremony, and in a manner that is artful enough. The juggler fixes poles in the ground, and thereon raiſes a circular hutt, which he ſurrounds with the skins of caribous, or other animals, leaving a hole at the top wide enough for a man to paſs thro': here the juggler ſhuts himſelf up alone; where he ſings, ſheds tears, tumbles up and down, torments himſelf, invokes, breaks out into imprecations, exorciſms, asks the Matchimanitou what is his pleaſure; who anſwers him with a thundring noiſe; all which is conſonant to the high idea mankind in general have form'd to themſelves of the divine majeſty. This idea makes them believe, that the gods muſt neceſſarily deliver themſelves with a mighty noiſe, and always throw nature into ſome confuſion. When Homer's Jupiter contracts his brow, heaven muſt tremble; does he put forth his voice? all the elements are in diſorder. Immediately the juggler's enthuſiaſm breaks out in a murmuring noiſe, like that of a rock falling, when all the poles or ſtakes are ſhaken with ſo much violence, that one would imagine all was coming to the ground. 'Tis in the midſt of theſe ſacred agitations that the juggler pronounces the oracle. This account is borrowed from de la Potterie.

IF father [a] Hennepin may be believ'd, there is not one true religious notion, or any regular worſhip among theſe ſavages. The bulk of their religion conſiſts in a ſett of confus'd notions, and a kind of veneration for the ſun, whom they acknowledge, but in appearance only, for the author and preſerver of all things. Whenever the Nadoueſſans and Iſſatis ſmoak, they look up to the ſun; and as this planet is, at the ſame time, the only object that raiſes any devotion in their minds, the moment they have lighted the calumet, they preſent it to him, and beſeech him to take a whiff or two. Theſe people, and all the inhabitants of the coaſts of Miſſiſippi, pay no other worſhip to the ſun, than the faint teſtimonies of that gratitude which we owe to the ſupreme Being. They offer to him the firſt-fruits of all they take in hunting, in their commanders hutt, who undoubtedly makes his advantage of the oblations which his ſubjects devote to that planet. As ſoon as they perceive day-break, they waſt the firſt cloud of ſmoak that comes from their calumets towards the ſun, at the ſame time mumbling over certain words, which probably are their firſt morning oriſons. They afterwards ſmoak towards the four quarters of the world. We are told that the [b] ceremonial habits of ſome of theſe nations have generally two ſuns painted on them, and that wild oxen, ſtags, ſerpents, &c. are repreſented on their bodies.

The above cited friar gives us a more particular account of the religion of theſe nations, and of the principles on which it is founded, in his third relation of Louiſiana, entitled, A voyage into a country larger than Europe. Here follows the ſubſtance of what he ſays: "The greateſt part of theſe ſavages believe the world to have been "created; that heaven, the earth, and men were made by a woman, who, toge-"ther " ther with her ſon, preſides over the world. This perhaps may be the reaſon, continues " father Hennepin, why theſe ſavages deduce their genealogies by females. The ſon is " the principle of every thing that is good, and the woman the cauſe of evil: how- " ever, they are of opinion, that both are in an equal ſtate of ſupreme felicity. That " the woman, being big with child, fell down from heaven, and drop'd on the back " of a tortoiſe, who ſav'd her from ſhipwreck." Methinks one may diſcover, in this whimſical ſyſtem, ſome faint idea of the facts contain'd in the hiſtory of the fall, as related by Moſes. " Other ſavages of the ſame continent are of opinion, that the world " was created by a Spirit, to which the Iroquois have given the name of Otkon, thoſe " of Virginia, Okée, and other ſavages who inhabit the mouth of St. Lawrence's ri- " ver, Atahauta; and that one Meſſou reſtor'd it after the flood.——They tell us, that " as Meſſou was one day hunting, his dogs loſt themſelves in a great lake, which hap- " pening to overflow, ſoon ſpread itſelf all over the earth.——They add, that by the " help of ſome animals, he reſtor'd the world with this land. The ſavages who in- " habit the head of St. Lawrence's river and Miſſiſippi, tell us, that a woman de- " ſcended from heaven, and hover'd ſome time in the air, ſeeking where to reſt her " foot: that the tortoiſe offer'd her his back, which ſhe accepted, and choſe that place " for her reſidence: that afterwards the filth of the ſea gather'd itſelf about the tor- " toiſe, and inſenſibly expanded itſelf to a great extent of ground.———However, as " this woman did not delight in ſolitude, a ſpirit deſcended from above, who finding " her aſleep, drew near to her: that the reſult of this approach was her being with " child; that ſhe was deliver'd of two ſons, who came out of her ſide. When the " children were grown up, they exercis'd themſelves in hunting; and as one of 'em " was a much more skilful hunter than the other, jealouſy ſoon occaſion'd diſcord: " they liv'd together in an irreconcileable hatred. The unskilful hunter, who was of " a very ſavage temper, treated his brother ſo ill, as forc'd him to leave the earth, and " withdraw to heaven. After he had thus withdrawn himſelf, the ſpirit return'd again " to the woman, and from this ſecond interview a daughter was born, who is the grand " parent of the North-Americans." The reader may find ſome affinity between this fiction and the ſtory of Cain and Abel, as related by Moſes.

We meet with a ſyſtem of the creation, according to the notions of the ſavages, in de la Potterie's hiſtory of North-America, that differs pretty much from the above-mention'd: " The ſavages are ſtrictly of opinion, that they came originally from beaſts, " and that Michapous is the name of the God who created heaven. They have ſome " idea of the flood, and believe that the world began at that time; that Michapous " created heaven, and afterwards created all the animals that were on floating woods " and groves; with theſe he made a caieu, which is a kind of bridge, and continued " ſeveral days upon it without any ſuſtenance.———Michapous foreſeeing that all " theſe creatures could not live long on this bridge, and that his work wou'd be im- " perfect, in caſe he did not take care to ſecure 'em from misfortunes, and from being " ſtarv'd,—and having at that time command over the heavens only, he found himſelf " oblig'd to addreſs himſelf to Michiniſi god of the waters, and wou'd have borrow'd " ſome land of him, in order to ſettle his creatures on it; but Michiniſi was not inclin'd " to grant him his requeſt. Michapous ſent the beaver, the otter, and a kind of rat, one " after another, to ſearch for earth at the bottom of the ſea, but none of 'em brought " any thing, the rat excepted, and ſhe only a few particles of ſand." Michapous made a prodigious advantage of this ſmall quantity of ſand, ſince it ſerv'd him for a leaven to ſwell it up to a high mountain. The fox was deſir'd to walk round and round this mountain, Michapous aſſuring him that his perambulations wou'd extend that piece of ground, the fox went round it for ſome time, in order to enlarge the terreſtrial globe, but he was ſoon weary, ſo that Michapous finiſh'd the reſt. The notions the ſavages have of ſeveral phænomena of nature, ſuch as earthquakes, thunder, light-lightning, &c. are equally extravagant. Some of them are very whimſical with regard to the origin of beaſts and the creation of man, which they tell us ſprung from the [a] putrefaction of the firſt animals that Michapous deſtroy'd, becauſe of the diſcord that reign'd ſo much among 'em. The new created men invented the bow and arrow, which they employ'd againſt the beaſts. It happen'd on a day, that one of 'em being ſeparated from the reſt, diſcover'd a hutt; here he found Michapous, who gave him a wife, and eſtabliſh'd the ſeveral duties to be obſerv'd between 'em: man had hunting and fiſhing allotted him for his part; ſpinning, dreſſing the victuals, and all the affairs of the houſe were the woman's province. Michapous drew up marriage-articles for the companions of this man, all of them to the ſame tenor. He gave every one of them away in marriage with his own hand, inveſted them with a power over beaſts, telling 'em he had created them to die, but that after death they ſhould go into a delightful place. Men liv'd in a ſtate of felicity and contentment for ſome ages; but as mankind were prodigiouſly multiply'd, they were oblig'd to ſearch for new countries to hunt in. At length diſcord and jealouſy began to ariſe among the hunters, and to this they aſcribe the origin of wars.

The ſame author informs us, that the ſavages have banquets in honour of Michapous, and that they are oblig'd to eat the victuals to the very bones, which they conſecrate to Michapous and the Genii. If the gueſts don't eat up all that the maſter of the feaſt has ſet before 'em, 'tis a bad omen for him, and he is to expect a great many croſſes in all his undertakings. He tells us that they ſacrifice dogs to the ſun.

Champlain tells us, in his travels, another opinion of ſome ſavages of Canada concerning the creation, &c. They tell us that there is one only God, creator of all things: that after he had form'd all nature, he took a certain number of arrows, planted them in the earth, and from thence drew man and woman; an original ſuitable to the character of thoſe people who live only for the ſake of deſtroying one another by wars. They believe in a quaternity, that is to ſay, a divine Eſſence comprehended under four perſons, viz. God who is the father; the ſon; the mother; and the planet of the ſun; and that this mother is the original of evil.

Otkon, call'd Okée by the Virginians; and Atahauta, call'd Manitou by the Canadans, &c. are names which probably may expreſs the ſame idea in the different languages of thoſe nations. 'Tis the univerſal Spirit that gives being and motion to matter; 'tis the firſt cauſe, of whoſe power and faculties the ſavages have form'd certain very confus'd notions. But cou'd we expect to meet with even ſo much reaſoning as this in ſavages, ſince, if father Hennepin is to be credited, they have never made the leaſt uſe of their reaſon in any thing relating to religion? and that, as he tells us, they are even incapable of making the moſt common and trite arguments on this ſubject. He nevertheleſs aſſures us, that they have ſome confus'd notions of the Deity. The ſavages

[a] This is ſomething like the thought in Virgil's fourth Georgic, of bees being form'd from the putrefaction of the carcaſs of a young bullock.

A ſteer of two years old they take, whoſe head
Now firſt with burniſh'd horns begins to ſpread:
They ſtop his noſtrils, while he ſtrives in vain
To breathe free air, and ſtruggles with his pain.
Knock'd down he dies; his bowels bruis'd within,
Betray no wound on his unbroken ſkin.
Extended thus, in his obſcene abode
They leave the beaſt; but firſt ſweet flowers are ſtrew'd
Beneath his body, broken boughs and thyme,
And pleaſing caſſia, juſt renew'd in prime.

———— ———— ———— ———— ————

The tainted blood in this cloſe priſon pent,
Begins to boil, and through the bones ferment;
Then, wondrous to behold, new creatures riſe,
A moving maſs at firſt, and ſhort of thighs;
Till ſhooting out with legs, and imp'd with wings,

ſavages who inhabit near Miſſiſippi acknowledge the ſun to be God; others, a Genius who preſides in the air: ſome look upon heaven as a divine Being, &c. The ſouthern nations ſeem to believe in an univerſal Spirit: they imagine that all things, not excepting the inanimate, are inform'd with a ſpirit. They offer up vows and prayers to them; they invoke the rivers, the floods, and thoſe dreadful caſcades, which in the relations of Miſſiſippi and Canada are call'd falls: they accompany theſe invocations with offerings, conſiſting of a few beaver skins, which they hang on the branches of a tree near the water-fall. If they happen to meet with any torrent or water-fall in their way, they throw into it a gown made of beaver skins, with tobacco, china, &c. By this ſacrifice, they flatter themſelves they ſhall draw down the bleſſing of the ſpirit that inhabits the flood. Their prayers conſiſt in ſupplications to the ſpirit of the water-fall, that he wou'd give 'em good ſucceſs in hunting; in beſeeching him to ſuffer 'em to re-croſs it without [a] danger; in imploring its protection againſt their enemies, and its aſſiſtance in their intended revenge. They are no ſooner return'd from their expedition, but they ſacrifice ſome priſoners in its honour. "They "neverthleſs, continues the ſame father, have no outward ceremony of religion that "gives the leaſt indication of their paying any worſhip to the Deity. We find nei"ther ſacrifices, temples, prieſts, or any marks of religious worſhip among 'em.—— "All their belief is, that an univerſal ſpirit inſpires 'em with every thing [b] they ought "to do:" that he directs their thoughts and dreams; nay, to ſuch lengths do they carry it, that if they fancy themſelves inſpir'd to kill a man, or to commit any other wicked action, they don't believe it would be a crime to put their inſpirations in execution. The contradictions in all the reflections which this father makes with regard to the religion of the Miſſiſippians are but too manifeſt. What does he call the paying religious worſhip to any deity? if they believe there is an univerſal Spirit that governs the world, and pervades all beings, as well the inanimate as thoſe that have life; if they imagine themſelves bound to follow his inſpirations; that they are to truſt in him, and offer up prayers and ſacrifices to him, what can we call this but a worſhip, and religious ceremonies?

Theſe people have their jugglers or mountebanks who pronounce their oracles, interpret their dreams, which they look upon as ſo many orders and admonitions from God; they foretel things that are to come to paſs; and [c] boaſt that rain, calm or ſtormy weather, fruitfulneſs, and good ſucceſs in hunting, is intirely under their direction. We may believe that they want neither cunning or evaſions to defend the impoſture when the event does not correſpond to the prediction. We ſhall not make any further reflections on their juggling, which is exactly the ſame with what has been already obſerv'd on that head.

We are aſſur'd that theſe ſavages aſcribe a reaſonable ſoul to ſeveral ſorts of beaſts, and that they have a peculiar veneration for the bones of elks and beavers. They fancy that the ſouls of thoſe beaſts come to ſee how their bodies are treated; that they afterwards acquaint both the living and the dead with it: that if theſe animals happen to be ill treated, they will not ſuffer themſelves to be any longer taken either in this world or the next. We may naturally believe that the ſkill and ſubtlety of theſe animals

[a] This notion agrees with that of the antients, who imagin'd every river and fountain to have its god, nymph, &c. Horace has addreſs'd himſelf to his fountain, ode 13. book 3.

Blunduſia's ſpring, more clear than glaſs,
That bubbles thro' the riſing graſs:
Thee wine ſhould ſweeten, crowns adorn,
But now a wanton ridgling dies
A pious humble ſacrifice,
His flowing blood ſhall paint the riſing morn, &c. Creech's Horace.

[b] This principle is very like that of the quakers among us, who have an overflow of Light, which ſhines within them ſo powerfully, that it dazles their eyes, and dances 'em into a thouſand vagaries of error and enthuſiaſm.

animals was what gave riſe to this notion. We will conclude this account, of the idolatry of theſe people, with a circumſtance worthy their ignorance, and that weakneſs of mind, which is inſeparable from the cloud with which they are ſurrounded, and that is, the belief they have in [a] prodigies, and their fear of thunder. Some of theſe, ſays father Hennepin, in the place juſt quoted, always carry the skeleton of a crow along with them, and affirm that their lives are in its power; others have an owl, the ſhell of ſome ſea-fiſh, or a bone; they nevertheleſs are frighted at the ſcreeching of an owl, and look upon it as an ill omen. We may ſuppoſe that this is not their familiar ſpirit.

The Natches, who are a people of Miſſiſippi, have had a kind of temple from time immemorial, in which a fire is kept continually burning by a prieſt, whoſe office it is to take care of [b] the temple. This edifice is dedicated to the ſun, from whom they pretend the family of their chief is deſcended. The Tenſas or Taenſas have the ſame object of religious worſhip: theſe people alſo dedicate to it temples, altars, prieſts with a fire, which, like the Natches, is kept burning in his honour. 'Tis well known that this perpetual fire repreſented the ſun among ſeveral nations of antiquity [c]. Whenever the moon is in the wane, they carry a great diſh by way of ſacrifice, to the gate of the temple, fill'd with their greateſt dainties, and theſe their prieſts offer to this deified planet.

We ſhall preſent the reader with the deſcription of one of thoſe temples of the ſun, as we find it in the author of the relation of Louiſiana, under the name of the Chevalier de Tonti, printed in the collection of voyages to the North, vol. 5. "They tell us "that it is ſurrounded with a high wall: the area between 'em forms a kind of court, "for the people to walk in: upon this wall a great number of ſpikes are ſet, on the "ſharp ends of which they fix the heads of their enemies, or of the greateſt criminals. "Over the front is laid a great log, rais'd very high, ſurrounded with a great quan- "tity of hair, and garniſh'd with a number of ſcalps, like ſo many trophies. The "inſide of the temple is no other than a [d] nave, which is painted or varicolour'd all "round the top, with a great number of different figures. In the middle of the tem- "ple they make a great fire-place, by way of altar; they always burn three great "logs, laid end-ways, which two prieſts with white hoods ſupply with fuel. 'Tis "round this flaming altar that all the congregation offer up their prayers with ſur- "prizing howlings. The prayers are three times a day, at ſun-riſe, at noon, and at "his ſetting. A cloſet is made in the wall, which they call the tabernacle of the God. "Two eagles with extended wings hang in it, and look towards the ſun." This deſcription gives us a pretty tolerable idea of the religious worſhip of the Miſſiſippians. Would one imagine it were poſſible that devotion ſhould exhibit itſelf in ſo much pomp on the banks of a river, where one wou'd expect to meet with no other than brutiſh and ruſtic ſavages! but then is not this deſcription merely fabulous?

[c] The Canadans give the name of Great Spirit to that ſupreme Being whom the other ſavages acknowledge to be the Univerſal Spirit. Theſe people argue very logically, if we are to give credit to a traveller who has borrow'd the pen and character of [a] This opinion ſtill prevails but too much among us.

[c] The Romans had their holy fire, the preſervation of which was committed to the veſtal virgins. Numa fancy'd it to be the principle of all things.——The veſtals were oblig'd to keep this fire with all the care in the world; and if it happen'd to go out, 'twas thought impiety to light it at any common flame, but they made uſe of the pure and unpolluted rays of the ſun. Every year, on the firſt of March, whether it had gone out or not, they always lighted it a-new.

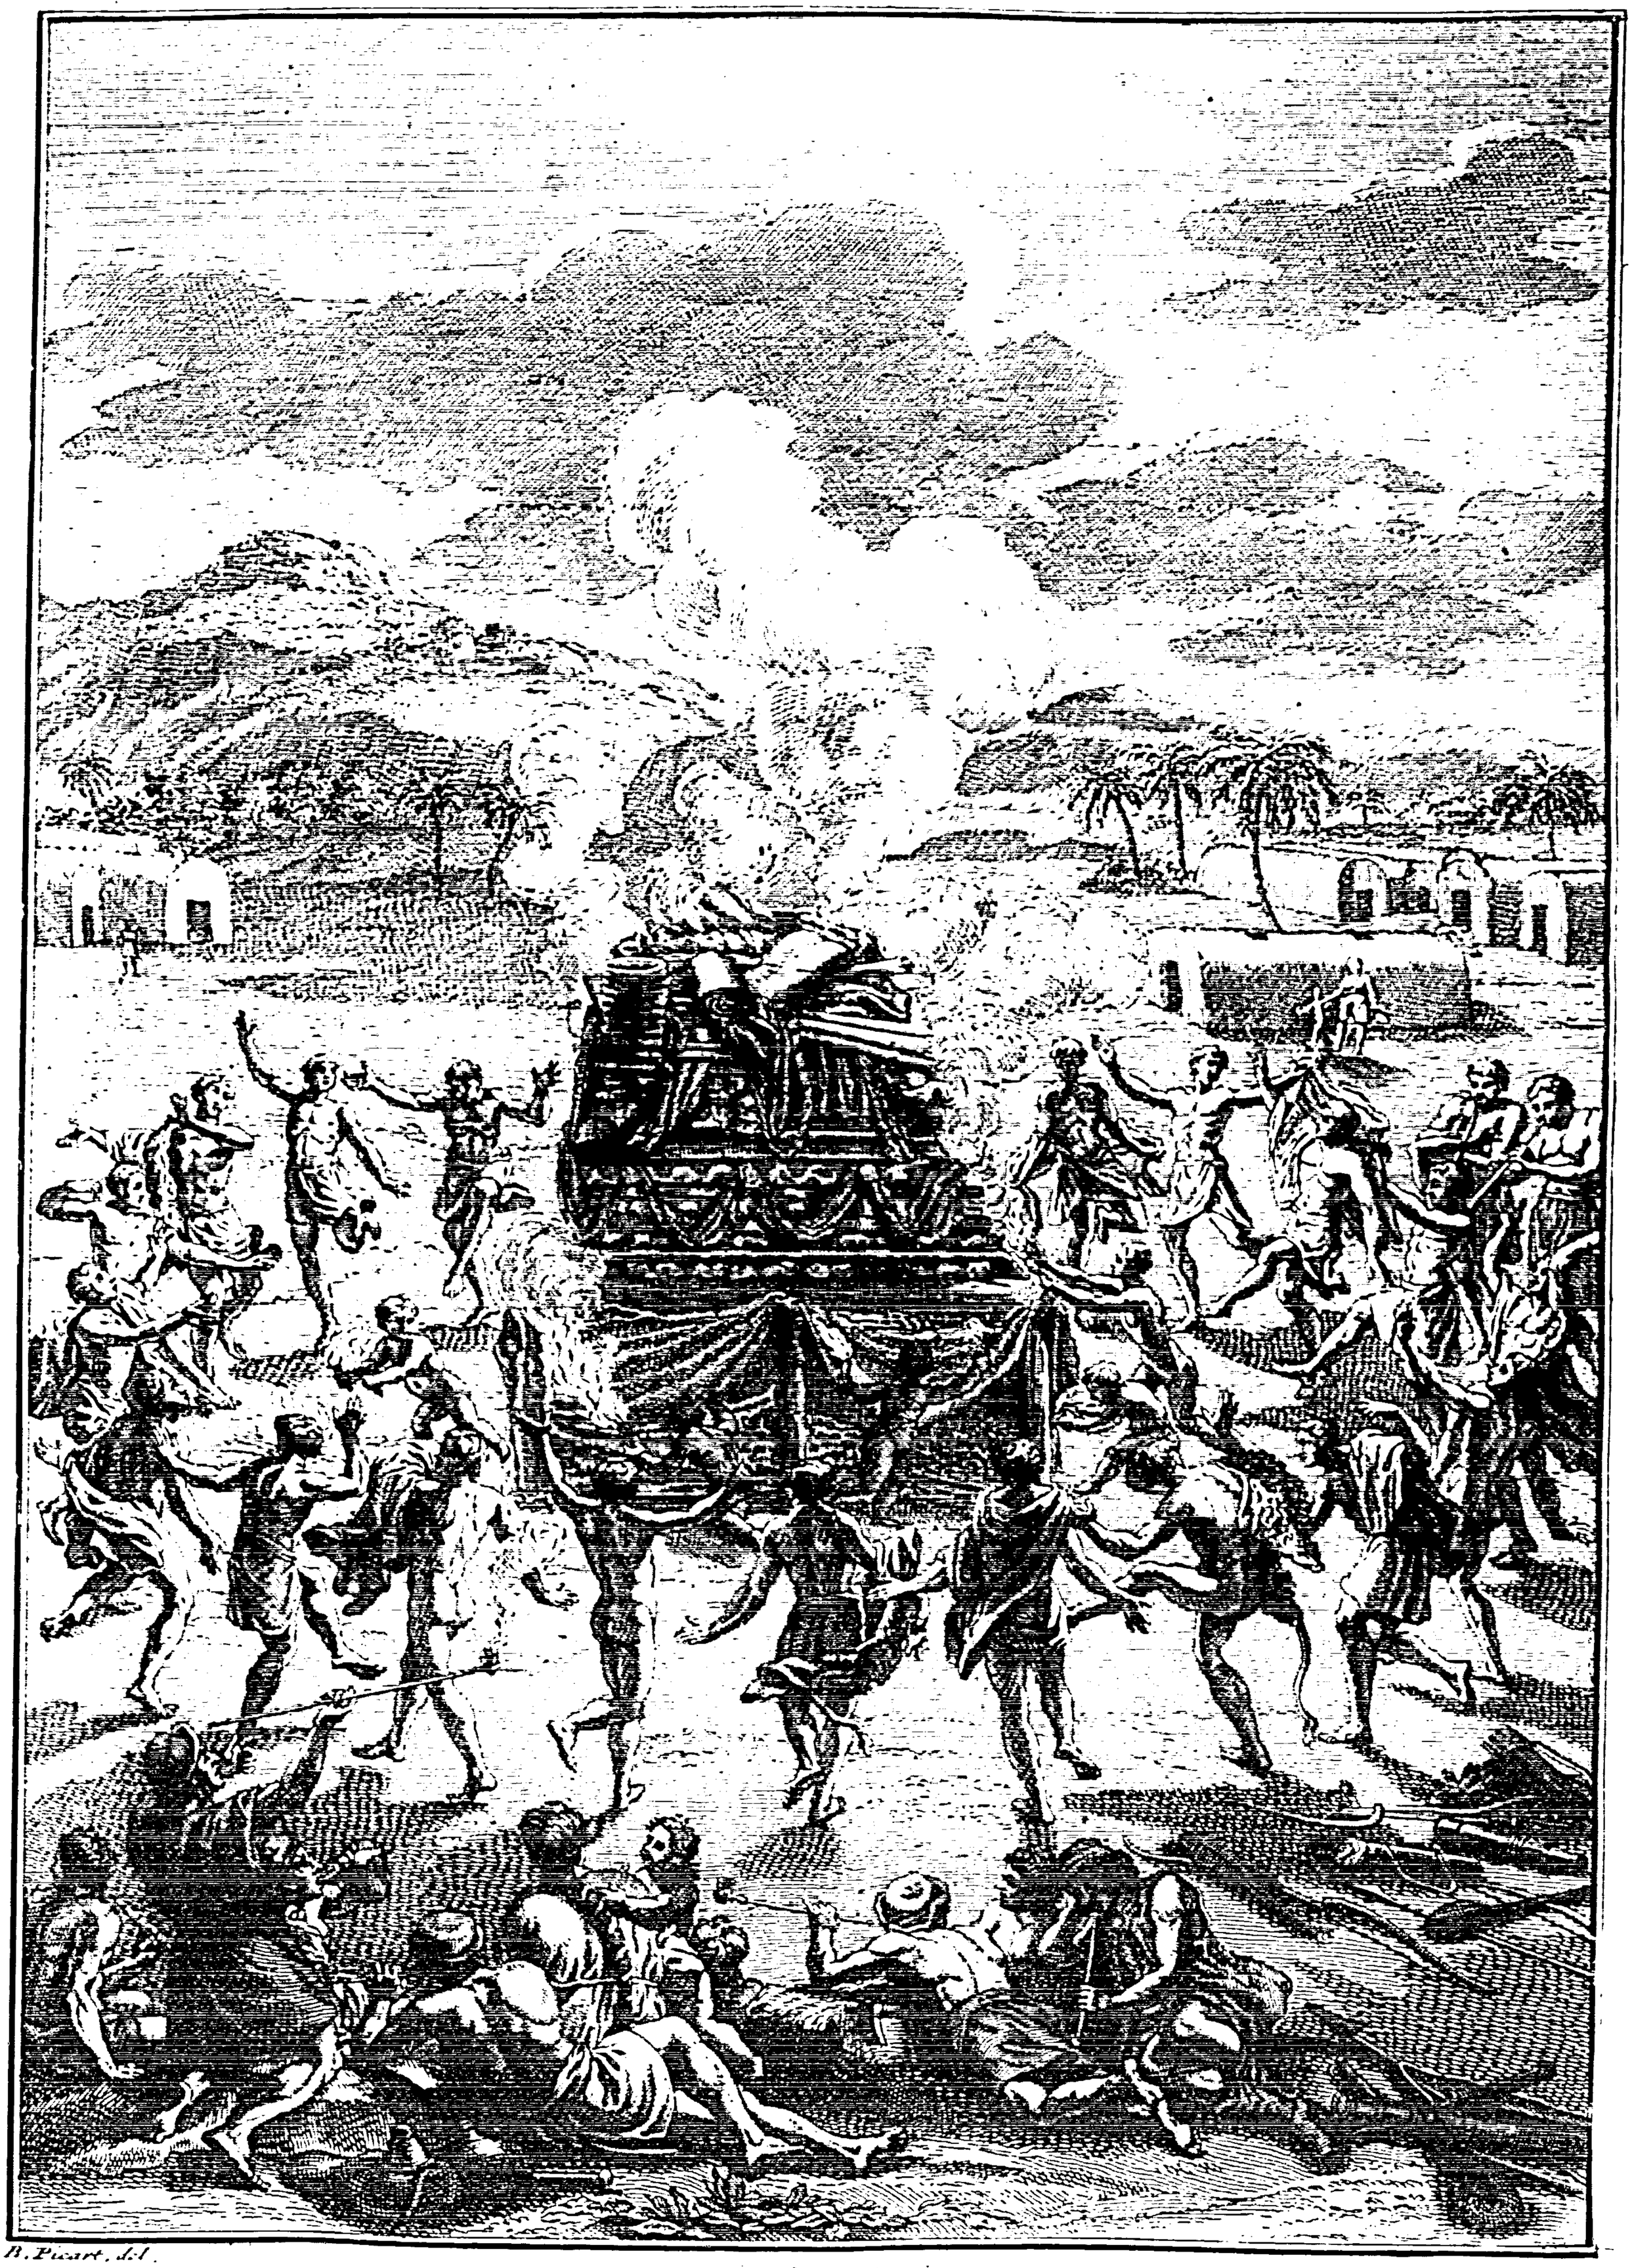
of a degraded [a] monk. He tells us, that "they prove the exiſtence of a ſupreme Being "from the frame of the univerſe, which leads us to a ſuperior and almighty Being; "whence it follows, that man was not made by chance.——They worſhip this ſupe- "rior Being after the moſt abſtracted manner imaginable, which they explain as fol- "lows.———As the exiſtence of God is inſeparable from his eſſence, he muſt com- "prehend all things, appear in all things, and give motion to all things. In fine, this "God is all we ſee, all we comprehend; who, as he exiſts without bounds, without limits, "or a bodily ſubſtance, ought therefore not to be repreſented under the figure of an "old man, or any other ſhape, how beautiful, great and extenſive ſoever: for which "reaſon they worſhip him in every thing they ſee. This is ſo true, that whenever "they ſee any thing that is beautiful, curious, or ſurprizing, eſpecially the ſun and "other ſtars, they cry out in this manner, O Mighty Spirit! we ſee thee in all things. "Thus they acknowledge a creating Being, under the name of The Great or Mighty "Spirit, or the maſter of life, whenever they reflect even upon the moſt trifling "things." Wou'd it be poſſible to paraphraſe better, or juſtify more ingeniouſly, the obſcure and doubtful manner in which we are told theſe ſavages expreſs their belief with regard to the firſt principle of nature? Nor does he make 'em argue with leſs ſubtilty on the myſteries of the chriſtian religion. He has put into their mouths all the ſcruples and difficulties that cou'd poſſibly enter into the head of the greateſt free-thinker, who was endeavouring to ſap its very fundamentals.



The Sacrifices and Adorations of the Canadan Savages.

WE have already obſerv'd that the ſavages of Canada, and thoſe of Hudſon's-Bay, &c. give the name of Kitchi-Manitou to the great Spirit. They aſcribe to him every thing that is good, as on the contrary they attribute to that evil genius, whom we have already mention'd under the name of Matchi-Manitou, every thing that is evil: but beſides theſe, they eſtabliſh good or evil intelligences or ſpirits in every thing that to them appears wonderful; and give to all things their preſiding good or evil genii, as they appear to them either uſeful or noxious. La Hontan tells us, that they rank gold and ſilver in the number of the latter; which notion is pretty juſt. They are eye-witneſſes to part of the care and trouble the French give themſelves to heap up wealth; but what wou'd they not ſay, were they to ſee the ſordid avarice of ſome of our Europeans? La Hontan tells us, that the [b] ſavages never ſacrifice living animals to Kitchi-Manitou; but burn in his honour goods, for which they trade with the French, the value whereof is ſometimes upwards of fifty thouſand crowns. Here follows the deſcription which that traveller has given us of the whole ceremony: They chuſe a clear and ſerene day for the performing of it; when every ſavage brings his offering and lays it on the pile. Afterwards, when the ſun is at the meridian, the young Canadans ſurround the pile with lighted barks of trees, in order to ſet fire to it. The warriors ſing and dance till the ſacrifice is conſum'd, at the ſame time that the old men addreſs themſelves to Kitchi-Manitou, and preſent at intervals their lighted calumets to the ſun. The ſongs and dances laſt during the whole day, and the homage of the calumet from the riſing of the ſun to its ſetting, obſerving to worſhip him at his riſe, his meridian, and his ſetting. The figure repreſents the ſacrifice of the Canadans in honour of Kitchi-Manitou.

This degraded monk has interſpers'd the greateſt part of his writings with jeſting and buffoonery, not excepting the travels of la Hontan, which he imagin'd wou'd be more diverting upon that account, tho' often at the expence of truth. If the ſavages reaſon as juſtly as he makes 'em do, one would be apt to think that they had ſtudied the evaſions and ſubterfuges of the logic of the ſchools.

LE GRAND SACRIFICE des CANADIENS à QUITCHI-MANITOU ou le GRAND ESPRIT.

We ſhall now preſent the reader with their form of prayer. They ſupplicate the Great Spirit, or Kitchi-Manitou, whom they acknowledge to preſide over their lives, to protect them againſt the wicked, to grant them his favour, to preſerve the ſtrength and bravery of their warriors, to ſtrengthen the ſpirit of their old men, and to inſpire them with good counſels; to increaſe and preſerve their families, to protect their children againſt wicked ſpirits and from the hands of the wicked, in order that they may one day prove the pleaſure and conſolation of their aged parents. They beſeech him to ſhed his bleſſings on the harveſt, on the villages, and the hunters; to teach them his will in dreams, and after death to waſt 'em to the region of ſouls.

The ſubject of their ſongs is the praiſes of the beauty of the works of nature, the goodneſs of God, their victories, and the defeat of their enemies. The women addreſs ſpeeches to the riſing-ſun, and preſent their children to him at the ſame time. At his ſetting the warriors come out of their villages to dance the Grand Spirit dance: however there are no fix'd days for the ſacrifices and the private dances. Theſe particulars are borrow'd from la Hontan.

We are perſuaded that a long reſidence, and repeated inroads for ſome years into the north parts of America, wou'd procure us a clearer, more exact, and more regular account of the religion of thoſe nations; but then the traveller muſt reſolve to lay aſide all his prejudices; muſt have a greater ſtock of learning and underſtanding than thoſe generally have who ramble up and down the world; muſt be inform'd with a capacity able to diſcover the original of the principles of the ſavages, and above all, muſt have patience and mildneſs to argue and diſcourſe with them. However brutiſh and ſavage the above-mention'd people may be, 'tis yet manifeſt, that they are not atheiſts, and that their prodigious ignorance does not obſtruct their going back to a firſt cauſe, ſuperior to theſe genii, which they imagine to inhabit all beings. We are aſſur'd, that 'tis a very difficult matter to convert them to chriſtianity, and that they continue fix'd in their notions, unable to reliſh the myſteries of the chriſtian religion, to which they liſten with an indifference capable of confounding the zeal of a choleric devotee. They often alledge much the ſame reaſon for their refuſing to embrace the principles of chriſtianity, as an idolatrous prince in the Eaſt-Indies did, to the archbiſhop of Goa; whoſe words were as follows. Had God deſign'd me for a chriſtian, I ſhould have been ſo from my very infancy [a].

We are aſſur'd that there is hardly the leaſt mark of religious worſhip among the ſavages of Terra-Nova.

Marriage-Ceremonies of the Inhabitants of Hudſon's-Bay, Miſſiſippi, and Canada.

AN [b] author who has given us a relation of Hudſon's-Bay, tells us, that its ſavage inhabitants marry as many wives as they can maintain; that they alſo have the cuſtom of marrying their wives ſiſters, from an opinion they have of their agreeing better together than ſtrangers. Another [c] author aſſures us, that the inhabitants of Louiſiana have the ſame cuſtom, and that nothing is more common than to ſee four or five ſiſters married to the ſame man. She that firſt happens to be a mother, enjoys certain prerogatives, which conſiſt in being exempted from ſeveral domeſtic cares. As to the preludes of marriage, a ſavage that is in love with a woman, does not commonly ſpin out the time of his courtſhip to any length: the moment his breaſt is inflam'd, he reveals his paſſion, and in order to obtain the object of his wiſhes, he gives an entertainment to to her family, and makes her father ſome preſent; and no ſooner has he obtain'd their conſent, but he takes her home to him, without haggling for her portion.

Father Hennepin has been more exact and particular upon the marriage of thoſe people: he tells us, "that their marriage is not a civil contract: the husband and "wife never marry with an intention of binding themſelves to each other for life; "they cohabit together ſo long as they agree, but the moment domeſtic broils begin "to ariſe, they ſeparate from one another without the leaſt formality." They marry their daughters very young, and tho' the wife is not old enough to have any commerce with her husband, ſhe yet ſuperintends her domeſtic affairs, while the husband goes a hunting, and brings what he kills to her father. They often marry without any amorous formality; they have no love toyings, no converſation, no wanton careſſes to create an acquaintance before they tye the gordian knot, which often is fatal in other places. Let us ſuppoſe for inſtance, a ſavage man and woman together, who never ſaw one another before, and that one of them ſhall ſuddenly have a deſire of being married; the party thus prompted will immediately paſs over all the formalities which ought to be obſerv'd on thoſe occaſions. The amorous ſavage will, without the leaſt ceremony, ask the perſon he deſigns for his wife, if ſhe has a mind to have him; and ſhe anſwers at once yes or no, without conſulting [a] her friends. To this reciprocal conſent ſucceeds a kind of ceremony, which we may conſider as the effect of the modeſty of the female ſavage, and of her future œconomy; which is, that in the evening of the wedding-day the bride takes her ax, goes and cuts down wood in the fields, and afterwards makes it up into a load, then lays it on the ground before the door of her future husband's hutt, and ſits down near her lover, who makes no other compliment than that 'tis time to go to reſt, and a little after ſlips to bed to her. Father Hennepin adds, that the friendſhip of thoſe ſavages is very fickle and wavering, and that whenever they happen to meet after falling out, they look upon one another with the utmoſt coldneſs and indifference. Whenever they ſeparate, the wife ſometimes carries away her clothes and furs, and ſometimes only takes a piece of ſtuff to make a petticoat, and a blanket. The children follow their mother, who takes care to provide for 'em, becauſe the poſſeſſions of every family, or of every tribe ('tis thus father Hennepin expreſſes it) are in common. Some indeed follow their father; but thoſe ſavages who ſeparate themſelves from their wives, generally leave the children with them, and tell 'em that they don't believe them to be their own. This is natural enough, if it be true that they are as eaſy and complaiſant as they are ſaid to be: at leaſt it appears by what Hennepin has related of them, that they have no great affection for the conjugal yoke, and that they ſeparate themſelves from their husbands without any reluctance. Nor are the men more juſt on that head; when a ſavage is out upon an inroad he ſhall hire a woman for ſome days, or weeks, which does not any way diſguſt her parents, becauſe they get furs by this cohabitation. The lawful wife, or which is more proper, the firſt wife, keeps the houſe, and ſows the corn, whilſt the other is roving up and down the country with her husband: but as ſoon as he is return'd home, he ſends back his fellow-traveller with preſents, and returns to his domeſtic wife, unleſs it happens that the charms of the former ſhould efface all the beauties of the latter. We muſt not omit that the wife has the ſame privilege, and that ſhe is allow'd to make herſelf amends during her husband's abſence. Notwithſtanding the account that has been given of the opinion theſe ſavages have of marriage and of conjugal fidelity, it yet meets with ſome exceptions. As we have ſome people among us that are mere ſavages upon that head, they in like manner have thoſe among them who obſerve ſtrictly all the duties of a married life, and who do not look upon it as a yoke, but a ſtate of felicity. In a word,

[a] The reader may obſerve that this contradicts what was obſerv'd page 41. line 21. &c. but after all, we don't pretend to anſwer for all the contradictions that are to be met with in the relations which travellers give us of the religions in America.

we meet with husbands in Canada who love their wives with the utmoſt tenderneſs.

The [a] moment a man has made ſome preſents to the parents of his future ſpouſe, ſhe becomes his property; and 'tis a purchaſe he has made. It ſometimes, tho' very rarely happens, that the parents take back their ſon-in law's children, and return them the preſents they had receiv'd. We have already obſerv'd in the foregoing diſſertation, that thoſe people have very little propenſion to jealouſy: nevertheleſs ſome ſavages are as jealous as the Italians, and puniſh the infidelity of their wives with great ſeverity. One of theſe husbands ſhall cut off his wife's noſe or ears, nay put her to death, which is attended with no other conſequence than his being oblig'd to make a preſent to the parents of the deceas'd, in order, we are told, to dry up their tears.

[b] Such ſavages as are bred up to war, don't marry before five and twenty or thirty, for fear of deſtroying their vigour by cohabiting with women: thoſe who have any commerce with them before that age, are look'd upon as a kind of cowards, or at leaſt as a ſett of people that are not fit either for war or hunting. But the reader is not to imagine they are chaſter becauſe they live in a ſtate of celibacy. The Canadans are of opinion, that a perpetual chaſtity occaſions vapours and pains in the back; ſo that a young warrior, who is deſirous of preſerving his health, [c] muſt run the match once a week.

[d] Here follows an account of thoſe Canadan amours as we find it in la Hontan. They never mention their paſſion to the ſhe-ſavages in the day-time, but ſay that the night is more ſuitable to amorous blandiſhments. [e] "As ſoon as a young man, after having "paid two or three viſits to his miſtreſs, imagines that ſhe looks upon him with a pro-"pitious eye, he behaves as follows, in order to be fully convinc'd of it. We are to "obſerve that the ſavages live in a kind of equality agreeable to the ſentiments of nature, "(which makes them not ſtand in fear of thieves and domeſtic enemies) for which reaſon "their hutts are open day and night. Two hours after ſun-ſet, the ſlaves take care to put "out the fire before they go to bed. Then the young ſavage goes into his miſtreſs's "hutt, wrapp'd up in a great many clothes, when he lights a kind of match at the "fire.... and afterwards draws near her bed. In caſe ſhe puts out the match, he lays "himſelf down by her, but if on the contrary ſhe wraps herſelf up in the bed-clothes, "he retires; for this is a ſign that ſhe is not pleas'd with his viſit." This is the match, the ceremony whereof is repreſented in four compartments.

The ſame author aſſures us, that theſe amorous ſhe-ſavages drink the juice of certain roots to prevent conception, or cauſe abortion; for if a young woman ſhou'd happen to have a child, ſhe wou'd never meet with a husband; conſequently they muſt be very nice artiſts to miſcarry when they pleaſe. "The moſt ſingular circumſtance, continues "the ſame author, is, that they give their lovers leave to ſit down by 'em on the bed, "only to talk with them a little; but if, among the ſeveral moments they ſpend toge-"ther, one ſhould happen to be more agreeable than the reſt, they won't ſcruple to "grant their lover the laſt favours. The reaſon of this is——the reſolution they have "taken of not being ſubject to their lovers."——Which cuſtom juſtifies what we have already advanc'd with regard to the notion theſe people have of the freedom of their women in that ſtate of independance which precedes marriage.

[d] We have omitted all the ornaments and rhetorical flouriſhes with which the Baron has ſtuff'd his relation, becauſe there is room to believe he had no other guide herein than his wild imagination. It will therefore be much ſafer to give credit to ſuch a writer as father Hennepin, whoſe plain and unaffected narration is more perſuaſive than all the ornaments of a monk, who takes pleaſure in diſguiſing the truth.
[e] La Hontan ſpeaks.

Whenever a Canadan ſavage, after having made himſelf famous by his warlike exploits atchiev'd againſt the enemies of his country, takes a reſolution of marrying, he draws up a leaſe for a certain term of years. They wou'd look upon a contract for life as the moſt grievous puniſhment, or an intolerable ſlavery. The ſavage therefore looks out for a wife ſuitable to him, after which both parties agree together, and communicate the intended marriage to their relations, who aſſemble in the hutt of the moſt antient perſon among them: there they make an entertainment, after the Canadan faſhion, on the day appointed, when they meet together with joy and ſatisfaction, ſing, and dance the marriage-dance. After theſe diverſions the bridegroom's relations withdraw, the oldeſt four excepted, when the bride, accompany'd with four antiquated ſhe-relations, preſents herſelf at one of the doors of the hutt, where the moſt decrepid of the bridegroom's four kinſmen comes to receive her, and leads her to her future conſort, to a place, where they are both made to ſtand upon a mat. A wand is preſented to them, which each of them holds by the end, whereupon the old men make a few very ſhort ſpeeches. The bride and bridegroom alſo ſpeak to one another alternately, having ſtill hold of the wand; they afterwards break it into ſeveral pieces, and diſtribute 'em to the ſeveral witneſſes. This ceremony being over, the bride is led out of the hutt, and the young maidens who waited for her at the door, conduct her back to her father's houſe, where her husband is oblig'd to viſit her, till ſuch time as ſhe has made him a father. When this happens, ſhe packs up her things, leaves her father's houſe, goes home to her husband, and cohabits with him as long as the marriage ſubſiſts.

La Potterie, author of the hiſtory of North-America, vol. 2. relates ſeveral other curious circumſtances in his ſecond volume upon this head. Whenever, ſays he, an Innamorato is ſure that his miſtreſs loves him, he addreſſes himſelf to his father, or his neareſt relation, who takes upon him to go and viſit his miſtreſs's father in the night-time. He awakes him, lights his pipe, and preſents it to him, and at the ſame time demands his daughter. When they are come to an agreement, the young man's father aſſembles all his relations, and declares to them his intention of beſtowing his ſon in marriage. Theſe relations bring as many things into his hutt, as they are able to beſtow, by way of portion for the young ſavage. His mother carries part of the goods to the young woman's hutt, and at the ſame time the bride's mother declares to her daughter that ſhe has married her to ſuch a one. The maiden muſt not offer to retract, 'tis even an honour to her to conſent at once: and from a ſtrange abuſe, continues the ſame author, the fathers, mothers, and eldeſt brothers, are allow'd to proſtitute ſuch a young woman, becauſe, ſay they, her body is not her own, but her relations. She nevertheleſs bewails her virginity, as he tells us [a] in another place. Having receiv'd her preſents, ſhe diſtributes 'em among the whole family, notifying to 'em at the ſame time, the new alliance. Every one gives ſomething towards the bride's portion. The bridegroom's mother and ſiſter alſo bring preſents to the bride, whom they equip in a very ſplendid manner on her wedding-day: this ſplendid dreſs, as they call it, is the having their hair perfum'd with bear's greaſe, and a good beaver's skin over their ſhoulders. In this geer ſhe goes to her mother-in-law's, who ſtrips her of her ornaments, and gives her others in exchange, together with a great kettle; when ſhe goes back again to her father's, where ſhe is again undreſs'd. Her mother gives her a certain quantity of maiz which ſhe carries to her husband, who undreſſes her a third time; when the two families divide all the preſents of the portion among themſelves.

The continence of the new-married man is very exemplary; he carries it to that length as to forbid himſelf for ſix months acceſs to a fort, which he has had the glory of conquering. However the Canadan laws allow him to conſummate the marriage four days after the ſolemnity; but he is perſuaded his abſtinence is an authentic teſtimony of the great affection he has for his wife, and wou'd have it imagin'd, that he had no other views, than to reflect an honour on himſelf by this alliance. The above-mention'd author author has expreſs'd himſelf pretty nearly in theſe words; 'tis he is to anſwer for the truth of it, or for the flouriſhes with which he may have embelliſh'd it. "At the end "of the year, continues the ſame author, the wife returns perhaps to her mother's hutt, "who now becomes the proprietor of all her ſon-in-law's poſſeſſions, as alſo of what-"ever he gets either in hunting or fiſhing. The husband not finding his wife at home, "and imagining ſhe is gone to her mother's, goes to the hutt at a time when he thinks "the whole family are aſleep; but the young woman's father and mother are upon the "watch, while ſhe, after all theſe preliminaries, is faſt aſleep by the fire-ſide, or pre-"tends to be ſo. The husband is no ſooner come into the hutt, but he knows the "fire was made upon his account; whereupon he ſits down by his wife. Then his "father-in-law riſes up with an air of coldneſs and indifference, fills his pipe, and gives "it him to ſmoak. His mother-in-law brings him a diſh of meat, and ſets it at his feet, "when he begins to eat, but does not utter a ſyllable." In a word, he continues two years with his father-in-law, during which time whatever he gets either in hunting, fiſhing, or by trade, belongs to his mother-in-law, as was before obſerv'd. [a] Here follows the way of life which the new-married couple are immediately oblig'd to lead. Decency does not permit 'em to ſpeak to one another in the day-time, unleſs it be to break out into injurious reproaches. The modeſty and baſhfulneſs of the ſavages demand expreſsly this conduct: As ſoon as the two years are expir'd, the ſon-in-law leaves his father-in-law, and then his wife and he ſet up houſe-keeping together, unleſs he has thoughts of taking a ſiſter-in-law for his ſecond wife. "The husband is not allow'd to "marry any woman but what he receives from the hands of the relations of his fa-"ther-in-law, who, if he pleaſes, may give him his other daughters in marriage; but "in caſe he has no more, the mother-in-law adopts ſome of her ſhe-ſlaves in favour of "her ſon-in-law, or gives him one of her nieces." We are told that intereſt gave riſe to this cuſtom. "The mother-in-law has all her ſon-in-law's poſſeſſions, and ſince if he "were to marry a ſecond wife in another family, the mother of the latter would have "the ſame right as his firſt wife's mother," it has been thought proper to check in ſome meaſure the inconſtancy of the ſavage husbands, by obliging them to marry only the daughters in one family, when they are deſirous of having ſeveral wives at once. We meet with ſomething like this in the ſtory of Jacob, who not only married Rachel and Leah, but even their ſervants. The firſt wife has certain privileges above the reſt, which occaſions jealouſy among the women, and is the cauſe of domeſtic quarrels; but the common husband bears all with the utmoſt patience, and is not a little proud of it, imagining that the jealouſy of his wives is a teſtimony of their affection.

We next proceed to the conſequences of marriage. The [b] ſavages of New-France preſer girls to boys, and affirm that they are the ſupport of a family. A menſtruous woman withdraws from ſociety, all the fires in her hutt are put out; they clean the fire-place; throw out all the aſhes that were on it; and ſtriking fire with a flint, light up a new one. This woman is oblig'd to live retir'd for a week together in a hutt tha thas no manner of communication with the reſt. The reſt don't drink at the ſtream ſhe has taſted, they never draw any water out of it, and ſhe ſets certain marks which diſcover the condition ſhe is in. When a girl finds her periodical diſtemper coming upon her for the firſt time, ſhe ſecludes herſelf for thirty days from all ſociety, except that of thoſe women who tend her, during which ſhe ſmears herſelf with coal. The moment a woman is with child, ſhe breaks off all communication with her husband, till ſuch time as the child is two years old; and when the time of her delivery draws near, they prepare a hutt for her, in which ſhe continues thirty days [c]; and if ſhe lies in of her firſt child, forty. All theſe cuſtoms have ſome affinity with the Jewiſh law. As to that which prohibits the man and woman from cohabiting together till the child is is two years old, 'tis too reaſonable to conceal its merit from the reader; and in caſe it be true, the ſavages are not very brutiſh on that account. The ſame author adds, than when the life of a child-bed woman is in danger, they carry her into the hutt in which ſhe uſually lives; but after her recovery, or in caſe ſhe happens to die, they pull down the hutt, and ſet it up in ſome other place.

Barrenneſs is one of the chief cauſes of divorce among the Americans, tho' they are allow'd to quit one another whenever they pleaſe. La Hontan tells us, that the Canadans generally give a week's notice before-hand, when they give the moſt ſpecious reaſons they can poſſibly invent, in order that their ſeparation may appear in ſome meaſure conſiſtent with good manners and civility. But in general, ſays he, theſe ſavages are not ſo very prying, and the only reaſons they give, is ſome pretended diſtemper; a deſire of eaſe, or a tranquility neceſſary for the recovery of their health. Thrice happy cure! the preſcription whereof is of too great a price in Europe to be as eaſily made uſe of there as in America. 'Tis however certain, that this remedy would be of vaſt ſervice to us, as 'tis productive of uncommon felicity. In Canada, when a husband and wife are reſolv'd to quit one another, the ceremony made uſe of on that occaſion is as follows: They bring into the hutt where the marriage had been celebrated, all the little pieces of the wand which had been made uſe of on that occaſion; theſe they burn with ſolemnity, which compleats the divorce without ſtrife or diſpute. The women have the ſame freedom of marrying again as the men; however, a kind of decorum forbids their ruſhing into the arms of a ſecond husband during the life of the firſt. When the husband and wife quit one another, they divide the children equally between 'em; for children, ſays la Hontan, are the treaſure of the ſavages. If there is an odd one, it always falls to the wife's lot.

The two compartments repreſent the marriage and divorce of the Canadans.

When a woman has ſeen fifty, ſhe never meets with another husband; the Canadans thinking it very ridiculous to marry a woman who is too old to bear children. When once a woman is upon the decline, ſhe has nothing charming in their eyes. What courſe ſhould thoſe women take, who find themſelves deſpis'd becauſe they grow old? I anſwer, they might conceal, by art, their age from the world: but in caſe their ſincerity will not ſuffer 'em to impoſe upon the other ſex, it muſt be own'd that they carry it to much greater lengths than our European ladies. An old woman of Canada, that has ſtill got a colt's tooth in her head, will adopt ſome priſoner of war, and keep him for her private uſe. We may naturally ſuppoſe that this ſlave is not one of the moſt contemptible ſons of Mars; be that as it will, 'tis natural to believe he is not ungrateful, and that he exerts himſelf to the utmoſt, to ſhew the deep ſenſe he has of his obligations to a paſſion which gives life to all men, and lengthens his own.

Of the Jugglers, and their manner of treating the ſick, &c.

ALL the ſavages above-mention'd are very healthy, and are free from a great number of diſeaſes which attack the Europeans. La Hontan tells us, that the ſmall-pox and pleuriſies are very rife among the Canadans; but as they are very vigorous and robuſt, when a man goes off the ſtage at ſixty, they ſay he died young; becauſe they often live to an hundred, and even upwards. A [a] writer whom we have quoted before, and who has given us a relation of Hudſon's-Bay, tells us, that the inhabitants of it enjoy a very vigorous old age. But when their vigour is quite exhauſted by age, they make choice of a voluntary death, the manner of which is as follows: The decrepid old man makes an entertainment after his manner, to which he invites his his family, and addreſſes himſelf to 'em all in a diſcourſe, the ſubject of which turns upon concord and the intereſts of his family. He then makes choice of that child who is moſt dear to him, and gives him a rope, which he ties courageouſly about his own neck, and deſires him to ſtrangle him, ſaying at the ſame time, that he looks upon himſelf no other than a burden to the world. The Maſſagetes us'd antiently to do the ſame piece of ſervice to their old relations. The ſavages of this Bay, continues the ſame author, eſteem it a happineſs to die in a decrepid old age: they feed themſelves with the thoughts of having a ſecond birth in the next world, at the age of children who ſuck at the breaſt, and that they ſhall then live in eternal youth: but that they ſhould meet with a contrary fate in the next world, were they to die young; in which caſe they would be born again old and infirm. This ridiculous notion might probably have been grounded on an opinion antiently receiv'd by the antient Jews and ſeveral other nations, viz. that long-life is the gift of heaven, that it is the reward of virtue, and that the gods puniſh thoſe who have not liv'd a life of virtue, by the infirmities with which they afflict 'em in this life, and afterwards by death.

[a] Sweating is one of the moſt common remedies which theſe people make uſe of. They have ſeveral ways of ſweating, but that which is practis'd by the inhabitants of the upper part of Miſſiſippi is too remarkable not to be mention'd: They make a hot-bath, into which the patient goes ſtark naked, with others as naked as himſelf, whoſe buſineſs it is to rub him. This bath they cover with the hides of wild bulls, flint-ſtones, and pieces of rock red-hot. The patient thus ſhut up in the bath, is oblig'd to keep in his breath every now and then, and while the juggler is ſinging as loud as he can bawl, thoſe who are in the hot-bath ſing alſo while they are rubbing him.

They cure diſeaſes of the legs and thighs by lancing the parts infected, with a knife made of ſtone or iron. Theſe inciſions are afterwards rubb'd with bear's oil, or the fat of ſome other wild beaſt. They alſo have an antidote to expel the poiſon of ſerpents, and make a potion that is good againſt agues.

All thoſe who go by the name of Jugglers act in the double quality of prieſts and phyſicians, which dignity they cannot attain to, till after having undergone a probation, [b] the manner of which is as follows: "They ſhut themſelves up in a hutt during "nine days[c], and are allow'd no other ſuſtenance than water: the novice holding a kind "of gourd-bottle in his hand, full of pebble-ſtones, with which he makes a continual "noiſe, invokes the ſpirit; beſeeches it to ſpeak to him, to admit him into the num-"ber of the phyſicians; the whole accompanied with the moſt terrible cries, howlings, "diſtortions and agitations, till he puts himſelf out of breath and foams at the mouth "in the moſt frightful manner. As ſoon as this hurly-burly, which is interrupted only "by a few moments of ſleep, that at laſt ſeizes him, is ended, on the ninth day he "comes out of his hutt——when he boaſts his having diſcours'd with the ſpirit, and "of having receiv'd from him the gift of healing diſeaſes, laying ſtorms, and changing "the ſeaſons." Father Hennepin adds, that nothing can be more dreadful than the cries and diſtortions of theſe jugglers, at the time of their practiſing their pretended enchant-ments. 'Tis certain that they carry it on with great skill and cunning: but in general, the cures they may perform by the help of theſe legerdemain-tricks, appear rather to be owing to chance, than to any skill they have in diſeaſes. However 'tis certain, they are acquainted with ſeveral phyſical herbs; nor is the uſefulneſs which ariſes from their repeated diſcoveries in ſweating, lancing, and rubbing, to be deſpis'd. 'Twould be as

[a] La Hontan gives another deſcription of the place where the ſavages of Canada ſweat: "Tis, ſays "he, a kind of oven cover'd with mats, skins, &c. in the center of it they put a porringer of burning "brandy, or great ſtones made red-hot, which raiſes ſo intenſe a heat, as immediately throws them "into a ſweat." They never let a week paſs without ſweating, and make no ſcruple of throwing themſelves in the winter-time into the water or ſnow, when they are all over in a ſweat.

[b] Deſcription of Louiſiana, in the collection of voyages to the North, vol. 5.

[c] A nine-days continual faſting does not appear very probable.

as unjuſt to aſſert that they perform no cures at all, as to affirm that the ſmall number of perſons they cure, is not more than ſufficient to ſupport their credit.

A juggler, ſays la Hontan, is a kind of phyſician, or rather quack, who having cur'd himſelf of a dangerous diſtemper, is ſilly enough to fancy himſelf immortal, and that he is endow'd with the virtue of healing all kinds of diſeaſes, by his diſcourſes with good or evil ſpirits.——Every one laughs at theſe jugglers behind their backs,—and looks upon 'em as madmen who have loſt their ſenſes by ſome violent fit of ſickneſs; they are nevertheleſs permitted to viſit the ſick, whether it be to divert 'em, or to ſee theſe tumblers jump, ſcream, howl, &c.———All this hurly-burly ends with their deſiring an entertainment of a buck, or of large trouts for the company, who are very merry on theſe occaſions.

This juggler makes a viſit to the patient, and examines him very carefully, promiſing at the ſame time to caſt out the evil ſpirit, when he immediately withdraws alone to a little tent pitch'd for that purpoſe; here he ſings, dances and howls like a goblin: he then comes and ſucks the patient in ſome part of his body, and drawing ſome little bones out of his own mouth, tells him that he has taken them out of his body; that he muſt chear up, ſince his diſtemper is but a very ſlight one, and that, to be the ſooner cur'd, he muſt ſend his ſlaves — to hunt the elk and ſtag — on which his cure depends. The arts which our quacks in Europe make uſe of, in order to maintain their credit with the vulgar, are almoſt as groſly ſtupid. We muſt not omit one remarkable circumſtance [a], which is, that in caſe the juggler has not wit enough to invent reaſons to juſtify his patient's death, they often make no difficulty to kill him upon the ſpot.

La Potterie relates in his hiſtory of North-America, that this quackery opens with a banquet, and that their old men aſſiſt at it; the phyſician comes into the aſſembly with a bag on his ſhoulders, in which he puts his medicines, having a gourd-bottle in his hand, with a ſtick run thro' it, which ſerves for a haft; he then ſings upon the ſubject of his medicines, beating time with his gourd-bottle, which is fill'd with little ſtones. On a ſudden the whole aſſembly are ſeiz'd with enthuſiaſtic fits, ſo that nothing is heard but the mingled noiſe of voices and gourd-bottles. Then the phyſician takes out his drugs, breaks out into ſome invocations, and begins to ſing again, ſtill continuing in the moſt violent agitations. The juggler afterwards draws near the patient with as haughty an air as the moſt able phyſician, turning ſeveral times round the patient in cadence, the aſſembly ſinging at the ſame time. He afterwards touches every part of the patient's body, and examines it with the attention of a man who really is, or would be thought to be a profound artiſt; after which he tells him very gravely, that he has a ſpell in ſuch a part of his body, that he muſt throw it out, that he is going to endeavour at it, that the diſeaſe is a very difficult one, and that he muſt perform a great many operations in order to compleat a cure. The relations of the patient liſten to the ſentence of this Æſculapius, rely upon his honeſty, and beg him to do all he can for their kinſman. They then ſing upon the ſubject of the wound, or the part infected, and bring a great kettle, in which they put the preſents that are made to the medico-prieſt; who wholly employ'd, in outward appearance, on the methods he muſt take to cure his patient, either meditates, or ſeems to do ſo, on what medicines will be expedient for that purpoſe. But now recovering himſelf from a kind of lethargy, he tells 'em that he has found out the diſtemper, which they believing, abandon the patient entirely to his care. After he has heartily tortur'd him by the medicines which he applies outwardly or inwardly, and by the violent agitations he throws him into, he then tells the company he either is, or is not cur'd. A cunning juggler, tho he does not cure his patient, is not at all deſpis'd upon that account, nor loſes any of that eſteem which his art had gain'd him; for he extricates himſelf by aſcribing his ill ſucceſs to the patient's ill ſtate of health, the power of the ſpell or charm, and the will of the ſpirits, who, ſays he, do all they can to deſtroy my work.

This juggling trade is very beneficial; nor is that of the quacks in Europe leſs ſo. La Potterie tells us, that the Ilinois and the ſouthern nations have the moſt able jugglers among them. Theſe ſavages boaſt their being able to kill an enemy tho' at two hundred leagues diſtance; for which purpoſe they make a figure of him, and therein ſhoot an arrow juſt oppoſite to the heart. Others take a flint ſtone about the bigneſs of a pidgeon's egg, and make a ſpell thereon, affirming that one of the ſame kind is form'd on the body of their enemy.

We are told of another remarkable kind of juggling, which is as follows: Whenever a patient fancies he is bewitch'd, or that the juggler perſuades him he is ſo, the latter goes to the patient's hutt, ſurrounded with a company of his young diſciples; they then extend the patient on the ground before the juggler, upon the skin of a beaver, or of ſome other beaſt. The phyſician feels every part of the patient's body with his hand, till he comes to the ſore part, on which the pretended ſpell has been thrown: then one of the juggler's diſciples lays the skin of a roe-buck, made into ſeveral plaits, upon the afflicted part, after which the phyſician throws himſelf with the utmoſt violence on the bewitch'd perſon, ſucks his blood, foams at the mouth, beats his own back, nor does he ſpare that of the patient, whom he beats from top to toe, in order to drive out the charm, which indeed he at laſt effects. The juggler then ſhews to the whole aſſembly the ſpell, which he had convey'd ſlily into his mouth, or into the plaits of his skin. However 'tis not always proper to produce the charm at the firſt ſignal, the juggler muſt have the art to vary the operation; and indeed it is ſometimes repeated, but without ſucceſs: however 'tis ſometimes at the expence of the patient; but the ſame maxim prevails among them as with us, viz. that 'tis better the patient ſhould ſuffer than the art.

Some of theſe jugglers give out certain ſecrets or charms, which are uſeful in war or hunting. La Potterie, who is not always to be depended upon, becauſe of the inaccuracy of his relation, tells us, that the moſt eminent jugglers are either lame or crook-back'd: that they ſometimes oblige the patient to run thro' flames and fires of the village: that in order to heal their ſick, they preſcribe dances, in which the men and maids proſtitute themſelves; that they plunge the patient naked into the water or ſnows, in the depth of winter.

They conſecrate, in ſome meaſure, the medicines they make uſe of; the ceremony whereof is perform'd in a very myſterious manner. They lay them on a skin, ordain a ſolemn feſtival, and dance round them a whole night long. We may naturally ſuppoſe that they have much efficacy after this. This being done, the juggler puts all the ſacred medicines again into his bag.

The odd geſticulations of theſe jugglers are very well expreſs'd in the firſt compartment of the plate repreſenting the funeral rites of theſe nations.

Funeral Rites of the Canadans, Miſſiſippians, &c.

FAther Hennepin tells us, in his New Diſcovery of a vaſt Country, &c. printed at Utrecht in 1697, that the Nadoueſſans bewail thoſe who fall in war, in order to ſtir up their countrymen to revenge, and till ſuch time as they have ſatiated it. The Relation printed under the name of the Chevalier de Tonti, in the fifth volume of the Collection of Voyages to the North, tells us of a people in Miſſiſippi, who fall into tears at the ſight of a foreigner. The reaſon of this is, that they fancy their deceaſed friends or relations are only gone a voyage, and are always expecting their return; and hope to meet with them among theſe foreign travellers. We are likewiſe told that they weep much more at the birth, than at the death of their children; they conſidering their birth, as an entrance into a ſtate of miſery and affliction.

They believe in tranſmigration, and the immortality of the ſoul. Some Savages are of opinion that they paſs into the ſouls of certain animals; others, that they ſhall enjoy a ſecond life, (provided they have fought courageouſly, and led a life of virtue) in the ſociety of a nation that live in the utmoſt felicity, and have a prodigious quantity of game; but if on the contrary they have led ill lives, they muſt expect to riſe in the midſt of an unhappy nation, who have no kind of game, and conſequently cannot divert themſelves with hunting. We find in the deſcription of Louiſiana, printed in the fifth Volume of the Collection of Voyages to the North, that the Caciques, or Chiefs of the Natches, pretend to be deſcended from the ſun, and that they ſhall return to it after death. Hennepin tells us, that the nations who inhabit near Miſſiſippi and Canada, fancy "that "the ſoul does not quit the body immediately after death: that they bury with the "deceaſed his bow, his arrows, ſome corn, and meat, in order that he may not want "proviſions before he arrives at the region of ſouls; and as they give a ſoul to every "ſenſible object, they tell us that men hunt the ſouls of beavers, elks, foxes, &c. "after death." That rakets alſo have ſouls, otherwiſe it would be impoſſible for the hunters to make uſe of them in paſſing over the ſnows in the next world; thoſe of their bows and arrows are uſeful to them in killing beaſts; thoſe of hooks and nets in fiſhing, &c.

[a] It may not be improper to give a ſpecimen of theſe abſurdities, which probably flow from the notion they have of an univerſal genius, as was before obſerv'd. They alſo are of opinion that departed ſouls have ſociety for ſome time among the living, and partake in all their rejoicings; for which reaſon they leave them a portion of what they had at their banquets.

They bury their dead with as much pomp as poſſible; they dreſs them, paint their faces and bodies with different colours, after which they [b] lay 'em in coffins made of the barks of trees, the outſide of which they make exceeding ſmooth with light pumice-ſtones. They then ſet up a palliſade round the tomb, which is always raiſed ſeven or eight foot from the ground.

We before took notice of the banquets theſe ſavages make for their phyſicians and ſick people. They alſo make entertainments for their dead, which are every way ſuitable to the circumſtances that occaſion them. Every thing is ſad and mournful: the parents of the deceaſed keep a deep ſilence, and will not allow dancing or ſinging. All the gueſts on theſe occaſions make preſents to the parents, which they throw at their feet, making at the ſame time a little compliment after their way. This, ſay they, is to cover him; that, to make a butt for him, or to ſurround his grave with a palliſade, &c.

Their women wear a mourning habit for a year together, during which they are not allow'd to take any diverſion. The father and brother of the deceaſed husband take care of the widow. La Hontan, on the contrary, relates, that widowhood among the Canadans laſts no longer than ſix months: "During which time, if either of the ſur-"viving parties dreams two nights together of the deceaſed husband or wife, they poiſon "themſelves with the utmoſt coolneſs and deliberation. But if the widower or widow "dreams

[a] Fame and glory come too late, when they find nothing of us to crown but our aſhes. Alas! of what uſe will thoſe things be to us, which we muſt ſee and hear, when we have neither eyes or ears. We laugh at the cuſtom of certain barbarous nations, who lay in the graves of their dead, the weapons they had made uſe of in their life-time; and at the ſame time commend thoſe who fatigue the brain in order to be admir'd by poſterity; as if thoſe organs of our bodies, by which we convey to ourſelves the thoughts of others, were not as compleatly deſtroy'd as the reſt; and that 'twas not equally neceſſary to be animated with life to hear a panegyric, as to make uſe of a ſpear or ſhield. Weekly Medley, N° 44.

[b] La Potterie tells us, that they cover the body with barks of trees, over which they throw earth and ſtones, and ſurround the whole with ſtakes to prevent wild beaſts from rooting it up. But theſe funeral rites are not uſed except in villages, for when they die in the open country, they lay 'em in a coffin made of barks of trees, which they lodge between the branches of the trees, or ſet them on four pillars.

" dreams but once of the deceaſed, they ſay that the ſpirit of dreams was not very certain
" the deceaſed was unſatisfy'd with being in the region of ſouls, ſince he is but juſt gone
" there, and does not dare to return again." They then think themſelves no longer oblig'd to keep the deceaſed company; and indeed it is but juſt they ſhou'd expect a ſecond ſummons on ſuch occaſions; and tho' they were not to viſit the deceaſed till after the tenth, 'twould ſtill be acting a very friendly part.

Several of theſe nations ſolemnize feſtivals in honour of the dead. They take their bones out of the graves, and convey 'em into others, having firſt adorn'd them with skins, and a kind of china-necklaces: all this, ſay they, is of uſe to comfort and relieve the deceaſed. Theſe feſtivals are celebrated annually, but not on any fix'd day, as La Potterie informs us. They ſend deputies to one another to ſolemnize theſe anniverſaries. In a word, the North Americans perform very ſcrupulouſly whatever may reflect an honour on the memory of the deceaſed. They weep over their graves, they groan, ſay prayers, and make preſents to the ſurviving relations, in order, ſay they, to dry up their tears. They have particular ceremonies for the children of ſuch perſons as are dear to 'em: they wrap their bodies in a skin painted with ſeveral colours, and afterwards carry 'em to the grave on a kind of ſledge: but they don't make any preſents to the relations of theſe children, but on the contrary have ſome gifts made to them, in order to dry their tears. We are not to omit that the corps is very well equipp'd. Hennepin tells us that they have new ſhoes on, a ſteel to ſtrike fire with, an ax, china-necklaces, a calumet, a great kettle, meat, tobacco, and an earthen-veſſel full of ſagamite, or milk thicken'd with corn. If the deceaſed was a warrior, they dreſs him in a military habit, and give him his bow and arrows; the ſouls of the latter never fail to follow their maſters; nay, thoſe of all their utenſils, not excepting the ſouls of their very kettles which the warrior had made uſe of in his life-time, and are greatly delighted to ſerve him in a delicious country, which they ſay lies to the weſt of 'em, and is inhabited by immortal hunters: for the only notion they have of this paradiſe, is, that they ſhall hunt in it to all eternity. This ſenſual notion prevents their comprehending thoſe which we form to ourſelves of the joys of heaven. If after having very calmly liſtned for a conſiderable time to what is objected with regard to that inactivity, or rather uſeleſſneſs of the ſenſes after this life, we ſhould ask, if they don't think our notions of paradiſe more conformable to reaſon than their own, they would anſwer, that they have their paradiſe, and we ours. Shall it be ſaid after this, that the wild Americans improve in the chriſtian religion? Wou'd not a Miſſionary loſe ſome of that patience which is the greateſt ornament of our religion, whenever a ſavage ſhould ſpeak to him in this manner: [a] You have not ſenſe enough to ask us what are our notions of a place, ſo much above [b] our heads, whither 'tis impoſſible for any man to aſcend? Canſt thou ſhew us, by the ſcripture thou mention'ſt to us, any man who came from above; and the manner how he aſcended thither? If the ſouls of thy countrymen go to heaven, 'tis very happy for them; but as for us, we don't go thither after death, but paſs into the regions of ſouls, &c. 'Tis not the ſtrength of the arguments that confounds the Miſſionary's reaſon, but the want of ſome handle, if I may be allow'd the expreſſion. 'Tis impoſſible to diſpute with a ſavage from revelation, if he does not give any credit to it. And if they diſpute with him from nature, how ſhall they inſtill faith into him by the bare aſſiſtance of human reaſon? This would be an attempt above the power of man; 'tis therefore only in the power of the Holy Ghoſt; 'tis he, would the Miſſionary ſay, works the miracle of our converſions. La Hontan gives us ſome other particulars concerning the funeral rites we juſt before quoted from Hennepin. " When a ſavage dies,
" they dreſs him as handſomely as poſſible, (La Potterie tells us, that they anoint his body all over, and alſo his hair with the oil of beaſts) " and then the ſlaves of his relations " come

" come and bewail his death: but that the mothers, ſiſters, or brothers of the deceas'd
" don't diſcover the leaſt token of ſorrow. They ſay that he is very happy in being " out of the reach of ſufferings, for——they believe that death is a paſſage to a better " life. As ſoon as they have dreſs'd the corps, they ſet it on a mat, as tho' he were " living. His relations ſet themſelves round about him, after which they all make a " ſpeech to him; they repeat to him all his noble exploits, and the glorious atchieve-
" ments of his anceſtors, when the laſt who ſpeaks addreſſes himſelf to him as follows:"
(If the baron has not embelliſh'd his relation with ſeveral flights of fancy, we muſt be forc'd to own, that a Canadan panegyriſt gives a judicious turn to every thing, and that his thoughts are witty enough.) " Thou art now, ſays the ſavage orator, ſitting in the
" midſt of us; thou haſt exactly the ſame ſhape as one of us, thou neither wanteſt arms,
" a head, or legs: nevertheleſs thou now ceaſeſt to be, and doſt begin to evaporate
" like the ſmoak of this pipe. Who was it that ſpoke to us two days ago? 'twas not " thee, otherwiſe thou would'ſt ſtill continue to ſpeak; 'twas therefore undoubtedly
" thy ſoul, that is now in the great region of ſouls, in company with thoſe of our na" tion. Thy body which we ſee before us, will in ſix months be what it was two " hundred years ago. Thou neither feeleſt or ſeeſt any thing, ſince thou thy ſelf art no" thing: nevertheleſs, becauſe of the friendſhip which we had for thy body, when thy " ſoul animated it, we beſtow upon thee theſe marks of our veneration, &c.

" Theſe ſpeeches ended, the male relations go out to make room for thoſe of the " other ſex, who pay the ſame compliment to the corps. They afterwards ſhut him " up for twenty hours in the hutt of the dead, during which they dance and have en" tertainments, [a] altogether unſuitable to the occaſion. The twenty hours expir'd, the " ſlaves carry him on their ſhoulders to the place, where they ſet him on ſtakes ten
" foot high, bury'd in a double coffin of bark, in which they lay his weapons, ſome
" tobacco, pipes, and Indian corn. As theſe ſlaves carry the corps, the relations of " both ſexes accompany it all the way dancing, while other ſlaves load themſelves with
" the baggage, which the relations preſent to the deceas'd, and lay upon his coffin.
" The ſavages of the Long River burn their bodies, keeping them firſt in little vaults, " till there is a conſiderable number of them, when they burn them all together, which " is done without the village in a place appointed for that purpoſe. The ſavages have " no mourning, and never make an eſpecial mention of the dead, that is, they never
" call them by their names. They laugh at us whenever they hear us talk of the " fate of our relations, kings, generals, &c.

" Whenever a ſavage dies, his ſlaves marry other ſhe-ſlaves, and become free. They " adopt the children that reſult from theſe marriages, and look upon 'em as children " of the nation, becauſe they are born in their villages, and country; nor is it juſt,
" ſay they, that they ſhould labour under the ſame ill fate with their fathers, or be " born ſlaves, ſince they themſelves did no way conſpire in their own begetting. The " ſame ſlaves go daily and offer ſome pipes of tobacco at the foot of their maſter's
" coffin, as a teſtimony of gratitude for their enfranchiſement."

La Potterie tells us, that whenever a child dies among the ſavages of Hudſon's-Bay, the father or mother cut off ſome of its hair, which they make up into a bundle like a doll, and ſet it in the fineſt part of their hutt, together with their moſt valuable goods. The child's mother mourns twenty days, and pours forth her grief to the friends of the family, who come and viſit her. The husband makes an entertainment for 'em, gives 'em tobacco to ſmoak, and they in return make preſents to him. The friends are oblig'd to eat every thing that is ſet before them, but the afflicted father does not touch a morſel, but ſatisfies himſelf with the ſmoak of his tobacco.

[a] Hennepin ſays the very contrary, as was juſt now obſerv'd. De la Potterie agrees better with father Hennepin than with la Hontan in this circumſtance.

The ſame author relates, that thoſe who are preſent at the burial, ſtrip the body, which is their perquiſite; and in caſe the deceas'd left nothing behind him, the relations are oblig'd to make up the deficiency. They mourn by not cutting off or greaſing their hair; by not taking the leaſt care of their perſons, and wearing nothing but tatter'd clothes. The parents wear mourning for their ſons: the ſons mourn for their father, and the daughters for their mother.

La Hontan tells us, that their councils are compos'd of the old men of the nation, who are all upwards of ſixty. The cryer gives notice of their meeting, by proclaiming it aloud in every ſtreet in the village, when the old men aſſemble in a hutt, deſign'd for that purpoſe. Here they ſeat themſelves in the form of a rhombus, when having debated upon what is to be done for the good of the nation, the ſpeaker goes out of the aſſembly: upon which the young people make a ring round him, himſelf ſtanding in the center. They afterwards liſten very attentively to the debates of the old men, crying at the end of every period, that's well.

The myſterious ceremony of the calumet, which is as it were the ſeal of all their debates, is the reaſon of our giving their councils a place among their religious ceremonies.

Their Dances.

THE ſame reaſon obliges us to ſpeak of their dances in this place. La Hontan tells us, that they are of ſeveral kinds; that of the calumet, the leader's dance, the war dance, the marriage dance, and that of the ſacrifice. All theſe differ in the movement, and the capers, and have their peculiar beauties, but that of the calumet is the fineſt. This is uſed when they are deſirous of receiving ſtrangers handſomely, or at the reception of embaſſadors. If theſe embaſſadors or foreigners come by land, they are oblig'd to ſend a meſſenger to the village, to give notice of their bringing the calumet of peace, when ſome young people advance forward, and range themſelves in an oval form. The foreigners advance forwards; they all dance together and make another oval round the officer who bears the calumet; this dance continues half an hour, after which they conduct the foreigners to the banquet. But in caſe they come by water, they are oblig'd to ſend a canoo to the village, with the calumet of peace fix'd in the prow like a maſt. The village ſends out another canoo to meet the ſtranger.

Ceremonies of War uſed by the Canadans and Miſſiſippians, &c.

WE ſhall open theſe ceremonies with the deſcription of that of the calumet. The American ſavages have their calumet of war and that of peace, which Hennepin tells us are diſtinguiſh'd by the difference of the feathers. Whenever a people whoſe herald has left the calumet with another people, is attack'd by an enemy, that which has receiv'd it, is oblig'd to ſtand by the invaded nation. In caſe a mediator, in the heat of of the battle, preſents the calumet, there immediately follows a ſuſpenſion of arms: and in caſe both ſides accept of it, and ſmoak out of the calumet, a peace is immediately concluded, and every man returns home: but tho' one ſide ſhould refuſe it, they would not thereby violate the right which the ſavages aſcribe to that inſtrument, and which is the ſame among them as the law or right of nations with us. La Potterie tells us, that by its red plumage, aſſiſtance is ſignify'd; white and grey mix'd, ſignify a ſolid peace, and an offer of aſſiſtance, not only to thoſe to whom the calumet is preſented, but alſo to their allies. A calumet that is red on one ſide, and white and grey mix'd on the other, is a double characteriſtic of peace and war at the ſame time: peace to thoſe towards whom the white and grey ſide is turn'd, and war to that people towards whom the red pointed.

The calumet dance is always a prelude to all great enterprizes among the ſavages. This dance ſtrengthens alliances; prepares to war; is a mark of the publick joy, the ſame as bonfires among us, after ſome ſignal victory, or on ſome prince's birth-day, &c. In a word it anſwers to our ball, for the Canadan ſavages often give ſuch foreigners as they have a mind to diſtinguiſh, the diverſion of the calumet, in like manner as we entertain with a ball.

Here follows the deſcription of the calumet dance, which La Hontan and other travellers call the war dance. 'Tis perform'd in a hutt in winter-time, and in the open air in ſummer. They then ſurround the ball-room with branches of trees, and ſpread a great mat made of bull-ruſhes, painted with ſeveral colours, and place on this mat, which ſerves for a carpet, the Manitou or tutelary deity of the perſon who gives the dance. They place the calumet to the right-hand of this god; for this feſtival is celebrated in his honour, or 'tis he at leaſt that preſides at the ceremony; and they raiſe round the calumet a trophy of bows, arrows, clubs and axes. After having thus diſpos'd things in their order, and a little before the dance begins, that is to ſay, as the aſſembly grows more and more numerous, they go and ſalute the deity. This homage conſiſts in perfuming him with tobacco. The fineſt voices are allow'd the beſt ſeats, and the reſt range themſelves in a ring under the trees, all ſitting upon their poſteriors. One of the chief in the aſſembly takes up the calumet in a very reſpectful manner, and holding it in both his hands, dances in cadence, himſelf dancing at the ſame time, obſerving always to keep time with his fingers. All the motions of the calumet are odd and whimſical, and have perhaps their meaning. They ſometimes ſhew it to the aſſembly, then preſent it to the ſun, and often hold it towards the ground; they extend its wings as if they were going to ſet it a flying; laſtly they bring it near the mouths of thoſe preſent, as if they were going to give 'em the calumet to kiſs. This is the firſt act of that rejoicing, which we may call a religious feſtival. They afterwards have a combat, to which they are animated by the ſound of drums or a kind of kettle-drum; and the voices ſometimes ſing in chorus with the warlike inſtrument. Then the ſavage who has the calumet in his hand, invites ſome young champion to take up the weapons that are hid under the mat, and challenges him to fight with him; when the young warrior taking his bow, his arrows and ax, attacks him who has the calumet in his hand. The combat is fought in cadence, when the calumet, which at firſt ſeem'd to quit the field, is declar'd to be victorious. They were certain that fate wou'd declare in its favour. The third act of the ceremony, relates entirely to the conqueror of the young warrior. He relates his military atchievement to the aſſembly, ſtriking with a club upon a poſt that is fix'd in the center of the circle, at the concluſion of every incident, as la Hontan aſſures us; and when he has no more to ſay, the preſident of the aſſembly makes him a preſent of a fine robe of beaver skin, after which the calumet is given into the hands of another ſavage, and from thence to a third, and ſo on till the whole aſſembly have perform'd the ſame ceremony. If the calumet is danc'd upon account of an alliance, the preſident concludes the ceremony by preſenting the calumet to the deputies of the nation with whom the alliance is made.

Theſe ſavages declare war by ſending back a priſoner to the nation with whom they intend to be at variance, giving him at the ſame time an ax, the haſt of which is painted red and black, with orders to give it to his country-men. They ſometimes ſend back three or four priſoners, but firſt make them promiſe not to ſerve in that war. The proclamation of war opens with a banquet, to which the [a] general of the enterprize invites all his friends. This is a banquet-council, which poſſibly may bear ſome affinity to thoſe of the antient Germans. Hennepin tells us that they ſometimes make ten or twelve entertainments before their ſetting out. Be that as it will, the general communicates his deſign to the aſſembly, and the meaſures he intends to follow to put it in execution. This preliminary to his enterprize is accompany'd with the ſongs and dances of the Calumet. He there fixes the day of ſetting out, and the place of rendezvous. They generally make choice of the night, the better to conceal their march; but when it is to be general, the preparations are made with great pomp and ſplendor. They make entertainments, and offer ſacrifices; the wives and maidens are order'd to proſtitute themſelves, the better to engage their warriors to exert themſelves for their country. Finally, they beſtow extraordinary honours on thoſe heroes, and reward them beforehand by gifts and preſents, for all the ſcalps which they promiſe themſelves they ſhall carry off from the enemy.

La Hontan tells us, that the ſavages of Canada begin to enter into the field at twenty years old, and never bear arms after fifty. From twenty to fifty they go by the name of warriors. Theſe warriors never go upon any enterprize without firſt conſulting their old men, and are oblig'd to propoſe all their deſigns to them. The old men debate thereon, after which the ſpeaker goes out of the council-hutt, and declares the reſolution that was taken in it, in the manner juſt mention'd.

They are two or three months in making their warlike preparations. The general [b] ſings military ſongs every night, faſts once every two days, does not eat with the reſt, prepares a ſolemn feaſt before his ſetting out, to which all the warriors of the canton are invited; hangs great kettles and porcelane-necklaces on the poles of his hutt, gives and receives preſents. Before he goes into the field, he makes a ſpeech to the old men, in which he declares to them pretty near the time when he intends to make his excurſions. He then begins to march, and ſings the ſong of death. This ſong is made up of all the terms that fury can poſſibly dictate. One of the ſofteſt expreſſions in it, is, that he abandons his body to the chance of war. We are told that he ſings and faſts every day till night, to the time of his performing his enterprize: then his face is ſmutted with black, and thoſe of his ſoldiers much after the ſame manner, in [c] order, ſay they, that their enemies may not ſee them grow pale with dread. He eats alone. Some ſavages of Canada have a ſolemn feſtival the day after their ſetting out, by which they implore their great ſpirit to grant them a propitious return. Here follows the ſubſtance of the deſcription of it, as we find it in the relation of a traveller, who was himſelf an eye-witneſs thereof, and was undoubtedly very well acquainted with the ceremonies and cuſtoms of thoſe nations. " The [d] day after the ſetting out, ſays he, (of the Miamis) " a ſolemn feſtival was celebrated, purpoſely that the great ſpirit might grant them a " happy return. They erected an altar, on which they placed their gods; theſe were " bear's

[a] If the general marches, his cryer publiſhes throughout the village, the day he intends to give the war-feaſt, when all who have a mind to be his gueſts, have their diſhes carried to the general's hutt. The aſſembly being met, the general goes out into the publick ſquare, having his club in his hand, and follow'd by his warriors, who ſeat themſelves round him. Immediately ſix ſavages, each bearing a war-like inſtrument, that has ſome reſemblance to a kettle-drum, come and ſquat themſelves down at the foot of the pole or ſtake fix'd in the center of the circle. At the ſame time the general looks ſtedfaſtly on the ſun, all the warriors do the ſame; when he makes a diſcourſe, or rather prays, to the great ſpirit: afterwards the ſacrifice is offer'd up. La Hontan's Voyages.

" bears skins made up like ſo many idols, whoſe heads they had ſmear'd over with " green earth. As every zealot paſs'd along before theſe deities, he bent the knee in " a ſuitable manner. The jugglers, and the reſt of that order, held their phyſical and " juggling bags in their hands; affirming, that they mark'd out all thoſe whom they " were reſolv'd to have die in the field; and ſome were ſeen at that time who pre- " tended to fall down dead; but the jugglers applying a certain medicament to their " lips, ſeem'd to raiſe 'em, by giving them a very hearty ſhake. They made " ſeveral groteſque and ridiculous poſtures; they danc'd to the ſound of gourd-bottles " and drums; they divided themſelves into two bands, one of which charg'd, while " the other ſtood upon their defence, the warriors being arm'd with otter and adder " ſkins. Theſe skins, ſaid they, mark'd out all thoſe for death on whom the lot fell: " but by a contrary effect gave life to ſuch as were friends. The maſter of the cere- " monies, walking with great gravity between two old men and two women, went " himſelf, and proclaim'd to the whole village the time fix'd for the ceremony; lay- " ing his hands on all he met in his way, as it were to give them his bleſſing; " upon which all who receiv'd it, threw themſelves proſtrate on the ground, embraced " his knees, imagining, without doubt, that after this they ſhould have a much greater " ſhare of the grand ſpirit's favour. Afterwards there was nothing ſeen but pious " and ſacred dances; and nothing heard but dogs bemoaning the rigour of fate in their " dumb language, by which they were condemn'd as victims, to appeaſe the wrath of " the grand ſpirit, and to draw down his bleſſing upon the people. In fine, thoſe " poor animals were ſacrificed. After this, the jugglers endeavour'd to raiſe, that is, " to bring out of their trances, certain perſons who lay as dead, who, upon their " recovery danced apart by themſelves, while others counterfeited the dead in their " turn. Men, women, and children died higgledy-piggledy, and roſe again in the " like manner; and their jugglers acted their parts in dying and riſing again, like the " reſt. The trances were ſucceeded by miracles. Some ſwallow'd ſticks a foot and a " half in length, and others ſwan's and eagle's feathers. They firſt died, then a juggler " raiſed them, and afterwards they danc'd to thank the gods." Theſe ceremonies laſted five days ſucceſſively. They withdrew in the night to their hutts, or ſome ſuch place, and the next morning they return'd in proceſſion to the place of public reſort in the village, when this piece of devotion concluded by preſents which the people made to the jugglers.

The warriors carry their wives and concubines with 'em into the field. When they draw near the territories of the enemy, they detach ſome ſcouts, to prevent the main body from being ſurpriz'd. After they have ended their enterprizes, in which they generally attack their enemies by thruſts and puſhes, or by lying in ambuſcade, they take off the ſcalps from the dead, and break out into what they call the mournful ſhout. They even give the enemy notice, running away at the ſame time, as faſt as their legs can carry them, to come and bury their dead; for theſe ſavages, tho' they may appear to our eyes to be diveſted of all pity and compaſſion, are nevertheleſs of opinion that 'tis one of the duties of humanity to bury [a] the dead immediately. In this manner the Ilinois and other ſavages of Canada treat the Iroquois, according to la Hontan. All theſe theſe ſavages divide the priſoners they take among their reſpective families; but a ſurprizing circumſtance is, that theſe captives who are expoſed in a public manner, each having a wand ſeven or eight foot in length in his hand, and ſet off with tufts of white feathers, ſing all the time the reſt are reſolving upon their fate, tho' they are almoſt ſure of being ill-treated and inſulted by their enemies. The reader may conſult the account which Hennepin gives us of this matter, and what will be mention'd on this head in the enſuing article.

[a] As they return from their expeditions, they make their court very aſſiduouſly to the chief leaders. As ſoon as the night draws on, and that they are going to incamp, the young warriors dance the Calumet. The captain to whom they pay this homage, ſends a warrior of his own family; and this officer makes them ſmoke one after another in his Calumet of war. We call it a homage, tho' it may poſſibly be an act of humiliation. Hennepin relates, "that the ceremony was every day cloſed by thoſe whoſe relations "had been kill'd in war. They took ſeveral arrows, and laying them croſs-wiſe, pre-"ſented them by the ſharp end to their leaders, weeping bitterly at the ſame time."

The commander keeps a kind of open table during the time that the war laſts, at which the principal ſavages are preſent. Here they dance after dinner, and while one part of the aſſembly is dancing, the tears and groans of thoſe are heard whoſe friends or relations loſt their lives in the field. This ceremony, which at firſt ſeems to be a public rejoicing, changes afterwards into a whimſical intermixture of joy and cruelty. Theſe ſavages unite tolerably well certain paſſions, which one would be apt to think incompatible.

AS ſoon as a priſoner is bound, he [b] ſings his death-ſong, becauſe he knows 'tis a thouſand to one if he be pardon'd. When the campaign, or rather the inroad, is ended, the ſavages return to their village. In drawing near to it, they break out as many times into the dead ſhout as they have loſt men; and when they are come pretty near home, they ſing the mournful ſong as many times as they have kill'd enemies. In the mean time, their youth of twelve or fifteen years of age make a lane, and are all arm'd with clubs to beat the priſoners with; they repeat their blows as ſoon as the warriors have made their entry, and that the ſcalps of their enemies appear, which are the trophies of their warlike exploits. The next day the council meets to make a diſtribution of theſe unhappy wretches, who are always beſtow'd on ſuch wives as have loſt their husbands, or ſuch young women as have loſt their fathers.

[c] After the diſtribution, thoſe who thereby become their maſters, have the liberty of treating them as they pleaſe, and may either kill or ſave them. They take care to feed them well, and even give them every thing that is moſt [d] delicate in its kind, in order that they may have ſtrength enough to ſuffer death with bravery and reſolution.

We have already obſerv'd, that the death of theſe captives is a kind of ſacrifice, which is manifeſt from the ſentence that is paſs'd on the condemn'd. La Hontan tells us, that when a woman to whom a priſoner has been allotted, is reſolv'd to put him to death, ſhe tells him, that as her father, her brother, or her husband, has no ſlave to aſſiſt or wait upon him in the region of the dead, he muſt therefore ſet out immediately for that purpoſe. The perſon to whom we are oblig'd for the death-ſong, and who was himſelf an eye-witneſs

"I am brave and intrepid; I am not afraid of any kind of death, for I "am a warrior, and deſpiſe the moſt dreadful torments: all thoſe whom they terrify, are daſtard ſouls "and cowards, and are worſe than women. The brave don't value life. May rage and deſpair ſeize my "enemies! Let me devour 'em! Let me drink their blood! &c." We are oblig'd to an inhabitant of New York for this ſong.

witneſs to what he relates, adds, that they often ſpeak thus to the ſlave condemn'd to die; Thou muſt die to appeaſe the ſoul of him thou haſt kill'd. The Iroquois dreſs up thoſe captives they condemn to the flames, as pompous as poſſible. After they have fatned him for a conſiderable time, as was before obſerv'd, he is adorn'd with porcelane-necklaces from head to foot, and led to the ſtake.

After ſentence has paſs'd upon him, he is tied to the ſtake, when they burn his body with iron inſtruments, during which he ſings the death-ſong. The unhappy wretch diſcovers a moſt ſurprizing conſtancy under theſe torments; for he is not ſeen to ſhed one tear, and indeed were he to do ſo, they would reproach him with his want of courage: he poſſeſſes himſelf to a wonder in the midſt of his torments; laughs at his executioners, and tells them they don't underſtand their buſineſs. [a] When they have tortur'd him in the moſt grievous manner, they take off his hair together with the skin, which they leave hanging on his ſhoulders; this being done, thay lay a porringer full of burning ſand upon his head to ſtop the bleeding. He then is looſed from the ſtake, which they call beſtowing life on the priſoner, when they bend him towards that ſide where the ſun ſets, (the reſt pelting him with ſtones as he goes along) for the ſavages place the region of ſouls to the weſt, as was before obſerv'd. Then they cut and mangle his fleſh, he being ſtill alive; and when he is dead, they all run in the night-time, and beat up and down with their clubs; in order, ſay they, to drive out the ſoul of the priſoner, who probably may have hid itſelf, to revenge the torments and inſults they had inflicted on his body. Some days after the execution, a ſolemn feſtival is made, during which they invite each other to entertainments. They are ſure not to omit ſinging and dancing; but this feſtival was chiefly inſtituted for the diſtribution of the ſcalps of ſuch priſoners as they had taken or kill'd in war. The warriors tie to the ſcalp a porcelane-necklace, repreſenting the body of the perſon kill'd.

It frequently happens that a woman to whom a priſoner is given as a ſlave, yielding to the ſoft emotions of pity, gives him his life, delivers him from the bonds of ſlavery, and captivates him with thoſe of love. Whatever may have been the motive of his having life granted him, he muſt yet be reſtor'd to that liberty, which the ill ſucceſs of war had depriv'd him of, in a ſolemn manner. They adopt him; and for this purpoſe, they carry him to the water-ſide, in order to waſh him, the women and young girls ſtill bewailing the death of the ſavage he ſucceeds: but the men ſing the war-ſongs, and cover the body of the adopted perſon with a new robe of beaver skins; after which he is number'd among the relations of that family, on whom he had been beſtow'd in the diſtribution of the plunder. [b] This ceremony is alſo call'd, delivery, or child-birth. They celebrate this ſolemnity by an entertainment, at which time the priſoner is adopted either as ſon, brother, uncle, couſin, or nephew, according to his age or quality.

Cœlius Rhodiginus tells us, but without quoting any authority, that the antient Scythians uſed alſo to ſcalp their enemies.

We ſhall cloſe this article with a cuſtom which muſt naturally inſpire 'em with a prodigious deal of courage, and that is their never allowing their priſoners to be exchang'd. " As ſoon as they are taken priſoners, ſays la Hontan, their relations and their whole " nation look upon 'em as dead, unleſs they happen to have been ſo much wounded ---- " that it was impoſſible for 'em to kill themſelves; in this caſe they are receiv'd, provided " they have been able to reſcue themſelves out of the hands of their enemies: whereas " were the former to come, they would not be regarded, even by their own relations, nor " even meet with one ſingle perſon that would look upon 'em."

Super-

[a] La Hontan obſerves, that the priſoners are treated much more cruelly, when there are proofs of their having kill'd women and children. If it appears that they have kill'd men only, their vengeance goes no farther than the ſhooting them with guns or arrows.

Superſtitious Ceremonies of thoſe Nations, before they go a hunting.

[a] HEnnepin has given us a deſcription of this ceremony, as practis'd by the Iroquois and Miſſiſippians. A few days before theſe people ſet out to hunt the wild bull, their old men ſend out five or ſix hunters to thoſe places where the chaſe is to be. When the hunters are got there, they dance the calumet, with as much ceremony as if they were among ſome of their confederate nations; and at their return, they expoſe publickly for three days ſucceſſively, ſeveral great kettles ſet off with feathers. During theſe three days a woman of diſtinction walks in proceſſion with the caldron at her back before a great number of hunters. The company is headed by an old man, who, with great gravity carries a piece of cloth, or ſomething like it, by way of ſtandard or enſign. Hennepin, who aſſures us that he himſelf ſaw this proceſſion paſs along, relates, that "this old man made the hunters or warriors halt three or four "times, to bewail the death of thoſe wild bulls they flatter'd themſelves they ſhould "kill. At the laſt halt, the old men in the company ſent out two of their beſt hunters "as ſcouts, to look for wild bulls. They whiſper'd them in the ear at their return, "before they begun the chaſe. They then lighted up bull's dung dry'd in the ſun, "and prim'd, as it were, their calumets with this new fire, which they preſented to "thoſe hunters who had been out upon the ſcout, in order for 'em to ſmoak. The "ceremony ended, an hundred men went behind the mountains, and the ſame number "march'd another way, in order to ſurround the bulls, &c."

Before a young hunter goes to the chaſe for the firſt time, he is oblig'd to keep a religious faſt, to which he prepares himſelf with the care and attention that is generally obſerv'd by thoſe who go thro' a ſtate of probation in any order ſoever, when they are juſt growing up to manhood. This faſt continues three days, during which the novice is oblig'd to daub his face over with black, and imagines it to be a homage he is bound to pay the great Spirit. He preſerves a piece of fleſh from every deer, in order to devote it to him; and theſe pieces are ſo holy, that no other ſavage but the hunter dares to touch them, not even altho' he were almoſt ſtarv'd.

Their Vows.

ALL relations are ſilent upon this head of devotion Here follows the only inſtance we meet with of that kind. [b] Whenever there happens a great ſcarcity of victuals, they promiſe the great Spirit, that a portion of the firſt beaſt they kill ſhall be given to one of the moſt conſiderable of their nation, as a teſtimony of the love they bear it; and that they will not eat any of that animal before the diſtribution is made. The above-mention'd author adds, "that they ſometimes keep the beaſt two months," till ſuch time as they meet with a perſon of diſtinction to whom they may give the devoted morſel; if the beaſt ſhould ſtink or rot during that time, they burn it, in order to offer it in ſacrifice. Such as don't make any vow to gain the favour of the great Spirit, at leaſt take care to recommend themſelves to the protection of their Manitou. They preſent a lighted pipe to him thrice, break out into lamentations, beſeech him to hear 'em, and recommend their perſons and families to his protection. Mournful ſongs bear a part in this religious ceremony.

The Heraldry and Hieroglyphicks of the Savages.

WE preſume the reader does not ſuppoſe the ſavages are very well skill'd in heraldry; but as la Hontan, has thought proper to give the name of coats of arms to certain rude and ill-ſhap'd figures, which thoſe people paint on the trees, as ſo many monuments of their victories, and which poſſibly they revere as deities, we ſhall alſo call 'em by that name, and deſcribe them as follows. Whenever a party of ſavages has gain'd a victory over their enemies, the conquerors, at their return into their country, peel the bark from the trees to the height of five or ſix foot in all places, where they halt, and then paint on the naked trunk ſeveral groteſque images, which are either ſo many figures that repreſent ſymbolically, or hieroglyphically, the character they aſcribe to themſelves, or elſe the images of their tutelary genius. Theſe images are made of coal, ground and beat to powder in fat or oil.

Theſe nations alſo expreſs their thoughts by hieroglyphicks. La Hontan furniſhes us with ſome inſtances to this purpoſe, ſuch as the following: The arms of France with an ax and ſeveral tens over them, ſignify that the French have rais'd the ax; that is to ſay, have proclaim'd war, and fought againſt them with as many warriors as there are tens in the figure.

Of their Year.

THE year [a] among the Hurons and ſeveral other nations of Canada and Miſſiſippi, is compos'd of twelve [b] ſynodical lunar months, but with this difference, that every thirty moons they paſs over a ſupernumerary one, which they call the loſt moon. All theſe lunar months have names ſuitable to 'em. They give the name of the worm moon to the month of March, becauſe thoſe inſects begin to diſcover themſelves at that time; that of the moon of plants to the month of April; the moon of ſwallows to that of May, and ſo on. The Flemmings have the ſame form of ſpeech in their tongue: The month of February is by them call'd [c] the month in which they lop or prune the trees; the month of April, [d] that in which the meadows are fit for mowing. We muſt here explain what we before mention'd of the loſt moon of the ſavages. [e] Let us ſuppoſe March to be their thirtieth lunar month, and that thus it ends the revolution of thirty months, in that caſe there will be a loſt or intercalary moon between March and April, after which the month of April will be reckon'd as the firſt of the ſynodical revolution of thirty months. This we believe is the only explication that can be given to la Hontan's relation. Inſtead of reckoning by weeks, a calculation never us'd by the ſavages, they compute time from the firſt to the twenty ſixth of their lunar months; which comprehends juſt as much time as is between the inſtant in which the moon begins to diſcover the edge of its half-face in the evening (theſe are la Hontan's words) till her almoſt diſappearing in the morning. This is what they call the month of illumination: "As for inſtance, a ſavage will ſay, I ſet out the firſt of the ſturgeon month, which is the "month of Auguſt, and I return'd the 29th of the month of Indian corn, i. e. that "of September; the day following, which was the laſt, I lay by. Nevertheleſs as "there ſtill remains three days and an half of dead moon, which is their manner of "expreſſing themſelves, during which time 'tis hid from their ſight, they give them "the [b] This is a term in aſtrology: a ſynodical month is the ſpace of twenty nine days and a half, which the moon employs from the time of her being once with the ſun under the ſame degree of the zodiack, till her meeting with him again under another degree. Robault's phyſicks.

" the name of naked days." 'Tis evident that this way of meaſuring time is very troubleſome and intricate. They compute their artificial day and night by a quarter, ahalf quarter, half, three quarters, ſun-riſing and ſetting, day-break, and twilight. But if it be objected that this way of computing cannot be exact, in ſuch parts of the year when neither the ſun nor moon appear in their horizon, la Hontan anſwers, that repeated experience, and an extreme attention, which the Europeans are ſeldom capable of, becauſe of the great diſtraction of their thoughts, teach them to know exactly the hour either in the day or night-time, tho' the weather be never ſo cloudy.

Of their Memorials, when they treat upon any affair.

THESE people expreſs their thoughts by hieroglyphicks, as was before obſerv'd: but when they treat upon any very important affair, they make uſe of necklaces, [a] made of porcelane beads, or pieces of black and white ſhells cut long-wiſe, ſtrung and rang'd in ſuch a manner, as to compoſe a variety of figures that look pretty enough. Theſe necklaces are two foot long, and about three or four inches broad. They in ſome meaſure ſupply the want of writing, whenever any treaty or ſuit of law is to be determin'd, &c. Theſe their warriors uſe as bracelets and girdles, and put them over white ſhirts. The reader will have a better idea of the uſe of theſe necklaces, by reading the negotiations of the French or Engliſh with the ſavages, as related by travellers. Suffice it to obſerve, that every necklace contains either a point to be treated on, or ſome remarkable circumſtance: as for inſtance, if they are to treat with a nation with whom they were before at variance; or if they are to communicate any affairs to an ally, they ſend him as many necklaces as there are affairs in agitation. One of theſe ſhall ſignify a piece of intelligence, another a compliment of condolance, a reconciliation; ſhall ſhew that they enter into a deſign, and are reſolved to ſhare in ſuch an enterprize, &c.

Religion of the Inhabitants of Cibola, of New-Albion, of New-Mexico, California, &c.

IF we may give credit to the relation of fryar Mark of Niſa, whom Antonio de Mendoſa, viceroy of Mexico ſent with ſome other Spaniards to diſcover the north coaſts of America, ſcituated on the South-Sea, the government of Zuny or Cibola is ſo well regulated, that we can ſcarce conſider thoſe people as ſavages. They dwell in cities, in which are ſeveral houſes built of ſtone; the form of their government is ſuch, as diſcovers that they are not entirely ignorant of thoſe circumſtances that conduce to the maintaining of order and regularity: but nevertheleſs, the little religion they ſeem to have, is vaſtly odd and whimſical, if we are to give credit to what Francis Vaſques relates, viz. that the people of Cibola pay no adoration to any thing but water, " becauſe, ſay they, it contributes to the growth of corn and other food; which is a " proof of its being the only ſupport of life."

The famous Sir Francis Drake, who made ſo many expeditions in the ſixteenth century, diſcover'd New-Albion, ſcituated on the South-Sea, in the 38th or 40th degree of north latitude. He imagin'd he diſcover'd ſome footſteps of religion in the inhabitants of that coaſt. He ſaw ſome women tearing their cheeks, bewailing and inflicting a variety of tortures on themſelves, all which, he thought, was ſome indication of religious worſhip. He had the honour to ſalute the king or cacique of the country and all his court. Their dreſs and ornaments, which conſiſted of feathers, rabbit skins, and lays of colours, whimſically daub'd over the body of the king, and thoſe of his courtiers, were not able to tempt Drake, in whoſe favour the king of New-Albion offer'd to abdicate his crown. His majeſty ſet it on the head of that illuſtrious Engliſhman with his own hand, put the royal chain about his neck, and heighten'd the whole ceremony with a ſong; but all to no purpoſe: Sir Francis refus'd the kingly dignity with as much generoſity, as the New-Albion monarch had offer'd it to him. The reader may poſſibly ask, what traces of religion could be diſcover'd in this ceremony? but that muſt be demanded of Drake himſelf. He tells us, that thoſe ſavages mixing among his people, wept, groan'd, and tore their faces, making their offerings at the ſame time; and that his companions endeavour'd to make 'em underſtand that religious worſhip was due to the true God only. In the whole he does not inform us, what it was in which the worſhip of the ſavages conſiſted. 'Twould be very difficult to form any ſolid notions from conſequences drawn from a few ſigns, which are generally fallacious.

All that can be ſaid on the religion of the ſavages of New-Mexico, is, that they worſhip idols. If the reader goes on to enquire, we will tell him, that the devotees among the idolaters have their oratories, where they worſhip the devil; here they offer meat to him for his ſuſtenance. They dedicate to him chapels, which are built on an eminence [a]: 'tis here the devil goes generally to divert and repoſe himſelf, whenever he is forc'd to ramble from one city to another. 'Tis to be obſerv'd, that travellers ſave themſelves from entring into abundance of particulars, by bringing in the devil in all the notions which idolaters form to themſelves of the ſupreme Being. This is the ſyſtem of occult qualities in religious matters. The ſavages of the province of Los Quires ſeem to worſhip the ſun, the moon and ſtars: this conjecture is grounded on the repreſentation of thoſe heavenly bodies painted on their tents and pavilions. We are told in general, that all theſe people hold a very ſtrict correſpondence with the devil.

Ferdinand Alarchon imagining that the Californians ador'd the ſun, made uſe of a very unapoſtolical method to bring them over; but after all, his buſineſs was to get his king new ſubjects and to increaſe the number of good chriſtians. He declar'd to 'em, that he was ſent by the ſun to exhort them to peace and unity. Some Indians, who ſuſpected the truth of his miſſion, ask'd, why he had delay'd to ſend him ſo long? To which he reply'd, that he was too young: which anſwer was perfectly well adapted to a ſavage. The concluſion of the conference was, that they acknowledg'd him to be the ſon of that planet. This pretended ſon, in order to encreaſe the number of the elect, rais'd a wooden croſs, and commanded his companions the Spaniards to adore it, as an example for the imitation of the infidels. To theſe he preſcrib'd the time and manner of adoration. As we may take it for granted that he had obſerv'd they worſhipp'd the riſing-ſun in the morning, he told 'em that they were to worſhip the croſs at the ſame hour. [b] Father Picolo relates, in his account of California, that he could not diſcover the leaſt form of government, or hardly any marks of religion or regular worſhip among that people. "They worſhip the moon, and cut their hair (I cannot affirm, continues the "ſame author, whether it be in the wane) in honour of their Deities. This they "give to their prieſts, who apply it to ſeveral ſuperſtitious uſes."

Marriage-Ceremonies, and other Cuſtoms of the Indians of New-Mexico.

[a] THeſe Savages are polygamiſts. We are told that the inhabitants of Cibola marry but one wife. Thoſe of California will not allow their maidens to keep company with men. They puniſh adultery with death. The widowhood of their women laſts ſix months, after which they are allow'd to marry again.

The Californians and their neighbours have youths among 'em whom they oblige to go in womens apparel: theſe adminiſter to the moſt infamous uſes. They are prohibited marriage, and they carry this laſcivious cuſtom to ſuch horrid lengths, that when the youth whom they proſtitute in this manner, happens to die, his brother is oblig'd to ſucceed him in the ſcandalous office. Theſe miſerable wretches make a duty of this obſcenity, which we have deſcrib'd in as modeſt terms as the ſubject would admit of; and in return are maintain'd by the charity of the publick, and beg their bread from door to door. The reſt of the Indians of North-America give into the ſame irregularities, and conceal the ſhame of thoſe they abuſe under the name of Hermaphrodites.

The Indians of Cinalva adopt perſons into their families in the ſame manner as the Nadoueſſans and other nations of North-America. They thruſt a little ſtick down the throat of the perſon who is to be adopted, which forces him to throw up violently whatever he has got in his Stomach; and this they call regeneration.

[b] Whenever any of them fall ſick, and that his life is thought in danger, they immediately dig a grave. The moment he is dead, they burn him, together with his houſe and all his effects: they bury his aſhes, and throw a certain kind of duſt over his grave, with which thoſe who revere his memory make a ſtrong liquor, which they drink to great exceſs. The Californians alſo burn their dead, with all that belong'd to them. This odd cuſtom alone plainly ſhews that theſe ſavages are perſuaded of the immortality of the ſoul.

Religion of the Virginians.

WE ſhall begin this deſcription with a piece of hiſtory, which may be of uſe in proving the greatneſs of ſoul of thoſe people whom we call Savages. [c] Oppechancanough, emperor of the Virginians, falling unhappily into the hands of the Engliſh, Sir ..... Berkley, governour of the Engliſh Colony, intended to ſhow him publickly to the people. The Virginian prince, whoſe eyes were ſo much weakned by old age, that he was forced to make uſe of one of his ſubjects to open them for him, hearing a great croud of people about him, cauſed them to be open'd immediately. The ſight of ſo great a multitude threw him into a rage, whereupon he bid 'em in a haughty tone, ſend for the governour, whom he reproached with his ill-treatment, and told him with a diſdainful air, " That if fortune had made him his priſoner, he would not have expoſed " him ſo baſely to the ſcorn and deriſion of his people." We have mention'd this incident, as it may be of uſe to juſtify the American Indians, with regard to ſeveral groſs and childiſh ideas, which ſome travellers have imputed to them, not only in religious matters, but even with reſpect to the moſt common notions of decency and decorum.

[a] Here follows what a native of Virginia has written concerning the religion of the Virginians: "These Indians, says he, look upon those to be guilty of sacrilege, who "reveal the principles of their religion." Whence we are to infer, that in case their neighbours entertain the same opinion, we are not to wonder, that it is impossible to reconcile the assertions which we meet with in travellers who have writ of those countries; or that a traveller should contradict all that had been written by one who had visited those regions before him. A very little attention will be sufficient to discover that they often ascribe to the same people, ideas that are directly contradictory, and ever confused; the reason of which is, because they are able to get but a superficial knowledge of things, swallowing them down in a hurry, without once examining them; but at the same time they strenuously maintain, that they are capable of giving a most authentic relation. "One day, continues the above-cited author, we met with the Quioccosan, "or temple of the Indians, at a time when every body was assembled to consult upon "dividing those lands which the English had given them. Overjoy'd to meet with so "happy an opportunity, we resolv'd not to lose it. After having remov'd from the gate "of the temple, twelve or fifteen great logs of wood with which it was barricaded, "we enter'd it, and saw nothing at first but the bare walls, and a fire-place in the middle. "This house was about thirty feet long, and eighteen feet wide, and had a hole in "the roof to let out the smoak. The gate of the temple was at one end of it. On the "outside, and at some distance from the building, stakes were set up quite round it; "the tops of which were painted, representing men's faces in relievo. We did not find "one window in all the temple, nor any place for the light to enter in at, except at the "door, and the hole of the chimney. We observ'd farther, that at the end, over-"against the door, there was a separation made of matting work'd very close together, "that inclosed a place about ten feet in length, and which did not let in one single ray "of light. At first we could hardly prevail upon ourselves to attempt to enter into so "dark a place, but at last we ventur'd in, and found in the midst of this enclosure, a "place surrounded with stakes, at the top of which were great shelves, from thence we "drew three mats that were roll'd up and sew'd together; on one of which some "bones were laid, on an other an Indian hanger, call'd by the Virginians [b] Tomahawk. "They had tied to one of these Tomahawks the waddles of a turkey-cock painted red "and the two longest feathers of his wing hung at the end, tied on with a string of "about five or six inches in length. In the third mat was some inlaid-work, which we "took for the idol of the Indians. This inlaid-work consisted of a piece of wood "three feet and a half in length, having a notch at the top, for the setting in of the "head, with semicircles about the middle which were nail'd on four inches from the "edge, representing the breast and belly of that statue. Underneath was another board, "not above half so long as the former, and which they fastned there with pieces of "wood, that being set in on every side, stood out about fourteen or fifteen inches from "the body, and which, as we imagin'd, made the bending in of the knees whenever "they set the image together. We also found in this mat, some pieces of red and "white callico, and rolls made for the arms, thighs, and legs, which they folded over "the knee.

"'Twould be very difficult to get the sight of one of those images at this time, because "the Indians are extremely careful in concealing them from public view. We put "the clothes of the above-mention'd image upon the circles to make up the body; to "which we fix'd the arms and legs, in order to form some idea of it: but the head and "the magnificent bracelets with which they generally adorn it, were not there, or at "least we could not find 'em. When this image is clothed in all its ornaments, it must "needs have a very venerable aspect in this dark place, in which the light is let in only "by

KIWASA IDOLE des VIRGINIENS.

B. Picart. del.

Le DIEU des VENTS, autre Idole des VIRGINIENS.

" by raiſing one of the mats of the partition, from the gloomy light that comes in at the " gate, and the hole of the chimney of the temple. This gloom ſerves to heighten the " devotion of theſe ignorant people: but one circumſtance which is of great ſervice to " them in carrying on the cheat, is, that the chief magician enters unperceiv'd by any " one, alone on one ſide, and moves the image up and down, whilſt the prieſt ſtands " among the people on the other ſide, to hinder any perſon from being over-curious, " under the penalty of incurring the cenſures and indignation of the deity."

The Virginians have given ſeveral names to this idol. 'Tis call'd by ſome Oka, by others Quioccos, or Kiwaſa. Theſe names may poſſibly be ſo many epithets, which they vary according to the ſeveral functions they aſcribe to this deity, or the different notions they may form to themſelves of it in their religious exerciſes, and common diſcourſes. " Moreover, continues the above-cited author, they are of opinion that this idol " is not one ſole being, and that there are many more of the ſame nature, beſides the " tutelary gods." They give the general name of Quioccos to all theſe Genii, or Beings; ſo that we will particularly apply the name of Kiwaſa to the idol in queſtion.

The engraver has not here repreſented the idol Kiwaſa in his temple; but has placed him in the open air in a hutt built of mats, and on a kind of ſeat or altar, call'd by the Virginians[a] Paworance. Theſe ſavages conſecrate chappels and oratories to this deity, in which the idol is often repreſented under a variety of ſhapes. They even keep ſome of theſe in the moſt retir'd part of their houſes, to whom they communicate their affairs, and conſult them upon occaſion. In this caſe they make uſe of them in the quality of tutelary gods, and 'tis they who ſhower down bleſſings on their families.

Theſe idolaters often repreſent Kiwaſa with a pipe in his mouth; and what is more, he really ſmoaks, for the pipe is lighted. But the truth is, that a prieſt conceals himſelf dextrouſly behind the idol, and ſmoaks the tobacco. The darkneſs with which the god is ſurrounded, prevents their ſeeing the ſmoaker, or the people from detecting him; for were they to diſcover him, they would no longer pay the reverence due to their ſpiritual directors. The Gods of the inhabitants of our hemiſphere have ſweated, groan'd, and wept juſt after the ſame manner.

Kiwaſa often manifeſts himſelf in oracles or viſions. They conſult him before they go a hunting, and for matters of leſs importance. As caprice is, among theſe ſavages, the effects of the inſpirations of a god; if at any time when they are hunting, the ſpirit moves them to play, they immediately reſolve upon playing, becauſe they think that God has commanded it, and that their wills ought to be immediately dependant upon his, even on the moſt trifling and ridiculous occaſions. Whenever they want to conjure him up, four prieſts go to the temple of the god, whom they raiſe by the power of certain words, of whoſe ſignification the people are entirely ignorant. Then Kiwaſa appears under the figure of a handſome man, having on the left ſide of his head a tuft of hair, which deſcends to his feet; and appearing thus equipp'd in the air, he haſtens forthwith to the temple. Immediately he begins to walk up and down it in great agitations; but he grows calm on a ſudden, and orders eight more prieſts to be ſent for: when the aſſembly is met, he declares his will to them; which being done, he again ſets out on his journey for heaven.

The Virginians worſhip alſo the ſun. At day-break the devotees of both ſexes go faſting, and waſh themſelves in a running ſtream. The ablution continues till the ſun appears, nor do they ſuffer their children of ten years of age to omit this religious duty. He is no ſooner above the horizon, but they offer him tobacco. The deity which is here repreſented with the idol Kiwaſa, is another object of the adoration of the Virginians. The winds and ſeas are all under his direction, and the ſeveral appendages about his image are all emblematical.

Theſe idolaters are not ſparing of either offerings or ſacrifices to their gods, and the moſt trifling ſubject of fear, furniſhes them with an occaſion of ſmoaking either [a] fat or tobacco in honour of thoſe deities, whom they imagine are ever prepar'd to oppreſs them. " [b] Whenever they go a journey they burn tobacco, in order to obtain the " aſſiſtance of the ſun.——Whenever they croſs a lake or a river, they throw tobacco " into it, or the moſt valuable thing they have, in order that the ſpirit who they be- " lieve preſides in thoſe places, may grant them a ſafe paſſage over. Whenever they " return from hunting, from war, or any other conſiderable enterprize, they offer " part of their ſpoils, of their beſt tobacco, of their furs, their colours with which they " paint themſelves, nay even fat, and the beſt of their game. The antients had part " of theſe cuſtoms among them.

" They have alſo ſome ridiculous traditions. There is a rock on that ſide where " the water-falls of the river James lie, on which are plainly ſeen ſeveral marks that " appear to have been made by the foot of a giant, and are about five feet diſtant from " one another. The Indians are of opinion, ---- that one of their gods having walk'd " on this rock, left the print of his feet in it."

We have already obſerv'd, that the Virginians make uſe of emblematical figures. " They often erect pyramids and ſtone pillars, which they paint and adorn after their " manner: they even pay 'em all the outward marks of religious worſhip, not as thoſe " which are offer'd to the ſupreme Being," but in quality of his repreſentatives; becauſe they employ them as ſymbols and hieroglyphicks of the Sovereign of all things: they honour his Majeſty before the ſign, or repreſentative; they honour it in the ſign, tho' at the ſame time they don't honour the ſign itſelf. 'Tis in the ſame view, " that they " keep certain ſtone-baskets, under which ſome character of the Deity is undoubtedly " repreſented. They offer ſacrifice to rivers and fountains, and that becauſe their con- " tinual flowing is an emblem of God's eternity.

" They erect altars in all thoſe places that are remarkable for ſome incident.——But " there is a private altar, to which they pay a greater honour than to any of the reſt. " The high altar, before the arrival of the Engliſh in Virginia, was ſcituated in a place " to which thoſe people gave the name of Uttamuſſak: the principal temple of the " country was in the ſame place, which was at the ſame time the metropolitan ſeat of " the prieſts. There were alſo three large houſes, each ſixty feet long, all fill'd with " images. 'Twas in theſe religious houſes that they uſed to preſerve the bodies of " their deceas'd kings, for which the natives had ſo great a veneration, that none but " kings and prieſts were allow'd to enter them. The people were never admitted into " them, nor dar'd even ſo much as to approach thoſe ſanctuaries without the per- " miſſion of the former. The high altar was of ſolid cryſtal of three or four inches " ſquare.——On this altar they uſed to ſacrifice on ſolemn days." And as mankind in general are eaſily perſuaded that every thing which is employ'd in any myſterious affair, cannot fail of diſplaying itſelf by ſome diſtinguiſhing characteriſtic; let us not omit " that this cryſtal was ſo very tranſparent, that the grain of a man's skin might be ſeen " through it; 'twas moreover of ſo prodigious a weight, that unable to draw it any " further, they were oblig'd to bury it in the neighbourhood," to conceal it from the Engliſh. We have inſtances of this miraculous weight in the religions of our hemiſphere. How much pains, how much labour was employ'd to conquer the reſiſtance of the god, demi-god, and other ſubalterns of the deity, whoſe ſtatues were reſolutely bent not to ſtir from their places? Among the extraordinary prerogatives which Homer has beſtow'd ſo liberally on his gods, he was particularly careful not to omit weight.

We before took notice that the Virginians give the name of Paworances to their altars; " which is the reaſon of their having ſo much veneration for a bird who is con- " tinually " tinually repeating that name.———They ſay that that bird is the ſoul of one of " their princes.——They add further, that an Indian—having kill'd one of thoſe birds, " paid dear for his raſhneſs; for he diſappear'd a few days after, and was never heard " of more.———Whenever they come near a Paworance as they are travelling, they " never fail to inform the young People in their company, on what occaſion and at what " time it was built; exhorting them at the ſame time, to pay all due reſpect to the " altar." Thus do theſe oral inſtructions perpetuate among theſe people the tradition of the miracles of their gods, the wonders of their religion, and the doctrine which it teaches.

The Notions the Virginians have of the Deity, the Creation, &c.

THE author from whom we have extracted the above-mention'd particulars, tells us, " That the Virginians acknowledge a God that delights in doing good, whoſe " habitation is in heaven, and whoſe kindly influences ſhed themſelves upon the earth: " that he is eternal; enjoys a perfect happineſs and tranquility, and is ſupremely per- " fect, and, what is worſe, he is ſupremely indolent. That he ſhowers down his bleſ- " ſings upon men, without choice or diſtinction, or without troubling himſelf with their " affairs." That he leaves 'em entirely to their free-wills, whilſt he himſelf continues in a ſupine [a] indolence, out of which all the worſhip they pay him is not able to recover him. That 'tis to no purpoſe to pray to him, ſince nothing is capable of moving him.

This ſyſtem does not hang well together, and poſſibly may have been falſely related by thoſe who have written on the religion of theſe ſavages. We have already taken notice, when we mention'd [b] Kiwaſa, that the Virginians imagine themſelves to be immediately inſpir'd by him in all their thoughts; whence it follows, that he acts upon their wills, and conſequently concerns himſelf with what men do. Be that as it will, finding they have nothing to dread from the indolent and inſipid goodneſs of their God, they endeavour to procure the favour of an evil genius, who is of an infinitely more active nature. We cannot ſay, whether they imagine him to be his ſubject, his equal, or his lieutenant; or whether it be him they call Oka or Kiwaſa: 'tis certain however, " that they pay this evil ſpirit a very zealous homage, which very much " reſembles the worſhip the ſavages of Miſſiſippi and Canada pay their evil genius. " The Virginians tell us, that 'tis he who concerns himſelf with the affairs of this " world; 'tis he, ſay they, viſits us, ruffles the air, and raiſes ſtorms, &c. and him we " appeaſe with ſacrifices."

Some other [c] people of Virginia have a notion that God, whom they ſuppoſe to be eternal, having made a reſolution to create the world, firſt form'd a ſett of ſubaltern gods,

[a] " How the vaſt maſs of Matter, Nature, free
" From the proud care of th' med'ling Deity,
" Doth work by her own private ſtrength, and move,

" In undiſturb'd and everlaſting eaſe, gods, to whom he afterwards committed the government thereof, after having made uſe of their aſſiſtance in creating it. After this he created the ſun, the moon and ſtars, whoſe degree and quality is inferior to that of the other gods. The firſt thing thoſe gods created was water, out of which they form'd all creatures, both viſible and inviſible. Woman was created before man, and ſhe had commerce with one of theſe creating gods. This is the origin of mankind.

Their Prieſts, Soothſayers, Diſcipline, &c.

THE figure repreſents a prieſt and a ſoothſayer. "The [a] ſacerdotal veſtment is "like a woman's petticoat plaited, which they put about their necks, and "tie over the right ſhoulder; but they always keep one arm out, to uſe it upon occa- "ſion. This cloak is made round at bottom, and deſcends no lower than the middle "of the thigh: 'tis made of ſoft well-dreſs'd skins, with the hair outwards.

"Theſe prieſts ſhave their heads cloſe, the crown excepted, where they leave only "a little tuft, that reaches from the top of the forehead to the nape of the neck, and "even on the top of the forehead. They here leave a border of hair, which, whether "it be owing to nature, or the ſtiffneſs contracted by the fat and colours with which "they dawb themſelves, briſtles up, and comes forward, like the corner of a ſquare "cap.

"The magicians or ſoothſayers alſo ſhave their heads cloſe, and leave only a tuft "upon it. Over their ears they wear the skin of a bird, whoſe feathers are of a dark "colour; and dawb themſelves with ſoot, or ſomething like it, in the ſame manner "as the prieſts. They hang an otter-skin at their girdle for modeſty ſake, and clap "its tail between their legs. They alſo tie a pocket to it, which hangs upon the thigh, "the bottom whereof is adorn'd with a little long fringe, or tagg'd points."

We are aſſur'd that the Virginians have a great veneration for their prieſts; "and "that the latter endeavour to procure it, by dawbing themſelves all over in a very "frightful manner; dreſſing themſelves in very odd habit, and tricking up their hair "after a very whimſical manner." Every thing they ſay is conſider'd as an oracle, and makes a ſtrong impreſſion on the minds of the people: they often withdraw from ſociety, and live in woods or in hutts, far remov'd from any habitation. They are difficult of acceſs; and don't give themſelves any trouble about proviſions, becauſe care is always taken to ſet food for 'em near their habitations. They are always addreſs'd to in caſes of great neceſſity: as for inſtance, they beſeech 'em to ſend rain, or to help 'em in finding out any thing they may have loſt: they alſo act in quality of phyſicians, becauſe of the great knowledge they are ſuppos'd to have of nature. In fine, peace or war is determin'd by their voice, nor is any thing of importance undertaken without firſt conſulting them.

"The ſoothſayer is the prieſt's aſſociate, not only in the tricking part, but alſo in "the profits ariſing from thence, and they ſometimes officiate for one another.

"The religious ſervice is perform'd in a general tongue, underſtood only by the "greateſt men of the nation, and anſwers in ſome meaſure to the Latin." As witchcraft makes a very conſiderable part of the religion of the country, we ſhall preſent the reader with a deſcription of it, as we find it in the above-mention'd Hiſtory of Virginia. "The Virginians, ſays that author, employ witchcraft on ſeveral occaſions; neither "are they ſparing in their ſacrifices to the wicked ſpirit. Every ſeaſon of the year "they offer to it the firſt-fruits of their fruits, of their birds, fiſh, cattle, plants, roots, &c. "and repeat their offerings every time they have any extraordinary ſucceſs in war, "hunting or fiſhing.

"Captain

[a] Hiſt. of Virginia, ubi ſupra.

" [a] Captain Smith happening to fall into their hands, they employ'd a piece of witch" craft or charm upon this account, which was as follows: The buſineſs was to know
" if he were well or ill affected towards them, and if any more Engliſhmen were to " come into their country. Early in the morning they lighted a great fire, round which " they drew a circle of meal; after which a man, whom we are to ſuppoſe was the " chief-prieſt or magician, drew near the fire, making ſeveral very frantick geſtures at the " ſame time. He was cover'd with a skin, and had a crown of feathers with weaſel " and ſerpents skins upon his head. Thus equipp'd, he began the invocation with a " thundring voice, ſinging magical airs, in which he was ſeconded by ſix other prieſts.
" They repeated the airs ſeveral times, and theſe were no ſooner ended, but the prieſts
" laid a few wheat-corns upon the ground, and the high-prieſt threw fat and tobacco
" into the fire. After this they drew two other circles. The prieſts took ſticks and " laid 'em between the wheat-corns, which were rang'd about five in a row, and this " ceremony laſted three days."

[b] Thoſe ſoothſayers pretend alſo to lay ſtorms, to effect which, they go to the water-ſide, where they addreſs themſelves to the water with a hideous noiſe, accompanied with invocations and ſongs; after which they throw tobacco, pieces of copper, and ſuch like trifles into the midſt of the water, in order to appeaſe the Deity who preſides over it.

The Virginians have been accus'd of ſacrificing young children. Captain Smith, who was wrong inform'd of the circumſtances of this pretended ſacrifice, which is no more than a probation that all ſuch go through as are devoted to the myſteries of religion, has given us the following deſcription of it. [c] They painted white fifteen of their beſt-ſhap'd boys, who were about twelve or fifteen years of age: theſe they carried before a numerous aſſembly of prieſts and people, all of them painted ſo artfully, that a painter could not poſſibly have done better. " The Werowance, which is the name the Vir- " ginians give to their princes, preſided in this aſſembly. The ſeveral members of it " held gourd-bottles and boughs in their hands. The ſavages ſpent the whole morning
" in dancing and ſinging round the young boys: in the afternoon they were all fifteen
" ſet under a tree, and were ſo rang'd as to have a double lane of people, arm'd with " bundles of ſmall cane, between them. They then choſe five young men, who went
" ſingly, and took out one of thoſe boys and led him thro' the lane, and ſhielded them,
" tho' at their own coſt, and with a ſurprizing patience, from the multitude of blows
" which they ſtruck with their ſticks. During this cruel exerciſe, the mothers of the " lads weeping and groaning bitterly, were preparing mats, skins, moſs, and dry wood " for their funeral. After this ceremony they pull'd down the tree, broke the trunk " of it to pieces, lopp'd off the branches and boughs, and therewith made garlands to " crown them, and dreſs'd up their hair with the leaves of the tree they had fell'd.
" 'Twas impoſſible to know what became of the children; but they were thrown " one upon another into a valley, where the aſſembly made great rejoicings. Several " queſtions being ask'd the Werowance with regard to this pretended ſacrifice, he an" ſwer'd, all thoſe children were not dead, but that Oka ſuck'd the blood from the " left breaſt of ſuch as were fallen to his ſhare, till they expir'd; that the five young " men kept the reſt in the deſart for nine months, not allowing them to converſe with " one individual perſon during that time. 'Tis from among theſe youths, continued he,
" that we chuſe our prieſts and ſoothſayers."

The author of the Hiſtory of Virginia thinks, the reaſon why theſe medico-prieſts endeavour to perſuade the people, that Oka ſucks the blood from the left breaſt of ſuch children as fall to his ſhare, is, in order that if any of the novices ſhould die under the rigors of their probation, the prieſthood may not ſuffer upon that account. He adds, adds, that Captain Smith gives an imperfect deſcription of the diſcipline which all thoſe are obliged to undergo, who aſpire at the dignity of the prieſthood, or who are ſo far ſpurr'd on by emulation, as to endeavour to be one day receiv'd into the number of their great men. This the Virginians call Huſcanawer: here follows the deſcription of that ceremony, as we find it in the Hiſtory of Virginia. "'Tis generally celebrated "once every fifteen or ſixteen years, unleſs it ſo happens, that their youth are capable "of being receiv'd oftner into it. All theſe are oblig'd to go through this diſcipline, "before they can be receiv'd into the number of the great men, or Cockarouſes of the "nation.—The principal men of the place where the ceremony is to be perform'd "make choice of the beſt-ſhap'd, and moſt ſprightly youths among them — for their "Huſcanawes. — Any one who ſhould refuſe to undergo that diſcipline, wou'd not "dare to live among his countrymen. They at firſt perform ſome of thoſe ceremonies "related by Smith, the chief of which is retirement.———They ſhut them up for "ſeveral months together, and give them no other ſuſtenance during their ſolitude, "than the infuſion or decoction of certain roots that turns the brain. And indeed this "liquor, which they call Wiſoccan, together with the ſeverity of the diſcipline, makes "theſe novices raving mad: they continue for ſome time in this condition. In the "mean time they are ſhut up in a ſtrong place, built for that purpoſe. — [a] This in-"cloſure is made in the ſhape of a ſugar-loaf, and is open like a lattice to let in the "air. — Not above a month ſince, thirteen youths were huſcanawed there, and ſet "at liberty." Here theſe novices quite loſe their memory; they forget their poſſeſ-ſions, parents, friends, and even language. "When theſe medico-prieſts find that the "novices have drunk Wiſoccan enough, they leſſen the quantity by degrees, till ſuch "time as their ſenſes are return'd: but before this happens, they carry 'em about to "their own cities or villages, poſſibly to make 'em known again to the people. The "young men, after having paſs'd thro' their ſevere diſcipline, dare not ſay they remem-"ber the moſt trifling particulars, for fear of being huſcanawed a ſecond time, for "then they are ſo ſeverely handled, that few eſcape with their lives. A novice is "oblig'd to grow deaf and dumb, and muſt pay afreſh for every thing he learns.

"Whether theſe youths really loſe their memories or not, 'tis certain they pretend "not to know any thing of what they had learnt before, and that they are attended "by their guardians till they have learnt all over again.——In a word, they begin to "live again, after having been dead as it were; and become men, by forgetting they "had formerly been children. — The trouble which thoſe guardians put themſelves to "is ſo very great, and they are oblig'd to obſerve ſo religious a ſecrecy during the "whole courſe of this ſevere diſcipline, that thoſe who acquit themſelves worthily of "this charge, are thought to have perform'd the moſt meritorious action that can be "wrought. 'Tis alſo a ſure way of riſing to great preferment. But then on the other "ſide, they may depend upon their being ſoon ſent out of the world, ſhould they ne-"glect but the moſt inconſiderable circumſtance in their duty. The author of this "relation adds, that thoſe who were huſcanawed in his time, were handſome, well-"ſhap'd, ſprightly boys, from fifteen to twenty or five and twenty years of age, and were "look'd upon as rich. This, continued he, made me [b] at firſt imagine, that the old "men had invented this ſtratagem in order to engroſs the poſſeſſions of their young "people, ſince 'tis certain that they ſhare them among themſelves, or employ them, "as they pretend, on ſome publick uſe.——The Indians pretend, that the ſole mo-"tive of their employing theſe violent methods, is in order to free their young people "from the dangerous impreſſions of infancy, and from all thoſe prejudices which they "contract before reaſon is capable of gaining the aſcendant. They affirm, that being then

" then at liberty to follow the dictates of nature, they are no longer liable to be de" ceived by cuſtom or education; and are thereby the better enabled to adminiſter juſtice
" uprightly, without having any regard to the tyes of blood or friendſhip." The antients had the ſame opinion of their initiations, and thought that they clear'd the underſtanding and rectify'd the ideas: the moderns give pretty much into the ſame notion; but it would be dangerous, and at the ſame time to no purpoſe, to make the application in this place.

Their Feſtivals and Devotion.

HERE follows what the above-mentioned author has obſerv'd on this head; " We don't find that they have any ſtated times, or fixed days on which they " celebrate their feſtivals, but that they regulate them only by the different ſeaſons of " the year. As for inſtance, they celebrate one day at the arrival of their wild birds, " another upon the return of the hunting ſeaſon, and for the maturity of their fruits: " but the greateſt feſtival of all is at harveſt-time. They then ſpend ſeveral days in " diverting themſelves, and employ moſt of their amuſements, ſuch as martial dances, " and heroic ſongs."

After their return from war, or eſcaping ſome danger, they light fires, and make merry about them, each having his gourd-bottle or his little bell in his hand. They all, men, women and children, often dance in a confus'd manner about theſe fires: one wou'd be apt to imagine that this is their chief devotion. Some travellers pretend that they pay a religious worſhip to fire on this occaſion; be that as it will, 'tis this ceremony which is repreſented by the figure.

Their devotions in general conſiſt only of acclamations of joy, mix'd with dances and ſongs, except that in ſeaſons of ſorrow and affliction theſe acclamations are chang'd into howlings. The prieſts preſide at this ſolemnity, dreſs'd in their ſacerdotal ornaments, part of which are the gourd-bottle, the petticoat above-mentioned, and the ſerpents or weaſels skins, the tails of which are dexterouſly tied upon their heads like a Tiara or triple-crown. Theſe prieſts begin the ſong and always open the religious exerciſe, to which they often add incantations, part of the myſteries whereof are comprehended in the ſongs above-mentioned. The noiſe, the geſtures, the wry-faces, in a word every thing contributes to render theſe incantations terrible.

We ſhall here obſerve, that one of their religious acts is the throwing the firſt piece of whatever they eat at their meals into the fire. But let us ſay a word or two more of their dancing. We muſt conſider it as relative to this article, ſince it makes ſo great a part of the worſhip of the Virginians, that 'tis not eaſy to diſtinguiſh the ſacred from the prophane. " They have two different kinds of dancing, according " to the author of the Hiſtory of Virginia, viz. 1*ſt*, either ſingle, or at moſt in ſmall " companies; or 2*dly*, a great number together, but without having any regard either " to time or figure. In the firſt kind one perſon only dances, or two or three at moſt. " In the mean time the reſt, who ſeat themſelves down in a ring, ſing as loud as they " can ſcream, and ring their little bells. Sometimes the dancers themſelves ſing, dart " terrible and threatning looks, ſtamp their feet againſt the ground, and make a thou-" ſand antick poſtures and wry-faces. The other dance conſiſting of a large company, " is perform'd round ſtakes ſet in the form of a circle, adorn'd with ſome ſculpture; " or round about a fire, which they light in a convenient place. (The figure repre-" ſents this ceremony.) Every one has his little bell, his bow and arrow in his hand. " They alſo cover themſelves with leaves, and thus equip'd immediately fall a dancing. " They ſometimes ſet three young women in the midſt of the circle.

" They light fires every night, and dance and ſing about them:" Theſe are the places of rendezvous of all ſuch as have a mind to divert themſelves. The deſcription of a ball, which the hiſtorian, who has furniſh'd us with theſe particulars, has copied from a more antient traveller than himſelf, ſhews, that the Virginians have ſome taſte for this diverſion.

Their Ceremonies of Peace and War, and Hieroglyphics.

THE Virginians uſe the Calumet in the ſame manner as the Savages above-mentioned. Here follows the deſcription of the ceremonies obſerv'd in their reception of foreigners. " The Werowance, accompanied with his people, goes to " meet the foreigners at ſome diſtance from his place of reſidence; deſires 'em to ſit " down on mats which his attendants bring with them for that purpoſe; and invites 'em " at the ſame time to the ceremony of the Calumet, which is follow'd by a ſhort con- " verſation. They then go to the habitation of the Werowance, who gives order for " the waſhing of their feet, treats them, and afterwards diverts them with ſongs and " groteſque dances. When the time for going to reſt is come, they make choice of " two of their moſt beautiful young women to attend upon——the ambaſſador or the " principal foreigners. Theſe young women undreſs him, and the moment he is in bed " they ſteal ſoftly into it, and lie down on each ſide of him. They wou'd even think " they had violated the laws of hoſpitality, were they not to ſatisfy all his deſires; and " this is ſo far from caſting a blemiſh on their reputation, that the reſt of the young " women envy them for what, in their eyes, is the greateſt honour that could be done " 'em. But this is granted to none but foreigners of the firſt diſtinction."

As ſoon as peace is concluded, they bury a Tomahawk, as a teſtimony that all their enmity is at an end; and this is what the Canadans call burying the ax. They often plant a tree over the Tomahawk, to ſhow that their mutual friendſhip will flouriſh like a tree.

" When they are upon the point of making war, the Werowance conſults the prieſts " and ſoothſayers; aſſembles the chief men of the nation, and holds a general council[a]. " The young men in theſe aſſemblies, particularly in caſe they expect a war, paint them- " ſelves all over with white, red, black, and ſeveral other colours intermix'd. As for " inſtance, they dawb over half their face with red, and the other half with black " or white. They draw great circles of different colours round their eyes, with mon- " ſtrous whiskers, and a thouſand other groteſque figures all over their bodies. To make " themſelves ſtill more terrible, they ſtick either feathers, down, or the hair of ſome " wild beaſt, into the wet paint. Thus equip'd they go to the council, and the mo- " ment they are arriv'd fall a dancing, with arrows or the Tomahawk in their hands. " At the ſame time, they chaunt forth the glory of the nation and the brave exploits " of their anceſtors; making ſigns with their Tomahawks that they are going to make " a great ſlaughter of their enemies."

They ſeldom fight on plains, but endeavour to ſurprize their enemies, and cut 'em to pieces in ſome ambuſcade, like the Canadans and the Iroquois. The above-mentioned writer tells us, " that they ſpare neither man, woman, or child, to prevent their " revenging themſelves;" which would make their cruelty greater than that of the other nations of North-America.

Their manner of expreſſing their thoughts has ſome affinity to hieroglyphics; as for inſtance, they make uſe of certain repreſentations of birds, quadrupeds, or other things to expreſs certain ideas; and 'tis to theſe that la Hontan has given the name of Coats of arms. When they are on a journey, or in war, " they paint certain marks on their " ſhoulders, to diſtinguiſh themſelves from other nations. Theſe generally mark them- " ſelves

" ſelves with one, two, or three arrows, which one nation ſhall paint with the point " upwards, another the point downwards, a [a] third croſs-wiſe, &c." One of their idols marches along with them in war, and they ſing as they advance to the combat.

Their Marriages and the Education of their Children.

WE are aſſur'd that the " [b] Indians of Virginia look upon marriage as a very " ſolemn act, and that the vows they then make are thought to be ſacred and " inviolable.——The husband and wife are allow'd to live apart if there is not a good " harmony between them; nevertheleſs divorces are look'd upon as ſcandalous; and " the parties ſeldom carry their quarrels to ſuch a length as to quit one another.—— " When they puſh things to theſe extremities, all the tyes of marriage are diſſolv'd, " and both parties are allow'd to marry again,——each takes thoſe children he likes " beſt,——and if the parties concern'd cannot agree about it, they divide the children " equally, and the man chuſes firſt."

The Virginians obſerve alſo to withdraw their women from ſociety, whenever they are attack'd with certain maladies. We before took notice of the licentiouſneſs of the young women of Canada and Miſſiſippi, but travellers would perſuade us that the women of Virginia are vaſtly more modeſt. " Tho' the young female Indians are ſaid to pro- " ſtitute themſelves for a trifle, ſays the author of the Hiſtory of Virginia, I yet cou'd " never find any room for that accuſation; ſo that I believe 'tis mere calumny. The " Indians diſown this cuſtom, tho' they look upon their young women as miſtreſſes of " their own perſons, and that they can diſpoſe of themſelves as they pleaſe. Moreover I " know that if one of 'em happens to have a child, her reputation is loſt as long as " ſhe lives; and that ſhe will never be able to get a husband afterwards." How will it be poſſible to reconcile this apology for the modeſty of the Virginians with what was ſaid in the foregoing page? We are told that the men are apt to be jealous. If that be true, his honour will not be more ſecure upon that account. Tho' a husband were to lay aſide all other cares, and employ himſelf in that only, he may depend that he would have work enough cut out for the reſt of his life. " 'Tis probable that " the excluding the children of their princes from the ſucceſſion, and the devolving it " upon thoſe of his brother by the mother's ſide, in caſe he has any, or in default of " that, to his eldeſt ſiſter's children, may reſult from their jealouſy; becauſe they think " the woman's ſide to be always the leaſt liable to impoſture: but the males in the " ſame degree of conſanguinity are preferr'd to the ſucceſſion before the women, tho' " the latter are preferr'd before ſuch males as are in a more diſtant degree of conſan- " guinity."

As to their children, " they plunge them into cold water the moment they are born." They educate them much after the ſame manner as the Canadans and other Savages of North-America, from the time of their being grown up a little big, till they arrive at the ſtate of manhood.

Their Medicaments, &c.

'TWOU'D be needleſs to repeat that their prieſts are phyſicians. 'Tis a happineſs for Europe, that our clergy have not yet taken it into their heads to join the cure of the body to that of the ſoul. The Virginians cure by ſweating, all ſuch diſeaſes as ariſe from ſudden colds or exceſſive heats. They ſuck ſores, lance wounds, and and apply fire to tumours "by the means of a ſtick of light wood, which being con" ſum'd to a coal, burns as fierce as a red-hot iron. They run the other end of the " ſtick into the fleſh, and make an inciſion, which they keep open till all the pectant

" humour is run out of it——They alſo make a little cone ---- with a kind of " rotten wood, by applying the baſe to the affected part; to which fire is ſet, till the " whole is burnt, and that they have made a real iſſue."

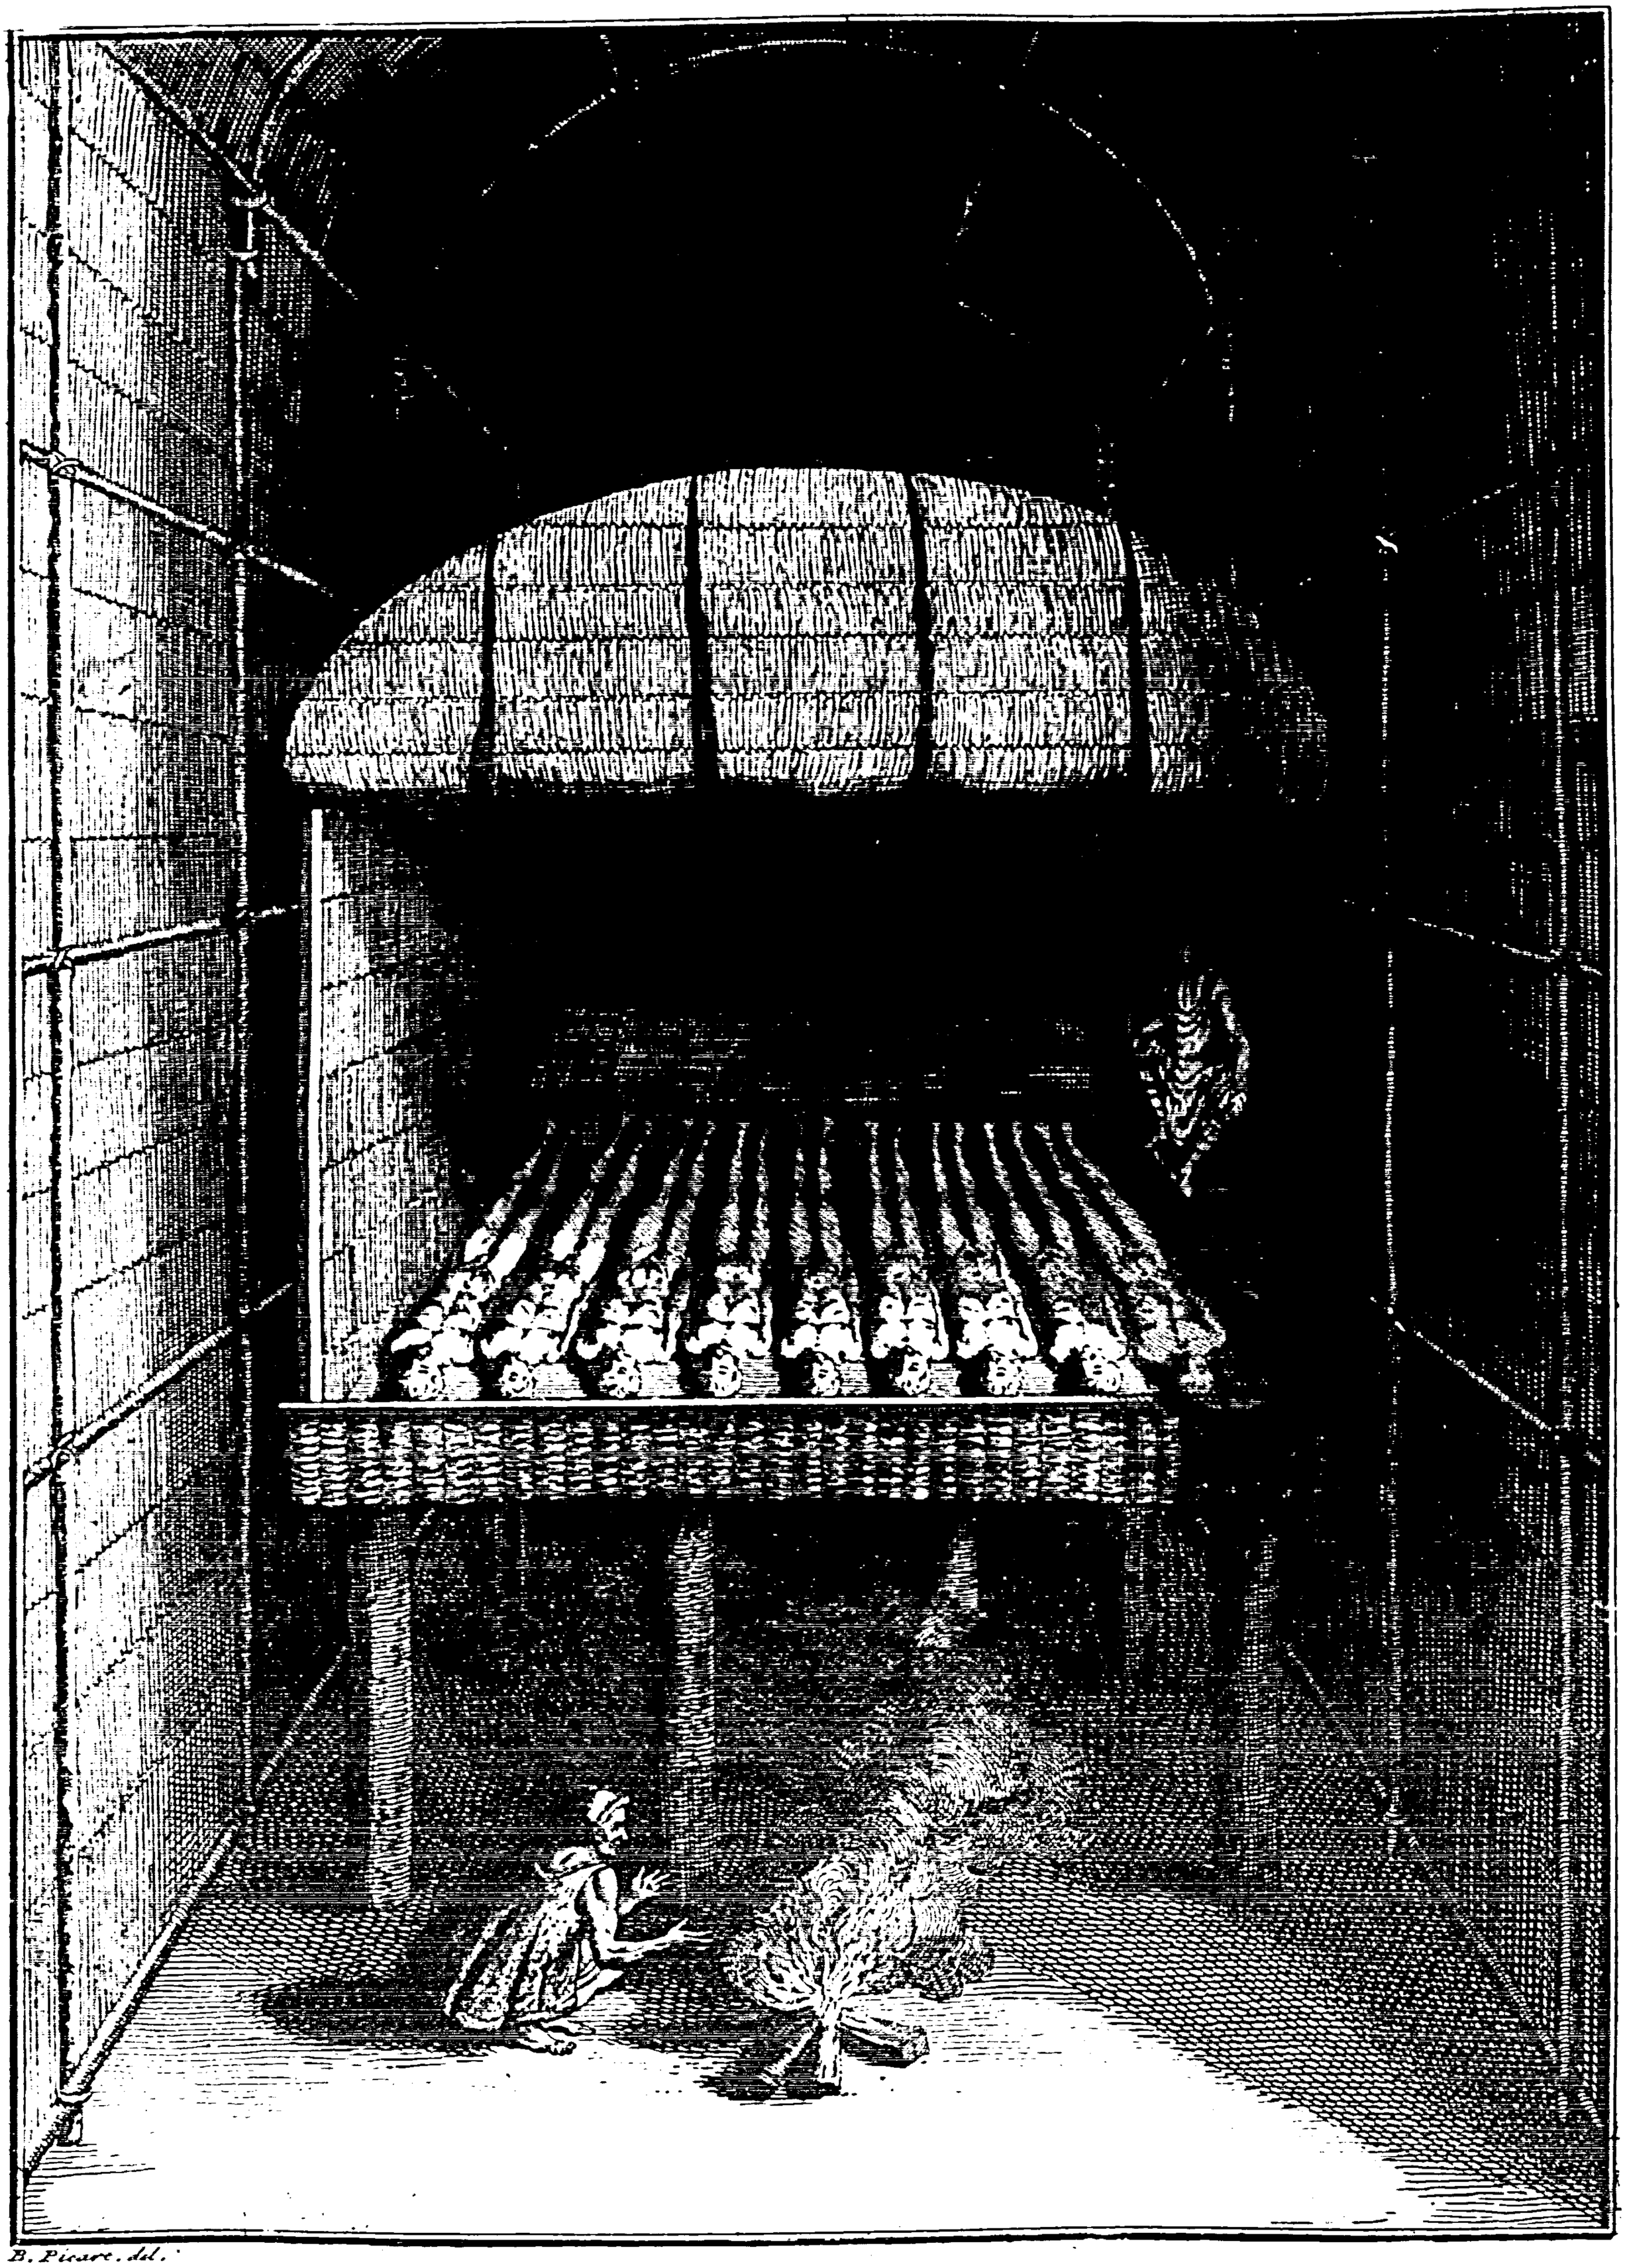
The prieſts ſtudy the qualities of plants, but conceal this ſcience, and the art of curing diſeaſes from the people. They rank this knowledge among their myſteries, and are of opinion, that it ought to be communicated to thoſe only who are deſign'd for the prieſthood; and ſay, that God would puniſh them were they to diſcover their medicaments. We ſhall not give a particular account of the ſeveral medicaments they make uſe of, becauſe it would be going out of the bounds of our deſcription; but we muſt not omit, that the application is made with a great many wry-faces, diſtortions, ſongs, howlings, all which prepoſſeſs the patient and the ſpectators in favour of the phyſician. Could it be poſſible for this noiſe, this diſorder, to be the work of a mortal? 'tis undoubtedly God who is the agent. Probably theſe people argue in this manner on that occaſion.



The method of their ſweating the ſick is the ſame as that of the Miſſiſippians, to which we refer the reader.

Their Funeral Rites, and Opinion with regard to the State of the Soul after death.

WE ſhall begin by thoſe ceremonies which are obſerv'd with regard to their ſovereigns. "The Virginians preſerve religiouſly the bodies of their kings and
" of their chiefs, in the following manner. They firſt cut the skin all down the back,
" and take it off whole, if poſſible: they afterwards take the fleſh from the bones,
" without hurting the nerves, to prevent the joints from diſuniting: they then dry the " bones in the ſun, which they afterwards ſet again in the skin, having firſt taken " care to moiſten it with oil or fat, which keeps it from rotting. After the bones are
" fix'd in the skin in their proper places, they fill up the hollows very dexterouſly with
" very fine ſand, and ſew it up in ſuch a manner, that the body appears as entire as " if they had not taken the fleſh from it. After the corps has been prepar'd in this " manner, they carry it into a place made for that purpoſe, and lay it upon a great
" piece of wood matted over, that is [a] raiſed a little from the ground, which they cover
" over with a mat to keep it from the duſt. They expoſe the fleſh which they have " taken from the body to the ſun, by laying it on a hurdle; and when it is thoroughly
" dried, they put it up into a basket ſew'd up very cloſe, and ſet it at the feet of the " corps. They place an idol of Kiwaſa in theſe ſepulchres, which they ſay looks
" after thoſe bodies." A prieſt watches day and night in this mauſolæum by a lighted fire, and 'tis there that he acquits himſelf of ſome pious duties which he imagines affect the deceas'd in ſome meaſure. If he himſelf does not give credit to it, 'tis certain he impoſes the belief of it upon the people. The figure repreſents the order the bodies lie in, and the ceremony of the prieſt.

Private perſons are not interr'd after the ſame manner, but are buried in pretty deep graves, their bodies being firſt wrap'd up in skins or mats, which they afterwards ſet upon poles, together with the beſt of their effects, and cover the whole with earth. After the burial of the bodies, the women put their faces in mourning; for this name we may give to that colour with which they dawb themſelves, made of coal ſteep'd in a certain certain quantity of oil, prepar'd for that purpoſe. In this condition they howl and mourn for four and twenty hours ſucceſſively.

They believe the immortality of the ſoul, and that it will be either happy or unhappy after this life, according to its good or evil actions. Their hell is a [a] great ditch, which they place at the extremity of the univerſe, where the ſun ſets. 'Tis there the wicked ſouls are to burn without having the leaſt mercy ſhewn them. [b] Others ſay, that they hang between heaven and earth. They add, that the truth of theſe torments are confirm'd to them by the dead themſelves, who from time to time bring them an account of what paſſes in the other world, as they formerly did to us, and ſtill do to this day in ſome countries. They call this hell Popoguſſo. The Werowances and prieſts never fail of going into a paradiſe, which they alſo place towards that part where the ſun ſets, and behind the mountains. 'Tis there that thoſe happy ſouls rejoice to all eternity; and in what ſhould this rejoicing conſiſt, but in their being crown'd with feathers; in having their Faces dawb'd over with certain odd colours; and in being peaceable poſſeſſors of certain trifles, the moſt conſiderable of which are pipes and tobacco, where they dance and ſing with their anceſtors. Such is the object of their immortality. The whole indeed is very trifling, and yet they exclude the common people from the advantages of it, and do not allow any but their prieſts and great men, to enjoy the benefit of riſing again after death.

Their Year and Records.

"THEY compute the [c] number of their Years by that of winters, which they "call Cohonk, from the noiſe of the wild geeſe that come only in winter in "thoſe parts. They divide the year into five different ſeaſons: the firſt is when the "trees ſhoot forth or flouriſh in ſpring; the ſecond is when the ears of corn are grown "and fit to parch; the third is ſummer; the fourth harveſt; the fifth winter. They "count their months by lunations, without having any regard to the number that are "in a year;" and call them, according to the Canadan cuſtom, by the names of ſuch things as are remarkable in thoſe lunations: "as for inſtance, they have the moon of "ſtags, of corn, the firſt and ſecond moon of Cohonk, &c. They don't divide their "days into hours; but make three portions or parts of it, which they call the aſcent and "deſcent of the ſun.

"They calculate by units, tens, hundreds, &c. and as to their tranſmitting to po-"ſterity the memorials of events or affairs of civil life, they uſe certain ſtrings, which are "ſomething like the Quippos of the Peruvians. They alſo employ certain pieces of "wood on which they make notches, &c.

Religion of the Floridans.

"THE [d] inhabitants of Florida are idolaters, and acknowledge the ſun and moon "for deities, whom they worſhip without offering them either prayers or ſa-"crifices. However they have temples; but the only uſe they make of them is to "bury their dead, and to lodge the moſt valuable part of their wealth in them. They "alſo ſet up the ſpoils of their enemies at the gates of theſe temples, by way of trophies." This is all the account the Incas Garcilaſſo de la Vega has given us of the religion of the Floridans. We may juſtly compare them to thoſe idolatrous nations of antiquity, who who worſhipp'd whatever they thought odd or ſurprizing, if it be true that the Floridans were ſo ſuperſtitious as to adore a pillar which Capt. Ribaut had erected upon an eminence, with the arms of France, when he diſcover'd that part of North-America. They offer'd ſacrifices to it; crown'd it with flowers, and dreſs'd it up with garlands and feſtoons; in a word they omitted no kind of homage.

The Floridans worſhip the [a] devil under the name of Toia, or rather that evil principle whom they ſet in oppoſition to their ſupreme deity. Firmly perſuaded, that it is impoſſible for this laſt Principle to do them any hurt, becauſe of his great innate goodneſs, they only bend their endeavours to appeaſe the other, who, they ſay, torments them in a very grievous manner. [b] The devil makes inciſions in their fleſh, terrifies 'em in viſions, and from time to time appears to them, to force them to ſacrifice men in his honour. In caſe the devil does not give himſelf the trouble to act on theſe occaſions, the prieſts have nevertheleſs the intereſt of the people too much at heart, to be wanting in the duty they owe him. We may therefore with great probability ſuppoſe, that they themſelves are the evil genius, and that they more than make up for that imaginary malice which the fear of the Floridans cauſes 'em to aſcribe to it.

[c] Another author has given us the following account of the religion of the Carolinans. "They adore one ſole God creator of all things, to whom their great pontiff offers "ſacrifices; but they don't think that the affairs of men deſerve his care. They ſay, "that he commits the government of this lower world to ſubordinate and inferior "deities: i. e. that he leaves it to the adminiſtration of good and evil ſpirits, to "whom the prieſts of an inferior order offer ſacrifices and other devotions."

The Savages that inhabit about the mountains of Apalache worſhip the ſun, as author of life and creator of nature. One would think they had preſerv'd ſome footſteps of the flood; for they ſay, that the ſun having retarded his ordinary courſe for 24 hours, the waters of the great lake Theomi overflow'd in ſuch a manner as to cover the tops of all the higheſt mountains, that of Olaimy excepted; which the ſun preſerv'd from the general inundation, becauſe of the temple he had built thereon with his own hands, and which the Apalachites afterwards conſecrated as a place of pilgrimage, where it was uſual for them to pay their religious homage to that planet. All ſuch as could ſhelter themſelves in this place, were preſerv'd from the deluge. The four and twenty hours expir'd, the ſun recover'd his firſt ſtrength, and commanding the waters to retire back to their juſt limits, ſcattered the vapours which they had ſpread over the earth. 'Tis in acknowledgment for this memorable deliverance, that the Floridans call'd Apalachites, have thought themſelves oblig'd to worſhip the ſun. Here follows the manner how they ador'd him, and the particulars of that worſhip.

The Worſhip which the Floridans pay to the Sun; their Feſtivals, Temples, &c.

WE ſhall begin by the worſhip of the Apalachites. Their religious ſervice conſiſts in ſaluting the riſing-ſun, and ſinging hymns in his praiſe. They pay him the ſame homage every evening. Beſides this, they ſacrifice to him, and offer ſolemn perfumes in his honour, four times every year, on the mountain of Olaimy: but as they don't offer any bloody victim to this planet, becauſe they look upon it as the parent of life; and that they think that he who beſtows it on creatures, can ſcarcely delight in a worſhip which deprives 'em of it; we can hardly give the name of ſacrifice to the offerings which they make to it, ſince they conſiſt only of perfumes which they burn; in in preſents which they make the prieſts; and in ſongs which they ſing in honour of the glorious planet of the day. The eve of the feſtival appointed for the offering of perfumes, the prieſts withdraw into the mountains, the better to prepare themſelves for this ſolemn act of the day following; the people are ſatisfy'd if they get there before day-break. Fires are burning all night-long upon the mountain; but the devotees don't dare approach the temple, or rather grotto, which is dedicated to the ſun. The [a] Jouanas only are allow'd acceſs to the religious edifice, and 'tis to them that the devotees intruſt their gifts and oblations, which the Jouanas afterwards hang on poles which are fix'd on each ſide of the gate, where they remain till the ceremony is ended; after which, they diſtribute them according to the donor's will.

The moment the ſun begins to ſhine, the Jouanas ſing forth his praiſes by falling ſeveral times upon their knees, after which they throw perfumes into the ſacred fire that is lighted before the gate of the temple. Theſe two acts of worſhip are follow'd by a third no leſs eſſential. The prieſt pours honey into a ſtone made hollow for that purpoſe, and which ſtands before a ſtone table; and ſcatters about the ſtone a conſiderable quantity of maiz half bruis'd and clear'd from its chaff. This is the food of certain [b] birds, whom the Floridans tell us ſing the praiſes of the ſun. Whilſt the prieſts are burning the perfumes, and ſinging to the honour of that planet, the people proſtrate themſelves and pay their devotions. The ceremony concludes with ſports, dances and diverſions, and the moſt eſſential part of the feſtival ends at noon. Then the Jouanas ſurround the table, repeating their ſongs and acclamations; and when the ſun begins to gild the edges of the table with his rays, they throw all the perfume they have left into the fire. The ceremony does not quite end here. After the laſt oblation of perfumes, ſix Jouanas choſen by lot ſtay by the table, and ſet at liberty ſix birds of the ſun, which they had brought in cages in order that they might act their part in the ceremony. After the myſterious deliverance of theſe birds, follows a proceſſion of devotees, who come down from the mountain with boughs in their hands, and go to the entrance of the temple, into which they are introduced by the Jouanas. Laſtly, the pilgrims waſh their hands and faces with a ſacred water. Such is the deſcription of this ceremony, which we have borrowed from an [c] author who had extracted it from the relations of two Engliſhmen.

The temple conſecrated to the ſun, and to its worſhip by the Floridans of Apalache, is a ſpacious grotto, made by nature in the rock, on the eaſt-ſide of the mountain. We are told that it is two hundred feet long, and of an oval form; that the arched-roof riſes an hundred and twenty foot in height, and that there comes in light enough by a hole which goes quite thro' the top, to illuminate the grotto.

Garcilaſſo, in his hiſtory of the conqueſt of Florida, gives a deſcription of another temple of the Floridans of Cofaciqui, which ſeems to have been uſed only as a burying-place for the great men of the country. The Spaniards found in thoſe temples great wooden trunks or cheſts, that were plac'd round the walls on benches rais'd two foot from the ground. "In theſe trunks the dead bodies were laid, which were em-
"balm'd in ſuch a manner, as not to caſt forth any offenſive ſmell. There were alſo
"leſſer cheſts, and reed baskets very curiouſly wrought. The little cheſts were fill'd
"with men and womens clothes, and the baskets with pearls of all ſorts." The temple of Talomeco was the burying-place of the Caciques of the country; the deſcription which Garcilaſſo has given us thereof, juſtly merits to be inſerted in this place.
"The temple of Talomeco, which is the burying-place of the Caciques, is, ſays he,
"above an hundred paces long and forty wide; the walls are of a height proportion-
"able to it, and the roof is very much rais'd, to ſupply the defect of the tiles, and
"to give the greater ſlope to the waters. The roof is made of very ſlender reeds,

" carpets of the Moors. Five or ſix of theſe carpets, laid one upon the other, keep " the rain from piercing thro, and the ſun from coming into the temple; in which " particular they are imitated by their common people and neighbours, who employ " their mats to the ſame uſe. Upon the roof of this temple a variety of ſhells of dif" ferent ſizes are ſet, and ſeveral fiſhes rang'd in a very beautiful order. But 'tis ſcarce
" poſſible to think whence they were brought, ſince thoſe people live ſo far diſtant
" from the ſea, unleſs we ſuppoſe they took 'em out of the rivers with which that " province is water'd. All theſe ſhells are plac'd inſide out, to make the greater ſhow;
" always ſetting that of a large ſea-ſnail between two little ones, with ſpaces between " the ſeveral pieces, fill'd with ſeveral ſtrings of pearls of different ſizes, like ſo many " feſtoons, faſten'd from one ſhell to the other. Theſe feſtoons of pearl, which reach " from the top of the roof to the bottom; heightned by the luſtre of the mother-of-" pearl, and of the ſhells, look wonderful pretty when the ſun ſhines upon 'em. The " gates of the temple are proportionable to the bigneſs of it. At the entrance of it
" are twelve gigantic ſtatues made of wood. They are repreſented with ſo ſavage,
" and threatning an air, that the Spaniards ſtood a conſiderable time to view them;
" and indeed thoſe figures were worthy the admiration of antient Rome. One wou'd
" imagine that thoſe giants had been ſet there to guard the door, for they make a " lane on both ſides, and leſſen gradually in bulk. The * firſt are eight foot high,
" and the reſt ſomething leſs, decreaſing gradually in height, like the pipes of an " organ.

" They have weapons anſwerable to their ſtature; the firſt on each ſide have clubs
" ſet off with copper, which they hold lifted up, and as it were ready to fall on thoſe
" who ſhould be ſo bold as to enter in; the ſecond have poll-axes, and the third a " kind of oar; the fourth copper axes, the edges of which are made of flint: the fifth
" ſtand with their bows bent, ready to let fly the arrow. Theſe arrows are very cu-
" rioufly wrought, the tips of which are made of a piece of ſtag's horn very nicely " wrought, or elſe of flint-ſtone whetted as ſharp as a ſword. The laſt giants have " very long pikes tipp'd with copper at both ends, and ſtand in a threatning poſture " like the reſt; all after a different, but very natural manner.

" The top of the walls in the inſide of the temple, are adorn'd agreeably to the " outſide of the roof; for there is a kind of cornice made of large ſea-ſnail ſhells,
" rang'd in very good order, with feſtoons of pearl between 'em, hanging from the roof.
" In the ſpace between the ſhells and pearls, we ſee in the hollow place which joins " to the roof, a great number of feathers of various colours, ſet in a beautiful order.
" Beſides this order obſerv'd above the cornice, there hangs from all the other ſides of " the roof ſeveral feathers and ſtrings of pearls, all held together by imperceptible " threads, fix'd at top and bottom, in ſuch a manner that thoſe works ſeem ready to " fall every moment.

" Under this ceiling and cornice, and round about the temple on the four ſides, are " two rows of ſtatues, ſtanding one above another, the one of men, and the other of " women, of the ſize of the people of the country. Their ſeveral niches, which were " made only as an ornament to the wall, join to one another, which would otherwiſe
" have been too naked. All the men have weapons in their hands, on which are rolls " of pearls, each conſiſting of four or five rows, with tufts at the end, made of very " fine thread of various colours. The ſtatues of the women have nothing in their " hands.

" At the foot of theſe walls are ſet wooden benches very well wrought, on which " the coffins of the lords of the province and thoſe of their families are plac'd. Two " foot above thoſe coffins, the ſtatues of the perſons buried there, are ſet in niches in

" the wall. They repreſent 'em exactly as they were at the time of their deaths.
" The women have nothing in their hands, but the men are arm'd.

" The ſpace between the images of the deceas'd perſons, and the two rows of ſta-
" tues which begin beneath the cornice, is fill'd with ſhields of different magnitudes,
" made of reeds, ſo ſtrongly interwoven, as not to be penetrated by a croſs-bow or a " gun. Theſe ſhields are all garniſh'd with pearl and tufts of ſeveral colours, which " makes 'em much more beautiful.

" In the middle of the temple are three rows of boxes or cheſts, ſet on benches ſe-" parated from one another. The largeſt of theſe cheſts ſerve as baſes to the leſſer, and " theſe to the leaſt; theſe pyramids conſiſt generally of five or ſix cheſts. As there is " a ſpace between the ſeveral benches, the paſſage is left clear, ſo that one may ſee
" every thing that paſſes in the temple.

" All theſe cheſts are full of pearls; the largeſt pearls are in the greateſt cheſts, and
" ſo in proportion to the leaſt, which are fill'd with nothing but ſeed-pearl. Theſe
" were in ſuch prodigious quantities, that the Spaniards affirm'd, nine hundred men
" with three hundred horſes, would not have ſuffic'd to carry away at once all the pearls
" depoſited in that temple." However, this will not be found ſo extraordinary, ſince we are told that the Americans of this province, depoſited every individual pearl they had met with for ſeveral ages together, in thoſe cheſts; and hence we may infer, that had the Spaniards kept all the gold and ſilver which they have brought from Peru in their own hands, they would by this time have had enough to cover a great number of their churches.

" They alſo found a great number of bundles of ſhamoy or wild-goats skins of dif" ferent colours, beſides ſeveral ſuits of skins with the hair dyed of different colours;
" ſeveral gowns of cats, martens and other skins, which were as well dreſs'd as they " could have been in Germany or Muſcovy.

" Round this temple, every part of which was very neat and clean, is a great ſtore" houſe divided into eight halls of equal bigneſs, which are a great ornament to it.
" The Spaniards went into them, and found 'em fill'd with military weapons. In the firſt " were long pikes tipp'd with very fine copper, and ſet off with rings of pearl, which " go three or four times round. That part of the pike which lies on the ſhoulder is " adorn'd with ſhamoy of various colours, having tufts of pearls at the end of it, which " makes them much more beautiful. In the ſecond hall were clubs like to thoſe of " the giants, ſet off with rings of pearl, and adorn'd up and down with tufts of different " colours, ſet round with pearls. In the third were poll-axes embelliſh'd like the reſt; in " the fourth were a kind of ſpears ſet off with tufts near the iron and the handle; in the " fifth were a kind of oars adorn'd with pearls and fringes; in the ſixth were very beauti" ful bows and arrows. Some are arm'd with flint-ſtones, ſharpen'd at the end like a " bodkin; ſwords, iron pikes, or points of a dagger with a double edge. The bows are
" enamel'd with ſeveral colours, ſhining and garniſh'd with pearls in ſeveral places. In " the ſeventh hall were bucklers made of wood and cow-hides, brought from far,
" adorn'd with pearls and colour'd tufts. In the eighth were ſhields made of reeds,
" finely interwoven and ſet off with tufts and ſeed-pearl."

Some Savages of Florida ſacrifice their firſt-born to the ſun, or rather to their ſove-reigns; at leaſt 'tis certain, that that cruel ceremony is perform'd in preſence of one of thoſe princes or Caciques, whom they call Paraouſti's. Whilſt the mother of the in-fant covers her face, weeps and groans over the ſtone againſt which the victim is to be daſh'd to pieces; and that the women who accompany her ſing and dance in a circle; another woman ſtands up in the midſt of the ring, holding the child in her arms, and ſhewing it at a diſtance to the Paraouſti. This woman dances in the ſame manner as the reſt of her companions, ſinging at the ſame time the praiſes of the Paraouſti. After this the prieſt, whom we ſee at a diſtance in the figure, ſurrounded with ſix other Floridans, daſhes out the child's brains. We are to obſerve, that the victim muſt always be a male infant.

[a] The ſame ſavages offer to the ſun, with great ſolemnity, the repreſentation of a ſtag; and chuſe for that purpoſe the skin of the largeſt ſtag they can meet with. They firſt ſtuff it with all kind of herbs, then adorn it with fruits and flowers, and liſt it to the top of a high tree, with its head turn'd towards the riſing-ſun. This ceremony is perform'd every year about the end of February; and is always accompanied with prayers and ſongs, which are chanted forth by the Paraouſti and one of the principal Jouanas at the head of thoſe devotees. The Floridans beſeech the ſun to bleſs the fruits of the earth, and preſerve its fruitfulneſs, and leave the ſtag's skin hanging on the tree till the year following.

They have another remarkable feſtival. [b] The people aſſemble under the direction of a Paraouſti, in order to go and pay their devotions to Toia. Travellers not knowing what Toia was, at once gave it the name of the devil. We have already obſerv'd that Toia is the evil principle. Be that as it will, this ceremony appears to be an act of contrition or deep ſorrow of mind, by which they imagine they ſhall obtain the favour of that idol. The Floridans meet together in a large open place, which the women adorn and get ready the day before the ceremony. The aſſembly is no ſooner drawn up in a ring, but three Jouanas, painted from head to foot with various kinds of colours, preſent themſelves in the midſt of it with drums, dancing and ſinging to the ſound of 'em; making very extraordinary wry-faces, and throwing themſelves into a thouſand fantaſtic ſhapes. The aſſembly anſwers in chorus to the muſic of the prieſts, who have no ſooner danc'd up and down three or four times, but they ſuddenly quit the diverſion, and fly to the woods. 'Tis there they conſult Toia. This myſterious flight interrupts the devotion, but the women continue it during the whole day with tears and howlings. Theſe cut and flaſh the arms of their young girls with muſſle-ſhells, and throw into the air the blood which ſtreams from the wound, as a homage due to Toia, invoking that idol thrice. Two days after the Jouanas return from the woods, where they had withdrawn themſelves to conſult it, and dance upon the very ſame ſpot which they had left ſo ſuddenly. The dance concludes with an entertainment; for as they had faſted three days, it would have been almoſt impoſſible for 'em to have continued any longer without eating: but they were indiſpenſibly oblig'd to faſt, ſince the gods reveal themſelves with greater freedom to ſuch as obſerve that duty. The brain, on theſe occaſions, is not clouded by thoſe vapours which ariſe from food, and is more ſuſceptible to the impreſſions of enthuſiaſm.

We ſhall conclude theſe deſcriptions with the following obſervation, viz. That the Floridans as well as Mexicans boaſt their having a prophecy which gave 'em notice of the coming of the Spaniards.

Their Prieſts, Diſcipline, &c.

THEIR prieſts, like thoſe of the other American nations, are likewiſe phyſicians, as alſo the Paraouſti's counſellors and miniſters of ſtate. They carry themſelves under this triple character with gravity, modeſty, and are ſurprizingly abſtemious. Before their promotion to the prieſthood, they are oblig'd to ſubmit to a very long diſcipline under the direction of other prieſts, who inſtruct 'em in the myſteries of Religion, and prepare their minds, as it were, for the reception of thoſe ideas, which they are to inſtil afterwards into the people. They are train'd up in faſting, abſtinence, retirement, and in a deprivation of the pleaſures of ſenſe; but then its auſterities are ſoften'd by viſions, viſions, and an intimate correſpondence with the deity. This is the account that travellers give of it, which whether it be exact in every particular, we ſhall not take upon us to determine. However, we are not to doubt but the old prieſts tell their young fry, that they muſt at leaſt appear thoroughly convinc'd of the holineſs of a vocation, which inveſts them at one and the ſame time with power both over body and ſoul. This diſcipline continues three years.

They hang at their girdles a bag fill'd with phyſical herbs and other medicaments; which is alſo the cuſtom of the Virginian prieſts; they are pretty well skill'd in the particular uſes of medicaments, and the properties of ſimples. They alſo employ vomits, ſweating, and lancing. They don't wipe away the blood which runs from wounds, but ſuck it with their mouths, and often thro' a ſtraw or reed. The Floridans are of opinion, that 'tis impoſſible but the breath and touch of the medico-prieſts muſt be of ſervice to the ſick. [a] A modern writer informs us, that the prieſt mumbles over certain words in theſe operations. If all theſe medicines are of no effect, the bath is preſcrib'd; and if that fails, he ſets the ſick perſon at the door of his hut with his face turn'd towards the riſing-ſun; when the medico-prieſt earneſtly entreats that planet to reſtore the ſick man to his health, by the gentle influence of its light. This is the laſt refuge of both patient and phyſician.

Theſe prieſts are clothed in a mantle of skins, cut in pieces of unequal bigneſs; which dreſs is ſometimes made in the form of a long gown: in this caſe they tye it about them with a leathern girdle, at which the bag hangs in which they put their medicaments. They go with their arms and feet uncover'd, and wear a fur cap made like a cone; their heads are often adorn'd with feathers, which they wear inſtead of a cap.

Their Military Ceremonies.

THE Floridans are of a very revengeful temper, which is alſo peculiar to the reſt of the American nations. [b] The former, to ſtir themſelves up to vengeance, hold certain aſſemblies, in which one of 'em is plac'd by himſelf at a diſtance. Then another riſes up, and taking a javelin in his hand, ſtrikes the former with all his ſtrength, the wounded perſon not offering ſo much as to flinch; after this the dart is preſented to others, who all ſtrike him till he falls down wounded to the ground. This being done, the women and young people raiſe him with tears in their eyes; give him Caſina to drink, which is the common liquor of their warriors; and convey him to a hut, where they again weep round him. The women and maidens get ready ſome medicaments to heal his wounds, the aſſembly at the ſame time drinking, rejoicing, and ſinging the brave exploits of their anceſtors, and ſtirring up one another to revenge. The whole ſolemnity is a commemoration of the death of their country-men. The wounded man is, in their eyes, an image of all the ill treatment they have met with from their enemies; and this ſpectacle inſpires the whole nation with an irreconcileable hatred.

Before their marching out to war, they hold a council, in which the Jouanas give their opinion. Nothing is there reſolv'd upon, till they have firſt been made privy to it, and alſo conſulted the oracle of their idol. The fumes of the Caſina contribute no leſs than the oracle to their taking thoſe deſperate reſolutions, which are the only ones they are ſenſible of: but none except the warriors are allow'd to drink Caſina, nor this neither, till after having firſt given proofs of their valour.

[c] Before they ſet out upon their expeditions, the Paraouſti turns himſelf towards the ſun, conjuring it at the ſame time to be propitious to him; when taking water in a wooden porringer, having firſt broke out into ſeveral imprecations againſt the enemy, he he throws the water up in the air, in ſuch a manner, that part of it falls down again upon the warriors, crying aloud at the ſame time, May you in like manner ſhed the blood of your enemies! He then takes ſome water a ſecond time, which he throws upon the fire that ſtands by him, and addreſſing himſelf to the ſame warriors, May you, ſays he, deſtroy your enemies as ſpeedily as I put out this fire! Both theſe ceremonies are accompanied with hideous cries and pathetical wry-faces.

[a] Thoſe of the Jouanas whom they conſulted upon the ſate of the expedition, are altogether as whimſical. The pretended magician lays himſelf upon a ſhield, in a poſture which it wou'd be needleſs to expreſs, ſince a verbal deſcription cou'd never come up to the engraver's art. We refer the reader to the plate, obſerving at the ſame time, that the conſulted prieſt draws a circle of unintelligible figures, himſelf ſtanding in the midſt of 'em. Theſe figures have at leaſt this uſe, viz. that they ſerve to give the people a higher idea of his knowledge. He recovers himſelf out of that unnatural poſture, after having continued a quarter of an hour in the moſt violent agitations; made the moſt frightful wry-faces; and thrown himſelf into as violent diſtortions as the higheſt convulſions cou'd have occaſion'd: then the god leaves his miniſter, who now grown frantic, riſes up, goes to the Paraouſti, and acquaints him with the reſult of the ſpiritual conference; relates to him the number of his enemies, the manner of their encampment, and the ſucceſs of the expedition; of all which we are aſſur'd they give a perfect account.

They ſcalp their enemies in the ſame manner as the other nations of North-America, and hang the legs and arms of their ſlain upon poles ſet up for that purpoſe. [b] An aſſembly gathers round theſe poles to hear the curſes which a Jouana pronounces againſt their enemies. Three men kneel before the prieſt, who has a little idol in his hand. One of theſe three beats time with a club upon a ſtone, and anſwers the prieſt's imprecations; during which the other two ſing to the noiſe of their gourd-bottles.

Such women as have loſt their husbands in war, implore the aſſiſtance of the Paraouſti, and preſent themſelves before him with eyes full of tears: a ſurprizing teſtimony of the love they bear them! Whether this grief be real or feigned, we are not to doubt but thoſe tears are of great ſervice in ſtirring up the revenge of the warriors.

Their hermaphrodites, whom we before obſerv'd to live a very odd kind of life, are employ'd in carrying their burdens and proviſions for war. They alſo make uſe of them to carry their ſick and wounded. Theſe hermaphrodites wear long hair like women, and are very much deſpis'd by their warriors.

Their Funeral Rites, and Notions with regard to the Immortality of the Soul.

THE Floridan women above-mentioned are not ſatisfy'd with ſhedding tears at the king's feet, to excite him to revenge the unhappy death of their husbands, but weep and groan over their graves; and as a laſt teſtimony of their conjugal affection, theſe diſconſolate widows cut their hair quite off, and ſcatter it over them. Some people, who are ſo ſilly as to believe that a husband's death merits an eternity of affliction, wou'd cry out that they would never alter their condition; but ſuch are greatly miſtaken, for they, as well as our widows, have their ſtated times of widowhood. The Floridan women are not allow'd to marry again till their hair is grown as long as it was before, i. e. till it deſcends below their ſhoulders.

They interr their Paraouſti's in the moſt magnificent manner poſſible. The ſepulchre is ſurrounded with arrows, with the points fix'd in the ground: over it is placed the cup which the monarch made uſe of in his life-time. They ſpend three days in tears and faſting over his grave, by way of honouring his memory. The Paraouſti's, his allies, bemoan his death with the ſame ſolemnity: they ſhave their heads as a teſtimony of their affection. In fine, hir'd ſhe-mourners lament his death thrice every day, viz. in the morning, at noon, and at night, for ſix months together. They burn every thing that belong'd to him in his life-time, and obſerve the ſame ceremony at the death of their prieſts. They bury them in their houſes, after which they ſet fire to the houſe, and every thing that is in it. [a] We are told that the Floridans, after having burnt thoſe ſacred bodies, beat the bones to powder, and a year afterwards give 'em the deceaſed's near relations to drink. [b] The Floridans of thoſe provinces which Ferdinand de Soto viſited, buried live ſlaves along with their monarchs, to wait upon them in the other world.

[c] The inhabitants of Apalache embalm the bodies of their relations and deceaſed friends, and leave them almoſt three months in the balm; they are afterwards dry'd with aromatic drugs, wrapp'd up in rich furs, and laid in cedar coffins, which the relations keep for twelve moons at their own houſes: they then carry it to the neighbouring foreſt, and bury it at the foot of a tree. But they ſhew a greater regard for the bodies of their Paraouſti's; for they firſt embalm them, then dreſs them up with all their ornaments, ſet 'em off with feathers and necklaces, and afterwards keep 'em for three years together in the apartment where they died, all which time they lie in thoſe wooden coffins above-mention'd; at the expiration of which, they are depoſited in the ſepulchres of their predeceſſors upon the ſide of the mountain of Olaimy. They are let down into a cave, the mouth of which they ſtop with great flint-ſtones, hanging on the branches of the neighbouring trees the weapons they made uſe of in war, as ſo many teſtimonies of their bravery. 'Tis further ſaid, that the neareſt relations plant a cedar near the cave, which they dreſs with care in honour of the deceaſed. Whenever the tree dies, they immediately plant another in its place.

The Apalachites believe the immortality of the ſoul, and that thoſe who have liv'd a life of virtue are carried up into heaven and lodg'd among the ſtars; but they fix the habitation of the wicked in the precipices of the high mountains of the north, among the bears, and in the midſt of ice and ſnow. [d] The other nations of theſe wide-extended countries believe alſo that the good ſhall be rewarded, and the wicked puniſh'd after this life. They call heaven the high world, and by way of oppoſition, the lower world, that which ſhall be the eternal habitation of the wicked. Cupai, that evil genius, whom the reſt of the Floridans call Toia, and we the devil, reigns in this latter place.

The [e] Indians of Carolina believe the tranſmigration of ſouls; and whenever any of 'em die, they bury proviſions and ſome utenſils along with 'em for their uſe.

We ſhall take notice of one cuſtom of the Floridans of Hirriga, which has ſome relation to that of the Apalachites. [f] Theſe ſavages bury their dead in foreſts. They lay the bodies in wooden coffins cover'd over with boards, which are not fix'd to one another, but held down only by the weight of ſome ſtones or pieces of wood which they lay upon the coffin; and as the province of Florida abounds with a great number of wild beaſts, they appoint ſlaves to guard the bodies.

Their Marriage-Ceremonies, and the Education of their Children.

[a] THE Indians of Florida generally marry but one wife, who is obliged to be true to her husband, upon pain of being expoſed to a ſhameful puniſhment, or even of being put to a cruel death. The great men of the nation diſpenſe with the cuſtom which allows but one wife to the common people, for they marry as many as they pleaſe; but then one of 'em only is look'd on as the lawful wife, all the reſt being conſider'd as concubines. The offſpring of the latter don't enjoy an equal portion of their father's wealth, as the children of the former do.

The Apalachites don't marry out of their families. Among them parents often make a match for their children from their infant years, who ratify what they had agreed upon when themſelves come to age. They are allow'd to marry in any degree of conſanguinity, next to that of brother and ſiſter.

The latter give to their male-children the names of the enemies they have kill'd, of the villages to which they have ſet fire, or of ſuch of their priſoners as have died in war. The girls bear the names of their deceaſed mothers or grand-mothers, for they obſerve never to let two perſons of the ſame family go by the ſame name. Both boys and girls are under their mother's direction till twelve years of age, after which the father undertakes the education of the boys.

We are aſſured that husbands have no commerce with their wives from the time of their breeding, till after their lying-in. They are even ſo ſcrupulous, as not to eat any thing they may have touch'd during the time of their child-bearing.

[b] The Floridans who inhabit near Panuco, don't marry young, and nevertheleſs we are aſſured they are ſcarce maids by that time they are "ten [c] or twelve years of age." The women of the Lucayan iſlands wear a [d] cotton apron for modeſty ſake; and their young women wear them as ſoon as they are fit for marriage.

Of their Records.

[e] THE Floridans of Carolina make uſe of hieroglyphics and emblems to record their events. They take care to inſtruct their children in every thing which relates to their families and their nation, in order that the hiſtory of them may be tranſmitted to lateſt poſterity. They erect a little ſtone pyramid in thoſe places where a battle has been fought, or a colony ſettled. The number of the ſlain, or that of the founders, or of thoſe who firſt inhabited the place on which theſe pyramids are erected, is ſeen by the number of the ſtones.

Religion of the Inhabitants of the Caribee Iſlands.

THE Spaniards have deſtroy'd the greateſt part of theſe iſlanders, and the reſt of the Europeans, who copied after 'em, have not treated 'em much better; but ſtill none of 'em have been able to deprive thoſe unhappy ſavages of the liberty of exclaiming againſt their injuſtice, and the cruelties they have ſuffer'd under the government of their new maſters. " [a] You have driven me out of my habitation, ſays the " Caribee, which you had not the leaſt right to do, neither can you have the leaſt " pretenſions to it. You are continually threatning to turn me out of the little that is " left me; muſt then the poor Caribee be forced to take up his habitation in the ſea " with the fiſhes? Your own country muſt certainly be very miſerable, ſince you quit " it to turn me out of mine. Whence is it that you take ſo much pleaſure in tor- " menting me?" Ambition and avarice have obliterated in our minds all the maxims of the goſpel. Our conqueſts will indeed have one ſpecious pretext, viz. that of winning over the ſouls of the Americans to Chriſt; but then a converted Indian will anſwer, " Why do you not therefore conſider me as a brother, ſince chriſtianity ſets " mankind in a ſtate of freedom; and at the ſame time that it exhorts us to humility, " fills our mind with a ſpirit of tenderneſs and humanity; a ſpirit which you have " never once breath'd with regard to us?" To all this we make no other anſwer, than that our intereſt calls for their ſubjection; that we want ſlaves to cultivate our lands; that we have diſpoſſeſs'd theſe ſavages of them in order to improve 'em, and to ſearch into their bowels for wealth, of which they were wholly ignorant; and ſo great is our infatuation, as to imagine that theſe venal motives ſuit with the gentle ſpirit of chriſtianity. But ſurely this cannot ſurprize us, when 'tis conſider'd that ſome have endeavour'd to juſtify the cruel havock which has been made of the Americans by principles drawn from religion; and have fancied that the behaviour of the Jews towards the Canaanites gave a ſufficient ſanction to their barbarous proceedings!

The almoſt total extirpation of the Caribees gave occaſion to this digreſſion; they ſeem to have been deſtroy'd with a more violent ſpirit of fury than the reſt of the Americans; and one would think that their conquerors, in order to palliate their inhuman butcheries, had endeavour'd to make 'em paſs for the moſt unnatural monſters, who had neither law, or religion; and, in a word, that they had nothing human about 'em but their ſhape.

If we may believe [b] Rochefort, the Caribees, ſo far from worſhipping a Deity, have not ſo much as any word to expreſs it; ſo that whenever we ſpeak to 'em concerning the ſupreme Being, we are obliged to make uſe of a great circumlocution, to give them an idea thereof. They conſider the earth as a kind parent that nouriſhes her creatures; but they don't underſtand what we mean by Divine Eſſence, or the other myſteries of religion. The ſame is related of the greateſt part of the Americans. 'Tis probable they confuſe theſe Barbarians with too great a multitude of ideas and arguments. They are for having them comprehend the Deity at once in the ſame manner we do, and require them to believe, at the firſt word, and on their bare words; a ſett [c] of people who declare certain myſteries to them, of the truth whereof they themſelves were not convinced till after long experience, a continual courſe of ſtudy, and a multitude of reflections; to all which, a catechiſm taught them in their youth, had led the way, the better to prepare their minds for imbibing the principles of the chriſtian faith. If it be true, that theſe ſavages have not capacity enough to underſtand abſtracted ſubjects, we ought before all things to poliſh their minds, form them to reflection, and make 'em men before we go about to make 'em chriſtians.

[d] The Caribees acknowledge a good and an evil principle, and call them Maboia. Rochefort tells us that they believe there are a multitude of good ſpirits, and that each ſavage imagines he has one to himſelf, to whom they give the name of Chemen. Other [e] travellers tell us, that they ſay Louquo or Looko was the firſt man, from whom whom all mankind are deſcended; that he created fiſhes; and roſe again three days after his death, and afterwards aſcended into heaven. That after Louquo's departure, the terreſtrial animals were created. They believe that the earth and ſea were created, but not the heavens. They have alſo ſome idea of the flood, and aſcribe the cauſe of it to the wickedneſs of mankind in thoſe ages. Maboia, ſay they, is the author of eclipſes. That notwithſtanding their firm perſuaſion of the power and malice of this evil ſpirit, they nevertheleſs [a] pray to it, "but then 'tis after a very irregular "manner, without having any fix'd time or place for that purpoſe; without once en-"deavouring to know him; without having the leaſt diſtinct idea of him; without "having the leaſt love for him; and, in a word, only to prevent his doing them any "harm: whereas they ſay, that ſince the good principle is kind and beneficent, it "were needleſs to pray to it." The ſavages mention'd in the preceding articles have the ſame ſentiments. They are of opinion that the ſun preſides over the ſtars, and that the latter are Chemens, who are ſuppoſed to ſuperintend over meteors, ſtorms, &c. We are not to omit, that theſe ſavages have their heroes or rather demi-gods, who are now ſtars and Chemens.

They offer Caſſave, and the firſt-fruits of their fruits to their Chemens; and ſometimes out of gratitude make a feaſt in their honour. Rochefort tells us, that theſe offerings are not accompanied with either adoration or prayers, placing them only at one corner of the hutt on a [b] table made of ruſhes and of Latanier, a tree which grows in this country. Here the ſpirits aſſemble to eat and drink thoſe oblations; a proof of which is, that the Caribees aſſure us they hear the veſſels in which the preſents had been laid, move up and down, as alſo the noiſe which the mouths of thoſe gods make at the time of their eating.

The ſame author relates, that they make little images reſembling the form under which Maboia reveals himſelf to 'em, in order to prevent their doing them any harm. They wear theſe images about their necks, and pretend that it gives 'em eaſe; moreover, that they faſt and flaſh themſelves for his ſake. We are obliged to obſerve in this place, that Rochefort, Father Labat, la Borde, and ſome others, both Proteſtants and Roman-catholicks, unanimouſly declare, that theſe people are tormented with the evil ſpirit, who beats, ſcratches, nay even wounds 'em in a moſt cruel manner, in order to force 'em to execute all his injunctions with the utmoſt exactneſs: all which may be true for what we know. We have already obſerv'd, that the North-Americans are alſo afraid of being tormented by the devil; and ſhall find in the ſequel of this work, that thoſe of South-America are expoſed to the ſame perſecution. Father Labat aſſures us, that the power of this angel of darkneſs has no manner of aſcendant in thoſe places where a croſs is ſet up; and Rochefort informs us, that "the devil has not the power to torture the ſavages "when they are in the company of chriſtians.——The ſavages, whenever the grand "adverſary of mankind begins to afflict 'em, run as faſt as poſſible into the next chriſtian "houſe they meet with, where they find a ſure aſylum againſt all the aſſaults of that "furious aſſailant: and adds, that baptiſm infallibly preſerves thoſe ſavages from the "devil's blows." From theſe two authorities receiv'd from perſons whoſe principles are ſo very different, we may however draw this inference, that the devil is equally afraid both of Proteſtants and Roman catholicks.

They have an infinite number of omens and ſuperſtitions, two of which only ſhall be mention'd. They pretend that bats are Chemens, whoſe office it is to watch during the night. They often preſerve the hair or the bones of ſome of their deceaſed relations in a gourd-bottle, which they conſult upon occaſion; and their Boia's, whom we are going to mention, make them believe that the ſpirit of the deceaſed acquaints 'em with the deſigns of their enemies.

[b] They call theſe tables Matoutous.

Of

Of their Prieſts and Diſcipline, &c.

THESE Boias, who are the medico-prieſts of the Caribees, have each their particular genius, whom they pretend to conjure up by humming over certain words, and the ſmoak of tobacco. They never call up this genius or demon but in the night-time, and that too in a place where there is neither fire nor light. We are told that theſe Boias are wizards, and have the ſecret of killing their enemies with charms which they employ againſt 'em.

The old Boias make all their candidates to the prieſthood go thro' a pretty ſevere diſcipline: the novice is obliged from his infancy to abſtain from ſeveral kinds of meats, and even to live upon bread and water in a little hutt, where he is viſited by nobody but his maſters, who make inciſions in his skin. But they don't ſtop here: they give him tobacco-juice, which, as it purges him in a violent manner, frees him, ſay they, from all terreſtrial uncleanneſs, and prepares his mind for the reception of the Chemen. They then rub his body over with gum, which they afterwards cover over with feathers, in order to make him exact and diligent in his conſultations of the genii, and ready to obey their orders. They teach him to cure the diſeaſed, and to conjure up the ſpirit.

The Caribees aſcribe their diſeaſes to Maboia. As thoſe people are obſerv'd to be of a very melancholy caſt of mind, we may probably ſuppoſe that the nocturnal apparitions of the devil, and the torments which he inflicts upon 'em, are in reality no more than the chimæra's of a brain very ſuſceptible to the impreſſions of fear. We may aſcribe part of the magical operations of the American prieſts to the ſame cauſe; for to impute them all, would be going too far. Whenever they are deſirous of knowing the iſſue of any illneſs with which they are troubled, they firſt lay the offering intended for Maboia upon a Matoutous, and then ſend for a Boia in the night-time, who immediately orders the fire to be put out, and turns out all thoſe perſons of whom he has the leaſt ſuſpicion. After this he goes into a corner, where he orders the patient to be brought to him, them ſmoaks a leaf of tobacco, part of which he bruiſes in his hands, and ſnapping his fingers at the ſame time, blows what he has rubb'd into the air. The odour of this perfume brings the Chemen, who anſwers the demand of the Boia, when the latter draws near to his patient, feels, preſſes, and handles ſeveral times ſucceſſively that part where the pain lies, if it be an outward one; pretending at the ſame time to draw out from thence, that which occaſions it, and often ſucks it. Theſe ſavages alſo make uſe of the bath and lancing. If this conſultation with the ſpirit does not give the patient any eaſe, the Boia-phyſician, reſumes his prieſtly function, and after having given the patient ſome conſolation, to prepare him for his journey into the next world, he declares to him that his god, or, if the reader pleaſes, his devil, is deſirous of his company, and to deliver him from the miſeries of this life.

If the ſick perſon recovers, they make a feaſt in honour of Maboia, and ſet victuals and drink for him upon a Matoutou. The Caſſave and the l'Ovicou which they preſent to him, continue all night upon the table, and as, to ſpeak with theſe ſavages, the ſpirit eats and drinks only in a ſpiritual manner, every thing they had ſet for him over night is found untouch'd in the morning. The Boia takes poſſeſſion of theſe oblations, and the Caribees look upon them with ſo much awe and veneration, that none but their old men and the chief perſons of the nation are allow'd to touch 'em. When the feaſt is ended, they black the patient with Juniper apples, which makes him as ugly as the devil himſelf.

Their Feſtivals, Aſſemblies, and Wars.

THEY have frequently feaſts, or rather drunken entertainments. 'Tis in this manner they ſolemnize the return from an expedition, the birth of their children, the time appointed for the cutting off their hair, and that of their beginning to go to war. The holding a council of war, the felling of any wood or grove, the grubbing up of a piece of ground, the building of a canoo, are all conſider'd as ſolemnities. They call theſe feaſts, aſſemblies, or drunken entertainments, Vin.

They obſerve a faſt upon their arriving at the ſtate of puberty, on their being made captains, upon the death of a father or mother, wife or husband; this laſt article is very ſurprizing after what has been before obſerv'd of the little affection which we are aſſur'd a husband has for his wife, and, as we may naturally ſuppoſe, a wife for her husband. If that ſaying be true, that friendſhip always meets with a reciprocal return, and that according to the maxim of Count de Buſſi Rabutin, all thoſe who love are ſure of being belov'd, it may on the other ſide be as true, that hatred will be repaid with hatred. The Caribees alſo faſt after having kill'd an Arouague, i. e. an enemy.

They have no ſtated time for holding their aſſemblies of war. As [a] to all thoſe of another kind, we have already obſerv'd that they eat, drink, and get drunk in them; to which we ſhall add, that in theſe they cut one another to pieces in cold blood.

Whenever they are about making war, ſome old woman draws up the whole deſign; makes a ſpeech to the company in order to ſtir 'em up to revenge; and when ſhe ſees that by the ſtrength of her harangue and of the Ouicou, which is their drink, the aſſembly begin to give manifeſt tokens of their being inſpir'd with rage and fury, ſhe then throws into the midſt of 'em ſome broil'd limbs of thoſe they had kill'd in war; after which, a captain ſeconds the old lady, and makes a ſpeech upon the ſame ſubject.

Their manner of making war is to come upon their enemies by ſurprize, and to fall upon 'em in ambuſcade. " [b] They cover themſelves all over with boughs and leaves, " and mask themſelves with an Indian cane-leaf call'd Baliſier, by making a hole for " their eyes to look thro'. Thus equipp'd, they ſtand up cloſe to a tree, and wait till " their enemies come by, in order to beat their heads to pieces at one blow with their " Bouton, (club) or to ſhoot 'em with their arrows after their being paſs'd by." Whenever they fall upon a houſe that is cover'd with leaves of cane-ſticks or palm-trees, they ſet fire to the roof, by pouring down arrows upon it, to which they tie an handful of cotton, which they light juſt when they let fly.

Their arrows are always poiſon'd. " They are full of little notches, which make " ſo many tongues, very neatly wrought, and cut in ſuch a manner as not to hinder " the arrow from penetrating, but from coming out again without widening the wound " conſiderably; or by driving it back to the oppoſite part to draw it out by making a " freſh one. They always make two cuts in that part where the reed is grafted at " the ſharp end, in order that when it is entred into the body, the reſt of the arrow " may fall, and at the ſame time leave the poiſon'd end in the body." They treat their priſoners of war much after the ſame manner as the Canadans do theirs.

Their

Their Marriage-Ceremonies, and Education of their Children, &c.

THE Caribees are jealous of their wives. A bare ſuſpicion of their having violated the fidelity they owe their husbands, gives them a power to kill their wives without any further ceremony. The husband is not liable to be call'd to account for an affair of this nature, becauſe the women of theſe iſlands are their husband's ſlaves; and, notwithſtanding the rigours of their ſlavery, we are nevertheleſs "[a] aſſur'd that they obey "with ſo much exactneſs, ſilence, ſweetneſs, and reſpect, that their husbands are very "rarely oblig'd to remind 'em of it. An example worthy the imitation of the chriſtian "wives, who are daily inſtructed from the pulpit, but to no purpoſe, in the duties of "obedience and conjugal fidelity. This doctrine will probably be inculcated to 'em "as long as the world ſtands, but will have as little effect upon them, as the preaching "of the goſpel has with regard to the Caribees." In fine, the female world are here ſuch complete ſlaves, that a woman is never known to eat with her husband, or even in his preſence.

Their young girls about twelve years of age, wear the apron, which is the characteriſtic of modeſty and chaſtity. In the Lucayan iſlands, when [b] a mother knows by certain natural ſymptoms that her daughter may aſſume the name of woman, the relations meet together and make a feaſt, after which they give her a cotton-net fill'd with herbs, which ſhe wears afterwards about her thighs, for before ſhe went ſtark-naked. 'Tis true indeed, that nakedneſs does not make any impreſſion upon their ſenſes; and we are aſſur'd they have ſo much virtue as to ſay, that when they are naked, they are to be look'd upon only in the face. [c] We are alſo told, that when a young maiden is of an age fit for marriage, ſhe is oblig'd to live for ten days together upon dry Caſſave; if in this time ſhe does not die with hunger, 'tis a proof that ſhe will be a good houſe-wife.

Such young Caribee women as are marriageable, are not allow'd to have any commerce with their young men. Their mothers never ſuffer 'em to go out of their ſight: "Nevertheleſs, ſays Father Labat, a young woman very ſeldom lives to that age "without being ſingled out before by ſome young ſavage, who conſiders her the moment "he has made his declaration as his future wife, till ſhe may be of an age of being ſo "in effect. Among theſe ſavages, relations are permitted to marry with one another, "a woman not being allow'd to refuſe her kinſman; they often pitch upon 'em when "they are but four or five years of age. A brother does not marry his ſiſter, nor a "ſon his mother." Rochefort aſſures us, "that they look upon this crime with horror; "but that they allow ſo general, ſo extenſive a liberty with regard to all the other "degrees of conſanguinity, and the plurality of wives, that a man often marries three or "four own ſiſters, who at the ſame time are either his neices or couſin-germans. They "reaſon thus, that as they have been brought up together, they will therefore love each "other the more, and preſerve a greater harmony." But here their notions differ greatly from ours.

We muſt not omit a very whimſical cuſtom. It ſometimes happens that a Caribee ſhall before-hand demand the offspring of a woman with child, provided it be a girl; which if they grant him, he marks the woman's belly with Rocou. As ſoon as the girl is ſeven or eight years of age, he goes to bed to her in order to inure her to the ſports of Venus.

[a] Father Labat's voyages to the American iſlands. [b] Purchas.
[c] La Borde's relation of the Caribees.

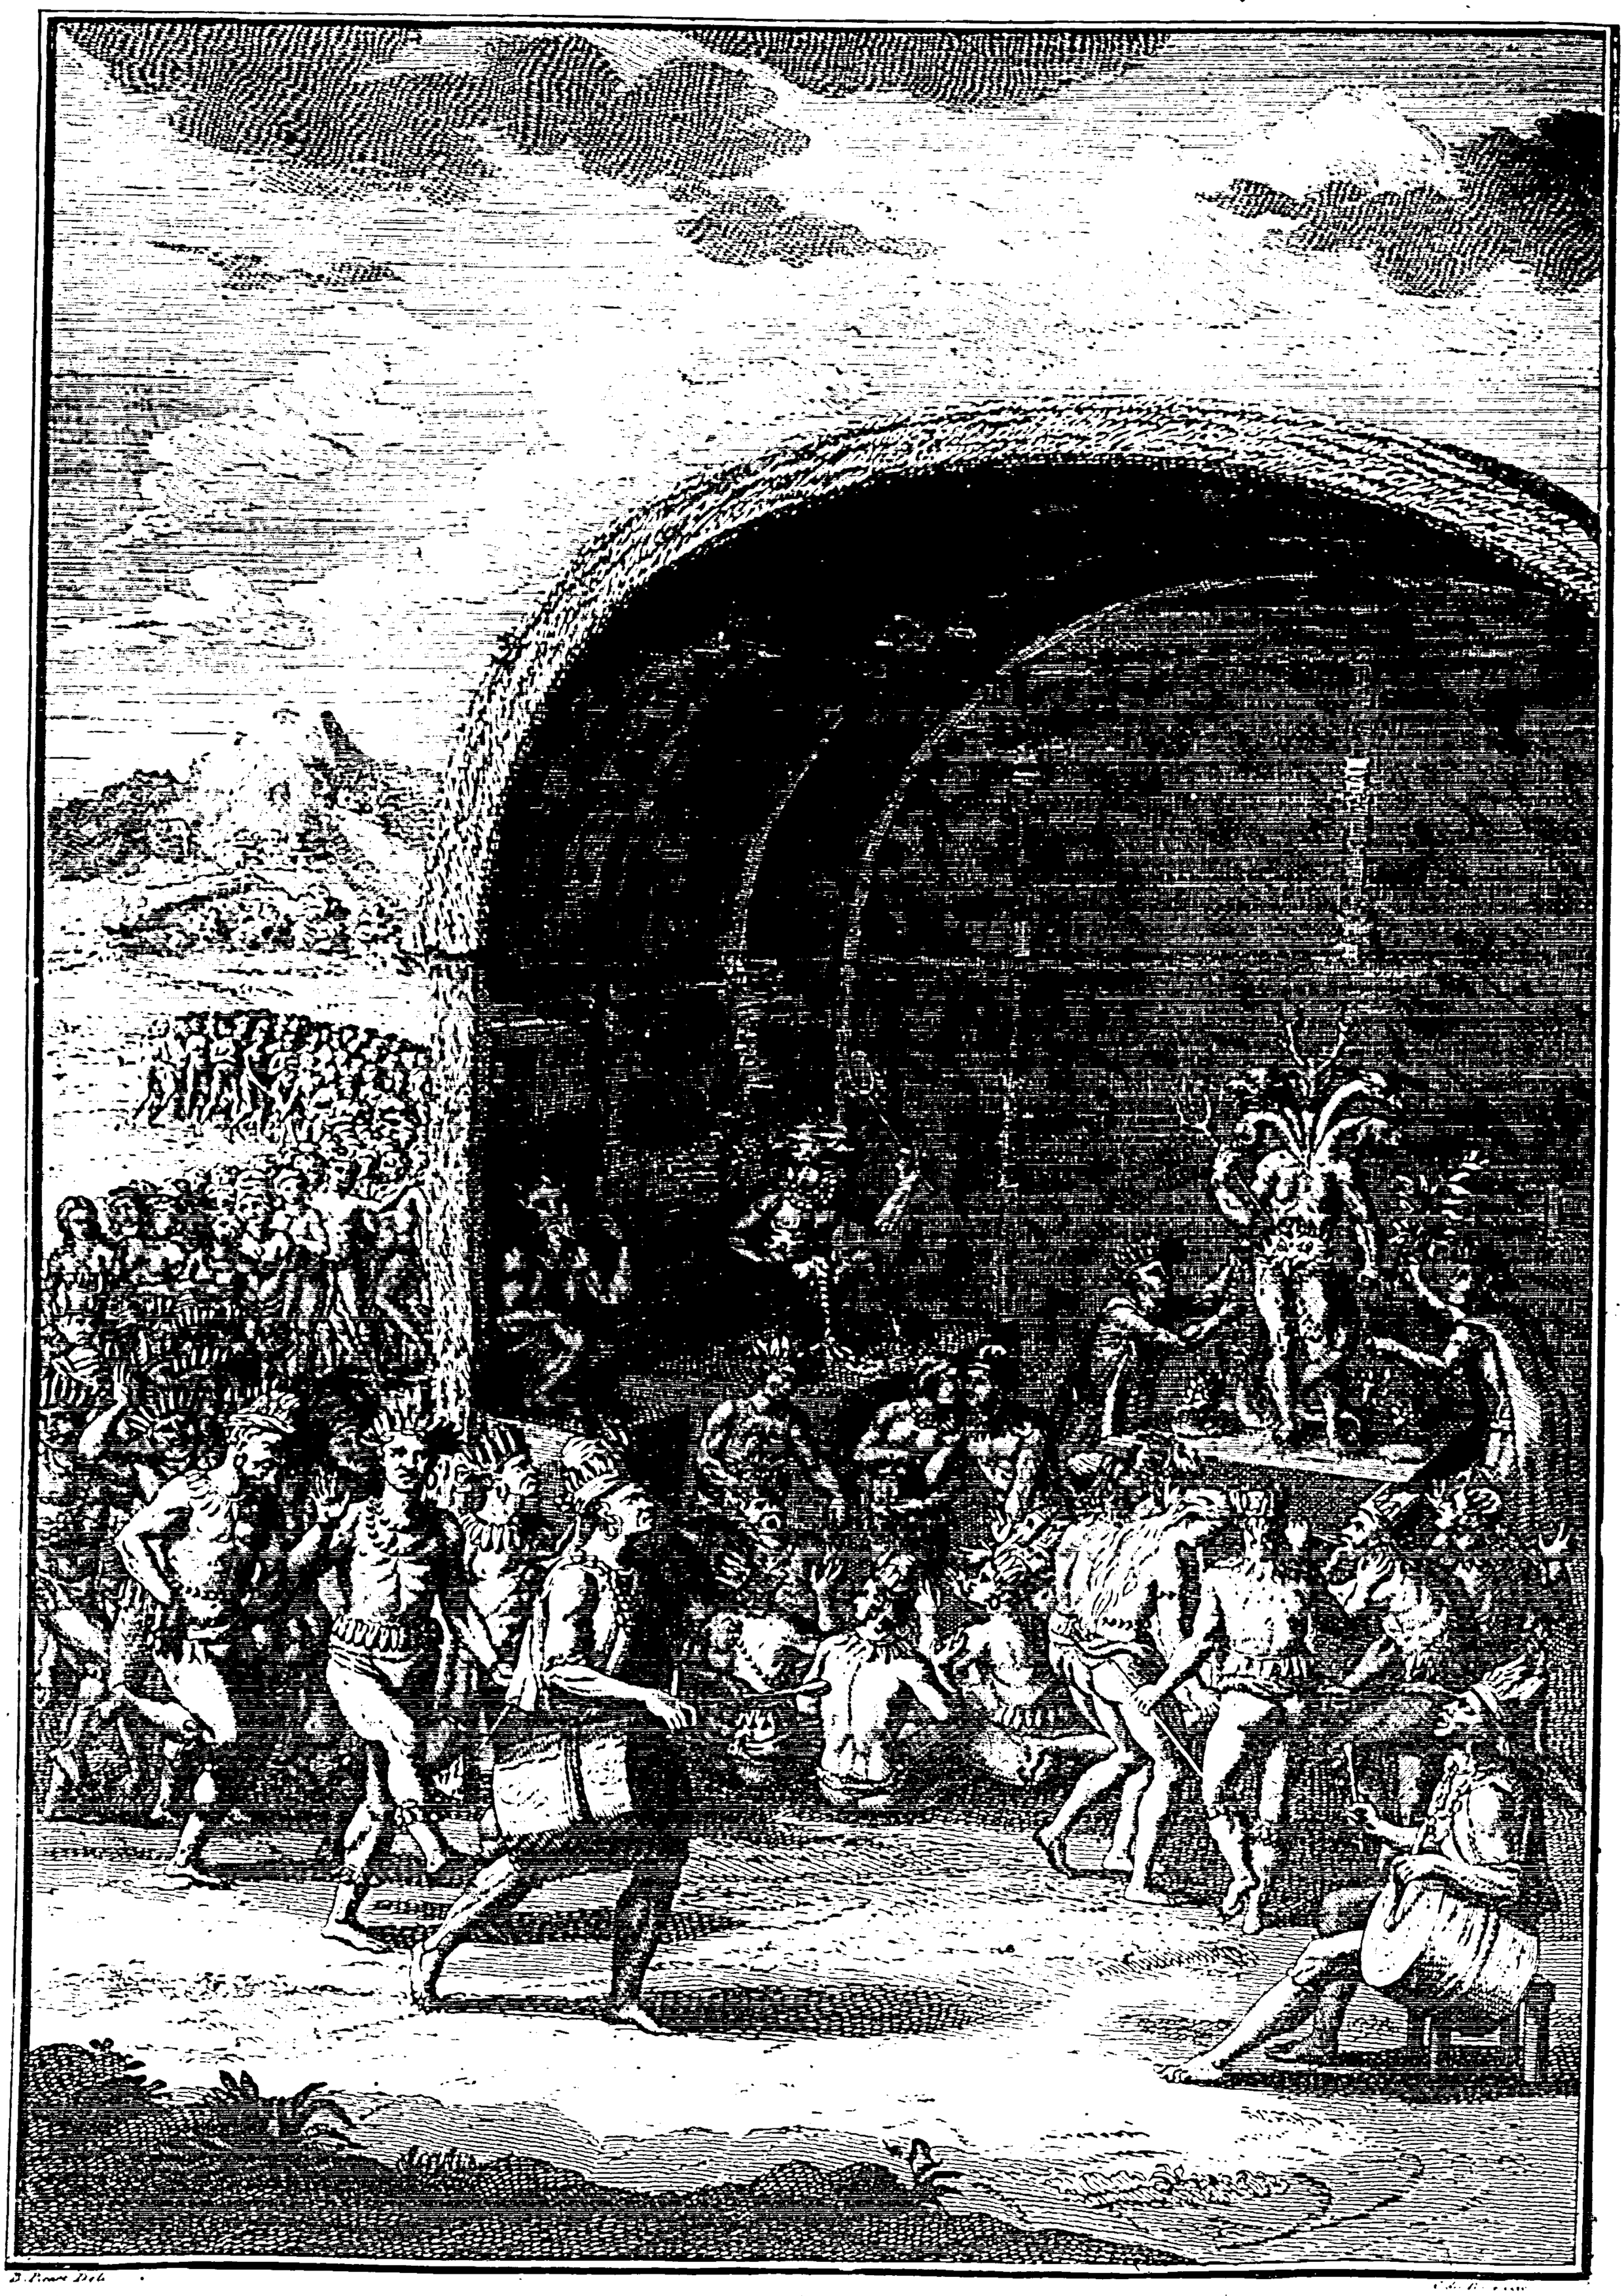
A father upon the birth of his firſt-born ſon withdraws from ſociety, and keeps a very ſtrict faſt for thirty or forty days together, [a] Another traveller adds, that the husband goes to bed, and acts the part of the lying-in woman. They neither give us the origin or reaſon of this cuſtom. Here follows another that is altogether as whimſical: the time preſcribed for faſting being expir'd, they pitch upon two young [b] Caribees to flaſh his skin, and to cut and hack his body all over; they then rub the wound with tobacco-juice, after which they ſeat him in a chair painted red: the women bring in victuals, which the old men preſent to the wounded perſon, and feed him as we do a child; in like manner they pour drink down his throat, holding his neck at the ſame time; and when he has done eating, the old men preſent him with two pieces of Caſſave which the poor tortur'd father holds in his hands. The ceremony is perform'd in a large open place, during which he gets aſtride upon two Caſſaves, which he is afterwards oblig'd to eat. We may very well ſuppoſe 'em to be bloody. They then ſmear the child's face over with blood, which they ſay contributes to the making him brave and courageous, and the more patient the father is, the more his ſon will be valiant. But this is not all; he is oblig'd to abſtain for ſix months together from various things, every time any of his wives are brought to bed. The moment the child is born, he is bath'd in water, and if it happens in the night-time, the father baths himſelf alſo: then the mother begins to flatten the infant's forehead, and to ſquaſh its face, which they think an addition to its beauty. We may naturally ſuppoſe that the education they beſtow upon them is of a piece with the reſt.



They name the child about a fortnight after its birth, which they take from ſome of the anceſtors of their family, from ſome tree, or other object that is agreeable to 'em, in a word, from any thing that either pleaſes or ſtrikes their ſenſes. The child is nam'd with form and ceremony, and has its god-fathers and god-mothers, if we may call thoſe by that name who bore a hole in the child's ears, in his lower-lip, and between his noſtrils. They put threads into theſe holes, to which pendants hang dangling; but they delay the ceremony in caſe the child be too weak to go thro' it. At two years of age they perform the ceremony of cutting off its hair.

Their Funeral Rites.

WHenever a Caribee dies, they call all his relations together, to ſhew 'em that he died a natural death: and if only one of theſe ſhould have eſcap'd ſeeing the deceaſed, the united teſtimony of all the reſt would not be ſufficient to perſuade him that he died according to the common courſe of nature, but he would imagine they had all conſpir'd his death, which he would think himſelf oblig'd to revenge by killing ſome one or other of them. They lay the deceaſed in a well, which they dig in a corner of a Carbet or Caribee hutt, about four foot in diameter, and ſix or ſeven deep: he is here laid all on a heap, his elbows on his knees, and the palms of his hands on his cheeks. He is painted red, with whiskers and black ſtrokes of a richer dye than thoſe commonly uſed, which are generally made of Junipa. They bind his hair behind his head; his bow, his arrows, his club, and his knife lying by his ſide. They put him in ſand knee-deep, which they only do to keep him fix'd in that poſture; for the ſand does come up as high as the top of the pit. After all the relations have examin'd the body, they fill up the hole. Another traveller adds, that they bury with him [c] a ſervant to attend upon him, and his dog to watch him.

We may eaſily imagine that their mourning is whimſical enough. They firſt lay the corps into the pit, then light a fire juſt by, when every one ſquats himſelf round about it.

it. The men ſet themſelves behind the women, and invite 'em to weep, by giving 'em a tap on the arm; they then all roar and cry together, breaking out into long and repeated exclamations on the death of the deceaſed, at the ſame time asking him what made him die.

They believe that the human body is inhabited with a variety of ſouls, and that that of the heart is immortal. They aſſign one ſoul to the head, which is the ſecond in dignity. The others, ſay they, are ſeated in the joints and thoſe parts of the body where a pulſe is felt.

The firſt is immortal, which after its leaving this world, goes and inhabits another young, beautiful, newly-created body in the next. The other ſouls continue upon earth, and tranſmigrate into the bodies of beaſts, or are changed into evil genii. We are certain of one circumſtance, which is, that all their notions on this article are very irregular and incoherent; for they ſay that the ſoul, altho' immortal, is nevertheleſs a body of a very thin and delicate ſubſtance. But this idea is not peculiar to them, ſince ſome fathers of the church have given into it. They look upon this ſoul as a ſenſual Being, which is neceſſitated to eat, drink, and divert itſelf in the next world; but then if we ask what places are the ſcenes of theſe pleaſures? ſome of them will anſwer, that the ſoul will go into certain fortunate iſlands, where their enemies will be their ſlaves; and others, that it will be plung'd up to the neck in a flood of pleaſures.

Their Records, &c.

WHenever they have ſet a day for the tranſacting of any buſineſs, they take a certain number of peas, and put one every day into a little gourd-bottle, till the whole are put in; by which they know that to be the day they had fix'd upon. They have another way of eaſing their memories, which is as follows: They take a rope, and tie as many knots in it as they have things to remember, which differs very little from the Quippos of the Peruvians. They alſo make as many marks upon certain pieces of wood, as they intend to employ days in preparing an affair.

They regulate their months by moons, and reckon their years by harveſts; but in general compute 'em by the courſe of the ſeven ſtars or Pleiad s.

Religion of the Savages of Hiſpaniola.

'TWould be needleſs to ſay much upon this head, becauſe the [a] religion of theſe Savages is the ſame with that of the inhabitants of the reſt of the Antilles: we will only remark, that theſe Savages pretended their demons had formerly foretold that their country would be conquer'd and deſtroy'd by a bearded nation who wore clothes,

[a] Some Spaniards, who were preſent at the firſt conqueſts which were made in America, tell us, that the inhabitants of Hiſpaniola look'd upon the Chemens or Zemes, for 'tis thus they have expreſs'd it, as the meſſengers, the agents, or mediators of a ſupreme, ſole, eternal, infinite, almighty, inviſible Being; they imagin'd that thoſe Zemes preſided over all the affairs of men. They gave the name of Jocauna and Guamanocon to this ſovereign God, who nevertheleſs, according to them, was a created Being, ſince they tell us of his mother, who went by five ſeveral names. Whenever they went to war, they uſed to fix two little Zemes upon their foreheads.

We have already obſerv'd, that thoſe Zemes were of wood, ſtone, cotton, &c. The Savages of Hiſpaniola worſhipp'd one under the figure of a woman, by whoſe ſides were placed her two firſt miniſters of ſtate, both of 'em ready to execute her orders. One of theſe, who acted the part of an herald, convened the other Zemes, in order to raiſe the wind, to bring down rain, &c. as occaſion might require. The other was commiſſion'd to puniſh thoſe with floods and inundations who did not pay the homage they ow'd to their miſtreſs. We have borrow'd theſe remarks from a treatiſe of Peter Martyr, entitled de rebus oceanicis & novo orbe, &c.

clothes, who would ſuppreſs their worſhip, aboliſh their cuſtoms, and murder their children. In commemoration of this oracle, they eſtabliſh'd a form of prayer accompanied with offerings in honour of their demons: but the time fix'd for putting a period to the power of theſe infernal ſpirits was come, and they were oblig'd to ſubmit.

There was no difference between their prieſts and thoſe of other ſavage nations, and their dances were exactly the ſame with thoſe already mention'd. Theſe dances, which were intermingled with ſongs, and which they conſider'd as a religious act, and we a prophane, was call'd Areita in their language. Theſe ſongs, whoſe ſubjects were the exploits of their anceſtors and the great atchievements of their countrymen, might be conſider'd as the annals of their nation; and they danc'd to the ſound of a kind of drum made of a hollow piece of wood. Tobacco was the incenſe with which they perfum'd their idols. The prieſts, whom the fumes of tobacco either ſuddled or ſtupified, were cunning enough to make an advantage of this delirium, by perſuading the people that the incoherent rhapſodies they then utter'd, were ſo many oracles with which the demons inſpir'd 'em.

The religious worſhip they paid theſe demons has ſomething remarkable in it. [a] The Caciques always caus'd the ſolemnity of it to be proclaim'd by heralds, and uſed on the day appointed for the ceremony, to walk in proceſſion by beat of drum at the head of their ſubjects of both ſexes, who were dreſs'd in their beſt geer, but the maidens were naked. The whole company went afterwards to the temple of theſe falſe gods, who were there repreſented in a very groteſque and frightful manner, and as they are drawn by our painters when they repreſent the devil. The prieſts uſed alſo to worſhip theſe idols, and pray to 'em with ſo much zeal, or rather with ſo many cries and howlings, as muſt neceſſarily terrify a company of poor wretches who had not cunning enough to find out the tricks which thoſe inſidious prieſts conceal'd under their pretended devotion. 'Twas then they preſented the oblations of the devotees to their gods, which were partly cakes brought by women in baskets, adorn'd with flowers: after which, as ſoon as the prieſt had given the ſignal, they danc'd and ſang the praiſes of the Zemes, whom we before call'd Chemens, and offer'd their cakes; the whole concluded with the praiſes of their antient kings or caciques, and with prayers for the proſperity of the nation. The prieſts uſed to break theſe cakes into ſeveral pieces, and divide them among the men. They were oblig'd to keep for a twelvemonth in their own houſes thoſe pieces of cake, which were hallow'd by their having been made an oblation to the Zemes. They were conſider'd as ſo many preſervatives againſt ſeveral kinds of accidents. When the proceſſion, which is here repreſented, was got to the door of the temple, the Cacique, who was at the head of it, ſet himſelf down at the entrance, when the proceſſion went in, ſinging all the way, and paſs'd, as it were, in review before him. When they were got to the idol, they thruſt a little ſtick down their throats, in order to make 'em vomit; for they were obliged to preſent themſelves pure and unſullied before their God, and with their hearts, as it were, on their lips.

Their Zemes reveal'd themſelves to the prieſts, and ſometimes to the people; whether this were an artifice of the demon, or a cunning trick of the Boia. They judg'd of the anſwer which the oracle had given by the countenance the prieſt put on. If he danc'd and ſung, it was a good ſign; if he diſcover'd a ſorrowful air, the people were ſad and dejected; gave themſelves up to grief and tears, and faſted till there were ſome hopes of their being reconcil'd to their Gods.

The account they give of the origin of mankind is ſo very odd and whimſical, that we can ſcarce prevail upon ourſelves to give it a place in this work. Men, ſay they, came out of two caverns of a certain mountain. Out of one of 'em came thoſe whom we may may call the good, that is to ſay, the flower and choiceſt part of human-kind; and from the other, the moſt vile and worthleſs part of 'em. The ſun greatly enrag'd at this, turn'd him into a ſtone who keeps the opening of the mountain, (probably to prevent the birth of mankind) and metamorphos'd theſe new-created Beings into trees, frogs, &c. notwithſtanding which, the world grew more and more populous. In ſhort, this is full as ridiculous as thoſe notions of ſome of the antients, who made mankind to ſpring from oaks. The ſun and moon themſelves came out of a grotto in the iſland to enlighten the univerſe: its reputation indeed was ſo great, that the ſavages of Hiſpaniola uſed to go in pilgrimage to it with as great pomp and devotion, as thoſe in any other part of the world. The cave was embelliſh'd with pictures in the Indian taſte; but before they enter'd, they always paid their devotions to two devils who guarded the entrance thereof.

Polygamy was eſtabliſh'd in this iſland, for they were allow'd to take as many wives as they could keep, and their Caciques had thirty at leaſt. Such writers as have writ on America relate, that when they died, they uſed to diſpatch two or three of them to attend upon 'em in the other world. Notwithſtanding this plurality of wives, they yet were addicted to a crime equally whimſical and deteſtable; a ſubject worthy the eulogiums which an [a] archbiſhop and an abbé have preſumed to conſecrate to it. They believed there were ſuch things as ſpirits, and fancied that the dead uſed to run up and down in the night-time; which indeed was a ſubject worthy the exerciſe of their piety, in caſe they had had the wit to do ſo. Theſe ghoſts would nevertheleſs ſometimes play their gambols with women; but whenever they happen'd to meet with any occaſion of putting their activity in practice, they were found much leſs alert than the living. They were not allow'd to put on a human ſhape but with certain [b] reſtrictions, which made them neither agreeable to the women, nor formidable to their husbands.

'TWould be no eaſy matter to reconcile the politeneſs of theſe people with the barbarity of their religion, the greateſt part of the worſhip whereof conſiſted chiefly in ſacrificing men, and ſhedding their blood before idols; but it would be full as difficult, to reconcile the cruelty with which the Spaniards treated the people whom they conquer'd in this powerful empire of America, with the calm, the gentle ſpirit of chriſtianity. The ſame fury inſpir'd the zeal of both. The former, hurried on by a blind ſuperſtition, ſacrificed men to their falſe gods; the latter, prompted by a cruel zeal, heighten'd by the moſt inſatiable avarice, extirpated, to the glory of the true God, a nation who deſtroy'd their fellow-creatures to honour the falſe deities. This pretence was ſpecious enough, and nothing could flatter more agreeably the paſſions of thoſe chriſtians who firſt undertook the conqueſt of America. 'Tis indeed true, that as they had form'd a reſolution of making a more lawful uſe of the wealth of thoſe regions, of conſecrating their conqueſts to God, and to bring over to him many thouſands elect among the Americans by the prevailing force of example, they thought themſelves empower'd to employ the ſecular arm, whenever they ſhould think it requiſite, and to ſeize upon what they had no manner of right to; as they by that means diſarm'd impiety, and depriv'd the devil of his power to hurt. The reader will perhaps ſay, that theſe reaſons reaſons are abſurd; but ſuch an aſſertion would be unjuſt, for practice and experience have ſhewn that they are of excellent uſe, tho' the Americans could not be prevail'd with to give into 'em; and that 'twas nothing but their ignorance made them exclaim againſt the tyranny as well as [a] morals of the Spaniards.

The firſt inhabitants of Mexico were a ſett of Savages, who differ'd but little from thoſe of the moſt northern parts of America[b], whence they are ſuppoſed to come originally. They liv'd by hunting in foreſts and mountains, without any kind of order or government. They worſhipp'd the ſun, and ſacrificed birds to him. Theſe Savages, who were call'd Chicamicas, and ſpent their lives in this manner, leſt the beſt lands deſart and uncultivated; but the Navatelcas, under which name were included ſix or ſeven nations who came out of the north, got poſſeſſion of theſe lands by inſenſible degrees, and afterwards peopled and cultivated them. Theſe colonies were form'd in the ninth century, if we may believe the hieroglyphics of the Mexicans. Three hundred and two years after this firſt expedition, they undertook a ſecond, which was that of the preſent Mexicans; an expedition vaſtly more remarkable than the former. The latter ſubdued the Navatelcas under the conduct of Mexi, their captain and law-giver. They were ſure of meeting with ſucceſs in this expedition, becauſe Vitzliputzli, the god of the nation, had aſſur'd him that he would conquer the territories he was going in queſt of. Mexi march'd at the head of theſe adventurers; and four prieſts, to whom his oracles were pronounc'd, carried him in a little trunk made of reeds. Vitzliputzli declar'd to 'em the manner how he would be worſhipp'd, and himſelf inſtituted the ceremonies, and gave 'em laws. Whenever they encamp'd, they erected a tabernacle in the midſt of the camp, and placed the little trunk or ark upon the altar. They never march'd or encamp'd till after having firſt conſulted the idol, and receiv'd his orders. Their march was very long and ſlow. 'Twas their cuſtom to leave their old men and the infirm in all thoſe places where they uſed to pitch their camps, in order for their forming colonies. One day, as ſeveral of the latter were waſhing themſelves, Vitzliputzli commanded the Mexicans to ſteal their clothes, and to go off immediately. The forſaken Savages, offended at this inſult, chang'd their manners, cuſtoms, and language, preſerving at the ſame time an implacable hatred againſt their antient country-men. Vitzliputzli manifeſted his power by miracles, which it were needleſs to trouble the reader with.

Being at laſt arriv'd at the promiſed land, the god appear'd to a prieſt in a dream, and commanded him to ſettle himſelf in that part of the lake, where an eagle ſhould be found ſitting on a fig-tree which was planted in a rock. The prieſt related his viſion, upon which they ſought for the place by the above-mention'd tokens. Some time after they found the fig-tree, growing out of the rock, and the eagle ſitting upon it, holding a ſmall bird in his talons; and 'twas on this ſpot that the famous city of Mexico was built. The next day the Mexicans made a tabernacle for the idol, till ſuch time as they might build a temple. The city was by his command divided into four quarters or diſtricts, and Vitzliputzli's tabernacle remain'd in the middle, who enjoin'd 'em to eſtabliſh a tutelary god over each diſtrict.

The reader may obſerve, that this ſtory of the firſt coming of the Mexicans to Mexico, agrees in a great many circumſtances with that of the entrance of the Iſraelites into the land of Canaan. Might it not poſſibly have happen'd, that the Mexicans may have preſerv'd, in the hiſtory of the foundation of their ſtate, (allowing for the errors they may have made in chronology) ſome of thoſe incidents which we meet with in the hiſtory of of the Jews? For as they came originally from the north of America, or rather from the north of Aſia, they might probably have had among 'em ſome of the poſterity of the antient Jews, who were diſpers'd up and down after the Aſſyrians had ruin'd their ſtate.

'Tis plain from what has been juſt now related of Vitzliputzli's power, that the Mexicans acknowledge a ſupreme Being under that name; notwithſtanding what the Spaniards affirm'd of their having no word to expreſs the deity; ſo that they were obliged to make uſe of the word Dios, to denote that Being whom we call God. Be that as it will, the Mexicans worſhip'd Vitzliputzli as the ſovereign lord of all things, and creator of heaven and earth, and added the epithet ineffable to that ſupreme deity: but notwithſtanding the great idea they had form'd to themſelves of this Firſt Cauſe, they yet could not perſuade themſelves that 'twas poſſible for it to govern the world without the immediate aſſiſtance of a numberleſs multitude of genii. The author of the conqueſt of Mexico tells us, they were ſo ſilly as to believe, "that there were not any gods at "that time in the other parts of heaven, till ſuch time as mankind grew more and more "miſerable, in proportion as they grew more numerous. They look'd upon their gods "as ſo many propitious genii, who were ever multiplying as mortals ſtood in need of "their aſſiſtance."

The greateſt god after Vitzliputzli, was the ſun. Vitzliputzli was an idol made of a very precious wood, repreſented under an human ſhape, ſeated in a chair of ſky-colour'd blue, ſupported by a litter, having four ſerpent's heads at the four corners: the forehead of the idol was of a blue colour, and had a blue ſtreak croſs the noſe, which went from ear to ear. [a] A Dutch author relates, that this idol had wings like thoſe of a bat, large round eyes, a mouth that reach'd from ear to ear; but he does not ſay whence he borrow'd theſe particulars. We had better ſtick to the deſcription which the author of the conqueſt of Mexico, and his tranſlator have given us of that idol, which they tell us was placed on a very high altar, and ſurrounded with curtains. "He was repreſented under a human ſhape, ſitting on a throne ſupported "by an azure globe, which they call'd heaven: four poles or ſticks came out from two "ſides of this globe, at the ends of which ſerpent's heads were carv'd; the whole "making a litter, which the prieſts carried on their ſhoulders, whenever the idol was "ſhewn in public. It had on its head a helmet of feathers of different colours made in "the ſhape of a bird, the bill and tuft whereof were of burniſh'd gold. Its counte-"nance was hideous and ſevere, and was made ſtill uglier by two blue ſtreaks which "went the one croſs its forehead, and the other croſs its noſe. He held in his right "hand a waving ſnake, which ſerv'd him as a cane; he held four arrows in his left hand, "which he look'd upon with veneration, as being a preſent from heaven, and a buckler "cover'd with five white feathers ſet croſs-wiſe. Theſe ſeveral ornaments, marks, "and adders, had a myſterious ſignification couch'd under 'em." The globe denoted the extenſive power of Vitzliputzli, who was cover'd over with pearls and jewels.

Tlaloch, whom ſome writers confound with Teſcalipuca, of whom we ſhall ſhortly ſpeak, was an idol pretty much reſembling that before deſcrib'd; the Mexicans [b] look'd upon thoſe gods as brothers, and ſuch great friends, as to divide between themſelves the ſovereign power in war; that their ſtrength was equal, and their wills the ſame: for which reaſon they offer'd the ſame victim and the ſame prayers to both. They had equal thanks paid for any good ſucceſs; and, to uſe the words of the tranſlator of the conqueſt of Mexico, they held the ſcales of devotion they paid 'em in æquilibrio, as it were.

[b] Hiſtory of the conqueſt of Mexico.

Teſcalipuca was the god of penance: the Mexicans uſed to call upon him in adverſity, becauſe they imagin'd he puniſh'd the ſins of mankind with plagues, famine, &c. We ſee him here repreſented in two different manners: in the firſt he is ſeated in a chair placed in the midſt of the altar, being an image made of ſtone as black and ſhining as jet, and cover'd with jewels, repreſented under an human ſhape like that of Tlaloch and Vitzliputzli; having golden ear-rings; a jewel or trinket fix'd to a chain of the ſame metal which went round its neck, cover'd its breaſt all over; and a little tube of cryſtal about ſix inches in length, was ſtuck thro' its lower lip. They ſometimes fix'd a green or blue feather at the end of the tube, which was done out of judgment, not caprice, it being one of the ſymbols of that falſe deity. From its hair, tied up with a golden fillet, there hung an ear, which was another ſymbol, by which the afflicted ſoul and repenting ſinner was taught, that he might confide in the divine mercy, who would liſten to his prayers. He held four darts in his right hand, ſignifying the puniſhment for ſin and the vengeance of heaven, which manifeſts itſelf to man by plagues, war, poverty, and famine. His left hand held a golden mirror extremely ſmooth, and ſo bright as to receive the objects very clearly and diſtinctly. With the ſame hand he held behind this mirror a fan made of feathers of all kinds of colours, ſignifying that nothing was hid from that vindictive god. Round the idol were a great number of emblematical figures, whoſe ſignification we did not learn. The other form, under which they repreſented this idol, was the ſame as the foregoing, viz. that of a man ſeated in a majeſtic manner on a throne ſupported by a kind of altar, and hid behind a red curtain, on which ſkulls and men's bones were either embroider'd or painted. This idol had as hideous a look, and its poſture was as dreadful and terrible as the other. Its right arm was up-liſted, as ready to hurl a javelin it held in its hand; its left ſupporting a ſhield, whence iſſued out four arrows round five pine-apples ſet croſs-wiſe. The body of the idol was black, and its head was cover'd with quail feathers; the whole ſurrounded with a great number of ſymbolical figures, and things of ineſtimable value.

The [a] Mercury and Plutus of the Mexicans was alſo repreſented under an human ſhape, except that it had the head of a bird, with a painted paper-mitre upon its head, and a ſcythe in its hand. The body of it was cover'd with jewels of an invaluable value; a habit very well adapted to him whom they worſhipp'd as the beſtower of treaſures.

Tozi, that is to ſay our grand mother, was of mortal extraction. Vitzliputzli procur'd her divine honours, by enjoining the Mexicans to demand her of her father, who was king of Culhucacan, for queen; this being done, they alſo commanded him to put her to death, afterwards to flay her, and to cover a young man with her skin. 'Twas in this manner ſhe was ſtript of her humanity to be tranſlated among the gods: and 'tis from this apotheoſis, that theſe ſavages, whoſe ſuperſtition was vaſtly barbarous and cruel, dated the cuſtom of ſacrificing men to idols.

The Mexicans ador'd another idol, made of all the ſeeds of the earth kneeded together with the blood of certain young children who were mark'd out for the ſacrifice; the hearts of theſe innocent victims being firſt tore out of their bodies. The heart was offer'd to this idol, which the prieſts conſecrated with the utmoſt ſolemnity in preſence of all the people. It was uſual for their devotees to adorn with jewels the god whom the prieſts had created; but no layman was ſuffer'd to touch it after its conſecration. They renew'd the idol from time to time, when 'twas their cuſtom to pull the old one into ſeveral pieces, and afterwards to diſtribute them among the devotees as ſo many relicks, when happy was he who could get a piece of 'em; for they pretended that theſe relicks were of excel-excellent uſe in preſerving from dangers. The ſoldiers always carried 'em with 'em to war. The prieſts at the ſame time that they perform'd this ſolemnity of conſecration, made alſo a holy water, which was uſed at the coronation of their monarchs, and when the bleſſing was given to ſuch generals as were ſent into the field.

We ſhall mention the god of hunting, and the ceremonies of penance and mortification, when we come to give the deſcription of the Mexican feſtivals. Suffice it that we have given an account of their principal Deities in this place; not but they had others whoſe worſhip was as ſolemn as thoſe above-mention'd; but their number was exceeding great, being upwards of two thouſand, who had all their reſpective temples, ceremonies, and ſacrifices. " [a] There was hardly a ſtreet without its tutelary divinity, nor was there " ſcarce a diſeaſe but had its peculiar altar, and to theſe the Mexicans uſed to flock in " order to be cur'd. Their crazy imaginations uſed to form to themſelves Gods from " their fears, not conſidering at the ſame time, that the power they aſcribed to one, " leſſen'd the power of the other." And not ſatisfy'd with having peopled heaven with gods of all ranks and kinds, they treated one of their priſoners as tho' he had been a god, for a whole year together, and ſometimes for ſix months only, according to the deity for whom they deſign'd him, and whoſe name they gave him; after which they ſacrificed him to the idol. The inhabitants of Marſeilles had formerly this cruel cuſtom; theſe uſed to pamper a man with the greateſt dainties for a whole year together, then led him with great ſolemnity all about the city, after which they ſacrificed him.

Their Temples.

THERE were eight [a] temples in the city of Mexico, equally magnificent, and built pretty near alike; but that of Vitzliputzli excell'd the reſt in bigneſs, which was of ſuch prodigious extent, that a city of five hundred houſes might have been built in the court of it. We ſhall give the deſcription of this great edifice, as we find it in the author of the Hiſtory of Mexico: this edifice was once the center of the Mexican idolatry.

" They firſt enter'd into a large quadrangle, ſurrounded with a great ſtone wall, " where ſeveral ſerpents in relievo, twin'd one in another on the outſide of the wall, " ſtruck terror into the beholder; particularly at the ſight of the front of the firſt " door, which was fill'd with them, under which ſome myſterious ſignification was " couch'd. Before arriving at this gate, there ſtood a kind of chapel, which was full " as terrible; 'twas built of ſtone, raiſed thirty ſteps, having a terraſs at top, on which " ſeveral trunks of great trees, all lopp'd of an equal height, were planted on a level " at equal diſtances, on which poles were laid from tree to tree. On each of theſe " poles hung the skulls of ſeveral unhappy wretches who had been ſacrificed, whoſe " number, which it would be impoſſible to relate without horror, was always equal; " for the miniſters of the temple took care to ſupply thoſe which through time dropt off, " with others.

" The four ſides of the quadrangle had each a gate, exactly facing one another, and " look'd to the four cardinal winds. Four ſtone ſtatues were placed over each gate, " which ſeem'd to point out the way, and to command thoſe to return back, who were for " going thither with an irreligious heart; theſe were conſider'd as porter-gods, upon which " account they were ſaluted at going in. The apartments of the ſacrificing-prieſts and " miniſters were built in the inſide of the wall of the quadrangle, together with ſome " ſhops

" ſhops that went round the whole, which however took up but little room, its extent " being ſo vaſt, that eight or ten thouſand perſons uſed to dance therein at eaſe, on their " moſt ſolemn days.

" In the center of this quadrangle, a great ſtone edifice was erected, which in fair " weather was ſeen to top the higheſt towers in the city. It always leſſen'd in bigneſs " upwards, till it form'd a half pyramid, three ſides of which were ſhelving, and the " fourth ſupported a ſtair-caſe; it was a ſumptuous pile of building, and built according " to the beſt rules of architecture. It was an hundred and twenty degrees high, and " built ſo ſtrong, that its top, which was flat, was a ſquare forty foot on each ſide, and " was finely paved with ſquares of jaſper-ſtones of all kinds of colours: the pillars or " props, which like balliſters or rails went round this place, were winding like a ſnail- " ſhell, and both ſides of it faced with a black ſtone which look'd like jet, carefully " and dextrouſly ſet together, and faſten'd with a bitumen of a red and black colour, " which was a great ornament to the whole building.

" On the two ſides of the rail or balliſter, at that part where the ſtair-caſe ended, " two marble ſtatues ſupported, in an attitude that very well expreſs'd their labour, " two very odd-faſhion'd candleſticks. At ſome diſtance from hence, was a ſtone of a " green colour five foot in height, ſharp-bottom'd: here the unhappy wretch, who " was to be ſacrificed, was laid on his back, when they ripp'd up his ſtomach and tore " out his heart. Above this ſtone, and oppoſite to the ſtair-caſe, was a large, ſtrong " chapel, the roof of which was of a rare and precious wood, under which their idol " Vitzliputzli was ſeated, on a very high altar, with curtains round it.

" In another chapel, to the left of the firſt, and built in the ſame taſte, and of " equal bulk, was placed the idol Tlaloch. The treaſure of theſe two chapels was " of an immenſe value, the walls and altars were cover'd with jewels and precious " ſtones upon feathers of various colours.

" The temple of the god of the air was round, ſignifying the circular motion of the " air round the earth. The entrance of this edifice reſembled the mouth of a ſerpent " when wide open; and to make it ſtill more terrible, they had fill'd it with the figures " of all kind of monſters."

The temple of Teſcaliputca was a loſty pile of building, and built with as much regularity as that of Vitzliputzli; no layman was allow'd to enter into this holy place. Theſe temples were look'd upon as cathedrals. We ſhall not mention the numberleſs multitude of temples which were met with in the different parts of the city, and which poſſibly might have nothing either great or remarkable in 'em ſave the name only; but there is one circumſtance which is not to be parallel'd among the pagans of antiquity, viz. that this unaccountably ſuperſtitious people had erected certain dark houſes purpoſely to lodge an infinite number of idols of gold, ſilver, &c. cover'd, or rather cruſted over with blood, with which they were every day ſmear'd. Nor did the ſtink of theſe charnel-houſes, whoſe floor was cover'd over with blood, any way leſſen their devotion: but none but the nobility were allow'd to enter into it; and to heighten the dignity of this privilege, the prieſts would not even admit any of theſe to enter in, till they had firſt ſacrificed a man.

Their Sacrifices and Penance.

AS it would be no eaſy matter to find any ſpecies of idolatry among the antients, as extenſive as that of the Mexicans, it would be full as difficult to meet with any ſacrifices ſo barbarous and inhuman as theirs; not that we are ignorant they were practiſed by the antients, ſince we have given inſtances of it: but 'tis certain that nothing can be compar'd par'd to this execrable worſhip, unleſs it be that of the Carthaginians and Canaanites from whom they are deſcended. The bloody ſacrifices of the Mexicans were perform'd in this manner: The victims deſign'd for ſacrifice were led to the charnel-houſe, which, as we ſee in the figure, riſes like a kind of plat-form or terraſs, ſupported by ſeveral trunks of trees. The victims, who were cloſely guarded by ſome Mexican ſoldiers, waited at the foot of the terraſs till ſuch time as they ſhould be put to death; and to heighten their diſtreſs, a great number of skulls hanging on the poles which went from tree to tree, were continually preſenting themſelves to their ſight; theſe were the skulls of ſuch as had been ſacrificed before 'em. A prieſt holding in his hand an idol made of wheat, maiz, and honey, drew near to theſe unhappy wretches, and preſenting it to each of 'em, cry'd out at the ſame time, there is your god. This done, they withdrew, going off on the other ſide of the terraſs, when the victims were immediately brought upon it; this being, as we have already obſerv'd, the place appointed for the ſacrifice. Here it was that ſix miniſters of the idols ſlaughter'd theſe [a] victims. After having tore out their hearts, they threw the bodies down the ſtair-caſe from the top of the terraſs to the bottom. We are aſſured that all thoſe who had taken any of theſe unhappy wretches in war, uſed to divide 'em among themſelves, and eat 'em. They never ſacrificed leſs than forty or fifty of theſe victims at a time; and thoſe nations who either border'd, or were tributary to the Mexicans, imitated them in this bloody worſhip. The famous [b] Ferdinand Cortez relates, that the inhabitants of Mechoacan firſt proteſted they would abandon a worſhip which was as injurious to the deity, as unworthy of humanity. We muſt not omit that thoſe prieſts who ſacrificed men, were diſtinguiſh'd by the title of miniſters of ſacred things; and that this employment was the higheſt dignity of the prieſthood. To the high-prieſt alone belong'd the privilege and honour of ripping up the victim's ſtomach; and this he perform'd ſo very dexterouſly, as, upon any other occaſion, would have raiſed the wonder and admiration of the ſpectators. 'Tis true indeed, that as the ſtone on which the victim was laid, was very ſharp and pointed, his body, which reſted altogether upon the loins, made the dexterity of the prieſt leſs ſurprizing.

'Twas a cuſtom among 'em on certain feſtivals, to dreſs a man in the bloody skin, juſt reeking from the body of one of the victims. [c] A Spaniſh author aſſures us, that even their kings and grandees did not think it derogatory to their honour to diſguiſe themſelves in this manner, when the captive ſacrificed was a perſon of diſtinction. Be that as it will, the diſguiſed perſon uſed to run up and down the ſtreets and places of public reſort of the city, and to beg the charity of all thoſe he met with, and beat ſuch as refuſed. This bloody kind of maſquerade continued till ſuch time as the skin-coat began to ſtink. The money that was collected in this devout ramble, was employ'd in pious uſes.

Another religious ceremony, which indeed does not ſeem altogether ſo barbarous as the former, was the duel of the victim; if we may give this name to the liberty he was allow'd of defending himſelf againſt the prieſt who was to ſacrifice him. The captive, whoſe feet were tied to a ſtone, parried the inſtrument with which the prieſt ſtruck at him, and even attack'd him, as we ſee in the figure. If he had the good fortune to gain the better of the prieſt, he was releaſed, and look'd upon as a brave man; but if the prieſt came off conqueror, he firſt kill'd him, than flay'd off his skin, and, as we are told, had his limbs dreſs'd and ſerv'd up in one of thoſe they call'd their religious meals.

It was always their cuſtom, before they ſet down to eat, to offer to the ſun and to the earth, the firſt-fruits of their meats and drink, as alſo of their corn, fruits, and flowers.

[a] Two of theſe prieſts took the victim by the feet, two others held his arms, a fifth held his head, and the ſixth ripp'd open his ſtomach, whence they tore out the heart, and held it up, ſtill ſmoaking, to the ſun; after which, turning himſelf towards the idol, he threw the heart in his face.

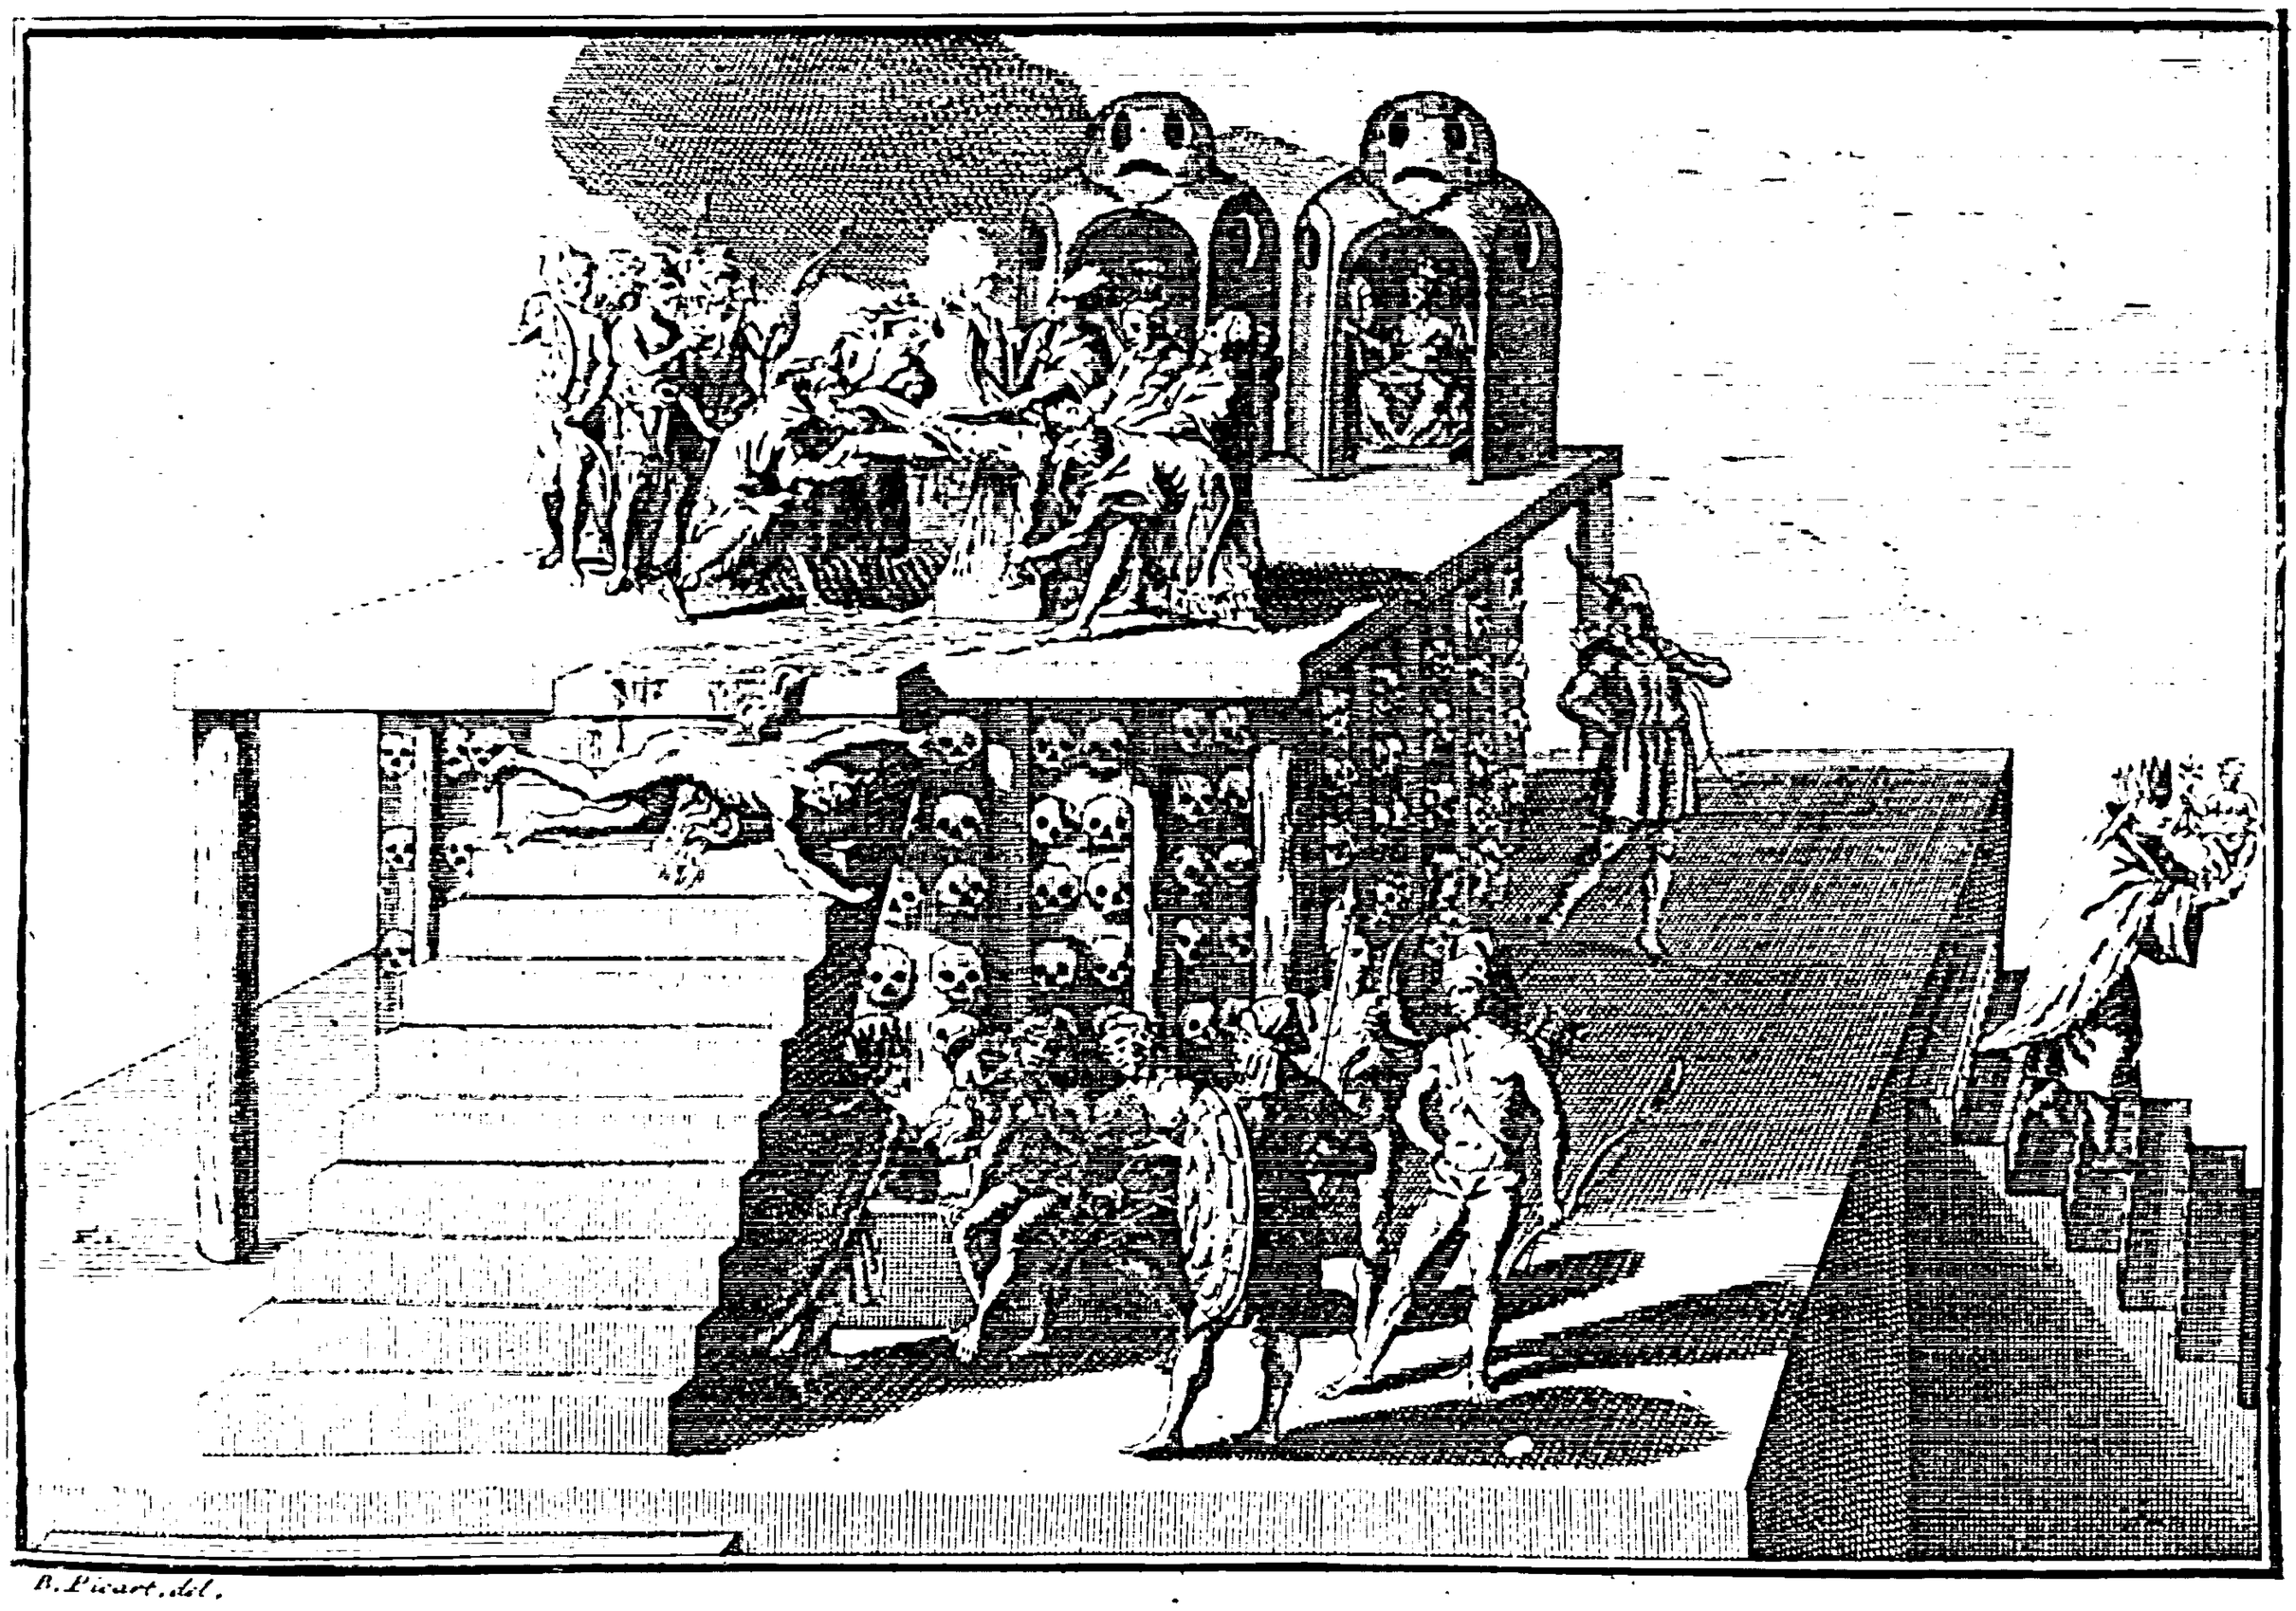
flowers. They had other religious cuſtoms, infinitely more abſurd than the foregoing, tho' the principle from which they flow'd, was not altogether to be condemn'd; which was the laying themſelves under a neceſſity of doing certain things, not excepting the moſt unſeemly, for the love of their gods: for they not only eat, drank, carried weighty burdens, anointed and ſmear'd themſelves out of love to 'em, but even ſtoop'd to the vileſt offices, purely to do them honour.

Their penance was at leaſt as ſevere as that of other religions. The prieſts, as mediators between the gods and men, offer'd up victims for ſinners, and alſo took upon themſelves the iniquities of the people. When this ſolemn penance, as repreſented here, was to be undertaken, it was their cuſtom to meet together at mid-night in the temple of the idol, when one of them uſed to call the people together to their devotions with a kind of horn, while another was incenſing the idol. Then one of the miniſters of the falſe gods began the penance, conſiſting in a ſmall effuſion of blood which he drew from the ancle, by pricking it with a Manghey-thorn or a ſtone-lancet. After this he rubb'd his temples and ears with this blood, then went and waſh'd himſelf in a certain water, which from that circumſtance was call'd the water of blood. 'Twas their cuſtom, the better to teſtify the merit and truth of this wonderful penance, to ſhew to the people the inſtrument which had been made uſe of on that occaſion. The other puniſhments which the prieſts inflicted on themſelves before Teſcalipuca, or the god who preſided over penance and afflictions, were to whip one another with thongs of Manghey made up in great knots, and to ſtrike one another with great ſtones, &c. In the next article we ſhall take notice of the diſcipline and auſterity of theſe miniſters of the Mexican idols; and ſhall, before we conclude this head, obſerve, that they uſed to incenſe theſe falſe gods three times a-day, viz. in the morning, at noon, and at mid-night; and that they were oblig'd to officiate by turns in the temple, in order to keep in the ſacred fire, which was to burn perpetually in honour of the gods.



Their Prieſts, Diſcipline, &c.

IN the fourth compartment of one of the foregoing plates, two Mexican prieſts are repreſented; one of which holds the ſacred knife in his hand. The firſt of theſe prieſts, or rather the high-prieſt, was call'd Topilzin in the Mexican language. 'Tis pretended, that his dignity was equal to that of the pope. He wore on his head a crown of beautiful feathers of various colours, with golden pendants, enrich'd with emeralds, at his ears; and a ſmall blue tube, like to that of the god of penance, ran thro' his lip. He was clothed with a ſcarlet robe, or rather mantle. The veſtments of their prieſts were frequently chang'd according to the different ſeaſons or feſtivals.

The prieſthood of Vitzliputzli was hereditary, and that of the other gods elective. Children were often, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel, deſtin'd from their moſt tender years to the ſervice of the idols; and officiated as clerks and ſinging boys, when but mere ſtriplings. The prieſts uſed to incenſe four times a-day, the god whoſe miniſters they were: but at midnight the principal miniſters of the temple roſe to perform the nocturnal office, viz. to ſound a trumpet and horn for a long time together, and to play on certain inſtruments accompanied with voices, which together celebrated the praiſes of the idol. After this, the prieſt, whoſe turn it was, took the thurible, ſaluted the idol and incens'd it, himſelf being clothed in a black mantle. In fine, after the incenſing was over, they all went together into a chapel, where they practiſed all thoſe rigorous penances, whereof an idea has been given in the preceding article.

Theſe prieſts uſed to obſerve a very rigorous faſt; they faſted for five, ſix, and even ten days together, which they commonly did when the time of their ſolemn feſti-vals drew nigh. During theſe faſts, ſuch of them as were married, uſed to abſtain from all commerce with women. Their chaſtity would undoubtedly have been glorious; had it been built on a reaſonable foundation; but that confidence, as well as principle of preſumption which prevails ſo much over thoſe who are deſirous of being applauded for things which they cannot merit by a ſolid virtue, ſullied all the glory of this forced continency. Theſe, in order to pleaſe their gods, uſed to practice all thoſe things which deſtroy procreation, not even ſparing thoſe parts which nature had appointed for that uſe. They would not allow themſelves to drink ſtrong liquors, and devoted part of that time which men give to ſleep, to the ſeverity of their diſcipline.

All theſe prieſts were poſſeſs'd of great revenues, and received the oblations which the people made to the idols, which brought 'em in immenſe ſums, particularly at the time of their grand feſtivals. 'Twas at theſe ſolemn ſeaſons they uſed to inſtruct 'em in their duty, by certain exhortations which they pronounced before 'em.

Nor was the conſecration of theſe prieſts leſs remarkable than their function. They uſed to anoint 'em from head to foot: their hair, which they always wore very long, and which they did not preſume to cut during their prieſthood, was continually moiſtned with a kind of black perfume that was partly made of roſin; this would undoubtedly have been very loathſome, had not the reſpect which immediately ariſes at the ſight of ſuch things as are look'd upon as ſacred, metamorphos'd it into an agreeable and even divine object.

The knotted treſſes of the ſacrificing prieſts of Mexico, reſembles a roll of Braſil tobacco, ſix inches in breadth, and of a length proportionable to it. Whenever theſe prieſts uſed to ſacrifice upon the mountains, and in thoſe almoſt ſubterraneous places in which part of their idols were lodged, they then employ'd an ointment, with certain myſterious ceremonies, much more ſolemn than the above-mention'd. It was of uſe, ſaid they, to [a] diſpel fear, and invigorate courage; and was made of the juice of the moſt venomous reptiles. Such youths as were under the diſcipline of theſe prieſts, uſed to hunt theſe animals, in order to ſtock themſelves with them againſt they wanted 'em. The prieſts burnt theſe venomous creatures at the altar of the idol, the aſhes of which were pounded in a mortar mix'd with tobacco, to which they added live ſcorpions and ſome other venomous inſects: they heighten'd this compoſition with an herb which has the property of diſturbing the brain, as alſo the black of ſmoak and roſin: this is what they call the repaſt or ſuſtenance of the gods. To theſe, the ſorcery of thoſe magical ſacrificers ow'd its ſucceſs; 'twas theſe gave 'em an opportunity of holding a correſpondence with devils; ſhielded 'em from the fury of tygers and ſerpents; and laſtly, inſpir'd 'em with that ſpirit of cruelty, which excited 'em to ſacrifice their fellow-creatures to idols, without the leaſt pity or compaſſion. They alſo pretended that this compound had the virtue of healing diſeaſes: but this was not the only ſuperſtition that reign'd among 'em, ſince they had ſeveral other kinds of enchantment, as well as methods of divining, which it were needleſs to mention in this place.

They had an order of veſtals, who were clothed in white, and call'd by the name of daughters of penance. Theſe were admitted into the order at twelve or thirteen years of age, and were oblig'd to have their heads ſhav'd, at a certain ſeaſon excepted, during which they were ſuffer'd to let their hair grow. Theſe nuns were under the direction of an abbeſs, whoſe office was to keep the temples clean, and they alſo [b] dreſs'd the ſacred meats which were preſented to the idols, and which afterwards ſerv'd as food to their miniſters. They were employ'd alſo in making carpets and ſuch like ornaments for the temples and the idols. They roſe at midnight to adminiſter to the gods, [b] Or rather the loaves, which they preſented to the idols. Theſe loaves were generally made in the ſhape of feet and hands.

[a] gods, and to exerciſe certain auſterities which the rules of their order obliged them to obſerve. Above all, they were bound to preſerve their chaſtity unſullied, the violation of which was puniſh'd with death. This continence was not indeed to be perpetual, ſince as they were ſent to the convent, only to fulfil ſome vow which their parents had made to the gods, they were allow'd to marry after a certain term of years. 'Tis even probable that this abbeſs or matron might, properly ſpeaking, ſuperintend a kind of nurſery in which the young ladies of quality were [b] educated, ſince they were never taken from under their care, but only when their parents intended to ſettle them in the world.

They had alſo a ſeminary or convent for their youth, like to that of the nuns. They were often admitted into it at ſeven or eight years of age. As they were obliged during the time they liv'd in theſe houſes, to lead a life very like that of our monaſticks, we may not improperly conſider 'em as a body of Religious. Theſe youths uſed to have the tops of their heads ſhaved, the reſt of their hair ſcarce covering their ears; but it fell as low as their ſhoulders behind, except when they uſed to tie it up in a kind of tuft. They wore a linnen veſtment. Theſe young Religious look'd after the temple, and led a moſt exemplary life of poverty and chaſtity till the age of twenty, or till ſuch time as they met with an opportunity of ſettling themſelves by marriage, or ſome other honourable means. Moreover, the prieſts had alſo in their ſervice a ſett of youths who were employ'd in matters of leſs importance. Theſe latter uſed, on certain ſolemn occaſions, to adorn the temples of the gods with feſtoons. 'Twas their office to preſent the prieſts with the 'water with which they waſh'd themſelves both before and after the religious ſervice; 'twas they gave 'em the lancets and the knife uſed in the ſacrifice, and alſo follow'd thoſe mendicant friars who uſed to beg from door to door. In caſe they at any time did not get alms ſufficient for their purpoſe, they were allow'd the liberty of going into a field, and of taking as much corn as they thought neceſſary, no one daring to hinder them. They had alſo, [c] beſides thoſe youths who were educated under the Religious above-mention'd, ſeveral devotees who uſed to retire into theſe convents to fulfil ſome vow they had made. Some pray'd to the gods for children, others for riches, and others again for long life. All theſe devotees ſet apart ſome hours to this retirement, and in all probability enjoin'd themſelves ſome of the auſterities above cited, in order to make themſelves more worthy of the bleſſings of heaven. They were permitted to walk in the proceſſions, but were not allow'd to ſing in them, nor to go up the ſteps which led to the temple.

Their Feſtivals.

[d] THE Mexicans, at the end of every month, which among them conſiſted of twenty days, as we ſhall ſee in the ſequel, uſed to obſerve a ſolemn day of devotion intermix'd with rejoicings. They then ſacrificed ſome captives, and ran up and down the ſtreets clothed in the skins of ſuch miſerable victims as had juſt been flay'd: they danc'd, they ſang, they collected alms for the prieſts; which among them, as in other places, was look'd upon as the effect of a real piety. When corn of all ſorts began to ſprout up, they uſed to go to a certain hill to ſacrifice a boy and a girl about three years old, to Tlaloch, the god of the waters; and becauſe thoſe children were born free, they did not tear out their hearts, but contented themſelves with cutting their throats, after after which they laid their bodies in a new mantle, and buried them in a ſtone ſepulchre. Theſe bloody ſacrifices were renew'd when the corn was grown up about two foot high, at which time they ſacrificed four children of ſix or ſeven years of age, to the ſame god. Theſe latter were born ſlaves. They then carried their bodies into a cave appointed for that purpoſe. The Mexicans tell us, that the origin of this cruel ceremony was owing to a great drought, which afterwards occaſioning a famine, forced them to abandon the country. In fine, when the corn was fit for reaping, each owner took a handful of maiz out of his field, and offer'd it to the god Tlaloch with Atolle, which was a liquor made of corn and copal, a precious gum uſed in incenſing the idols. In the beginning of ſummer, they uſed to crown the gods with flowers, and ſpend a whole day in mirth and rejoicing. The great men of the empire were obliged to go to the capital on another holiday, on the evening of which, they dreſs'd up a woman who was to repreſent the god of ſalt, and partake in the publick rejoicing; but they ſacrificed her on the morrow, and that day was wholly employ'd in devotion and the worſhip of the idols. The trades-people uſed alſo to celebrate certain bloody feſtivals, in honour of their Mercury, in the temple which was conſecrated to him. Not to mention another feſtival, when they uſed to flay a woman, and clothe an Indian with her skin, who, thus equipp'd, danc'd for two days together with the reſt of his fellow-citizens; nor that which was ſolemniz'd at their entring into the lake with a great number of canoos, when they uſed to drown in a ceremonious manner a boy and girl, whom, as they ſaid, they ſent to keep company with the gods of the lake; they nevertheleſs uſed to ſpend the day in faſting and devotion.

The great feſtival of Vitzliputzli was celebrated in the month of May. Two days before which, the nuns uſed to make a figure of maiz and honey, repreſenting that god. Then after having dreſs'd it in as magnificent a manner as poſſible, they ſeated it on an azure throne, which was ſupported by a kind of ſhaft. The nuns, who on that feſtival, uſed to call themſelves the ſiſters of Vitzliputzli, carried it in poſſeſſion on their ſhoulders to the area before the temple, where the young monks, before cited, received the idol, and after having paid homage to it, carried it alſo on their ſhoulders to the ſteps of the ſanctuary. 'Twas here the people came and worſhip'd this image of Vitzliputzli, and humbled themſelves before it by putting duſt on their heads; which cuſtom was alſo obſerv'd in the worſhip that was paid to the other idols. The nuns were dreſs'd in white and crown'd with parch'd maiz. They wore chains about their necks made of maiz, which they uſed to twiſt about their left arms. Their cheeks were painted with a pretty thick vermillion, and their arms cover'd over from the elbow to the wriſt with the feathers of a red parrot. Their young men were dreſs'd in red, and wore maiz crowns, in the ſame manner as the young veſtals.

After this humiliation, theſe devotees uſed to go in proceſſion, and make ſtations in three different villages; whether it were from cuſtom, or poſſibly the holineſs of thoſe places where the ſtations were kept. They then firſt ſacrificed upon a mountain at a league diſtance from Mexico. The proceſſion made a tour of about four leagues, and uſed on their return to conduct the idol into its ſanctuary with the ſound of drums, trumpets, and horns. They then cover'd it over with roſes, and uſed to ſtrew all ſorts of flowers on the pavement and about the temple. Laſtly, the veſtals came out of the convent, carrying pieces of the dough with which the idol was made, made in the ſhape of bones: theſe they gave to the monks, who laid them at the foot of the idol. Theſe pieces of dough, which were commonly call'd Vitzliputzli's fleſh and bones, were ſolemnly conſecrated by the prieſts with certain particular ceremonies, accompanied with dances and ſpiritual ſongs in honour of the idol. They paid the ſame worſhip to this conſecrated dough as to the gods, of which it was at firſt no more than a type and figure. After the conſecration was ended, the men were ſacrificed, the whole ceremony concluding with dances and ſongs. Then follow'd a religious piece of worſhip, which has [a] has ſome conformity with the chriſtian communion. The prieſts ſtript the dough-idol of all its ornaments; broke them into ſeveral pieces, and likewiſe the little conſecrated loaves: theſe they diſtributed to the people in the form of a ſacrament, and the aſſembly communicated in a manner which reſembles ſo much the practice of the chriſtians in that particular, that we can ſcarce forbear conſidering this idolatry any other than an uſurpation of the devil over the myſteries of the chriſtian religion. This communion was accompanied with an exhortation, by which the people were inform'd that they eat the fleſh of their god; and they even adminiſtred this kind of ſacrament to the ſick. We ſhall conclude the deſcription of this religious act with two remarks; firſt, that the communicants gave a tithe of maiz by way of oblation; and, ſecondly, that the feſtival concluded with a ſermon, which one of the moſt antient of the prieſts pronounced to the people.

The feſtival of Teſcalipuca was celebrated the nineteenth of the ſame month, when the prieſts granted the people a remiſſion of their ſins. At the ſame time they ſacrificed a captive, which we may almoſt conſider as an imperfect image of the death which our bleſſed ſaviour ſuffer'd for the redemption of mankind. The Mexicans might perhaps have preſerv'd ſome footſteps of that memorable incident. On the eve of the feſtival, the prieſt of Teſcalipuca ſtript himſelf of his veſtments, when others were given him by the Mexican nobility, who came together with the reſt of the people, in order to reconcile themſelves to this idol of penance. They open'd the temple-gates to all repenting ſinners; when one of the chief miniſters of the god diſcover'd himſelf to the ſpectators, and blew his [b] horn; turning himſelf to the four winds, as if he were calling all the earth to repentance: after which he took up duſt, and carried it to his mouth, pointing at the ſame time to the heavens. Every one imitated the prieſt; after which, nothing was heard but voices, intermix'd with ſighs, tears, and groans. They roll'd themſelves in the duſt, calling at the ſame time upon the divine mercy, when the terrors which trouble the conſciences of the blindeſt ſinners, actuated in ſuch a manner on the minds of the Mexicans, that they uſed to call to their aſſiſtance the ſhades of night, the winds and ſtorms, the better to eſcape the fury of that god, whoſe vengeance, they ſaid, was ever impending in order to chaſtiſe the wicked. And as the notions which even falſe religions exhibit to thoſe whom they are deſirous of leading into the paths of virtue, are ſtrong enough to ſtrike the hearts of the vicious with remorſe, and even to make 'em ſenſible that vice is contrary to humanity; it ſo happen'd that all ſuch as were conſcious of guilt, made a publick confeſſion of it; unable to reſiſt the terror with which their conſciences were ſtruck by the ſound of the horn. All theſe agitations, ſo ſalutary in outward appearance, ſince it inſpir'd the hearts of the Mexicans with repentance for ſome time, concluded with the burning a great quantity of incenſe in honour of the idol whoſe feſtival they ſolemniz'd. They blew the horn for ten days ſucceſſively, viz. from the ninth of May to the nineteenth, all which time was ſpent in tears and affliction. On the laſt day, Teſcalipuca was carried in proceſſion. The image of the god, ſurrounded with branches of Manghey, ſtuck full with prickles, was ſeated in a machine ſurrounded with curtains, which probably was like a litter. This machine was carried in proceſſion round the temple by prieſts ſmear'd with black, who wore the livery of their god, and whoſe hair was partly twiſted up with a white ſtring. Two miniſters of the idol walk'd at the head of the proceſſion, with thuribles in their hands; every time they incens'd the people, the whole proceſſion lifted up their arms in a devout manner, looking at the ſame time on the ſun and the god of penance. During this ceremony, the reſt of the devotees ſcourg'd themſelves themſelves with ropes made of Manghey. Some adorn'd the court and the temple with branches, and ſtrew'd the way with flowers.

After the proceſſion and the ſcourging of the penitents, every one made his oblations. Some brought jewels and works of gold and ſilver; others incenſe, precious wood, maiz, &c. the poor offer'd quails, and theſe the ſacrificers, after having cut off their heads, threw at the foot of the altar. Then the people made a feaſt, very much reſembling thoſe which the antient heathens inſtituted in honour of their gods. Whatever meats were given to the idol, were call'd ſacred viands, and were ſerved up by veſtals who were led to it by an old prieſt dreſs'd in a kind of white ſurplice, and were by him conducted back to the convent, after having thus ſerv'd up at the table of the god. But when the time for their clearing the table was come, the youths and miniſters of the temple took away the meats, and carried them to the prieſts, who alone had the privilege of eating them. After the ſacred repaſt was ended, they made a ſacrifice of him who that year had been the living image of the god of penance; and the whole ceremony ended, like thoſe of other feſtivals, with dances and ſpiritual ſongs.

The Mexicans uſed to celebrate a jubilee every four years, which was nothing more than the feaſt of penance, ſuch as we have already deſcribed it, except that it was more ſolemn; there being at that time a more general and plenary remiſſion of ſins. We are aſſur'd that the Mexicans ſacrificed ſeveral human victims at that ſeaſon, and the youth uſed to make a kind of challenge who ſhould firſt, and in one breath, get to the top of the temple. This enterprize was a very difficult one, ſince it gain'd all thoſe prodigious applauſe who had the glory of coming firſt to the goal; not to mention that they were diſtinguiſh'd from the reſt of their countrymen: they moreover had the privilege of carrying off the ſacred viands, of which we are aſſur'd they almoſt made the ſame uſes, as chriſtians do of relicks.

Quitzalcoalt, the Mercury of the Mexicans, was particularly worſhipp'd by all thoſe who were concern'd in traffick. Forty days before the feaſt of this god, the merchants purchaſed a ſlave of a very fine ſhape, who during that time repreſented the deity to whom he was to be ſacrificed as a victim on the day of the feſtival; but they firſt waſh'd him in the lake of the gods, which was the name they gave to the water that fitted him for the fatal apotheoſis which ended with his death. They afterwards adorn'd him like the god whom he was forced to repreſent; when he ſpent all the time of his deification in dancing and rejoycings. They join'd with him in his pleaſures, and worſhipp'd him; but for fear leſt he ſhould be forgetful of his fatal deſtiny, two antient miniſters of the idol refreſh'd his memory with it nine days before his being ſacrificed. [a] He was obliged to wait his fate with patience and reſignation. If he diſcover'd the leaſt ſorrow upon that account, the two prieſts gave him a liquor to drink, which, by reſtoring him to his wonted mirth, made him undoubtedly inſenſible to his fate. The day of the feaſt being come, they again ador'd the miſerable victim, and incens'd it ſeveral times ſucceſſively. In fine, they ſacrificed it at twelve at night, offer'd its heart to the moon, and afterwards threw it before the idol; then the body was thrown down from the top of the temple, as was practiſed in the worſhip of Vitzliputzli, and the whole concluded with a dance.

The prieſts of this deity perform'd a ceremony which was odd enough, and that was the commanding every body to retire by beat of drum, the ſound of which was heard all over the city. At day-break they uſed to call up the people to work. This function was perform'd by the prieſts, each of whom had it in his turn every week.

[a] Theſe two prieſts uſed to proſtrate themſelves before the pretended god, repeating theſe words to him, Lord, thy pleaſures will end nine days hence. He was obliged to anſwer them with a chearful air; be it ſo, and continue his mirth.

The god whoſe worſhip we have deſcrib'd, was ador'd after another manner at [a] Cholula. He was there look'd upon as the god of the air. He was alſo conſider'd as the founder of the city, the inſtitutor of penance, and the author of ſacrifices. His idol was repreſented in almoſt the ſame attitude as we ſee it in the figure. Its cloak was powder'd with red croſſes. As this deity had, during his reſidence here, been a lover of faſting and works of penance, devotees uſed to faſt, and draw blood from their tongue and ears, to make themſelves agreeable to him. This god concern'd himſelf alſo in all warlike affairs. They ſacrificed five boys and as many girls of three years old, in his honour, before they took the field.

'Tis to the idol of Cholula that they aſcribed the famous predictions relating to the ruin of the empire of Mexico: predictions which were follow'd by prodigies, the particulars whereof it would be needleſs to relate; eſpecially as there is great reaſon to believe that they were very much heighten'd by the credulity of the people.

In fine, the Mexicans, and particularly the inhabitants of Tlaſcalla, worſhipp'd one god, who, during his abode in this world, had been a great hunter. He was honour'd with a ſolemn party of hunting, as we ſee it repreſented in the plate. Whilſt the god ſtood on an altar placed on the top of a mountain, round which they had lighted ſeveral fires; the devout hunters purſued the wild beaſts, who, in order to eſcape the violence of the flames, fled towards the top of the mountain. They uſed to knock theſe beaſts down before the idol, and ſacrifice their hearts in his honour. The chaſe concluded with ſongs of mirth and joyful acclamations, after which the hunters brought back the idol in triumph, and a ſolemn feaſt concluded the devotion of that day.

[b] AN embaſſador was diſtinguiſh'd by a mantle or riding-cloak of cotton, embroider'd with a fringe interwoven with knots. He held in his right hand a very broad arrow, with the feathers upwards, and in his left a ſhell in the ſhape of a buckler. The ſubject of the embaſſy was known by the feathers of the arrow, the red denouncing war, and the white denoting peace. The embaſſador was to be reſpected at the ſight of theſe tokens, but he was not allow'd to turn out of the royal roads of the province through which he paſs'd, upon penalty of loſing his right of juriſdiction and immunity.

The ſacrificers denounced war by the ſound of an inſtrument which they call'd the ſacred trumpet, becauſe none but the ſacrificers were allow'd to ſound it, to animate, by the command of the gods, the hearts of the ſoldiers. The ſound of this inſtrument was harſh, and breath'd gloomy notes, very well adapted to inſpire the ſoldier with a new bravery, by conſecrating, ſays the tranſlator of the conqueſt of Mexico, the contempt of life from a religious motive. The Mexican troops were kept under very ſtrict diſcipline, and were very obedient. We ſhall not take notice of their method of fighting, having confin'd ourſelves to religious ceremonies only, but ſhall only obſerve, that the taking a priſoner was thought a more heroic action, than the killing an enemy [c]; and he was look'd upon as the moſt valiant, who brought the greateſt number of victims for the ſacrifices.

Their writing conſiſted in certain hieroglyphic paintings, by whoſe aſſiſtance they call'd up certain memorable incidents in the mind; for they had not, like the Europeans, the uſe of letters. They uſed to paint the objects on calico, prepar'd on purpoſe for the pen-pencil. To theſe images they added numbers, or ſome other ſigns[a], " which they " diſpos'd in ſo exact and regular a manner, that the number, the character, and the " figure, mutually aſſiſted each other, in expreſſing the thought, and form'd a compleat " argument. This ſubtle invention reſembled the hieroglyphics of the Egyptians; and " the Mexicans were ſo skilful therein, that they had whole books drawn up in this " manner, in which they preſerv'd the memoirs of antiquity, and tranſmitted to poſterity " the annals of their kings." They alſo by this method preſerv'd the ceremonies of their religion; the books which treated thereof were kept in their temples.

The Mexican emperors uſed to cauſe the exploits of their heroes to be ſung in theſe temples, and particularly the illuſtrious actions of the kings their predeceſſors. They taught their children theſe poetical compoſitions, which ſupplied the place of hiſtory to thoſe who did not underſtand their paintings, and the hieroglyphicks of their annals. Thus did they learn to underſtand the advantages of military virtue, in an age when they were incapable of putting it in practice: however, it was at leaſt an excellent preparative to that heroiſm, which a young ſoldier was obliged to exhibit in his firſt campaign.

Their Calendar, &c.

" [b]THE Mexicans uſed to regulate their Calendar by the motion of the ſun; for " they knew how to take its altitude and declination, and by that means found " the different ſeaſons. Their year conſiſted of 365 days, which they divided into " 18 months, each month containing 20 days, making the whole 360 days, the five re- " maining being look'd upon as ſo many [c] intercalar days: theſe they added to the end " of the year, in order to equal the courſe of the ſun. During theſe five days, which " they imagin'd their anceſtors had left purpoſely as ſo many chaſms, they abandon'd " themſelves entirely to indolence, and ſought only to while away the reſt of the time " as agreeably as poſſible. The artificers uſed to leave their work, and the ſhops were " ſhut; no cauſes were carried on in the courts of judicature, nor ſacrifices made in the " temples. They uſed to viſit one another, and devote themſelves to every kind of " recreation, in order, as they ſaid, to compenſate for all the vexations and miſeries they " were to undergo the approaching year, which began the firſt day of ſpring, and " differ'd but three days from our ſolar year, which they took from our month of " February.

" Their week conſiſted of thirteen days, all of them call'd by different names, which " were diſtinguiſh'd in their calendar by different figures. Their age conſiſted of [d] four " weeks of years."

The revolution of the age of the Mexicans is explain'd at the bottom of the figure where it is repreſented. The author of that explication tells us the reaſon why they began to compute their years from the ſouth. " Whenever they afflicted and humbled " themſelves the laſt day of their age, it was uſual for them to kneel down on the top of " their houſes, with their faces turn'd towards the eaſt, to ſee whether the ſun would again " begin his courſe, or if the world was at an end; and as, when they were in this poſture, " they had the ſouth to their right hand, they drew this conſequence from it, viz. " that the light had began in that quarter. They alſo imagin'd that hell lay northward, " and [c] This way of computing was the ſame as that of the Egyptians. Their twelve months making 360 days, to which they added 5 intercalar ones.

[d] Fifty-two years.

" and therefore that it would have been ridiculous to think the ſun had begun his " progreſs from that quarter."

[a] As they had learnt from tradition, or by ſome other means, that the univerſe is to be deſtroy'd, and that they imagin'd its deſtruction would happen at the end of four weeks of years; when the laſt day of the fifty-two years was come, every one prepar'd himſelf for the general deſtruction of nature. Then the Mexicans diſpos'd themſelves to die, tho' in perfect health; they broke to pieces all their diſhes and plates, as being of no farther uſe to them: they put out the fire, and run up and down all night long like men out of their ſenſes, and no one dar'd to give over, till ſuch time as he knew whether they were really going into the regions of darkneſs, or not. They began to take breath as ſoon as the day began to break and diſcover itſelf to their eyes, which were inceſſantly turn'd towards the eaſt; and when the ſun diſcover'd itſelf, he was ſaluted with the ſound of all their inſtruments by hymns and ſongs, which expreſs'd the tranſports of their joy. Then the Mexicans congratulated one another upon their being certain of the world's laſting one age longer at leaſt. They went to the temples to thank the gods for it, and receiv'd new fire from the hands of the ſacrificing prieſts. This new fire was lighted before the altar by the rubbing of two pieces of dry wood very hard one againſt the other; after which, each of them provided himſelf afreſh with every thing that was neceſſary for his ſubſiſtence, and the day was celebrated by public rejoicings. Nothing was to be ſeen all the city over but dances and other active exerciſes, which were conſecrated to the renewal of the age, in the ſame manner, ſays the author of the conqueſt of Mexico, as the ſecular games at Rome. 'Tis very probable that the Mexicans had borrow'd from their anceſtors the idea of the end of the world, and that the latter had brought it with 'em from Aſia, where it has been receiv'd in all ages. It appears alſo that this people had ſome knowledge of aſtronomy, ſince the Spaniards found in the province of Jucutan ſome Mexican books which treated on that branch of the mathematicks. The monks, better acquainted with their breviaries than aſtronomy, burnt thoſe books, and imagin'd that each of thoſe ſchemes was capable of raiſing the devil.

WE take notice of this ceremony, becauſe it is partly a religious one. The emperors or kings of Mexico were at firſt elected by the voices of the people, but the whole was manag'd by the nobles. They were afterwards choſen by four electors: theſe choſe for their king ſuch youths as were brave, and fit for war, who were oblig'd to give proofs of their valour; nor were they crown'd immediately after their election. The newly elected monarch was " [b] obliged to make a campaign at the head of his " troops, and to gain ſome victory, or win ſome province from the enemies of the em- " pire or the rebels, before he was crown'd, or ſuffer'd to aſcend the throne. No ſooner " had the merit of his exploits made him appear worthy of reigning, but he return'd " triumphant to the capital. The nobles, the miniſters, and ſacrificing prieſts ac- " companied him to the temple of the god of war, where he deſcended from his litter; " and after the ſacrifices were ended, the electoral princes clothed him with the imperial " mantle and other robes of ſtate. They put into his right hand a golden ſword " adorn'd with flint ſtones; which was the ſymbol of juſtice. He received with his " left hand a bow and arrows, which denoted the ſovereign command over their armies; " after

" after which, the king of Tezuco ſet the crown on his head, which was the peculiar " office of the firſt elector. One of the principal magiſtrates afterwards made a long " harangue, to congratulate the prince in the name of the empire: intermixing it with " inſtructions, in which he repreſented to him the cares and obligations of thoſe who " are raiſed to the ſovereign dignity; and how attentive he ought to be to the happineſs " and proſperity of his ſubjects, &c." The high-prieſt, clothed in his pontifical veſtments, crown'd the kings, as it were. 'Twas he anointed them, for which purpoſe a thick liquor, as black as ink, was employ'd; but we don't know what it was made of. The above-mention'd high-prieſt bleſs'd the king, and ſprinkled him four times together with a conſecrated water; putting a cowl over his head, on which bones and skulls were painted, and a black robe over his body, over which they put another blue one, painted in the ſame manner as the cowl. All this was undoubtedly done to teach him, that kings are as much ſubject to death as the moſt wretched mortal; and that all which remains of this grandeur, which is ſo much envied by the plebeian, is a rotten, corrupted carcaſs. They ſurrounded the new king with certain drugs, which, according to them, had the virtue of preſerving him from diſeaſes and inchantments: after this, he offer'd incenſe to Vitzliputzli, and the high-prieſt made him take an oath, by which he bound himſelf to maintain the religion of his anceſtors; the laws and cuſtoms of the empire; and to treat his ſubjects with clemency and gentleneſs. He moreover took an oath, that the ſun, during his reign, ſhould give its light, and rain fall in its proper ſeaſons; that the rivers ſhould not ravage the country by inundations; the fields be curſed with barrenneſs; nor mankind annoy'd by the malignant influences of the ſun. " This contract, ſays the author of the conqueſt of Mexico, has ſomething very whim- " ſical in it. Nevertheleſs, it may be ſaid, that the people pretended by this oath to " engage their ſovereign to reign with ſo much moderation, as not to draw down the " anger of heaven by his own guilt; well knowing that chaſtiſements and public cala- " mities fall often on ſubjects, who ſuffer for the crimes and irregularities of their " monarchs."

Their Marriage-Ceremonies, and Divorces, &c.

MArriage was ſolemniz'd by the authority of the prieſts, and a public inſtrument was drawn up, wherein was mention'd the particulars of the wife's fortune, which the husband was obliged to return back again in caſe of a ſeparation. " [a] After " their having agreed upon the articles, the couple went to the temple, where one of the " ſacrificing prieſts examin'd their reſolutions by certain preciſe queſtions appointed for " that purpoſe. He afterwards took up the woman's veil and the husband's mantle; " and with one of his hands, tied them together at one corner, to ſignify the inward " tie of the wills. [b] They then return'd to their houſe with this kind of engagement, " accompanied with the ſacrificing prieſt. [c] Then, in imitation of what the Romans " practiſed with regard to the Lares, they went and viſited the hearth or fire, which " they look'd upon as the mediator of the diſputes between the husband and wife. " [d] They uſed to go ſeven times round it ſucceſſively, the ſacrificing-prieſt walking " before; after which ceremony they ſat down, in order to be equally warm'd by the " heat of the fire, which gave the laſt perfection to marriage." The bridegroom had two two old men for aſſiſtants, or witneſſes on his part; and the bride, two old women. The Mexican hiſtory, repreſented in figures and hieroglyphics, adds, that in the beginning of the night, a kind of ſhe-mediator, accompanied by four matrons, with each a torch in her hand, took up the bride on her back, and carried her to her husband's houſe. The parents of the latter, who were gone to meet the bride, led her into a place where the bridegroom was waiting for her; and here the reſt of the ceremony was compleated in the manner above-mention'd. Then follow'd the marriage-feaſt, and after having ſufficiently entertain'd themſelves with eating and drinking, the old men took the bridegroom aſide, and the old women the bride, in order to inſtruct 'em in ſuch particulars as were uſeful and neceſſary for their change of condition, and how they might beſt anſwer thoſe duties, to which they had bound themſelves by their marriage-contract; laſtly, the old people withdrew, when the married couple put the finiſhing ſtroke to the work.

Here follows what was generally obſerv'd by the Mexicans; nevertheleſs, ſome provinces of the empire, either added, or retrench'd from theſe particulars according as caprice dictated. At Tlaſcalla they uſed to ſhave the heads of the married couple, to teach 'em, as it were, that it was now proper for them to lay aſide all youthful amuſements. In Mechoacan, the bride was obliged to keep her eyes fix'd on the bridegroom while the ceremony was performing, without which the marriage wanted one degree of perfection. Was it done to denote to the wife, that it was her duty to read her will, her deſires, and caprices, in her husband's eyes? In another province of this empire, 'twas a cuſtom to carry off the bridegroom, in order that it might be thought he was forced to marry againſt his will; or perhaps to denote, that if men were not prompted to propagate their ſpecies in a lawful way, by the dictates of nature and reaſon, hardly any man would ever enter into that ſtate, nor embaraſs himſelf with the cares of a family; but would preſer the begetting a long ſucceſſion of baſtards, and abandon them to the wide world, to the beautiful harveſt which Hymen beſtows after a toil of many years. In the province of Panuco, the husband purchaſed his wife, (which was, in ſome meaſure, the giving her a portion) for a bow, two arrows, and a net. After the marriage, the wife's father did not ſpeak a word to his ſon-in-law during the firſt year; and the latter, as ſoon as he was made a father, abſtain'd from all commerce with his wife for two years. During the firſt twenty days of their marriage, the Macatecas, another nation ſubject to the empire of Mexico, faſted, pray'd to their gods, offer'd ſacrifices to 'em, and, from a penitential motive, drew blood from themſelves, and rubb'd the mouth and face of the idols with it. Whence this whimſical piece of devotion, at a ſeaſon that claims nothing but mirth and feſtivity? Did it ariſe from fear, or a principle of duty? 'Tis probable that they might be partly influenced by fear: but how ſpecious ſoever the motive of that piety might appear, the Europeans would think that husband a madman, who ſhould give himſelf up to faſting and praying to God, in thoſe firſt days which ſeem ſo naturally adapted to mirth and jollity. And ſince reaſon dictates to us to ſuit the ſeveral circumſtances of life, and proportion them to one another; 'tis manifeſt, that he who falls down to prayers in a ſeaſon which naturally calls him to an exerciſe of a quite different nature, offends againſt that juſt proportion.

Divorces were very common in Mexico: " Nothing more was requir'd in that caſe " than the mutual conſent of both parties; ſo that they had no occaſion of going before " the judges, but they themſelves decided it upon the ſpot. The woman kept the girls, " and the husband the boys; but the moment a marriage was thus diſſolv'd, the parties " were, on pain of death, forbid to cohabit together again; and the danger of re- " lapſing was the only remedy the laws could think of applying againſt divorces, which " the natural levity and inconſtancy of thoſe people made but too common among them. " They made the chaſtity of their wives a point of honour; and notwithſtanding their

" propenſion to luſt, they [a] nevertheleſs puniſh'd an adulterer with death." However, they at the ſame time allow'd of common ſtrumpets and public ſtews.

The Ceremonies uſed at the Birth of their Children, and the Education they gave them.

THE new-born infants were carried in a ſolemn manner to the temple, and the prieſts, when they receiv'd them, repeated certain exhortations on the miſeries and troubles to which they are expoſed by their birth. If it was a nobleman's child, they put a ſword in its right hand, and in its left a ſhield, which the prieſts kept for that purpoſe. If it were an artificer's child, they perform'd the ſame ceremony with tools or mechanical inſtruments. After which, the prieſt carried the child near the [b] altar, and drew ſome drops of blood from its ears and privy parts with a Manghey thorn, or a ſtone-lancet. He afterwards threw water on the child, or plung'd it into the water, uttering certain imprecations at the ſame time.

This kind of circumciſion, and the immerſion which follow'd it, reſembled in ſome meaſure the circumciſion of the Jews, and the baptiſm of chriſtians. We find in the hiſtory of the conqueſt of Mexico repreſented in figures, that the midwife took the child four days after its birth, and carried it naked into the yard, where ſome ruſhes were prepar'd, on which they ſet a veſſel of water: the midwife plung'd the infant in this veſſel, and when the immerſion was ended, three little boys of three years of age nam'd the child with a loud voice. Twenty days after its birth, the father and mother carried their child to the temple, and preſented it to the prieſt with an oblation, and from that time they devoted it to ſuch a profeſſion as was moſt agreeable to its parents. In caſe he were deſign'd for the prieſthood, he was put into the hands of the prieſts at fifteen years of age; if for war, he was given at the ſame age to the perſon whoſe buſineſs it was to inſtruct their youth in the military arts. In this laſt caſe, the oblation was given to him.

The parents of the children uſed to ſuperintend their education, till ſuch time as they were fifteen years of age. It ſeems to have been pretty ſtrict, and that nothing was omitted which might conduce to check the licentiouſneſs of youth. They were brought up in ſobriety from their moſt tender infancy; and they increaſed every year the quantity of their food in ſo judicious a manner, as can never be ſufficiently applauded. A child of four years old was exerciſed in things ſuitable to its age, and from that time they prevented the growth of a habit of idleneſs ſo common among us; and which at the ſame time is of ſuch fatal conſequence, as to make a man's whole life vicious and miſerable. They never chaſtiſed them with any ſeverity till ſuch time as reaſon began to dawn; but before they proceeded to chaſtiſement, they firſt employ'd threats and admonitions for a long time together; as well to give the child time for reflection, as an opportunity to thoſe who were impower'd to correct them, to exert their prudence. At nine years of age, a ſtubborn or rebellious child was chaſtis'd very rigorouſly: he was ſtript ſtark naked, when tying his hands and feet, they prick'd his body all over with Manghey thorns. The daughters were not puniſh'd quite ſo rigorouſly. A child of ten years old was beat with a ſtick; at eleven he was ſmoak'd at the noſe with dry Axi, which put him to exceſſive pain; and in caſe theſe chaſtiſements did not produce a reformation, he was carried with his feet and fiſts tied, into a damp dirty place, where he was left a whole whole day together expos'd to the inclemencies of the air, and the ſcorching heat of the ſun. In fine, at fifteen years of age, the youth was either put under the direction of the prieſt, or the perſon who was appointed to inſtruct their youths in the arts of war. The latter chaſtiſed the young people according to the enormity of the faults which may be committed in the moſt frail period of human life; when the paſſions, left to themſelves, generally fall into a courſe, which tho' it may ceaſe with the faculties of the ſenſes, does nevertheleſs not bereave the mind of its activity. Drunkenneſs in young people was puniſh'd with death, but the old people were indulg'd in it.

In order to give the reader an idea of the exerciſes in which the youth were employ'd in their ſchools and ſeminaries, we ſhall copy what the author of the hiſtory of the conqueſt of Mexico has written on that ſubject. " They had, ſays he, public ſchools, " where the children of the common people were inſtructed in every thing that was " proper for them to know; and other colleges or ſeminaries which were much more " conſiderable, where the children of the nobility were educated from their moſt tender " years till ſuch time as they were in a capacity of making their fortunes, or purſuing the " bent of their genius. There were in theſe colleges, maſters appointed for the ſeveral " exerciſes of children; others for thoſe a little older; and, laſtly, others for ſuch as " were advancing towards puberty. The maſters had the ſame authority and reſpect " ſhow'd them as the miniſters of the prince, which was no more than juſtice, ſince " they taught the elements of thoſe exerciſes that were to be one day uſeful to the " ſtate. They firſt began by teaching their children to read the characters and figures " of which their writings were compos'd; and exerciſed their memories in making " them repeat hiſtorical ſongs, the ſubjects whereof were the great actions of their an- " ceſtors, and the elogiums of their gods. From thence they went to another ſchool, " where they were taught modeſty, civility, and, according to ſome authors, a regular " way of walking and a proper geſture. The maſters of this ſchool were more con- " ſider'd than the former, becauſe that they by their employment were appointed to " ſuperintend the inclinations of an age which ſuffers both its errors to be corrected, and " its paſſions controul'd. And at the ſame time that their minds were thus en- " lightned in this ſtate of obedience, their bodies waxed ſtrong, and they were re- " mov'd to the third ſchool, where they grew very expert in the moſt violent exerciſes. " 'Twas here they exercis'd their ſtrength in lifting burdens, and in wreſtling; they " challeng'd one another in jumping or running, learnt to manage their weapons, fence " with ſwords and fight with clubs; to hurl the dart, and direct the arrow with ſtrength " and exactneſs. They oblig'd 'em to ſuffer hunger and thirſt. They had ſtated " ſeaſons when they were oblig'd to ſuffer the injuries of the weather, till ſuch time as they " were expert and skilful, when they return'd home to their parents, and were employ'd " according to the character which their maſters gave of their genius either for religion, " for the arts of peace or thoſe of war: the nobility had the choice of one of theſe three " profeſſions, which were equally honourable; but they generally inclin'd to that of war, " becauſe it gave them a better opportunity of making their fortune.

" There were alſo other colleges of matrons devoted to the ſervice of the temples, " in which the young ladies of quality were educated, who were put under their direction " in their moſt tender years. Theſe kept 'em under a very ſtrict confinement, till ſuch " time as they were remov'd from it, in order to be ſettled in the world with the appro- " bation of their parents, and the permiſſion of the emperor. They were all very " skilful in thoſe works which adorn a female character.

" Such as had a genius for war, were oblig'd at their leaving the ſeminary, to " ſubmit to another very rigorous, as well as remarkable probation. Their fathers uſed " to ſend 'em into the army, in order to inure 'em to the fatigues of the field, and to " make them ſenſible by this trial, what they engaged themſelves to ſuffer, before " they embraced the profeſſion of a ſoldier. They then were employ'd only as Ta-

" menes or porters, carrying their baggage upon their backs between the reſt, in order " to mortify their pride and accuſtom them to labour.

" Whoever among theſe novices changed colour at the ſight of the enemy, or did " not ſignalize himſelf by ſome heroic action, was not admitted into the army; by " which means theſe novices were of great ſervice during the time of their probation, " becauſe they all, to a man, endeavour'd to diſtinguiſh themſelves by ſome gallant exploit, " ſuch as ruſhing headlong upon the enemy in the greateſt dangers."

There is a great affinity between this way of educating youth and that of the antient Greeks. Our notions on that head are very different; but if we except what chriſtianity rectifies by the purity of its morals, can we affirm that our method of education is much ſuperior to theirs? And can the Europeans juſtly boaſt that they make their youth more upright, or more uſeful to the ſtate; that they make the heart leſs corrupt, or form more ſprightly genius's? Do they furniſh the ſtate with a great number of citizens, worthy of being compar'd with thoſe Greeks and Romans, thoſe brave and magnanimous nations, who had been taught to deſpiſe dangers and their own private intereſts, whenever thoſe of their country call'd for their aſſiſtance? We are far from inuring our children to labour and fatigue, which at the ſame time that they invigorate the body, ſtrengthen thoſe organs, and the ſprings which give a motion to the ſpirits. We are in general very negligent in all thoſe things which inure the body to fatigue; and as to the mind, we uſually give our youth a very faint idea of their duty: whence it comes to paſs, that they are ſcarce able to reſiſt the multitude of falſe principles with which they are, as it were, ſurrounded, at their entrance on the ſtage of this world.

The plays and ſports of theſe Mexican youths were in ſome meaſure intermix'd with religion. One would think that theſe people were of opinion that no recreations could be lawful where theſe had not a ſhare. They uſed to play about the temples, and the prieſts were the judges of their ſports; 'twas they decided the diſputes which aroſe among them, and adjudg'd the prize to ſuch as deſerv'd it. The toſſing of a ball was one of their chief diverſions, in which they uſed to diſpute for victory with greater ſolemnity than in the reſt of their exerciſes: " [a] For the prieſts aſſiſted at it, together with the god of " the ball; and after having ſeated him at his eaſe, they conjur'd the tennis-court by " certain ceremonies, in order to correct the chances of the play, and to diſtribute an " equal portion of fortune among the ſeveral players."

Their Funeral Rites, &c.

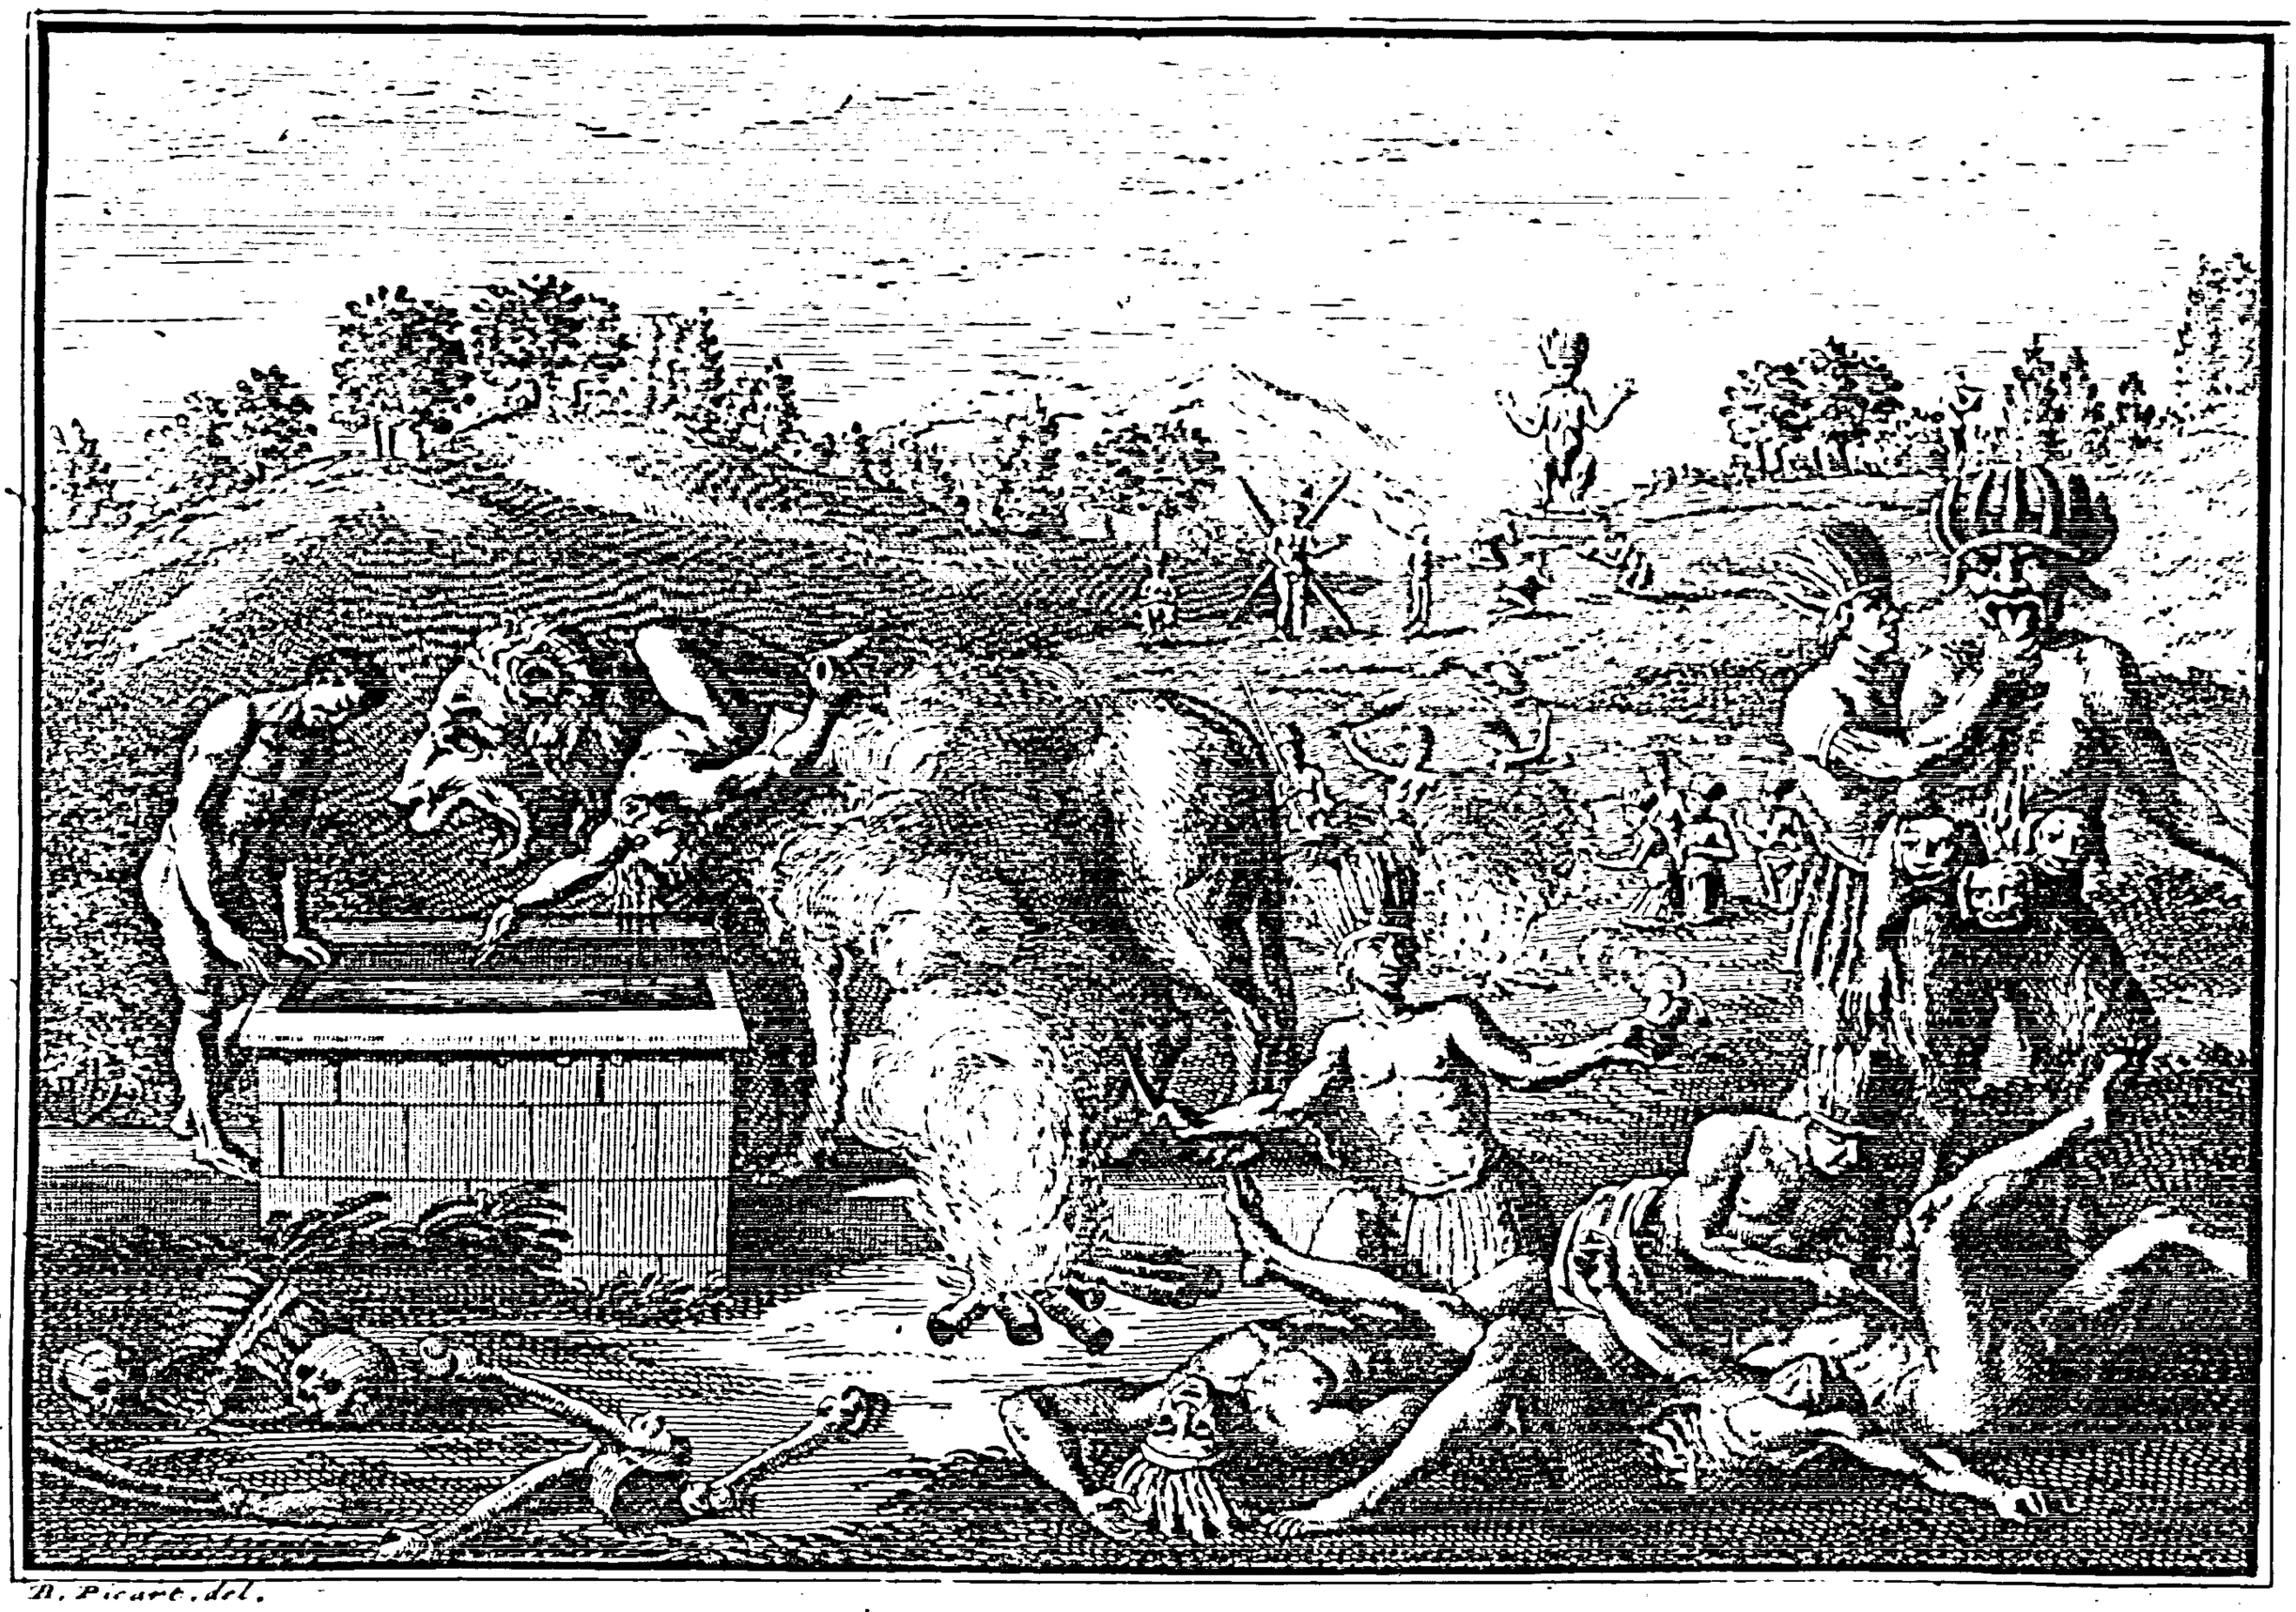
THE Mexicans believ'd the immortality of the ſoul, and the eternity of rewards and puniſhments. [b] They placed the manſion of the bleſſed near the ſun. Among theſe happy ſouls, thoſe were allow'd the firſt places who had been kill'd in battle, or had been ſacrificed to the gods. Prepoſſeſs'd with the ſame notion as the antients, eſpecially the Greeks, viz. that courage was the chief of all the virtues; and being perſuaded that the ſacrificing of men was the moſt heroic act of religion; 'tis no wonder that they aſcrib'd the moſt ſupreme felicity to their heroes, and to ſuch men as devoted their lives to pleaſe the gods. They aſſign'd different manſions in the other world to the ſouls of the departed, according to their different deaths; as for inſtance, ſtill-born children did not reſide with thoſe who died of old age, nor ſuch as died of ſickneſs with thoſe who were put to death for their crimes: and even with regard to the latter, parricides did not inhabit in the ſame manſion with the other kind of murderers. They eſtabliſh'd, as as we ſee, different degrees of puniſhment; and, in all probability, different degrees of reward.



Burials, and all funeral rites were regulated by the prieſts. They generally buried their dead either in their gardens, or houſes, and commonly choſe the court-yard for that purpoſe; they ſometimes buried 'em in thoſe places where they ſacrificed to the idols. In fine, they frequently burnt 'em, after which they buried their aſhes in the temples, together with their moveables, their utenſils, and all they thought might be uſeful to them in the next world. They uſed to ſing at funerals, and even made feaſts on thoſe occaſions; which cuſtom, how ridiculous ſoever it may be, yet ſome chriſtian nations have not been able to prevail upon themſelves to lay it aſide. Above all, they buried their great lords in a very magnificent manner, and uſed to carry their bodies with great pomp and a numerous train into the temples. " [a] The prieſts walk'd firſt with their " pans of copal, ſinging funeral hymns in a melancholy tone, accompanied with the " hoarſe and mournful ſound of flutes. They lifted the body ſeveral times on high, " whilſt they were ſacrificing ſuch as were appointed to ſerve thoſe illuſtrious dead. " The [b] domeſticks were put to death, to keep their maſters company. 'Twas a " teſtimony of great affection, but very common among the lawful wives, to ſolemnize " by their deaths the funerals of their husbands. They buried a great quantity of " gold and ſilver with the deceaſed for the expences of his journey, which they imagin'd " was long and troubleſome." The common people imitated the grandees in proportion to their ſubſtance. The friends of the deceaſed came and made preſents to him, and talk'd to him as tho' he were ſtill living: the ſame ceremonies were practiſed whether they burnt or buried the dead. We muſt not omit, that they carried the atchievements and trophies of the deceaſed, in caſe he were a man of quality; and that the prieſt who read the funeral ſervice, was dreſs'd in thoſe of the idol whom the [c] nobleman repreſented. The funeral laſted ten days.

The Ceremonies practiſed at the Death of their Emperors.

PRide and vanity, as in all other places, exerted their utmoſt efforts at the death of the Mexican monarchs. If a perſon upon his death-bed ſincerely acknowledges the emptineſs of all human grandeur, his ſucceſſors don't imitate him in every particular. Various intereſts, whether true or feigned, oblige them to ſtifle thoſe ideas, whoſe force they yet muſt one day feel. Whenever the emperor was ſick, they uſed to mask the faces of the idols, and never took 'em off till he was either dead or recover'd. If he died, his death was publiſhed, together with an edict by which all his ſubjects were commanded to bewail it. The whole body of the nobility was invited to his interment. They uſed to guard the emperor's body the firſt four nights after his death; after which they waſh'd it, and took a tuft of his hair, which they preſerv'd as a relick; that tuft, according to the Mexicans, repreſenting the ſoul. They put an emerald into his mouth, wrapp'd him in ſeventeen mourning mantles very richly wrought, on the laſt of which the image of that deity was repreſented which had been the peculiar object of that monarch's devotion: they cover'd his face with a mask, and carried him in that manner into the temple of this idol. The clergy of the temple receiv'd it at the gate, ſinging the the funeral ſervice after the Mexican manner; which being done, the high-prieſt pronounced ſome words, when they threw the body into the fire with every thing that had been appointed for his uſe: they ſtrangled a dog, who was to be his guide in the other world, and ſacrificed ſeveral days ſucceſſively a great number of ſlaves and others to attend upon him. In fine, they put the aſhes and the tuft of hair into a coffin, the inſide of which was adorn'd with all kinds of pictures repreſenting idols, and laid the image of the deceaſed prince on the coffin. Thus concluded a ceremony, when he who had liv'd in the utmoſt pomp and ſplendor, was going to be confounded with worms and corruption.

The kings of Mechoacan were buried with much the ſame pomp. The figure repreſents not only the funeral rites of the Mexicans, but thoſe of Venezuela, concerning which we have nothing particular to add.

THE Deities repreſented in this figure were worſhip'd at Campeche, and probably in other places. The devotees of the eaſtern coaſt of Mexico went and ſacrificed to the idols in the iſland of ſacrifices. The author of the hiſtory of the conqueſt of Mexico has not given us a deſcription of it, but ſatisfies himſelf with ſaying, " that the Spaniards " found idols there of various, but dreadful ſhapes. They were, continues he, placed on " altars to which they aſcended by ſteps, near which were ſix or ſeven human bodies " newly ſacrificed, and quarter'd, after having tore out their bowels."

There was formerly at Campeche a ſquare theatre or ſcaffold, built of earth and ſtone about four cubits high. Upon the theatre was fix'd a marble ſtatue of a man whom two animals of an extraordinary ſhape ſeem'd ready to tear in pieces. Near this figure a ſerpent was alſo repreſented, forty ſeven foot in length, and of a proportionable thickneſs, which ſwallow'd up a lion. Theſe two laſt figures were made of marble like the reſt, and encloſed in ſome meaſure by palliſadoes. On the pavement were bows and arrows, bones and skulls. [a] This is all we are told concerning theſe figures, which poſſibly might have ſome myſterious ſignification couch'd under them.

The Savages of Jucatan had alſo a kind of circumciſion; but we are not told that it differ'd from the ceremonies obſerv'd by the Mexicans at the birth of their children. There were croſſes found among theſe ſavages; 'twould be no eaſy matter to gueſs what uſe theſe idolaters might apply 'em to, and the origin of 'em: for we cannot depend upon the truth of what they told the Spaniards, viz. that formerly a man who was more beautiful than the ſun went into that province, and left that memorial thereof among the inhabitants.

We are told that the [b] iſland of Cozumel went by the name of the idol which the inhabitants worſhip'd. " The temple of this idol was built of ſtone, of a ſquare figure, " and in a pretty good taſte. The idol was repreſented under the figure of a man, with " a terrible and hideous air." They had made a back-door behind the idol, thro' which the prieſt pronounc'd the oracles unſeen; but the devotees, when they addreſs'd their vows to the idol, fooliſhly imagin'd it really anſwer'd them. [c] There were alſo ſome other figures of marble and earth reſembling bears. We are told that theſe gods were their domeſtic deities, or the Lares of the people of that country.

In

In the ſame iſland the god of rain was worſhip'd under the figure of a croſs. Whenever a drought happen'd, they uſed to go in proceſſion to beſeech it to ſend rain. They ſacrificed quails in its honour; offer'd it the moſt exquiſite perfumes; ſprinkled it with water, and undoubtedly repeated the oblations, the prayers, and aſperſions ſo frequently, and ſo long together, that at length the clouds had leiſure to gather in the ſky. It rain'd, when, lo! the miracle.

The idols of Tabaſco, and the ſacrifices which were made 'em, are repreſented in the figure. They uſed to rip up the victim's breaſt and tear out his heart; they afterwards ſet, or rather encloſed the bloody body of the victim, in a hollow made in that part of the lion's neck which is repreſented in the figure. The blood of the victim fell into a ſtone reſervoir, on the ſide of which was placed a ſtone ſtatue repreſenting a man, who ſeemed to look ſtedfaſtly at the blood of the ſacrificed victim. As to the heart, the ſacrificing prieſt, after having tore it out, ſmear'd the idol's face with it, and then threw it into a fire which was lighted for that purpoſe.

Religion of the Nicaraguans.

THESE Savages uſed to ſacrifice men in the ſame manner as their neighbours, and worſhip'd the ſun and ſeveral other deities. Some of their prieſts might be conſider'd as confeſſors, ſince they were appointed to hear confeſſions, and enjoin penance; they alſo pointed out the feſtivals and other ſolemnities; preſcrib'd the manner of the ſacrifices; and gave the form of prayer, &c. Theſe prieſts liv'd in a ſtate of celibacy.

Here follows the moſt remarkable circumſtances in their ſacrifices. The ſacrificing prieſt turn'd thrice round the victim, who was always a priſoner of war, ſinging at the ſame time in a moſt lamentable tone. He then ript up his breaſt, ſmear'd his face with the blood of it, and cut the body to pieces, after having firſt taken out the heart. This the ſacrificing gave to the chief prieſt; its hands and feet to the king; and the reſt to the people. The head was fixed on a ſtake, which was call'd by the name of the province againſt whom they were making war; we may naturally ſuppoſe the victim was of that country. They often ſacrificed children, and even men of the country on thoſe ſtakes; but they were obliged to purchaſe 'em before they could offer 'em in ſacrifice, and a father was allow'd to ſell his child for that cruel ceremony. Thoſe who had the happineſs of being ſacrificed in this manner, enjoy'd the privileges of deification, and paſs'd from this mortal to an immortal life. All the religious ceremonies of theſe Savages are intermix'd with prayers, vows, promiſes to the gods of a ſincere repentance, and proceſſions in their honour. In theſe the prieſts aſſiſt, clothed in calico-mantles, which deſcended to the leg; the laity carry banners, on which were repreſented, in their taſte, ſuch gods as were the object of their worſhip; the youths aſſembled alſo in it with bows and arrows in their hands. The chief prieſt walked at the head of the pious band, carrying an image of ſome deity of the country fix'd at the end of a lance. The prieſts ſing till they are arriv'd at the place where the idol was to halt, when they ſtrew the place where it is ſet down, with all kind of flowers; then they leave off ſinging, and the chief prieſt draws blood from ſome part or other of his body in honour of the god. The pious band follow his example, ſome letting themſelves blood in the tongue, others in the ears, and others a great deal lower, as they think proper; but the blood, from what part ſoever it be drawn, is always uſed in ſmearing the idol's face. During this act of devotion, the young people dance and make merry. They ſometimes conſecrate the maiz in theſe proceſſions, which indeed is whimſical enough. They ſprinkle it with blood, which is far from having a property of inſpiring the mind of man with works of piety. When the conſecration is ended, they begin to eat.

Their temples are low and dark; [a] the great altar ſtood formerly before one of them. 'Twas here the ſacrificing prieſt made an exhortation to the people, which ſerv'd as a prelude to the ſacrifice.

Their Marriage-Ceremonies.

NOtwithſtanding that polygamy is allow'd among 'em, they yet have but one lawful wife. The prieſt takes the parties betroth'd by the little finger, and leads 'em to an apartment near a fire which is lighted purpoſely for that ceremony. He inſtructs 'em immediately in their duty, and in all thoſe particulars which he thinks neceſſary to be obſerv'd by them in this tranſition from one ſtate to another, which indeed is vaſtly more dangerous for an European than an American husband. The moment the fire is extinguiſh'd, the parties are look'd upon as husband and wife; but if the latter, whom the husband ſuppos'd to be a virgin, ſhould happen to be found otherwiſe when they come to a ſcrutiny, he immediately puts her from him without the leaſt formality, unleſs he is willing to leave the determination thereof to his Cacique, by giving him leave to make an experiment on her virginity. The only puniſhment inflicted on a woman who has violated her conjugal faith, is to divorce her; ſhe is indeed prohibited from marrying again, but here ſhe's no loſer. Nevertheleſs on certain feſtivals, the husband allows his wife the privilege of taking a deputy; which indeed is a more graceful way of enliſting themſelves among the cornuted. We may even preſume, that the only expedient to meet with ſome conſolation in cuckoldom, and perhaps to avoid falling under its juriſdiction, is to permit, and not prohibit. After all, whatever violation Hymen may ſuffer,

Husbands, 'tis beſt to ſhut your eyes,

We are told, that in this country the relations of an adulterous woman are diſhonour'd; that the man who violates a woman is made a ſlave, or oblig'd to give her a portion; that a ſlave who has any commerce with his maſter's daughter, is buried alive with her; and that in order to prevent any commerce of this nature, they admit of ſtews. Let us add, that theſe ſeveral cuſtoms ſeem very repugnant to one another.

The reader will obſerve, that we have mention'd the cuſtoms of theſe nations as tho' they really exiſted at this time. Nevertheleſs 'tis probable, that if they really do ſo, 'tis only among a ſmall number of Indians, who are confin'd to the woods and mountains, for the chriſtians have aboliſh'd 'em in all other places.

Religion

Religion of the Savages of Darien, Panama, New Granada, and Cumana.

WE are aſſur'd, that the Indians of the province of Darien, have neither temples, altars, or any exterior marks of religion. [a] They nevertheleſs believe, that there is a god in heaven, and this god is the ſun, the moon's husband, to both which they pay equal adoration. As to the evil principle, they ſtand in fear of it, becauſe it hurts them, and worſhip it in order to draw down its benevolence upon 'em. They preſent to it flowers, fruits, perfumes, and maiz. As to the frequent apparitions we are told of, we may reaſonably conclude, without wronging our judgment, that 'tis no more than the effect of their imaginations, perhaps of their melancholy, and probably the artifice of their prieſts, who are at the ſame time phyſicians and politicians: let us not omit, that they are alſo the miniſters of war.

[b] The pretended magical incantations of theſe prieſts are always perform'd in ſecret. Theſe ignorant people are eaſily perſuaded, from the aſtoniſhing and uncommon cries, diſtortions, wry faces, and howlings, that ſome myſtery muſt be couch'd under 'em. We are told that the ſoothſayers in their repeated cries, mimic the howling of beaſts, and ſometimes the melody of birds. Theſe cries are likewiſe heightned by the noiſe of certain ſtones, which undoubtedly are ſtruck in ſome cadence; with the ſound of a kind of drum made of cane or read; with that of a flute made of the ſame materials; to which if we add the rattling of the bones of certain beaſts tied together, the reader will have a compleat idea of the muſic which accompanies the inchantments of thoſe prieſts. However, they don't all howl together, the time for the noiſe is follow'd by a deep ſilence, when the oracle pronounces the anſwer.

[c] Their way of healing the ſick is very extraordinary. "They ſeat the patient on a "ſtone, (or ſomething elſe which is nothing to the affair) which being done, the medico-"prieſt takes a little bow and ſome ſmall arrows, and ſhoots 'em as quick as poſſible at "his patient, who is ſtark naked. They are ſo skilful at this exerciſe, that they never "miſs their mark; moreover, there is a ſtay put to the arrow, which hinders it from "piercing beyond ſuch a depth. If the arrow ſhould open a vein that's fill'd with "wind, and that the blood ſhould ruſh out with violence, the phyſician and thoſe who "are preſent at the operation leap for joy, and diſcover by their geſtures, that the "operation has been ſucceſsful."

The Savages that inhabit between Carthagena and Panama, uſed formerly to worſhip, and perhaps ſtill do ſo, the ſtars and the devil; that is to ſay, the evil principle. As the ſyſtem of their religion agrees with what has been already obſerv'd with regard to that of the Savages of Darien, we ſhall not make any further reflections on it in this place. Such as live higher up in the country, and in thoſe places where the [d] Indian kings had their palaces on [e] trees, did alſo worſhip the ſun, and ſeem'd to look upon him as the principal deity.

Rio grande, which empties itſelf into the gulf of Uraba, was formerly call'd Dabaiba, from an idol that was very famous among theſe Savages. Here they uſed to go in pilgrimage, and burnt ſlaves by way of ſacrifice in his honour. They uſed to worſhip this god or goddeſs, by faſting for three or four days together; by auſterities like to thoſe before before mention'd; and by petty acts of devotion, such as sighs, groans, extasies, &c. [a] We worship, (said they to the Spaniards, when they question'd them about their religion,) one god creator of heaven and earth, whose mother is Dabaiba. This Dabaiba had led a very virtuous life in this world, and was consequently very much esteem'd, and after her death was deified, and became the mother of god. When she is angry, she sends thunder and lightning upon mankind. This is the substance of the religion of those Savages.

Their priests make a vow of chastity, and if ever they violate it, they are infallibly ston'd and burnt. The devotees are oblig'd, during their fasting, to cease from all correspondence with their wives. Notwithstanding the rigorous punishment which is inflicted on all such priests as violate their chastity, they yet preserve the authority they have arrogated to themselves in all places, and nothing is transacted without their advice.

We are told that the Savages of the valley of Tunia worship the sun and moon, and an idol call'd Chiappen. Before they set out to war, they sacrifice slaves and prisoners in his honour, and smear the body of the idol with the victim's blood; they never go on any enterprize without first asking his advice and imploring his assistance; for which purpose they undergo a penance for two months together, during which they abstain from salt and the commerce of women: but we are not told the reason of their abstaining from salt. They have now, or had at the time of the Spaniards coming among them, certain houses or seminaries for educating the youth of both sexes.

We have not much to say concerning the cures which were perform'd by their priests, who when they find themselves unable to heal their patients, abandon 'em to their gods; but before they come to this extremity, they lay their hand on the afflicted part; mumble over regularly a few words; make an incision, and give a certain potion.

The inhabitants of Cumana and Paria [b] look upon the sun and moon as their gods; thunder and lightning always follow the anger of the former, and whenever he is eclips'd, they employ the most severe mortifications to engage him to restore his light. They pull their hair to pieces, and cut themselves with fish-bones; the women tear their faces, and the young girls draw blood from their arms. In the mean time the sun resumes his wonted power, which he had lost only in the imagination of the ignorant; but all men are not oblig'd to understand astronomy. These Savages are also of opinion, that comets are ill-boding and pernicious; upon which account they make a great noise, beat on a kind of drum, and exorcise 'em in order to frighten and drive 'em at a distance. To the worship of the sun and moon, they add that of some other idols, and among the latter, travellers have taken particular notice of a cross shap'd like that of St. Andrew, which is a preservative from spirits, and all those evil genii who ramble about in the night-time. We are assur'd that this is the reason of their fixing children to that cross.

[c] Besides certain compositions made of roots and herbs, which are often mix'd with the fat of birds, or quadrupeds, to which several ingredients are added unknown to the people; the medico-priests of Cumana suck the infected part with their mouths. These two things are perform'd with an air of gravity, which is apt to prejudice the people in their favour; and they at the same time mumble over several words to assist the operation. But if after all this, a cure is not effected, they then affirm that the patient must absolutely be possess'd with an evil spirit. Then the medico-priest rubs his patient with all his strength, begins to mutter over his words again, exorcises the pretended spirit, and sucks as hard as possible in order to drive him out. After this he takes a piece of wood, whose virtue is known only to the operator; when he rubs the mouth, the throat, and stomach of the patient therewith, and with so much violence, that at last the patient vomits vomits blood. Immediately the operator repeats his incantations, ſtamps his foot, cries, and makes a thouſand new diſtortions, when lo! the devil appears. This is ſomething which comes out of the patient's body, or which ſeems to come out by a legerdemain trick of the prieſt; 'tis then carried out of the hutt, the following words, which probably may have a peculiar hidden virtue, being ſpoken at the ſame time; may the devil go out from hence. In caſe the patient ſhould happen to die, after ſo much care and pains have been beſtow'd upon him, the operating-prieſt cries out, his time was come; which does no way leſſen his reputation in the minds of the people.

They adviſe with their prieſts in all affairs relating to peace or war, and conſult their gods in caves or ſolitudes. They purpoſely make choice of the night for the performing of their magical ceremonies, and the darker it is the better. They conjure the devils by their cries, by a great noiſe, and their magical ſongs, in the preſence of ſeveral young-people. The perſon whom they commiſſion to conſult the oracle of the idol, is ſeated, and the reſt are ſtanding. While the devil is expected, the magician makes much leſs noiſe; and the moment he appears, it ceaſes entirely, when the conjurer proſtrates himſelf, and gives the ſignal for the homage that is to be paid him. This is the account which the old Spaniſh writers give of the antient ſuperſtitions of the Americans, they being eye-witneſſes to them. They add, that one day certain fryars undertook to exorciſe the prieſt who was raiſing the devil, and that by the power of the ſigns of the croſs and holy water, which was wonderfully aſſiſted by a ſtole that was put about the conjurer's neck, he anſwer'd very pertinently to all the queſtions which the fryars put to the devil. Among other things, they asked him where the ſouls of the Indians would go after their deaths: the anſwer he made, was, to hell.

Such as are deſign'd for prieſts, are initiated in the prieſthood from their infancy. They oblige thoſe children to retire for two years to the moſt remote parts of the woods, where they are not allow'd to feed upon any thing that has blood in it, or ſee any women; but muſt forget their kindred, and are not allow'd to ſtir out of their caverns. The old Piaias, which is the name of theſe Indian prieſts, viſit and inſtruct 'em in the night. When the probation-time of theſe young candidates is expir'd, theh Piaias give 'em a certificate, upon which they are look'd upon as licens'd prieſts, and doctors in phyſic and magic.

Their Martial Ceremonies, &c.

THE Savages of Darien, as well as thoſe of North-America, have a ſolemn ſmoaking-feaſt, in order to take their reſolutions with regard to war. As they have no diets or parliaments among them, the reſults whereof are expected for ſeveral years together; or ſubſidies, which it is a hard matter to levy; or taxes invented by ſome farmer of the revenues; we may ſuppoſe that they immediately ſet out the moment after they have taken a reſolution of making war. The women march to the field as well as the men, and handle the bow and arrow much better than ours do the needle and diſtaff.

They burn their priſoners of war, but [a] pull out one of their teeth before they execute them. The Savages of Panama imitate their neighbours of Darien in this cuſtom. We are not to doubt but this laſt practice was in ſome meaſure a religious one, ſince the moſt ſolemn oath among the latter was that of ſwearing [b] by the tooth.

les PARENS & les AMIS DÉFRICHANT la TERRE qui est destinée aux NOUVEAUX MARIÉS.

The Savages of Darien and Panama always come into the aſſembly of war or that of the ſtate in a decent habit, that is to ſay with a calico veſtment over their ſhoulders, a ſcarf upon their thighs, a ring on their noſes or mouths, a necklace of teeth or ſhells round their necks; we muſt not imagine that theſe necklaces are as light as thoſe of our women. Thoſe of theſe Savages weigh twenty-five or thirty pounds, and very often reach down to the navel. Some of them wear ſeveral together, but they all weigh no more than a great necklace. They don't go to council with thoſe ceremonious gewgaws, but their women follow the men, and carry after 'em the ſeveral ornaments which they are oblig'd to put on when they are ſummon'd to appear in the council. But 'tis certain that theſe counſellors give themſelves very little trouble with regard to the gravity requiſite on thoſe occaſions. They dance in their formalities without the leaſt ceremony; when, being ſeated in their ſeveral places, a boy lights a roll of tobacco, and wets that part of it a little which is lighted, to keep the tobacco from burning away too faſt; after this, he puts it to his mouth as if it were a pipe, and goes from one row to another with the roll of tobacco, when he ſmoaks in the faces of all the counſellors, who receive his whiffs with great ſatisfaction, and undoubtedly look upon it as a token of honour and reſpect.

All theſe Savages never allow any quarter to their enemies; in caſe they don't cut 'em to pieces immediately, they are kept only in order to be ſacrificed to their idols, to be knock'd down, or burnt in their ſolemn aſſemblies. The fear of death would be a thouſand times more dreadful than death itſelf, did not their captives diſcover ſuch an almoſt unaccountable intrepidity in their ſlavery, which poſſibly may flow from a principle that is not to be deſpis'd.

[a] The Savages of New Granada and Cumana caſtrate all their young captives, and afterwards fatten 'em, imagining that men are like capons in that reſpect. They wear the teeth of their murder'd enemies about their necks, and always have an idol marching at the head of their armies, in whoſe honour they ſacrifice ſlaves or captives before the battle begins.

The Savages of Venezuela paint or roco their bodies in as many places as they have kill'd enemies. The firſt time they ſlay an enemy, they paint their arms; the ſecond, their breaſts; and the third, they draw colour'd lines from the noſe to the ears.

Their Marriage and Funeral Rites.

THE Savages of Darien are allow'd a plurality of wives, and have even the liberty of ſelling 'em the moment they ceaſe to be agreeable in their eyes. They have alſo proſtitutes among 'em, and if we may give credit to what travellers relate, their daughters are not cruel; nevertheleſs, as they look upon an immature pregnancy as ſcandalous, they immediately employ certain herbs in order to procure abortion.

As ſoon as the young women of Darien and Panama are of an age fit for marriage, and diſcover ſome ſymptoms of their maturity, they give 'em the apron, and they are no longer ſuffer'd to appear in public. They are veil'd in their houſes, and even in their father's preſence. Happily for the girls they marry 'em out of hand, and by that means prevent the dangerous inſinuations of a [b] director, who regardleſs of the honour of families, frequently deſtroys in a moment, all that virtue had been inculcating into youth for fourteen or fifteen years together. " [c] Coreal relates, that the Weſt-Indians in general " declare for nature, and are of opinion that ſhe is not to be ſuffer'd to remain idle; " whence neither their men or women are ever ſuffer'd to languiſh long, nor do they " once

[a] Authors cited by Purchas. [b] Cupid. [c] Vol. II. of his voyages.

" once make any of thoſe reflections which may be any way conducive to check the " irregularities of love. 'Tis to their early and ſpeedy marriages, and the little trouble " they have in meeting with partners for life, that I aſcribe the ſmall number of adul- " terers of either ſex among theſe Savages.

" They do not uſe much ceremony in their marriages; the whole amour and gal- " lantry on both ſides goes no further than in asking each other the queſtion; at leaſt a " young woman is allow'd to inſinuate, that ſhe deſires ſuch an one for her husband; " whereas among the Europeans, decorum forbids the woman making the leaſt overture.

" After they have enquir'd into each other's inclinations, and are agreed upon the matter, " they immediately marry; and all the gueſts that are invited to the wedding, bring each " of 'em a preſent, conſiſting of axes and ſtone-knives, maiz, eggs, fruits, fowls, " hamocks, cotton, &c. which they leave at the entrance of the hutt, and withdraw " till ſuch time as the ceremony of making the preſent is ended. After this they begin " to ſolemnize the marriage, the form of which is as follows: The bridegroom preſents " each of the gueſts with a great gourd-bottle full of Chicali, which is the drink of " theſe Americans, at the door of the hutt. All the gueſts, not excepting the little " children, drink in this manner at the door; after which, the fathers of the bride and " bridegroom come in alſo, holding their children. Then the bridegroom's father makes " a ſpeech to the aſſembly, holding in his right hand a bow and an arrow, with the " point turn'd towards 'em. After that, he dances and makes a thouſand odd poſtures, " which throw him into ſuch a violent ſweat, that he at length is oblig'd to give over " thro' fatigue. The dance is no ſooner ended, but he kneels down, and preſents his " ſon to the bride; whoſe father, being in the like poſture, holds alſo his daughter by " the hand: but the bride's father dances likewiſe in his turn, and makes the ſame " antick geſtures before he kneels down. Scarce are the reciprocal compliments over, " when the brideman and his attendants run to the fields, with their hatchets in their " hands, leaping and skipping, in order to cut down the trees which cover the ſpot of " ground where the new-married couple are to lodge; and whilſt the men are thus " clearing the ground, the bride-maids and all her train ſow corn there."

[a] The bride's father (where there is no father, uncle, or ſome other near relation) watches her for a week in the apartment where he lies. To what ſhall we aſcribe this? To paternal affection, or the bride's reluctance, who cannot prevail with herſelf to ruſh boldly into the arms of a husband? Authors are ſilent on this head; and be that as it will, a week after ſhe is deliver'd up to her husband.

We have already [b] obſerv'd, that the wives live in great ſubjection; but are they the more unhappy on that account, ſince they know no condition that is better than their own? Polygamy, whoſe very name would frighten our ladies, and perhaps make them more humble and reſerv'd when they would be ſurrounded with ſeveral rivals, is not capable of cauſing the leaſt emotion in the breaſt of a female American. Thoſe of Darien and Panama not only employ themſelves in domeſtic affairs, but alſo in ploughing, digging, and grubbing up the ground, in ſowing maiz, in planting and pruning the trees. Theſe employments ſeem too rough for women; but then 'tis certain, that women in the infancy of the world underwent thoſe toils, and uſe is a ſecond nature. The American women have no taſte for exceſs and gluttony, nor are they form'd for ſpending whole nights at cards, and rambling from one ball or maſquerade to another. That way of life might ſeem as painful to them as that of ploughing, or following a husband to the field would be to our wives. " [c] Notwithſtanding that the women of the Iſthmus of " Panama are thus employ'd in all kinds of ſervile buſineſs, either in the houſe or in the " field, and are in ſome meaſure their husbands ſlaves; they nevertheleſs acquit them- " ſelves

[a] Waſer's voyages. [b] Diſſertation on the Americans. [c] Waſer's voyages.

" ſelves of every duty with ſo muchchearfulneſs and ſpeed, that one would imagine " it was choice, not neceſſity. They are generally good-natur'd, courteous, and obliging " one to another, eſpecially to ſtrangers, on whom they are always ready to beſtow " thoſe favours which are lawfully due to their husbands only. The women are very " reſpectful and ſubmiſſive to their husbands, who in return are tender and loving. I " never ſaw, continues the above-mention'd writer, any Indian beat his wife, or make " uſe of reproachful expreſſions."

As to their children, they [a] plunge 'em in cold water the moment they are born. The mother is plung'd afterwards in the ſame manner. They then tie the child to a piece of Macau wood, and as his back always lies upon it, he runs no great danger of being either crooked or crump-back'd. The children of both ſexes, till ſuch time as they arrive at puberty, go as naked as Adam and Eve in paradiſe: then the girls wear an apron, and the boys a funnel, whoſe uſe it were needleſs to mention.

We are but very little acquainted with their funeral-rites: they preſent victuals to the ſouls, and celebrate anniverſaries for the dead, which conſiſt in carrying yearly a little maiz and chicali on the grave of the deceaſed. They have ſome idea of the rewards and puniſhments in the other life.

The Savages of New-Granada are as great friends to polygamy as any other Americans; but they don't marry out of thoſe degrees of conſanguinity which are forbidden by the law of nature: as for inſtance, a brother never marries a ſiſter. Their Caciques have more wives than the common people; and the children of his beſt-beloved conſort are the true and only heirs.

They uſed formerly to bury their Caciques with gold-necklaces adorn'd with emeralds, or buried whatever they poſſeſs'd during their lives, not forgetting to ſet both victuals and drink near their bodies, in which particular they were imitated by their ſubjects.

A wife ſometimes follow'd her husband into the other world. [b] In caſe a woman was to die while ſhe was ſuckling her child, the infant was put to death after her, to prevent, ſay theſe Americans, its being left an orphan. They lay it to the breaſt of its deceaſed mother. They do not believe that any other ſouls are immortal but thoſe of their great men, and conſequently ſuch as were their attendants in this world, ſince they diſpatch 'em after 'em, in order to their ſerving 'em in the next. They alſo are of opinion, that when a man dies with chearfulneſs and reſolution, and is buried with thoſe great men, it gives him an infallible title of ſharing with 'em in their immortality. The pleaſures of the next life conſiſt in eating, drinking, dancing, loving, and in general, in repeating all the ſenſualities of the animal life in certain delicious countries.

They celebrate very ſolemnly the anniverſary of the deaths of their warriours, which conſiſts in entertainments after their mode, and in ſongs intermix'd with tears and groans for the ſake of the deceaſed, obſerving not to omit the praiſes of thoſe heroes, and the breaking out into imprecations againſt their enemies. If the hero whoſe memory they celebrate died in battle, and with his weapons in his hand, the imprecations againſt the enemy are more ſolemn. They afterwards repreſent the image of the latter as perfectly as poſſible, and tear it to pieces in honour of the hero whom he kill'd; after which, they eat, drink, fuddle themſelves, dance, and ſing. The next morning at day-break, they place the image of the deceaſed hero in a great canoo fill'd with all thoſe things in which he delighted during his life-time. They often carry part of theſe things in proceſſion; but in what manner ſoever the ceremony concludes, 'tis certain, that whatever things are burnt, are all for the uſe of the deceaſed. Then they again begin to be merry, and get drunk, and the women diſtinguiſh themſelves from the reſt of the company by ſuch leaps and gambols, as very often put modeſty to the bluſh. The feſtival con-concludes with a general drowſineſs, into which their exceſſive joy, join'd to the ſtrength of the liquor, throws 'em. The young men, who are deſign'd to give proofs one day of their valour, make a kind of ſacrifices to the Manes of thoſe warriours, in whoſe ſteps they generouſly reſolve to tread. This ſacrifice indeed is ſomething odd and whimſical, ſince it conſiſts in making an inciſion, with a fiſh-bone ground very ſharp, in that part of the body, which prompts us to prefer the ſports of Venus to the triumphs of Mars. The blood which flows from the wound, is a religious libation in honour of the dead.

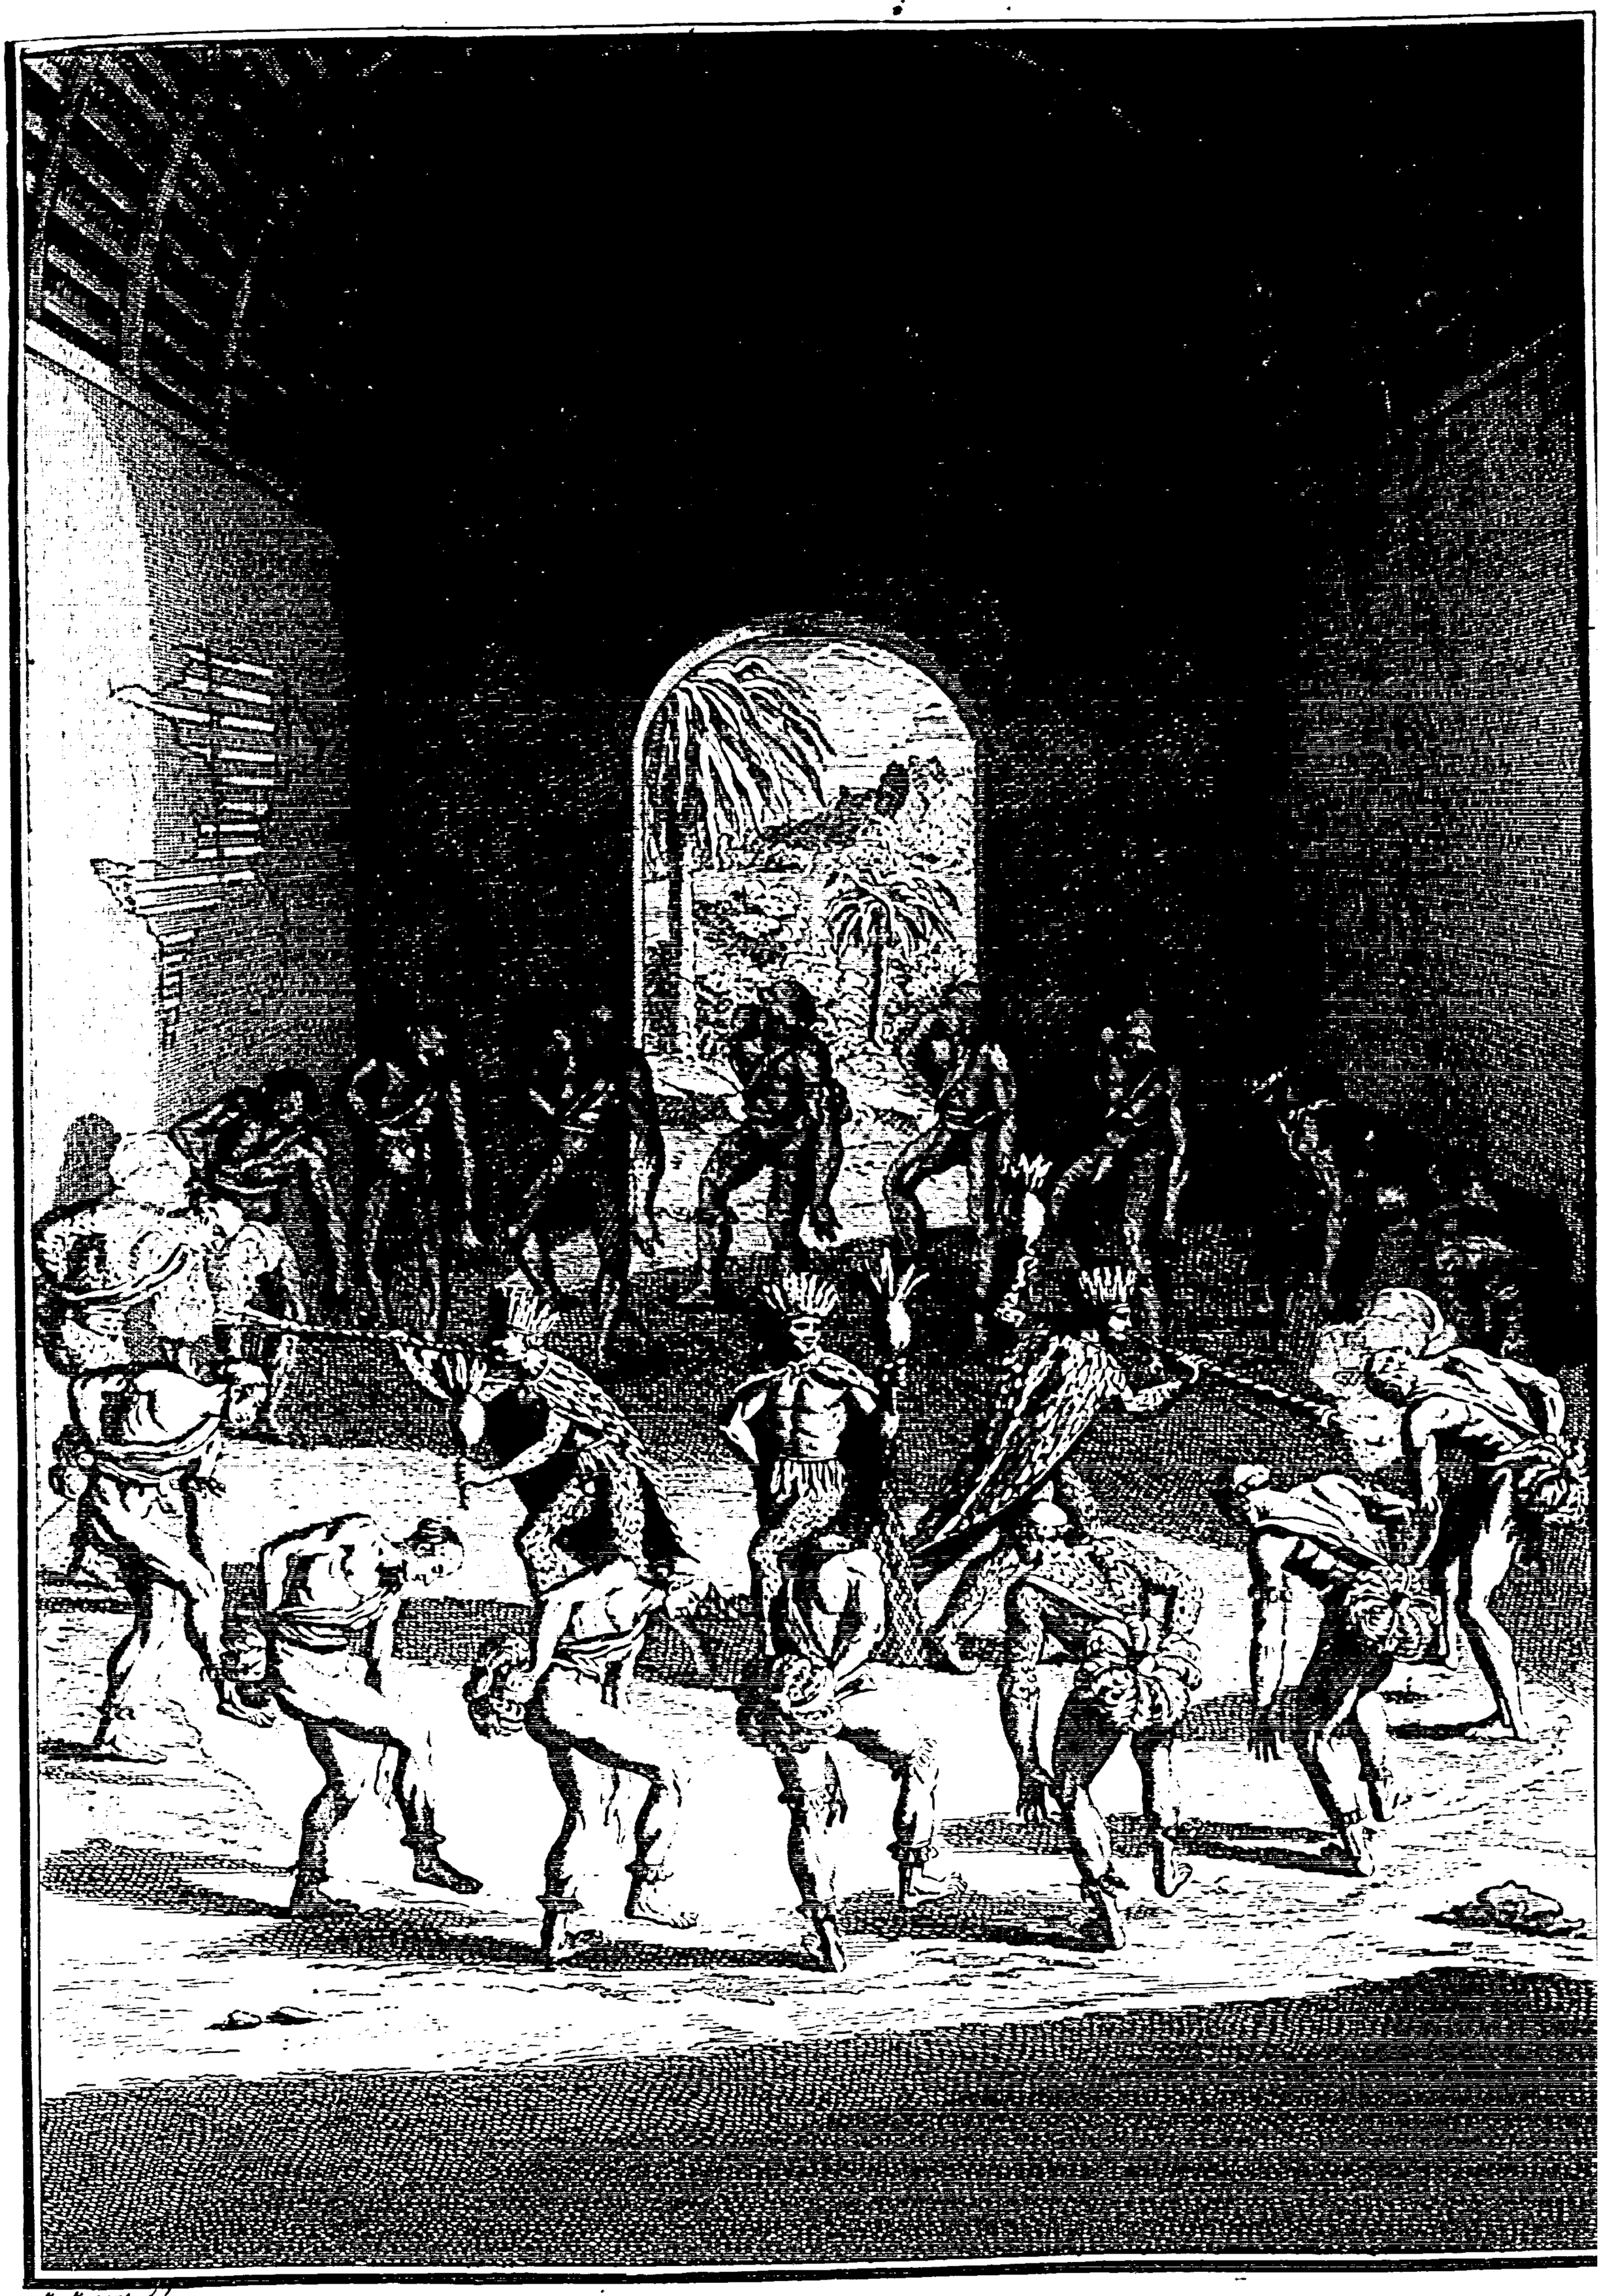
The prieſts of Cumana, and thoſe of the neighbouring nations, have cunning enough to procure to themſelves the cropping the virgin flower of all ſuch young women as marry. We have nothing particular to add with regard to their marriage-ceremonies. There are ſome young women among 'em, who make a vow of perpetual chaſtity, which they preſerve inviolably even to the hazard of their lives; for theſe chaſte ſhe-warriours, who are always equip'd for hunting, which is the only exerciſe they take, boldly diſpatch the man who ſhould dare to gather that, which, in the opinion of judges, is the moſt rare and moſt beautiful flower in nature.

Theſe Savages, and thoſe of Venezuela, burn and beat to powder the dead bodies of ſuch as were dear to them in their life-time, particularly their Caciques; after which they dilute this powder, and drink it off with their common drink. Their mourning conſiſts in weeping for ſeveral days together over the bodies of thoſe whom they lov'd and reſpected, in the manner repreſented in the two figures.



Religion of the Savages of Cubagua, Caribana, and New-Andaluſia.

THE only particulars we know of their religion, is, that they adore the ſun and moon, but above all an evil Being, whom they worſhip only becauſe he hurts 'em. We are told, that thoſe of Paria worſhip the dry skeletons of their anceſtors. Theſe Savages, as likewiſe thoſe of the Trinity, think that the ſun makes his progreſs in a chariot drawn by tygers [a]; for which reaſon they treat theſe animals reſpectfully, and generally give 'em the bodies of the dead to feed upon. They have even a tradition among 'em concerning a great conflagration which the ſun occaſion'd in their country, as a puniſhment for their having neglected to throw their dead bodies to thoſe animals. This fire was extremely violent, and conſum'd an infinite number of inhabitants; but we ſhall not trouble the reader with all theſe trifling and ridiculous ſtories.

The figure repreſents a religious act of theſe ſouthern Savages, which we might very juſtly look upon as a juggling trick of the prieſts, in caſe the prejudice we entertain againſt the Weſt-Indians could extend ſo far as to engage us to think it were poſſible for them to be ſo wicked as to juggle in an affair in which ſo much truth and ſincerity are requir'd. Here follows the deſcription of it.

The Caribees of Caribana receive in a ſolemn ceremony what they call the Spirit of courage. This gift is beſtow'd by the prieſts, who open the ceremony with ſongs and dances, in which every one foams, and rolls, and tumbles about like a demoniac: this violent agitation is interrupted for a moment, when they ſing and dance with greater regularity and cadence. All ſuch as deſire to have the ſpirit communicated to 'em by the mediation of the prieſt, join hands, and continue dancing inceſſantly, when three or four prieſts enter the circle, ruſh upon the dancers, ſome with a gourd-bottle tied to the end of a ſtick, and others with a long reed or cane fill'd with lighted tobacco, with which they whiff the dancers, crying out at the ſame time, Receive all of ye the Spirit of ſtrength, by by which ye will be enabled to overcome your enemies. From this form of prayer, we preſume that this religious ceremony is a very ſtrict one with regard to theſe ſavages, who, like the reſt of the Weſt-Indians, reduce all their articles of faith to dances, and certain equivocal homages; for can we poſſibly put a better conſtruction on the deſcriptions which travellers have given us of the American idolatry? As to thoſe of whom we are now ſpeaking, all that can be affirm'd with regard to their religion, is, that it conſiſts in fearing and praying to the evil Spirit, and in not troubling that Being whom they conſider as God; and that the deſtruction of their enemies ſeems to be a virtuous action. But to proceed to their other ceremonies.

Their Methods of healing the Sick.

THE Savages of Paria plunge any one who is ſick of a fever into the river, and afterwards make him run by dint of whipping, till he is out of breath, round a great fire; after which, they carry him to his hamock. They likewiſe ſometimes preſcribe abſtinence to their patients, at other times bleeding; and, in the latter caſe they open a vein in the reins.

In caſe they almoſt deſpair of the ſick man's life, he is carried into a wood in his hamock, which they hang between two trees, and dance round it all day. As ſoon as night is come, they give him proviſion for four days, and leave him to fate; if he happens to recover, ſo much the better for him; upon which occaſion, the relations make rejoicings; but in caſe he dies, they lament very little for his loſs.

Their Marriage and Funeral Rites.

IT would be needleſs to repeat, that polygamy is as much in vogue in Caribana, as in other parts of America. Their Caciques have a great number of wives, and [b]even have always ſome kept on the road, like our horſes, when they go a journey. The common people have as many wives as they are able or willing to maintain; but in general, they make no ſcruple to lend 'em to ſuch good friends and ſtrangers as they reſpect. This piece of gallantry however, does no way affect property; we are nevertheleſs aſſur'd that the Caribees put away their wives, whenever they violate their conjugal fidelity.

When a young woman is of an age fit for marriage, ſhe is ſhut up for two years, and during that time is not allow'd to cut off her hair: at the expiration of this term, her parents endeavour to ſettle her in the world.

The ceremony of betrothing is made at the expence of their friends, who bring ſtore of proviſion for eating, and a good quantity of wood to build a hutt for the future couple. One of the bridegroom's friends cuts off his hair from his forehead, and ſome venerable matron does the ſame to the bride, which compleats the marriage. They celebrate the feſtival by eating and drinking luſtily; then the prieſt immediately beſtows his bleſſing, after his faſhion, on the marriage, after which, the Sir-Venerable reſtores the wife to her husband, having firſt made her a compleat woman. We are not to omit, that ſhe only who is treated in this manner, is conſider'd as the lawful wife: for the reſt are all look'd upon as concubines, and are oblig'd to obey the former as their miſtreſs.

They

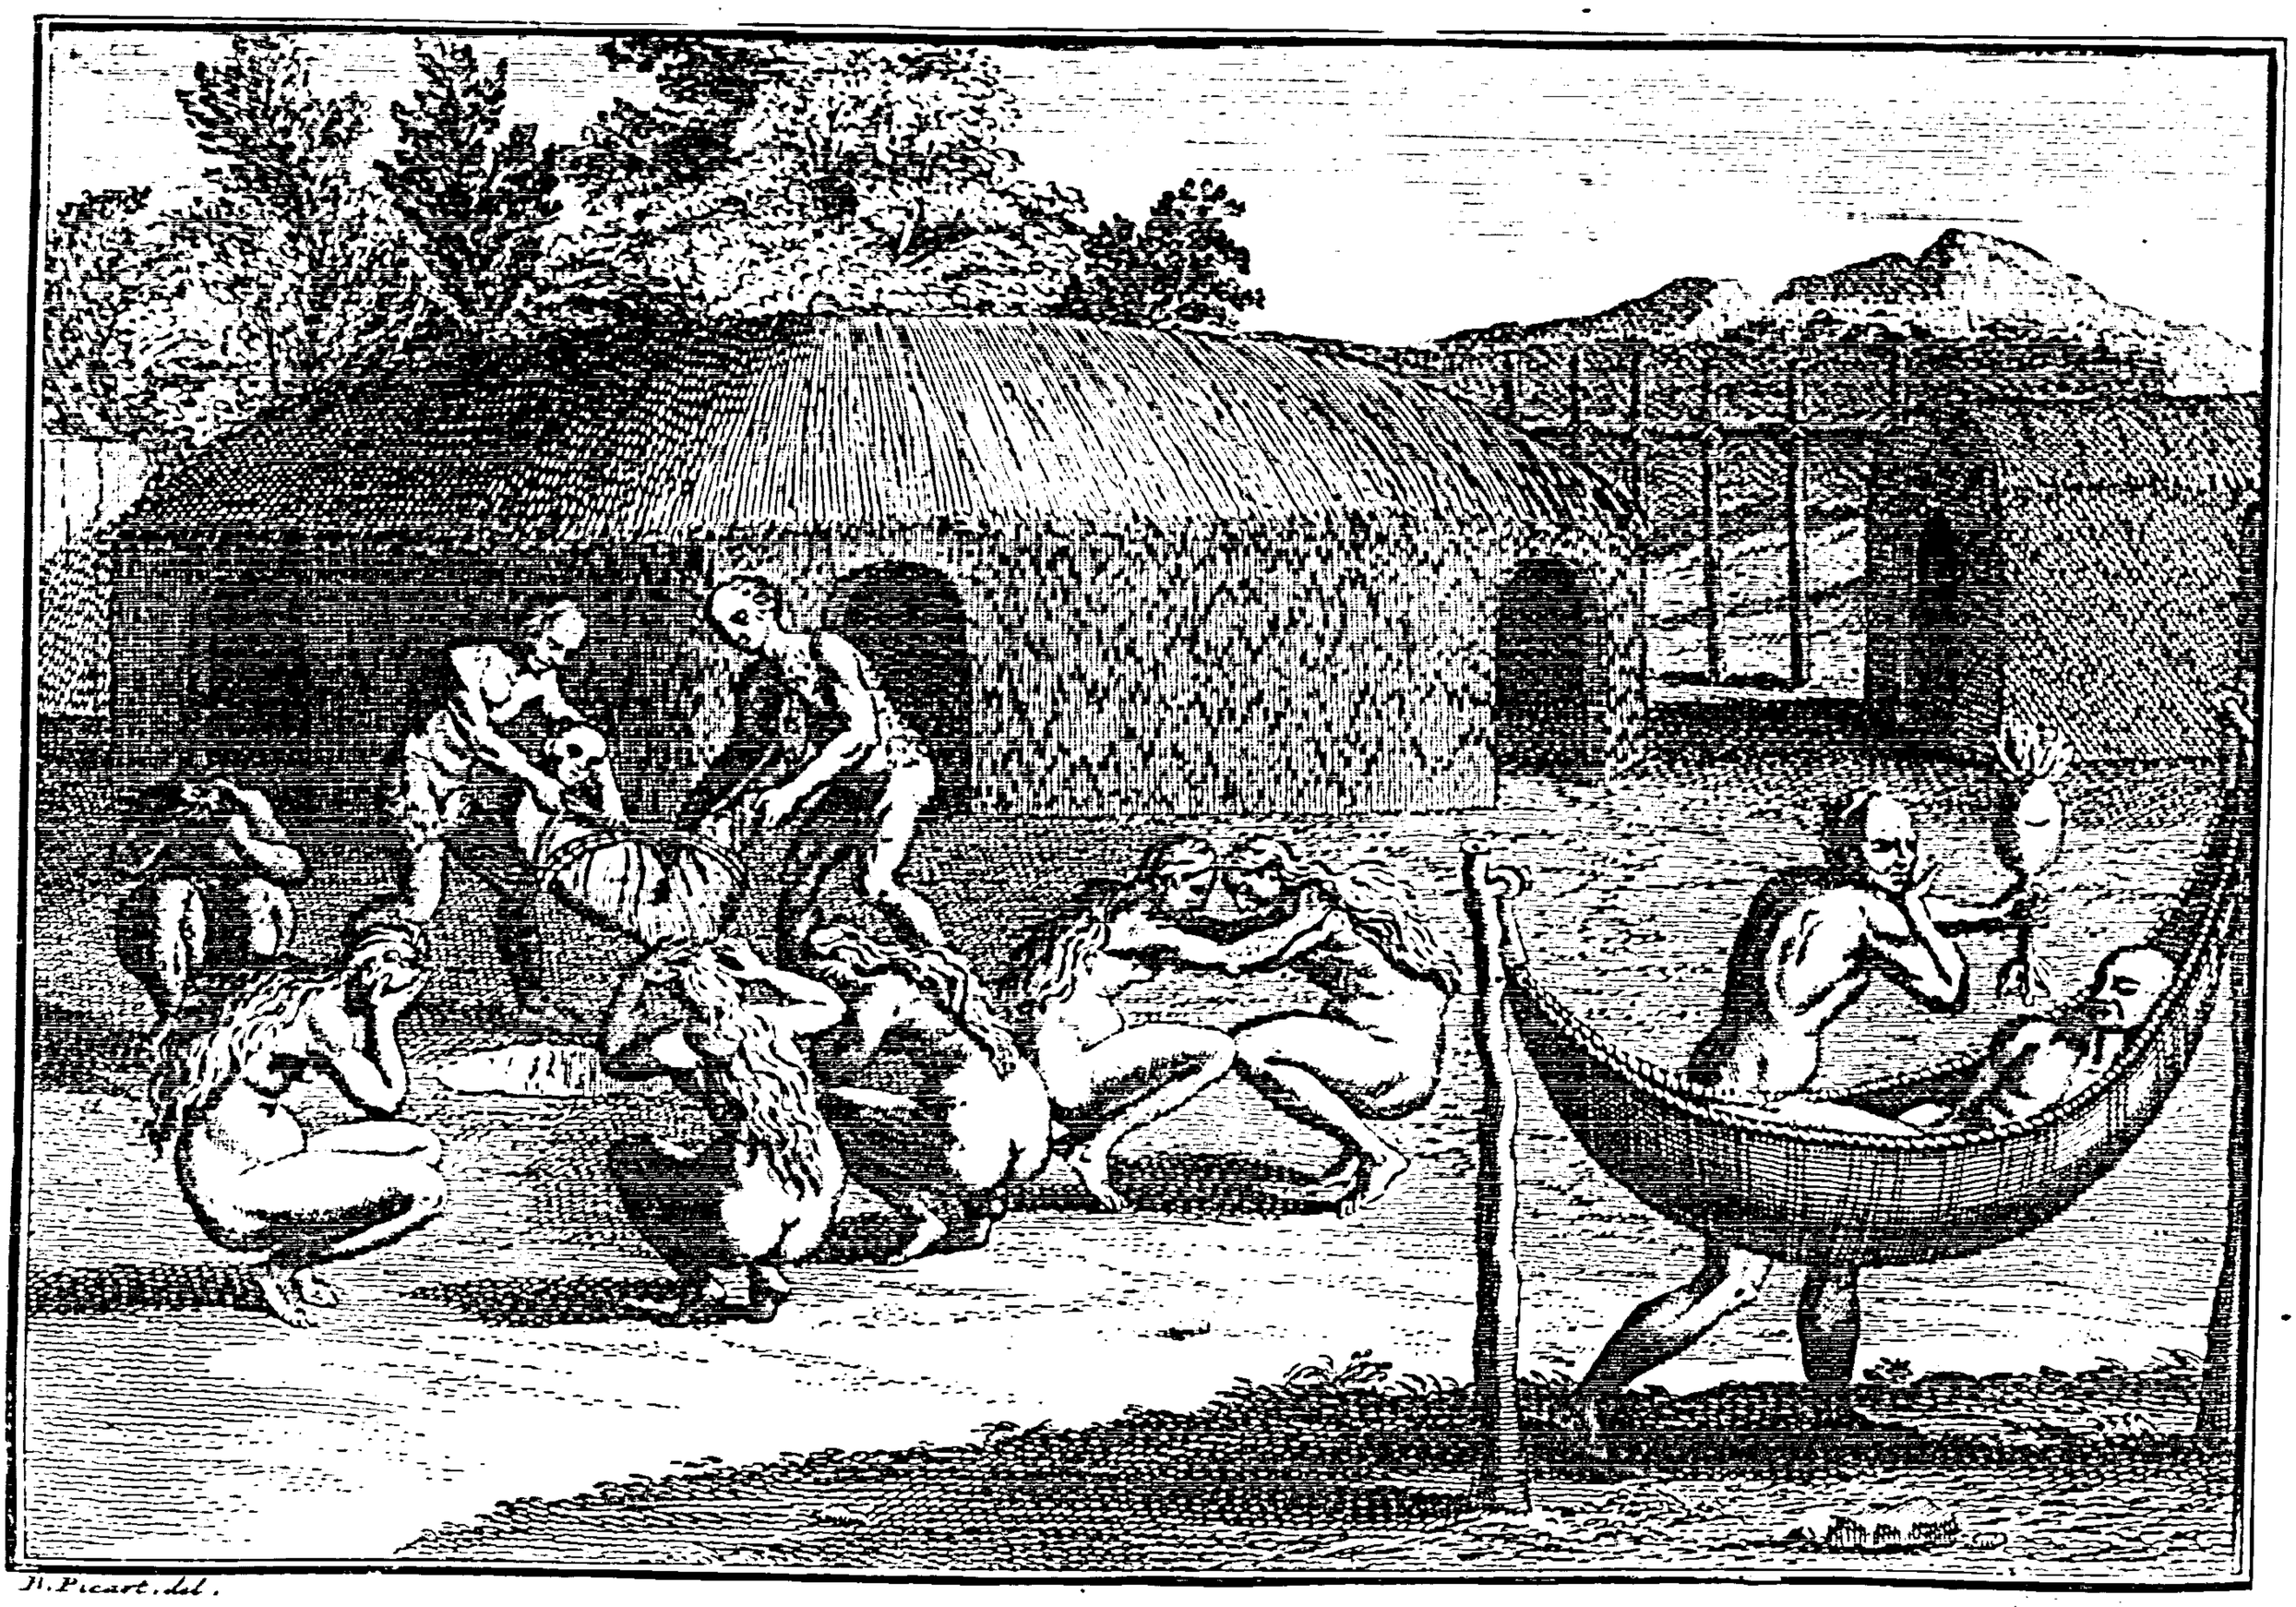
They bury the dead in their hutts; the Savages of Paria, after having laid 'em in the grave, ſet victuals by them, from an opinion which prevails among 'em, that the dead ſtand in need of ſuſtenance. They often dry 'em by the fire, and afterwards hang 'em up in the open air. The whole ceremony is accompanied with dirges and wailings, particularly if the deceaſed had diſtinguiſh'd himſelf by heroic actions, or other important ſervices; in this caſe, they honour him ſo far as to celebrate the anniverſary of his death, and his beſt beloved wife is oblig'd to preſerve the skull of the deceaſed warriour her husband by way of relick. They believe the immortality of the ſoul, and imagining that they ſtill preſerve the ſenſes they had in this world, they affirm that they ramble up and down, and eat and drink at pleaſure. They alſo are of opinion, that echoes are the voices of the ſouls which are roving about the fields.

Religion of the Savages that inhabit the banks of the River Oronoko, and of thoſe of Guiana.

WE are acquainted but with very few particulars of the religion of theſe Savages, and we are not even to give much credit to what little we do know of it. [a] Some worſhip Watipa, who is the devil; others worſhip the devil under another name, together with the ſun and moon. Some Savages of Guiana, worſhip whatever their prieſts command 'em to worſhip, or content themſelves with what theſe adore; others are of opinion, that the ſun and moon are living Beings, but they don't pay 'em any religious worſhip. Certain Savages that inhabit the inland parts of [b] Guiana, pay their devotions to a ſtone idol made in the ſhape of a man ſitting on his heels, with his knees open, his mouth gaping wide, leaning on his two elbows, with his hands open and ſtretch'd out. This idol reſides in a hutt, which at the ſame time is its temple.

The Nouragues, the Acoquas, and Galibis acknowledge one god, but don't pay him the leaſt worſhip. They ſay, that he inhabits [c] heaven, but don't know whether he be a ſpirit or not, and ſeem to think him a corporeal Being. The Galibis call God by a name which ſignifies the Antient of Heaven. All theſe Savages have a great number of ſuperſtitious notions and ceremonies, which are wholly founded on a ſett of ridiculous ſtories.

The prieſts of theſe people are alſo phyſicians, agreeable to the cuſtom of the reſt of the Americans. The prieſt, before he undertakes to cure the patient, firſt conſults the oracle, and in caſe it pronounces his death, they don't apply any remedy to his diſeaſe.



The reſt of their Ceremonies.

SOME of theſe nations chuſe their leader at table, and elect him who is the greateſt drinker. The general, the moment after he is choſen, puts his two hands over his head, and while he continues in this poſture, a long harangue is made him with regard to his duty, which being done, they make a trial of his courage, by whipping him till the blood follows the ſtroke.

CEREMONIE funebre des peuples qui habitent aux environs du fleuve ORENOQUE

H. Picart. del.

CEREMONIE funebre des BRESILIENS

The medico-prieſts of Galibis go through a pretty ſevere probation, before they can be receiv'd as doctors in both profeſſions. One of theſe trials is ſo very ſevere, that ſuch as undergo it often- loſe their lives. They bruiſe green tobacco-leaves, and preſſing the moiſture out of it, fill a quantity of it equal to one of our large drinking-glaſſes, and give it to him who is to be receiv'd medico-prieſt or Boia, who is oblig'd to ſwallow it all down.

We are not told any thing particular with regard to their marriages. The Galibis, and ſeveral nations of Braſil, &c. as ſoon as their wives are brought to bed, get into their places, and receive the compliments upon their happy delivery, as if they themſelves had ſuffer'd the pains of it. The Nouragues lay their children in dirt, the moment they are born, and let 'em lie in it for ſome time. Does not this cuſtom ſeem to reſemble that of the Greeks and Romans in ſome meaſure, who uſed to expoſe their children? but then there is this difference, that the Nouragues are expoſed for a certain time only.

But we are told more particulars with regard to their funeral rites: the Savages who inhabit the banks of Oronoko, [a] hang up the carcaſſes of their dead in their hutts, and adorn 'em with feathers and necklaces, after all the fleſh is rotted off. The Arvaques, who inhabit to the ſouth of Oronoko, beat the bones of their Caciques to powder; this their wives and friends throw into their drink, and thus bury in their own bodies thoſe whom they lov'd and reſpected in their life-time. One would imagine that ſuch cuſtoms muſt neceſſarily flow from a very violent affection, but the Savages have their decorums as well as we; and 'tis well known that they differ widely from friendſhip. Some other Savages of Guiana, make great rejoicings after the death of their chiefs, and even get very drunk, at the ſame time that one of the wives of the deceaſed, torments herſelf and howls as if ſhe were going to run diſtracted. Theſe laſt Savages preſent the deceaſed with captives or ſlaves to ſerve him in the other world. They believe that there is a heaven for the good, and a hell for the wicked.

Religion of the Savages who inhabit the River of Amazons, and the inland parts of South-America, as far as Peru.

" FAther D'Acunha relates, that there is but very little difference in [b] the religion of " theſe ſeveral heathens; they all worſhip idols which they themſelves make, and
" to theſe they aſcribe a variety of operations. Some of theſe are thought to preſide
" over the waters, and are repreſented with a fiſh in their hands; there are others for ſeed-
" time, and others again who inſpire 'em with courage in war. They ſay, that theſe
" deities came down from heaven, purpoſely to dwell among and aſſiſt 'em, but they don't " pay 'em the leaſt worſhip; they carry 'em in a caſe, or leave 'em in any place till ſuch
" time as they want them. Hence, upon their going out to war, they hoiſt at the prow
" of their canoos, that idol in whom they repoſe the greateſt confidence, and under whoſe
" auſpices they look for victory. They have the ſame cuſtom when they go a fiſhing, " and on this occaſion, they hoiſt the idol that preſides over the waters."

If we ſuppoſe that Father D'Acunha was faithfully inform'd, his relation may be reduced to two particulars which merit our regard: Firſt, that they divide the government of nature among their gods. Secondly, that they never pray to 'em but in neceſſity; with with regard to which, we may, without too much ſtraining the compariſon, affirm, that they do no more than imitate the followers of other religions. Theſe gods are, properly ſpeaking, no more than Genii, and are ſubordinate to a ſuperior deity. The ſavages, who inhabit the banks of the Amazons, acknowledge this principle; and the inference may be eaſily drawn from the ſequel of the Jeſuit's relation.

Theſe Savages ſtand in great awe of their prieſts, and have them in the utmoſt veneration. The above-cited Father relates, that they have a particular houſe for the celebration of their ceremonies; and 'tis there they pronounce their oracles, and receive the anſwers from their gods. Theſe prieſts are the maſters, the prieſts, the counſellors and directors of the people. They alſo apply to 'em as caſuiſts for the ſolution of their doubts; and whenever they breathe any vengeance againſt their enemies, theſe worthy miniſters of the idols furniſh them with poiſonous herbs for their arrows and other weapons.

The memory of theſe directors of their worſhip is had in ſuch extreme veneration, that they preſerve their bones like ſo many reliques; theſe, after being all put together, they hang up aloft, and thus preſerve 'em in the ſame cotton-beds, in which they uſed to lie when living.

Other Ceremonies of the above-mentioned Savages.

WE have no particulars with regard to their marriages. Some of theſe keep the bodies of their deceaſed in their houſes, " in order, ſays father d'Acunha to have " a perpetual Memento mori before their eyes. Others burn the bodies in large graves, " together with all that belong'd to 'em in their life-time; but they all celebrate their " obſequies for ſeveral days together, all which time they employ in weeping and drinking " to great exceſs."

[a] The Aguas, a people of a leſs blood-thirſty temper than moſt of the other American ſavages, treat all ſuch captives as they take in war, with great humanity: nevertheleſs, if theſe were famous for their valour and bravery, they cut 'em to pieces on their ſolemn feſtivals, and hang their heads as ſo many trophies at the entry of their hutts.

Religion of the Braſilians.

" [b] Coreal relates, that the Braſilians have neither temples, nor monuments erected " to any deity, a circumſtance in which they differ very much from the Mexicans " and Peruvians. They have not the leaſt notion of the creation of the world, and " regulate time by moons only; however, we cannot ſay but they have ſome faint " idea of the Deity, ſince they often lift up their hands towards the ſun and moon in " token of admiration, &c." They have ſome idea of the flood; for they relate, " that a very powerful foreigner, who bore the moſt violent hatred againſt their anceſtors, " cauſed 'em all to periſh by a violent inundation, two perſons excepted, whom he pre- " ſerv'd in order that they might propagate a new race of men, from whom they affirm " themſelves deſcended, and this tradition, which points out the flood pretty evidently, is " found in their ſongs. They ſtand very much in fear of the [c] devil, whom they call " Agnian, and yet they don't pay him the leaſt worſhip. They are equally fearful of " thunder, which they ſuppoſe to be under the direction of Toupan; and when they are " told to worſhip the God who created thunder; ſurely, ſay they, 'tis very ſtrange " that [a] Coreal, Vol. I. of his voyages. [b] Vol. I. of his voyages. [c] Authors cited by Purchas.

" that God, who is naturally a Being of ſo much goodneſs, ſhould terrify mankind with " thunder."

They pay a great veneration to a certain fruit about the bigneſs of an oſtrich-egg, and ſhap'd like a great gourd; which they call Tamaraca, tho' travellers have corrupted the word, and call it Maraca. " Coreal tells us, that when the prieſts go their viſitation " in their dioceſes, they never forget to carry their Maracas along with 'em, and oblige " the people to worſhip them with great ſolemnity. They fix them at the end of a " ſtaff, which they ſtick in the ground, then dreſs 'em up with beautiful feathers, and " order the inhabitants of the villages to carry their Maracas victuals and drink; for, " ſay the prieſts, it is well-pleaſing to them, and they delight in being entertain'd in " that manner. The Chiefs and Fathers of families go and offer part of their proviſion " to theſe Maracas;" [a] and it is a very great crime for any one to take away what has been conſecrated to theſe idols. The prieſts aſſure, that the ſpirit pronounces its oracles by the organ or mediation of the Maraca. We are alſo told of ſeveral other ceremonies in which that ſpirit is preſent after a divine manner; one of the chief is, when the prieſt breathes the ſpirit of courage upon them, which we have already deſcrib'd. In fine, they look upon theſe Maracas as domeſtic deities; for which purpoſe, after they have been conſecrated in a ſolemn manner by their prieſts, they carry 'em to their houſes, and conſult 'em upon occaſion. [b] Another author relates, that they alſo worſhip the moon, particularly when in the firſt quarter.

Purchas relates from Jerom Rodriguez, that there are ſavages in the inland parts of Braſil, who have a form of worſhip and a ſett of religious ceremonies very like thoſe of the Roman Catholics. They have, ſays he, a Chief who preſides over a kind of hierarchy, a prieſtly ordination, confeſſion, abſolution, beads. But this account has all the air of a romance.

The eſſential part of their feſtivals conſiſts in dances and ſongs, the ſubjects whereof are their glorious atchievements in war; and are alſo of uſe in tranſmitting to poſterity the memory of their heroes. One of the greateſt of theſe feſtivals is that of the butchering of their priſoners, whom they afterwards eat in their ſolemn aſſembleis: [c] nevertheleſs, ſome relations diſpute a little the truth of what is here advanced, and pretend, that theſe Savages are far from being thus thirſty of human blood; but 'tis added, that the Portugueze have endeavour'd to juſtify their exceſſive cruelties by this unjuſt aſſertion.

The Boias or prieſts are alſo interpreters of dreams, and make the people believe they hold a ſecret correſpondence with Agnian; and that they by the virtue of his power are able to divert plagues and diſeaſes, &c. from them. The Boia conſults the oracle in a hutt built for that purpoſe, where a virgin of about ten or twelve years of age prepares a hammock for him, and a good quantity of [d] Caouin. The Boia, who for nine days together is obliged to abſtain from all commerce with women, waſhes himſelf before he goes to bed, and there conſults the ſpirit, who never fails to anſwer his prayers; for 'tis proper to obſerve, that he is always alone when he raiſes the ſpirit.

Their Martial-Ceremonies.

IF it be true, that the Braſilians are as revengeful as they are repreſented, a captive among them has no hopes of the leaſt quarter. Their prieſts and old men prepare the people for war, and give the ſignal for marching, but they firſt expoſe their Maracks, thoſe tutelar gods of the ſtate. We ſhall not enter into a detail with regard to their their military affairs, as foreign to our ſubject; ſuffice it that we acquaint the reader with their treatment of their captives, ſince their death ſeems to be a kind of ſacrifice. [a] All ſuch as take any priſoners, are oblig'd to feed and fatten 'em. They give women to their male captives, but don't give any men to ſuch females as they take in war. The woman who is thus given to the man, ſerves him both at bed and board, and they allow him the liberty to hunt and divert himſelf, till the very moment he is to be butcher'd, which infallibly happens as ſoon as he is grown very fat. Then they aſſemble the people in a ſolemn manner, and open the feſtival with dances, and ſuch diverſions as drunkenneſs inſpires. [b] The priſoner himſelf has his ſhare in their ſports, and dances, drinks, ſuddles, and ſtupifies himſelf, in order to die with the greater bravery. We have already obſerv'd, that the Americans in general are pretty much inclin'd to this brutal intrepidity. After they have diverted themſelves in this manner for ſome hours, two or three of their ſtrongeſt men lay hold of the priſoner, and bind cotton ropes about his middle; however, all the terrors of the impending moment are not able to make the leaſt impreſſion on his mind. They then carry him in triumph up and down the city, after which he is expoſed for ſome time to the inſults of all the people. The men who had bound him, have an eye upon him all the time, and ſtanding at about eight or ten foot from him, they pull the ropes with which he is bound equally to the right and left. A third ſavage carries ſtones to the poor wretch, and he is allow'd to throw them at thoſe who ſurround him. "If all theſe particulars are true, [c] ſays a "traveller, we may juſtly conſider theſe executions as a kind of comedy." We muſt not omit, that he who has the honour of taking a priſoner, aſſumes at the ſame time a new name, and that the title which he thereby acquires, is a degree of nobility. The priſoner has no ſooner thrown all his ſtones, but a ſavage comes forward with the Tacape, which is a kind of club, and addreſſes a diſcourſe to him, which we may call the pronouncing his ſentence, and a little after ſtrikes the blow; when, if the force of it throws the priſoner upon his back, 'tis an omen of the death of the perſon who ſtruck him. No ſooner is the captive knock'd down, but the woman who had been appointed for his uſe, throws herſelf on his dead body, and falls a weeping; however, 'tis but a very tranſient grief, for if we may believe thoſe travellers who have been in Braſil, ſhe feeds on the dead body with the reſt of the company.

[a] Purchas. [b] Author cited by Purchas. [c] Relation of the river of Amazons.
[d] Other authors cited by Purchas.

Their Marriage and Funeral Rites.

"I Will allow, ſays Coreal, that we conſider all the American Savages as entertaining "principles which differ very widely from thoſe of ſound morality and juſtice; "nevertheleſs, ſome faint traces of the moſt ſimple duties of nature are ſtill viſible "among them. The Braſilian Savages never marry their mothers, ſiſters, or daughters, "but they are under no manner of reſtriction with regard to the other degrees of con-"ſanguinity. The moment a youth is fit for marriage, he is allow'd to look out "for a wife. They don't conſider, as is the practice in Europe, whether he has ca-"pacity or abilities ſufficient for ſupporting a family, and the weight of civil affairs. "Formerly a young man was not allow'd to marry before he had kill'd an enemy; "but now, when a young Savage has ſome young woman in his eye, he addreſſes him-"ſelf to her parents; or, in caſe ſhe has none, to her friends, or even neighbours, and "asks their conſent to marry her." Theſe Savages are unacquainted with all our pre-liminaries liminaries of marriage: there is no ſuch thing among 'em as a declaration of their paſſions, nor any amorous intercouſe. If the young woman's relations, friends, or neighbours, give their conſent, he is from that moment her husband, that is to ſay, he haſtens to the ſiege, and takes the place by ſtorm, without allowing the leaſt capitulation.

[a] Coreal, and other authors cited by Purchas.

Polygamy is had in great honour among them; a manifeſt indication that they are deſirous of well-peopling the nation. We are told that the wives live together in pretty good harmony, but that their husbands put 'em from 'em upon the moſt trifling pretences.

The husband goes to bed as ſoon as his wife is deliver'd, and acts the part of a lying-in woman with great art and skill, by receiving the uſual viſits made on thoſe occaſions, and cauſing himſelf to be attended as tho' he were really ſick: [a] he nevertheleſs acts the part of the midwife to his ſpouſe, fairly cuts the child's navel-ſtring, and beats its noſe flat; after that he waſhes it, and paints it red and black, and, laſtly, goes to bed, and his wife returns to her work. The birth of the child is follow'd by ſome ceremonies which are ridiculous enough. If it be a boy, his father, laying down a bow, arrows, and a knife, exhorts him to bravery and courage, and concludes by naming him after whatever object makes the greateſt impreſſion on his mind. The child is no ſooner grown up, than his father takes him along with him, and teaches him to kill his fellow-creatures, and this is their whole art of war. The girls are brought up in domeſtic affairs, and the moment they have given tokens of their being ripe, a ſolemn feaſt is celebrated on that occaſion.

They believe the immortality of the ſoul, ſince they affirm that the good, i. e. thoſe who have kill'd a great number of enemies, go beyond the mountains, and there enjoy the utmoſt bliſs in paradiſe. As to cowards, Agnian torments them in the next life. They pay a great veneration to a certain bird, that ſings mournfully in the night-time. They ſay, it is a meſſenger which their deceaſed friends and relations have ſent, and that it brings them news from the other world. [b] They are of opinion, that provided they do but liſten attentively to his melody, notwithſtanding their having been vanquiſh'd by their enemies, they yet ſhall go one day and reviſit thoſe places beyond the high mountains inhabited by their anceſtors, where they will enjoy an uninterrupted ſeries of pleaſure, and dance and ſing to all eternity; nevertheleſs ſome travellers relate, that the ſavages of Braſil have not the leaſt idea of rewards or puniſhments after this life.

[c] When a ſick perſon is at the point of death, his neareſt relations throw themſelves upon him with ſo much violence, that they ſometimes almoſt beat his breath out of his body. If the ſick perſon dies in the evening, the following night is ſpent in mourning and wailings, and the neighbours of both ſexes are invited to join with them; but how dangerous ſoever the ſymptoms of the ſickneſs may be, in caſe they have but the leaſt hopes of curing it, they not only refrain from weeping, but even dance, ſing, and ſuddle as uſual.

They waſh and comb their dead, after which they wrap 'em up in calico; [d] and if it be one of their chiefs, in his hammock, ſet off with all his feathers and other ornaments. [e] They lay him in a kind of coffin, but ſo as not to let any earth touch the body, and carry him proviſion every day, in order to prevent his dying with hunger after his death; not to mention that he wearies himſelf ſo much with the eternal dances in the other world, that he is very glad to come every now and then, and refreſh himſelf in this. Theſe are their notions with regard to the dead. Coreal, who tranſcrib'd the above-mention'd article, and ſeveral others, from authors who wrote long before his time, relates, that they let down the dead with their feet right forward, into round graves dug dug in the ſhape of a well or cask. He adds, that they carry them proviſions till ſuch time as their bodies are quite moulder'd away, in order to prevent Agnian's malice, who would infallibly carry off the body, did he not meet with victuals about the grave. " As they frequently change their habitations, continues the ſame writer, theſe ſavages, " in order that they may know again the ſpot where the grave was made, cover it over " with Pindo, which is a Braſilian plant; and every time they paſs near thoſe graves, " they roar out dirges in honour of the dead in the moſt frightful manner, ſo that one " would conclude they intended to raiſe them from the dead, &c."

The figure repreſents a ſick man in his hammock, and the Boia-phyſician or prieſt, viſiting him with his Marack in his hand; the dead man carried to his grave, and the Braſilians weeping over him. We muſt not omit, that the mourning of theſe ſavages conſiſts farther in not eating before the going down of the ſun, when they go and weep regularly over his grave, and mourn in this manner for a month.

Religion of the Savages of La Plata, and of ſome more remote Nations; their Ceremonies, &c.

WE have little or no account of theſe Savages. Some of them conſecrate the skins of their enemies as ſo many trophies in certain houſes, which ſeem to have been deſign'd for religious worſhip. Others adore the ſun and moon. Some of theſe nations, at the new or full moon, make certain inciſions with bones to which they give an edge, and uſe them inſtead of knives. [a] Thoſe of Tucuman have ſome notion of a deity, and have prieſts among 'em who act the part of ſoothſayers, upon which Coreal makes the following juſt reflection; " I am of opinion, ſays he, that wherever there are prieſts, " there muſt neceſſarily be ſome ſhadow of religion, and that the one is always re- " lative to the other." However, the diſpute does not relate to the true ſignification of the word Religion, but to the idea only. The other Savages of Paraguay and Uraghay, i. e. thoſe whom the Jeſuits have not civiliz'd, do not differ from the Tucumans in theſe particulars. Their prieſts are alſo phyſicians, as in other places, and cure their patients by ſucking the diſeaſed part, or by the ſmoak of tobacco. They admit an univerſal ſpirit who pervades matter, and acts on all parts of it, but this is too philoſophical for ſavages. Let us rather ſay, that they imagine every thing is inform'd with its peculiar genius and ſpirit, which flows from their groſs ignorance; tho' after all, 'tis certain, that ſome very polite nations, both antient and modern, have ſuppoſed the immediate action of an univerſal ſpirit, and that of Genii upon earthly bodies. Agreeable to this notion, we are aſſur'd, that the Savages in queſtion addreſs invocations to theſe Genii: ſome [b] worſhip a pretended inviſible tyger.

" [c] Such as are candidates for the prieſthood or phyſick, are oblig'd to faſt often, " and for a long time together; muſt have fought ſeveral times againſt wild beaſts, " particularly tygers, and at leaſt have been bit or ſcratch'd by 'em. After this, they " may be rais'd to the prieſthood; for they look upon tygers as almoſt divine animals, " and the impoſition of his holy paw is as honourable among them, as the receiving the " [d] doctor's cap in the univerſity of Salamanca is in Spain. Afterwards the juice of certain " diſtill'd herbs is pour'd upon their eyes, and this is the prieſtly anointing; after which, " theſe

[b] Relation of the Moxes, in the third volume of Coreal's voyages.
[c] Coreal's voyages. The edifying letters ſpeak pretty nearly the ſame thing.
[d] 'Tis Coreal who ſpeaks.

" theſe new prieſts know how to calm the ſpirits of all Beings, animate or inanimate;
" hold ſecret intelligences with thoſe ſpirits, and ſhare with them in their virtues."

There are other medico-phyſicians ſuperior to the above mention'd, whoſe office extends no farther than to calm the ſpirits, and receive their oracles. They never attain to this ſupreme dignity till after having practis'd phyſick for a long courſe of years; they are alſo obliged to faſt for a whole year together, and their abſtinence, ſays the relation of the Moxes, muſt exhibit itſelf by their pale and wan countenances. " At certain
" ſeaſons of the year, particularly at the new moon, they aſſemble their people on ſome
" hill at a little diſtance from the town. At break of day, all the aſſembly march to " that place with a deep ſilence, but the moment they arrive at the halting place, they " break out into hideous cries, in order, ſay they, to molliſy the heart of their deities.
" The whole day is ſpent in faſting and confus'd noiſes: towards the evening, they " conclude with the following ceremonies; the prieſts begin by cutting their hair, which
" among them is a token of great joy and gladneſs, and cover their bodies with red and " yellow feathers, which being done, they have great veſſels brought 'em, into which " they pour the liquor prepar'd for the ſolemnity; this they receive as the firſt-fruits
" offer'd to their idols, of which they drink inordinately, then give it to all the people, " who quaff it off to great exceſs. The whole night is ſpent in drinking and dancing.
" One of them ſings the ſong, when all of 'em drawing round him in a circle, begin to drag " their feet after 'em in cadence, and to loll their heads from one ſide to another with a care-
" leſs air, at the ſame time throwing their bodies into very indecent poſtures; the warmth
" of their piety and religion, is judg'd by the diſtortions in which they throw themſelves."

Some other nations, who are all confounded under the name of Moxes in the relations of the Jeſuits, worſhip the ſun, moon, and ſtars, and others pay adoration to rivers: ſome always carry about 'em a great number of little idols, made in a very ridiculous ſhape. Every act of piety and religion flows from a principle of fear, and among ſo great a number of people, to whom the Miſſionaries and Spaniards have given the name of Moxes, they, ſays the author of that relation, have not been able to diſcover but one or two nations who employ any kind of ſacrifice.

Their medico-phyſicians, enchanters, or quacks, preſcribe alſo to their ſick. We do not hear that they take their degrees like the prieſts of Paraguay: be that as it will, when the former are ſent for to the ſick, they [a] mumble certain ſuperſtitious prayers over 'em, promiſe to faſt for their health ſake, and to ſmoak tobacco a certain number of times every day. But it may be a queſtion, whether they really do it as ſincerely as they pretend to do? They alſo ſuck the diſeas'd part, which is a prodigious favour; after this, they withdraw, but upon condition however of being liberally rewarded for their ſervices.

Their marriages conſiſt in the mutual conſent of both parties, and in ſome preſents which the bridegroom makes to the bride's father, or neareſt relation. The conſent of thoſe who contract it, is look'd upon as nothing; and they have another very whimſical cuſtom among 'em, viz. that a wife may live where ſhe pleaſes, and her husband is oblig'd to follow her up and down. If they have but one wife, 'tis becauſe they can get no more, for they favour polygamy both by cuſtom and inclination, and always put it in practice whenever they have an opportunity to do it.

They look upon the incontinence of women as a moſt enormous crime; and if any of them happens to run counter to her duty, ſhe is look'd upon as an infamous creature and a proſtitute, and is often put to death. If men are unjuſt in any thing, 'tis certainly on this occaſion. Why are not women allow'd to puniſh the lewdneſs of men? Or at leaſt, why do we not indulge a ſex, whoſe frailty is the daily ſubject of our ridicule, to to divert themſelves at the men's expence, who are vaſtly more frail than women? [a] forgetting twenty times a-day at their feet, their ſo much boaſted ſtrength of mind, and ſacrificing all that is moſt valuable to their charms.

" The women prepare the liquor which their husbands drink, and take care of the " children. They have the barbarity whenever a woman dies, to bury her little chil- " dren with her, and in caſe ſhe happens to be brought to bed of twins, ſhe buries one " of them, and the reaſon ſhe gives for it, is, that it is impoſſible to nurſe two children " well together."

They have a very obſcure idea of the immortality of the ſoul, and bury their dead with very little ceremony. The relations of the deceaſed dig a grave, whither they attend upon the body with a deep ſilence, which is interrupted by nothing but ſobs; and as ſoon as the body is laid in the ground, they divide between themſelves the things it was wrapt in. Father Sepp tells us, in a letter of his publiſh'd in the eleventh Collection of curious and edifying letters, " that ſome people of Paraguay cut their own fingers, " and afterwards their toes, according as their relations go off the ſpot." A man is very unhappy in that country who has a great many old relations; for he runs the hazard of being mutilated very young: but then we may ask Father Sepp if he himſelf was an eye-witneſs to that unaccountable mutilation.

Religion of the Peruvians.

THE Peruvians, before their being govern'd by their Incas's, worſhip'd a numberleſs multitude of gods, or rather [b] Genii. " There was no nation, family, " city, ſtreet, or even houſe, but had its peculiar gods; and that becauſe they thought " none but the god to whom they ſhould immediately devote themſelves, was able to " aſſiſt 'em in time of need." They worſhip'd herbs, plants, flowers, trees, mountains, caves; and in the province of Puerto Viejo, emeralds, tygers, lions, adders; and not to tire the reader with an enumeration of the ſeveral objects they thought worthy of religious worſhip, every thing that appear'd wonderful in their eyes, was thought worthy of adoration.

Theſe antient idolaters of Peru offer'd not only the fruits of the earth and animals to theſe gods, but alſo their captives, like the reſt of the Americans. We are aſſur'd, that they uſed to ſacrifice their own children, whenever there was a ſcarcity of victims. Theſe ſacrifices were perform'd by cutting open the victims alive, and afterwards tearing out their hearts; they then ſmear'd the idol, to whom they were ſacrificing, with the blood yet reeking, as was the cuſtom in Mexico. The prieſt burnt the victim's heart, after having view'd it in order to ſee whether the ſacrifice would be agreeable to the idol. Some other idolaters offer'd their own blood to their deities, which they drew from their arms and thighs, according as the ſacrifice was more or leſs ſolemn; and they even uſed on extraordinary occaſions, to let themſelves blood at the tips of their noſtrils, or between the eye-brows. [c] We are however to obſerve, that theſe kinds of bleedings were not always an act of religious worſhip, but were often employ'd purely to prevent diſeaſes.

[d] Such was the ſtate of idolatry all over Peru, when Mango-capac, the law-giver of that vaſt empire, taught thoſe Savages the worſhip of the ſun and the [e] ſupreme god, under the

the name of Pachacamac. Before we make any reflections on that new religion, we muſt firſt inform the reader, that Mango-capac and his wife were the children of the ſun; and that they both receiv'd a commiſſion of equal import from that planet to teach and humanize the Peruvians. They ſet out from Titicaca, and guiding themſelves with a golden rod which the ſun had given 'em, and which was to ſink in the earth, when they were come to the place where they were to ſettle by the command of that planet; they accordingly ſet out northward, having continual inſtances of the virtue of this golden rod, which at laſt ſunk down in the valley of Cuſco; and 'twas here they took a reſolution of fixing the ſeat of their empire. Immediately this offspring of the ſun employ'd ſpiritual weapons; the brother and ſiſter began to preach their father's religion, and made a great number of proſelytes, who poſſibly might have been as much won over by the novelties of the equipage and the advantages of the new religion, as by the force of inward conviction. The boldneſs of theſe miſſionaries, their ſurprizing vocation, the ideas of power and ſuperiority which they inſus'd into the minds of thoſe groſs and brutiſh people, raiſed them undoubtedly a conſiderable number of followers in a little time; among whom, the new law-giver was particularly careful of making choice of the ableſt and moſt skilful, for the better eſtabliſhing his authority, which he afterwards enlarg'd by conqueſt, and at laſt aboliſh'd the antient religion; commanding, ſays the Incas Garcilaſſo, all his ſubjects to worſhip the ſun. This Incas Mango-capac, not ſatisfy'd with making a reformation among his ſubjects in things relating to the deity; he likewiſe gave them excellent political laws, and founded ſuch wonderful inſtitutions, as might juſtly be compar'd to the moſt boaſted among the Europeans.

The laſt words of that monarch [a] merit our utmoſt attention: theſe would almoſt perſuade us, that they were guided by a more exalted principle than that of nature, were we not certain that ſeveral antient legiſlators exhibit as ſhining examples of the force of natural truths. The virtuous Mango-capac was ſoon after deified: his ſubjects raiſed altars in his honour, and to his ſucceſſors after him; not but they were perſuaded that thoſe Incas's were mortal men, but they paid him theſe honours out of gratitude for the favours they had received from the poſterity of the ſun, whom, we are told, they worſhip'd only. In order to make this ſyſtem of religion appear leſs abſurd and ridiculous, we muſt ſuppoſe that they conſider'd their Incas's in the ſame light as the antient Greeks did their heroes, and the Romans, Romulus, and ſome of their emperors: they might imagine that the children of the ſun became the tutelar divinities of the kingdom, and that in recompenſe for the virtues they had practiſed in this mortal life, they enjoy'd the privilege of being the depoſitaries, as it were, of the prayers, as alſo of preſenting them to that planet. However, the Peruvians denied pretty ſtrongly the conſequences which might have been drawn from their practice.

" [b] Garcilaſſo relates, that the above-mention'd people, in proceſs of time, built " temples to the ſun, and embelliſh'd them with ornaments of a prodigious value; but " they

[a] He above all recommended to the Peruvians, the worſhiping of the ſun as their god and father. " It " muſt neceſſarily have happen'd, ſays the Incas Garcilaſſo, that Mango-capac having a perfect knowledge " of the ſtupidity of this people, and the great need they had of being inſtructed in the duties of morality, " judg'd it would be proper for him to feign that he and his wife were the offspring of the ſun, and " that their father had ſent them from heaven. The better to poſſeſs the Peruvians with this opinion, " he appear'd among 'em in a ſplendid manner, and diſtinguiſh'd himſelf particularly by the largeneſs of " his ears, which were of ſo incredible a ſize, that I could never have believ'd that circumſtance, had I " not ſeen it in his deſcendants." In this manner, the antient law-givers have made an advantage of the favourable opinion their people had of 'em; and ſome of 'em have even had artifice enough, to make a merit of certain pretty remarkable defects both of body and mind. The long and repeated retirements of Numa Pompilius, during which he was probably ſeiz'd with violent fits of melancholy, and the extaſies of Mahomet, are well known. " And as Mango-capac, continues Garcilaſſo, corroborated " the fiction of his genealogy by the great advantages he procured his ſubjects, they really believ'd him " to be the offspring of the ſun, and that he was come from heaven to aſſiſt them, &c."

[b] We have quoted this whole paſſage from Garcilaſſo, becauſe he is more exact than the other authors who have written on the ſubject.

" they did not pay the ſame honours to the moon. For tho' they look'd upon her as both " wife and ſiſter of the ſun, and even as mother of the Incas's, we yet don't meet with " one ſingle inſtance of their paying any worſhip to that goddeſs, or their having ſa- " crificed on her altars, or erected temples to her glory; tho' at the ſame time they had " her in the utmoſt veneration, ſo far as even to call her the univerſal mother of all " things : but their idolatry went no farther. They call'd thunder and lightning, the " executors of the ſun's juſtice; and in that quality they were honour'd ſo far as to " have an apartment allotted to 'em in the houſe of the ſun at Cuſco. But this is no " conſequence of their having been rank'd among the number of the gods, as a Spaniſh " hiſtorian would perſuade us they were: ſo far from it, that if a houſe, or any other " place happen'd to be ſtruck with thunder, it was ſo much deteſted by them, that " they immediately ſtopp'd up the door with dirt and ſtones, in order to prevent any " one's ever entring into it; and if any thunder happen'd to fall in the country, they " always pointed out the place with ſtakes, or ſuch like marks, in order to prevent any " one's walking over it. In a word, they gave the epithets of unhappy and curſed to " thoſe places, and added, that the ſun ſent down thoſe curſes upon them by the me- " diation of thunder, whom they conſider'd as his lacquey, and the miniſter of his " juſtice."

Notwithſtanding they adher'd ſo zealouſly to the worſhip of the ſun, yet the moſt knowing among the Indians acknowledge a Soul of the world, or rather firſt Mover of matter, call'd by them Pachacamac, which Garcilaſſo tells us ſignifies expreſſly He who animates the world. He adds, " That their veneration for this word was ſo great, " that they did not dare to utter it; but in caſe they were forced to do it at any time, " they always pronounc'd it with the greateſt tokens of ſubmiſſion and reſpect, ſhrugging " up their ſhoulders, ſtooping their heads and bodies, lifting up their eyes towards " heaven, and on a ſudden caſting them on the ground; laying their hands extended on " the right ſhoulder, and kiſſing the air." They paid a conſiderable part of this worſhip to the ſun, and even to the Incas's; nevertheleſs Garcilaſſo relates, that they had in reality a much greater veneration for Pachacamac than for the ſun. They acknowledg'd, " that he alone animated the univerſe, and continued its exiſtence; but then, as they had " never ſeen him, they conſider'd him as the unknown God," or rather an inviſible and immaterial Being. From an anſwer which the Incas Atahualipa made [a], one would be apt to think, that the word Pachacamac was one of the ſun's attributes.

The Peruvians took the character of Cupai to be directly oppoſite to that of Pachacamac, and whenever they were oblig'd to name him, they uſed to ſpit upon the ground, in token of their mortal averſion for that wicked Being. They only paid a bare reſpect to the moon, in quality of the ſun's wife and ſiſter; and they honour'd the ſtars, " whom " they ſaid were the women, or maids of honour to the houſe of theſe planets."

Here follows the account that Garcilaſſo gives of the Huacas or Guacas, which ſeems more juſt and rational, than what Purchas has cited in his collections, upon the authority of ſeveral Spaniſh authors. Garcilaſſo informs us, that the word Huaca ſignifies idol and ſacred things; ſuch were the repreſentations of the ſun; the offerings they made him, ſuch as the figures of men, birds, quadrupeds, in gold, ſilver, and wood; not excepting rocks, trees, ſtones, caverns, temples, and tombs, which God ſanctified either by his preſence or his oracles. They alſo gave the name of Huacas to the Genii; to the heroes rank'd among the immortals; to all ſuch things as were moſt beautiful and excellent in their kind, and even to miſhapen and monſtrous things. The Spaniards, continues Garcilaſſo, who were ignorant of theſe various ſignifications, imagin'd

[a] Vincent de Valverde deſiring to make a convert of this King, told him of Jeſus Chriſt creator of the world. The Incas anſwer'd, he did not believe that any Being, except the ſun, could have created any thing in nature; that he held him for God, and that Pachacamac had form'd this world out of nothing.

imagin'd that the Indians took all thoſe things to which they gave the name of Huacas, for deities, and likewiſe fancied that the Peruvians worſhip'd hills and hillocks under the name of Apachitas, for want of knowing, " that the corrupted word Apachetta, " which often ſignifies he who cauſes to ſupport or ſurmount ſome difficulty, expreſs'd, " in the Laconic way of ſpeaking uſed by the Indians, the following kind of bleſſing, " let us return thanks to him, who has enabled us to ſupport the fatigue we have un- " dergone in walking up this hill. Theſe prayers of thanks were offer'd up to Pa- " chacamac, whom they then worſhip'd mentally, for having aſſiſted 'em in this fatigue. " When they were got to the top of the hill, they laid down their burdens, in caſe they " carried any; and after having lifted up their eyes to heaven, they caſt them down on " the ground, and gave the ſame tokens of adoration as they uſed with regard to Pacha- " camac. Moreover they repeated the dative Apachetta two or three times over, and " afterwards uſed, by way of offering, to pull up the hair from their eye-brows, and " whether they tore 'em up or not, they always blew them in the air, as if they in- " tended to waſt 'em to heaven. They had alſo a cuſtom of putting an herb call'd " Cuca in their mouths, which they threw into the air, in token that they offer'd all " their moſt precious things to Pachacamac. They were even ſo fooliſhly ſuperſtitious " as to offer him ſplinters of wood, or even ſtraws, in caſe they could not meet with any " thing better; or ſome flint-ſtone, and for want of theſe, a handful of earth. Large " pieces of theſe offerings were ſeen upon the tops of the hills. They never look'd up " to the ſun when they perform'd theſe ceremonies, becauſe they did not then worſhip " that planet, but Pachacamac."

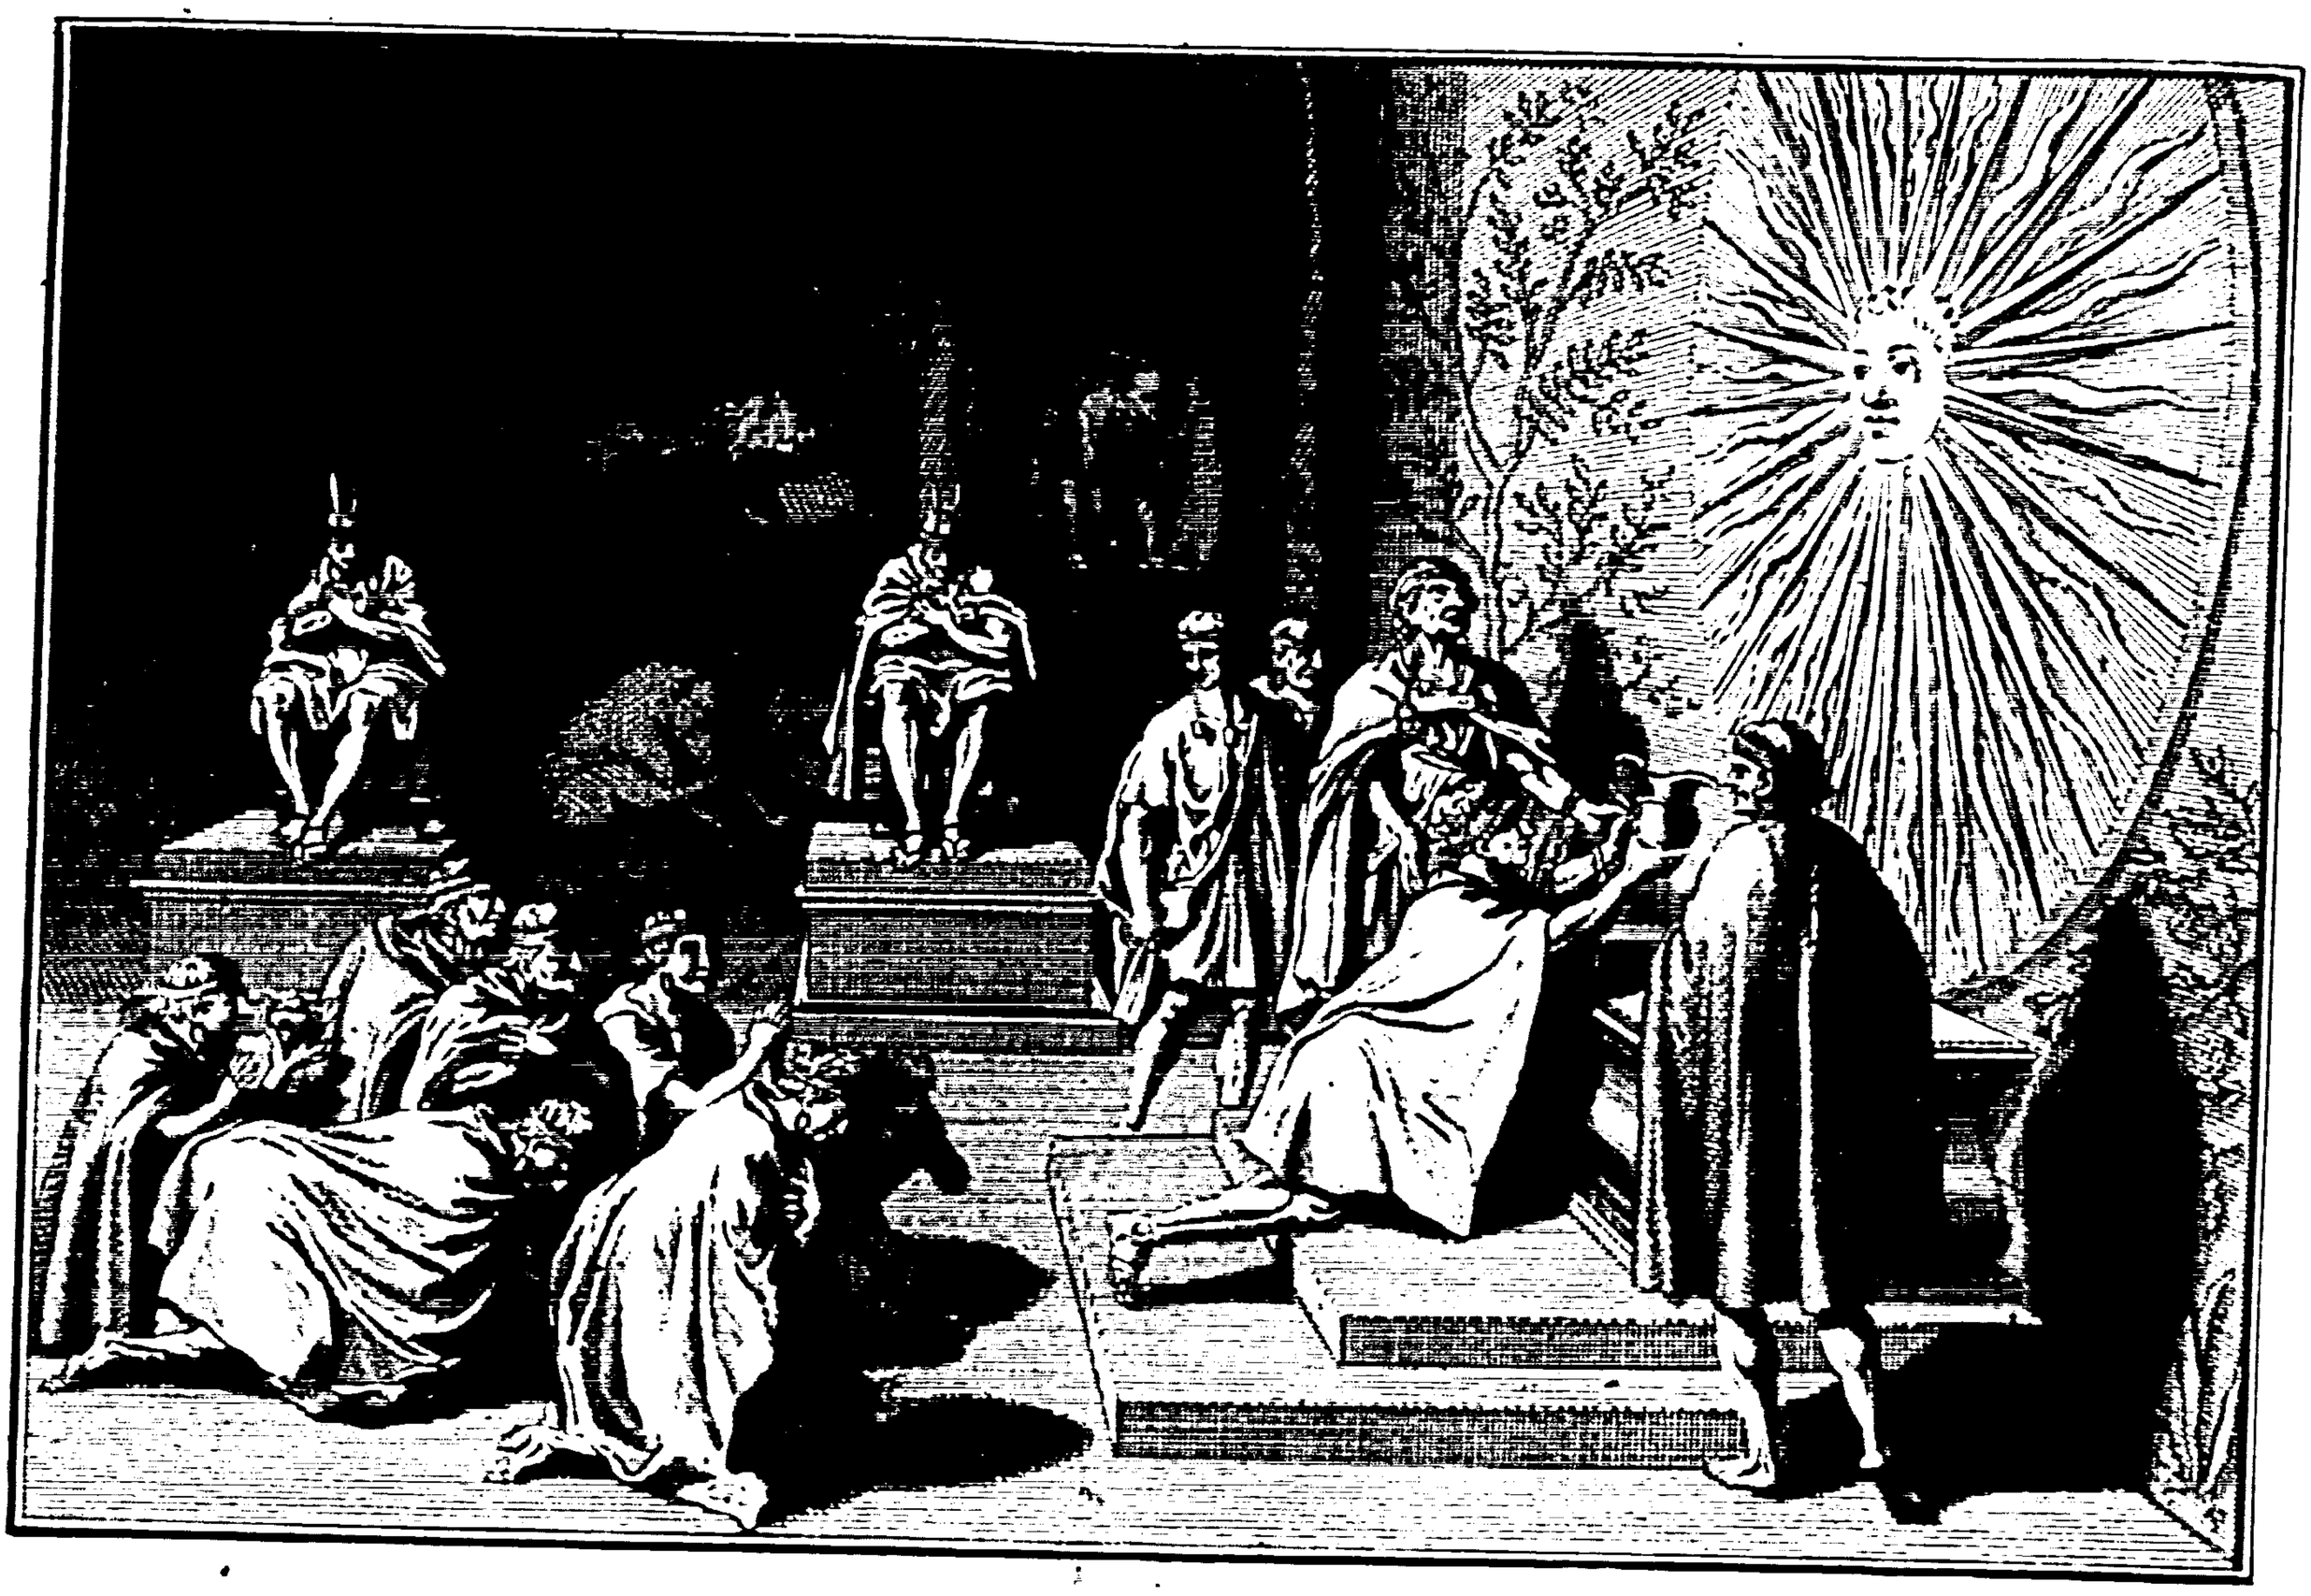
The Incas's and the Peruvians their ſubjects, uſed to ſacrifice ſeveral ſorts of animals in honour of the ſun; they alſo offer'd him Cocoa, corn, rich clothes, and a liquor made of water and maiz. They always preſented the laſt offering to the ſun in the following manner: " When they were very dry, they firſt fell to eating, and afterwards dipt the " tip of their finger in the veſſel into which the liquor was pour'd: this being done, " they lifted up their eyes to heaven in a very ſubmiſſive manner; ſhak'd that finger on " which the drop hung, and offer'd it to the ſun as an acknowledgment for his goodneſs " in providing drink for 'em. At the ſame time they gave two or three kiſſes to the " air. This oblation being made, they all drank as they thought proper.

" Every time they enter'd into their temples, the chief man in the company laid his " hand on one of his eye-brows, and whether he tore off any of the hairs from thence " or not, he blew it into the air before the idol, as a mark of its being an oblation." They paid the ſame adoration to trees, and to all ſuch things as a divine virtue had made ſacred and religious.

The Peruvians paid a kind of worſhip to the city of Cuſco, becauſe of its being founded by Mango-capac. We ſhall obſerve, that heathen Rome had antiently the ſame reverence paid to it by its inhabitants. At Cuſco was that wonderful temple of the ſun, the beauty and riches whereof ſurpaſs'd imagination. We ſhall tranſcribe the deſcription which the Incas Garcilaſſo has given us thereof. His words are as follows: " The high- " altar of this pompous edifice ſtood eaſtward, and the roof, which was made of timber, " and very thick, was thatch'd over, they having no tile or brick among 'em. The " four walls of the temple, to conſider 'em from the top downwards, were all cover'd " over with plates of gold. On the high-altar was made the figure of the ſun, which " was alſo repreſented on a gold plate, twice as thick as thoſe above-mention'd. This " figure, which was made of one continued piece, was repreſented with a round face, " ſurrounded with rays and flames, in the ſame manner as our painters uſually draw it. " It was of ſo prodigious a breadth, that it almoſt cover'd one ſide of the wall, on which " nothing was repreſented but that idol; the reaſon of which was, becauſe this was the " only one thoſe Indians had, either in that or any other temple; nor did they worſhip " any other deity than the ſun, whatever ſome writers may affirm to the contrary.

" On

" On each ſide of the image of the ſun, the ſeveral bodies of their deceaſed monarchs " were ranged in order, according to the courſe of their reſpective reigns, and ſo em- " balm'd (the manner of which was a ſecret) that they ſeem'd to be alive. They were " ſeated on thrones of gold, raiſed on plates of the ſame metal, with their faces looking " towards the bottom of the temple; but Huana Capac, the beſt-belov'd of all the " ſun's children, had the peculiar advantage above the reſt, of being placed directly op- " poſite to the image of that planet; and that becauſe of his having merited adoration " during his life-time, and for having practiſed the moſt exalted virtues, and diſcover'd " qualities worthy the greateſt monarch, from his very infancy. But upon the coming " of the Spaniards, the Indians hid thoſe bodies with the reſt of the treaſure, notwith- " ſtanding that the ſtricteſt ſearch has been made after them, they are not yet found.



" This temple had ſeveral gates which were all cover'd over with plates of gold, the " chief of which look'd towards the north, as it ſtill does to this day. Moreover, " round the walls of this temple was a plate of gold in the ſhape of a crown or garland, " and was above an ell broad. On one ſide of the temple was a cloiſter built in a qua- " drangular form, and in its higheſt encloſure, a garland of pure gold, an ell broad, like " the above-mention'd. Round this cloiſter were five great ſquare pavilions or houſes, " cover'd over in the ſhape of a pyramid. The firſt was built for the habitation of the " moon, the ſun's wife, and ſtood the neareſt to the great chapel of the temple; the doors " and incloſures of it were cover'd with ſilver plates, its white colour denoting that it " was the apartment allotted to the moon, whoſe figure was painted like that of the " ſun, but with this difference, that it ſtood upon a ſilver plate, and was repreſented " with a woman's face. 'Twas here theſe idolaters came and offer'd up their prayers " to the moon, whom they imagin'd to be ſiſter and wife to the ſun; the mother of their " Incas's and of their whole poſterity; in quality of this laſt, they gave her the name of " Mama Quilca, or Mother-moon, but without offering any ſacrifices to her as to the " ſun. On both ſides of this figure were the bodies of their deceaſed queens, rang'd in " order according to their antiquity. Mama Oello, mother to Huayna Capac, had her " face turn'd towards the moon, and from a peculiar advantage, was placed above the reſt, " becauſe of her being the mother of ſo worthy a ſon.

" Next to the manſion of the moon, was that of Venus, the Pleiades, and thoſe of " all the other ſtars. They gave the name of Chaſca to the planet Venus, by which " her long and curl'd hair was ſignified; Venus was moreover greatly honour'd, becauſe " they fancied her to be the ſun's page, ſaying, that ſhe ſometimes went before, and at " other times behind him. They alſo paid great reverence to the Pleiades, becauſe " of their wonderful diſpoſition, and their appearing to be all equal in magnitude. " The others in general were call'd the moon's waiting-maids, and for this reaſon they " have an apartment aſſign'd 'em near their lady, in order to be near at hand whenever " ſhe wants 'em; becauſe they imagin'd that the ſtars were fix'd in the sky for the ſervice " of the moon, and not that of the ſun, ſince they are viſible in the night only.

" This apartment, and its great gate, were cover'd over with plates of ſilver like that " of the moon. Its roof ſeem'd to repreſent the sky, being adorn'd with ſtars of " different magnitudes. The third apartment next this laſt, was ſacred to thunder " and lightning.

" The two laſt were not conſider'd as gods, but as the ſun's lacqueys, and they had " the ſame idea of them as the antient heathens had of thunder, which they look'd upon " as an inſtrument of Jupiter's juſtice. For this reaſon their Incas's aſſign'd an apart- " ment ceil'd with gold to thunder and lightning, which they fancied were the ſun's " domeſtics, and conſequently reſide in his houſe. They did not repreſent either of " theſe by images in relievo, or on a flat ſurface, and that becauſe they could not copy " them from the life, they chiefly ſtudying nature in all their images; but they honour'd " 'em under the name of Yllapa. The Spaniſh writers have not yet found out the ſigni-

L'YNCAS consacre son VAZE au SOLEIL

B. Picart. Lel.

L'YNCAS vient recevoir les OFRANDES que ses SUJETS font au SOLEIL

Maniere d'allumer le FEU SACRÉ chez les PERUVIENS, la veille de la grande FÊTE du SOLEÏL nommée le grand RAMY.

Le premier jour de la grande FÊTE du SOLEÏL, L'YNCAS lui présente un vase plein de liqueur, et l'invite a boire.

" fication of this word. Some of theſe have endeavour'd to draw a parallel between " their idolatry and our holy religion in this reſpect; but they have been prodigiouſly " miſtaken in it, as well as in ſeveral other particulars, wherein they have ſought, tho' " with leſs foundation, for ſymbols or ſigns of the bleſſed Trinity, by giving ſuch an " explication as they thought proper to the names of the country, and aſcribing a belief " to the Indians which they never had, as has been already ſhewn in another place.

" The fourth apartment was ſacred to the rainbow, becauſe they found that it ow'd " its birth to the ſun. This apartment was all enrich'd with gold, and the rainbow " was repreſented after the life, on plates of this metal, with all its variety of colours, " on one of the faces of the building; and this phenomenon was drawn ſo prodigious " large, that it reach'd from one wall to the other. They call'd it Cuychu, and had it " in very great veneration. Whenever it appear'd in the air, they immediately ſhut " their mouths, and put their hands upon it; imagining that were they to open it never " ſo little, their teeth would infallibly rot.

" The fifth and laſt apartment was that of the high-prieſt, and of the other prieſts, " who adminiſtred in the temple, and who were all obliged to be of the royal blood of " the Incas's. This apartment, enrich'd like the reſt with gold from top to bottom, " was not uſed either for eating or ſleeping, but as an apartment for giving audience, " and to conſult about ſuch ſacrifices and other things as related to the ſervice of the " temple."

We muſt not omit a very remarkable circumſtance, which is, that in the temple of Cuſco there were the ſeveral gods of thoſe nations whom the Incas's had conquer'd. Theſe were there ſerv'd and ador'd in preſence of the ſun, but their worſhip was conditional. They were firſt oblig'd to worſhip that planet in quality of the great god, upon which conſideration they were permitted to ſerve the other deities. Such was the ſtate-policy of the Incas's, who did not make a dreadful havock of men's conſciences by terrifying 'em with ſword and halters. On the contrary, they were of opinion, that ſome regard ought to be paid to the religion of a vanquiſh'd people; and juſtly perceiv'd that it would inſenſibly die away at the ſight of a worſhip, which as it was leſs abſurd, was at the ſame time ſupported by the royal authority: nor were they miſtaken in their conjectures, for the worſhip of the ſun was more and more receiv'd, and would have rooted out that of their ſtrange gods, had not the empire of the Incas's been deſtroy'd by the Spaniards. But we ſhall wave theſe reflections, and leave the reader to draw ſuch conſequences as he ſhall judge proper from what has been already mention'd.

We ſhall not take any notice of the pompous temple at Titicaca, but refer the reader to the hiſtory of the Incas's. [a] We alſo meet in this hiſtory with a very particular detail of the riches contain'd in this temple, [b] part of which is repreſented in the figure, where we ſee an Incas offering a golden veſſel to the ſun: this was one of the moſt ſolemn ceremonies of the great feaſt of that plane, which was kept in June, and is a proof of what we before advanc'd, viz. that Pachacamac was one of the attributes of the ſun, that reſplendent fire, which was antiently worſhip'd by the Perſians and Chaldeans. The Peruvians aſſerted, that in this ſolemn feaſt, they particularly worſhip'd the father of light, " as being the ſole, ſupreme, and univerſal God, whoſe light and virtue gave " birth and nouriſhment to all worldly Beings. They alſo ſolemniz'd it as a publick " acknowledgment that the ſun was the father of the firſt Incas," and of all his poſterity.

The feſtival open'd with ſacrifices: " they ſaid, it was not lawful to uſe any fire in " thoſe ſacrifices, but that which was preſented them by the ſun's own hand; for " this purpoſe they made uſe of a great bracelet, call'd Chipana, like thoſe which the " Incas's wore on their left wriſt; with this difference, that that which was worn by " their

" their chief prieſt was larger than the reſt. They had inſtead of a medal, a concave-
" veſſel, about the bigneſs of half an orange, very ſmooth and gliſtering. This " they placed directly oppoſite to the ſun, and in a certain point where the rays which
" ſhot from the veſſel were all collected ; and apply'd to it, inſtead of a match, a little " cotton lint, which immediately took fire from a natural effect. With this fire thus " lighted, and given by the hand of the ſun, they uſed to burn their victims, and roaſt all
" the fleſh which they eat that day. After that, they took ſome of the ſame fire, carried " it to the temple of the ſun, and the houſe of the virgins elect, and there it was pre-
" ſerv'd all the year; and its going out was look'd upon as a very unlucky omen. In caſe
" the ſun happen'd not to ſhine out the eve before the feſtival, on which day every thing
" was prepar'd for the ſacrifice that was to be made on the morrow ; and conſequently if " there were no poſſibility of getting fire that way, they then took two little ſticks
" about as thick as one's thumb, and half an ell in length, made of a wood call'd Vyaca,
" very like cinnamon, and theſe by being rubb'd together very hard, had ſeveral ſparks
" of fire drawn out of them which ſet fire to the match. Notwithſtanding that this " was a very good way of ſtriking fire, they nevertheleſs, when neceſſity forced 'em to
" uſe it in the ſacrifices which were made on their feſtivals, diſcover'd a deep affliction,
" and look'd upon it as a very ill-omen, ſaying, that the ſun muſt neceſſarily be very " angry with 'em, ſince he refuſed to give 'em fire with his hand."

The chief captains of the empire, and the Curacas or Caciques always aſſiſted at this feſtival: theſe, when they were prevented from adminiſtring at it in perſon, either by very urgent affairs, or extreme old age, uſed always to ſend their ſons or brothers, accompanied with the nobleſt of their relations, as their proxies. The Incas, in quality of ſon to the glorious planet of the day, always open'd the feſtival; nor could he be diſpens'd from ſo doing, unleſs war call'd him another way, or his being obliged to make a progreſs thro' his empire. All the nobility of the empire went in proceſſion to preſent their oblations to the ſun. The Curacas appear'd in a moſt ſplendid, but very whimſical dreſs. " Some of theſe had robes adorn'd with gold and ſilver plates, and " garlands of the ſame on their caps, and others were dreſs'd in lions skins.

" After theſe there advanced others, whom, with regard to their dreſs, we ſhall take " the liberty of comparing to angels, they wearing the wings of a bird to which they " give the name of Cuntur. Theſe wings are ſpeckled black and white, and fifteen " foot long from end to end. Thoſe who adorn'd themſelves with the feathers of theſe " birds, did it purely to ſhew they were deſcended from 'em.

" The Yuncas uſed to diſguiſe themſelves with certain frightful masks, by which means " they made the moſt hideous figure that fancy could poſſibly paint. To ſee the apiſh " tricks and diſtortions they made in thoſe aſſemblies, one would have taken 'em for
" mad-men; and to make themſelves appear more compleatly ſo, they uſed to make " a confuſed noiſe of diſſonant inſtruments, ſuch as flutes and drums, holding torn skins
" in their hands, and with theſe they uſed to play a thouſand ſilly tricks.

" After theſe Curacas there advanced others dreſs'd in a different manner, and each " nation carried the weapons uſed by them in war, ſuch as bows, arrows, lances, javelins,
" long and ſhort hatchets, to fight either with one or both hands.

" There were others alſo who wore ornaments, on which were repreſented the glo" rious actions they had perform'd in honour of the ſun, and of their Incas's; and " others again were attended by a great train of ſervants, who play'd on [a] atabales, and " blew on the trumpet. In a word, every nation appear'd there in as much pomp and " ſplendor, and with as great a train of domeſtics as they could poſſibly procure, they
" all endeavouring to rival their neighbours in grandeur and magnificence.

" They

" They always prepar'd themſelves for the ſolemnity of this feſtival by a moſt ſtrict " faſt, eating nothing every third day but a little white raw maiz, with certain herbs " call'd Chucam; nor ever drank any other liquor but water. During this time they " abſtain'd from all commerce with their wives, nor were fires made in any part of " the city.

" After this faſt, on the eve of the feaſt of the ſun, the Incas prieſts, whoſe office " it was to perform that ſacrifice, ſpent the night in getting ready the ſheep and lambs " which were to be ſacrificed; they alſo prepar'd the victuals and drink that were to " be preſented as an oblation to the ſun: theſe ſeveral affairs were ſettled, after they " had firſt taken a pretty exact account of the number of the people who were aſſembled " at the feſtival; for not only the Curacas, the embaſſadors, their relations, their " domeſtics and ſubjects partook of theſe oblations, but likewiſe all the nations in ge- " neral who were preſent at the ſolemnity. On the ſame night, the women of the " ſun were employ'd in kneading a kind of dough call'd Cancu; and this they made " into little round loaves, about the bigneſs of an apple. We are to obſerve that theſe " Indians never made their corn into bread except at this ſolemn feaſt, and another " call'd Citua, and then they never eat more than two or three pieces of it; for their " common bread was call'd Gara, which was a kind of pulſe; and the corn of which " it was made was either baked or parch'd. None but ſuch choſen virgins as had de- " voted themſelves to the ſun, in order to be his wives, were permitted to knead the " dough of which that bread was made, particularly that which was eaten by the " Incas and thoſe of the royal blood; or to prepare the other viands which were " eaten on that feaſt; becauſe on that day, the ſun's children did not treat their father, " but rather the ſun gave a banquet to his children. The common people were waited " upon by a numberleſs multitude of other women, who prepar'd their victuals, and " took a vaſt deal of care in working up the bread which was made for their uſe, " and was always of the fineſt flower. They were not allow'd to eat any of it except " on this ſolemn day, which was the greateſt of all their feſtivals, for they thought " this bread to be of a very ſacred nature."

On the moſt ſolemn day of the feaſt, the Incas appear'd in publick accompanied with his relations, when he went with all his train to the great ſquare in Cuſco, and there waited bare-footed till ſuch time as the ſun ſhould riſe, during which he look'd attentively towards the eaſt. The moment he ſaw it appear upon the horizon he fell proſtrate on his knees, and opening his arms directly oppoſite to his face, kiſs'd the air: the Curacas and other nobles of the empire ſtood at ſome diſtance, and worſhip'd the ſun in imitation of the Incas, and the princes of the blood. Then the Incas roſe up, the reſt continuing ſtill upon their knees, and took two great golden vaſes fill'd with drink, and at the ſame time, he, in quality of chief of the houſe of the ſun, lifted up one of thoſe vaſes, and ſhewing it to the ſun, invited him to drink. The Peruvians were perſuaded that this planet pledg'd the Incas and all the princes of the blood.

" [a] After the Incas had invited the ſun to drink in this manner, he poured all the " liquor that was in the veſſel dedicated to the ſun, which he held in his right hand, " into a golden tub with ears, whence the drink diffus'd itſelf as from a ſpring in a " pipe that was curiouſly wrought, and which reach'd from the great ſquare to the houſe " of the ſun. When that was done, he drank a little of it, as his portion, out of the " veſſel which he held in his left hand, and at the ſame time the reſt was divided among " the Incas, by a little gold or ſilver veſſel which each of 'em had brought with him. " In this manner they inſenſibly emptied the Incas's veſſel, the liquor whereof, " according to them, was ſanctified by his hand, or that of the ſun, whoſe virtue is " communicated to 'em. All thoſe of the royal blood took a draught of this liquor, but

[a] Hiſtory of the Incas's, Book 6. Chap. 21.

" but they gave the Curacas the drink which the ſun's wives had made, and not that " which they believe to be ſanctified.

" [a] This ceremony ended, which was no more than a prelude to a quaffing bout, they " march'd in order to the houſe of the ſun, when all, the King excepted, pull'd off their " ſhoes and ſtockings at two hundred paces diſtance from the gates of the temple. Then " the Incas and his relations enter'd it, as being the ſun's legitimate offspring, and pro- " ſtrated themſelves before his image. In the mean time the Curacas, who thought " themſelves unworthy of entring his temple, becauſe they were not related to him, " ſtood without in a great court which was before the gate; and the moment the Incas " had, with his own hand, offer'd the golden veſſel, with which he had perform'd the " ceremony, the reſt gave theirs to thoſe Incas prieſts, who had been nominated and dedi- " cated to the ſervice of the ſun; for they only were allow'd to execute that office, and " not even thoſe who were related to the ſun, unleſs they were of the prieſthood. " When the ſacrificers had offer'd the veſſels of the Incas's, they all went to the door, " to receive thoſe of the Curacas, who all walk'd according to their reſpective ranks, and " in the order of time they had been reduced under the empire of the Incas's. Be- " ſides their veſſels they alſo preſented to the ſun ſeveral gold and ſilver pieces, repre- " ſenting in miniature, but very naturally, various kinds of animals, as ſheep, lambs, " lizards, toads, adders, foxes, tygers, lions, birds of all kinds, and every thing that " grew in their reſpective provinces.

" The offering being ended, each of 'em return'd in order to his place, and at the " ſame time the Incas prieſts were ſeen advancing forward with a great number of " lambs, barren ewes, of all colours, for they are naturally ſpeckled in this manner like " the Spaniſh horſes. Out of all theſe beaſts, which belong'd to the ſun, they took a " black lamb; the Indians making choice of that colour preferably to any other, par- " ticularly in their ſacrifices; becauſe, according to them, it had ſomething divine in it. " To this they added, that a black beaſt was generally ſo all over the body, whereas a " white one has generally a black ſpot upon its ſnout, which they look'd upon as a blemiſh. " For this reaſon their Kings were generally dreſs'd in black, and their mourning habits " were of a mouſe-colour.

" The firſt ſacrifice which they made of a black lamb, was in order to obtain happy " or unhappy preſages of the ſolemnity of their feaſt; for this people in every important " action, whether in peace or war, always ſacrificed a lamb, when they took out its " heart and lights, in order thereby to judge whether or no their oblation would be " agreeable to the ſun; if the war in which they were going to be engag'd, would be " happy or unſucceſsful; and whether the earth would yield an abundance of fruits " that year. But we are to obſerve, that they always ſacrificed different animals accor- " ding to the nature of the preſages which they were deſirous of obtaining by that means, " as lambs, ſheep, barren ewes; for they never kill'd any but what were ſo, nor eat their " fleſh till ſuch time as they were paſt bringing forth young. In theſe ſacrifices they " took the lamb or ſheep which they had mark'd out for ſlaughter, with his head " turn'd eaſtward, without tying his feet together; but three or four men held him with " all their ſtrength, to prevent his ſtirring. They then ripp'd up its left ſide, the beaſt " being ſtill alive, and thruſting in their hands took from thence the heart, the lights, " and all the reſt of the harſlet, which they were obliged to pull out entire, without " tearing the leaſt part of it."

They were as ſuperſtitious at leaſt as the Greeks and Romans in inſpecting the intrails of their victims. This is manifeſt from that paſſage of the hiſtory of the Incas's above cited. " When the lights, after being juſt taken out, were found ſtill panting, it " was

" was look'd upon to be ſo happy an omen, that all other preſages were conſider'd as " indifferent or of no conſequence; becauſe, ſaid they, this alone ſuffic'd to make them " propitious, how unhappy ſoever they might be. After they had taken out the harſlet, " they blew up the weaſand with their breath, then tied it up at the end, or ſqueez'd " it cloſe with their hands, obſerving at the ſame time how the paſſages thro' which the " air enters into the lungs, and the ſmall veins which are generally found there, were " ſwell'd; becauſe the more they were inflated, the more the omen was propitious. " They alſo obſerv'd ſeveral other particulars, which it would be a difficult matter for " me to relate, as I did not take a particular notice of 'em. I only mention theſe, be- " cauſe I ſaw 'em twice: I remember that I was carried when a child, into a lower court, " where ſome old men perform'd that kind of ſacrifice at one of their chriſtnings, and " not on the day of their Raymi, (the name of the feſtival of the ſun) which was " almoſt forgot at the time of my birth, but at another ſeaſon in which they uſed, for " particular reaſons, to ſacrifice lambs and ſheep in order to obtain preſages.

" They look'd upon it as an ill omen, if while they were ripping up the beaſt's ſide, " it roſe up and eſcap'd out of the hands of thoſe who held it down. They alſo look'd " upon it as ill-boding if the weaſand, which generally joins to the harſlet, happen'd " to break, and had thereby prevented their taking it out entire; or if the lights were " torn, or the heart putrified, and ſo on; particulars which I did not enquire into. I " remember the above-mention'd, becauſe I heard the Indians talk of them; and theſe " enquir'd of one another during their ſacrifices, whether the omens were propitious or " unhappy, not ſuſpecting that ſo young a child would take notice of them.

" The ſacrifices concluded with a feaſt, when they eat the fleſh of the ſacrificed " victims; this they diſtributed among all the perſons who were preſent at this ſo- " lemnity, viz. to the Incas's, and afterwards to the Curacas, and their train, according " to their reſpective ranks. After they had been thus ſerv'd up with meat; bread, which " Garcilaſſo calls Cancu, was given them. They then ſerv'd in other kinds of victuals, " all which they uſed to eat without drinking; the Peruvians not being allow'd to drink " at meals. They never drank till theſe were over, but then they would drink as co- " piouſly as any of the European nations."

They had alſo other feſtivals. That to which Garcilaſſo gives the name of [a] Citu was very remarkable, and might be look'd upon as a general luſtration or purging by ſacrifice. The deſign of this luſtration was to cleanſe the ſoul from thoſe pollutions which it contracts from the human body, and to preſerve the latter from the diſeaſes to which it is expoſed. This people always prepar'd themſelves for it by faſting; were oblig'd to abſtain from all commerce with women, and faſt for twenty-four hours. The Peruvians, the night after this faſt, uſed to knead pieces or balls of Cancu, in a very devout manner; laid 'em in earthen kettles, and parboil'd them till ſuch time as the Cancu was collected into one great lump. Of this they made two ſorts; one was mix'd with blood which they drew from between the eye-brows and noſtrils of young children. All thoſe who had faſted, waſh'd their bodies before day-break, and afterwards rubb'd their heads, their faces, their ſtomachs, ſhoulders, arms and thighs with the above-mention'd dough, in order, ſaid they, by this purification, to drive away diſeaſes and all kinds of infirmities. This purification being ended, the oldeſt perſon of the higheſt quality in each family, took ſome of the above-mention'd dough; rubb'd the door of his houſe with it; and left it ſticking, to ſhew that his houſe was purified. The high-prieſt perform'd the ſame ceremony in the palace and in the temple of the ſun, whilſt his ſubalterns or deputies purified the chapels and other ſacred places. The moment the ſun began to appear, they fell to worſhipping it. An Incas of the royal family preſented himſelf in the great ſquare ſquare at Cuſco, magnificently clad, having a lance in his hand adorn'd with feathers of various colours, and enrich'd with a great number of gold rings; which lance was alſo uſed for a ſtandard in war-time. This Incas went and join'd himſelf to four others, who likewiſe were arm'd with lances, which he touch'd with his own, and this was a kind of conſecration; he then declar'd, that the ſun had made choice of 'em to drive away diſeaſes and infirmities; upon which theſe four miniſters of the ſun immediately ſet out to execute their order: they then viſited the ſeveral quarters or diſtricts, upon which occaſion every body came out of their houſes, ſhook their garments, and rubb'd their heads, faces, arms, and thighs. Such were the ceremonies which they thought puriſy'd them: the whole was accompanied with great acclamations of joy. The miniſters of the ſun took away thoſe evils which the people had juſt got rid of, and drove 'em at five or ſix leagues diſtance from the city.

The night following, the above-mention'd Incas's ran up and down with ſtraw-torches, after which they came out of the city: this nocturnal luſtration was of ſervice in driving out thoſe evils to which people are expoſed in the night-time, as that of the lances had been ſerviceable in repelling thoſe of the day. They threw into the river in which the people had waſh'd themſelves, thoſe half-burnt torches, and whenever any pieces of 'em were found by the water-ſide, they would run away from them as if they had been infected with the plague. Theſe feaſts concluded with rejoicings, intermix'd with prayers of thanks and ſacrifices to the ſun.

The Religion of ſome Nations ſubject to the Incas's.

IN this article we ſhall only give a tranſient account of thoſe nations whoſe idolatry the Incas's deſtroy'd in order to eſtabliſh their own. [a] Thoſe of the valley of Rimac, afterwards call'd Lima, worſhip'd the idol Rimac under the figure of a man, who anſwer'd ſuch queſtions as were made it, like the antient oracles of Greece. Rimac is as much as to ſay, He who ſpeaks. This idol was lodg'd in a very magnificent temple, which however was not ſo pompous as that of Pachacamac.

They alſo worſhip'd Pachacamac, but offer'd human victims in his honour; and ſo great was the veneration they bore him, that they did not dare to once caſt their eyes up to him. Their kings and prieſts always walk'd backwards whenever they enter'd his temple, and came out of it in the ſame manner, without ſo much as once liſting up their eyes towards the idol.

The Antis, a people who inhabit towards the mountains of Peru, worſhip'd tygers and adders, as alſo the herb Coca. They put all their captives to death without the leaſt mercy, but with this difference, that a priſoner of no diſtinction was immediately put to death, whereas a man who was thought worthy of that fatal honour, was ſacrific'd with great ſolemnity; for which purpoſe he was ſtript naked, then they tied him to a great ſtake, and afterwards ſlaſh'd his whole body with knives and razors made of a flint-ſtone ground very ſharp. They did not immediately tear him to pieces, but firſt cut the fleſh from off the moſt brawny parts, ſuch as the calf of the legs, the thighs, and buttocks, &c. after which, their men, women, and children ſmear'd themſelves with the blood of theſe unhappy wretches, and devour'd them before they were dead. The women uſed to rub the tip of their breaſts with their blood, and afterwards gave their children the blood of their enemies to ſuck, mix'd with the milk which nature had given them for the ſuſtenance of thoſe little creatures. Theſe inhuman wretches call'd this bloody execution a religious ceremony, and rank'd all ſuch as had ſuffer'd death with with courage, or rather with a ſavage bravery, in the number of their gods, and lodg'd 'em under hutts on the tops of their mountains; but ſuch as ſunk under the violence of the tortures were thrown among the carrion.

The Savages of the province of Manta worſhip'd the ſea, fiſhes, tygers, lions, and ſeveral other wild beaſts, as alſo an emerald of a prodigious ſize, which they uſed to expoſe to public view in their ſolemn feſtivals. They uſed to flay their priſoners of war, and after having ſtuff'd their skins with earth and aſhes, hung it up as a trophy on the gates of the temples of their idols. We ſhall wave a farther deſcription of theſe abſurdities, ſince they would only tire the reader.

The Notions the Peruvians have of their Origin, &c.

THEY relate, " That a man of an extraordinary ſhape, whoſe name was Choun, " and whoſe body had neither bones or muſcles, came from the north into " their country; that he levell'd mountains, fill'd up vallies, and open'd himſelf a " paſſage thro' the moſt inacceſſible places. This Choun created the firſt inhabitants " of Peru, giving them the herbs and wild fruits of the field for their ſuſtenance. They " alſo related, that this firſt founder of Peru having been injured by ſome Savages who " inhabited the plains, chang'd part of the ground, which before had been very fruitful, " into ſand; forbid the rain to fall, and dried up the plants: but that being afterwards " moved with compaſſion, he open'd the ſprings and ſuffer'd the rivers to flow. This " Choun was worſhip'd as a god, till ſuch time as Pachacamac came from the ſouth."

" Choun diſappear'd after the arrival of Pachacamac, who was much mightier, and " metamorphos'd all the men whom Choun had created, into wild beaſts."

The Peruvians had ſome knowledge of the flood, but as it would be a difficult matter to draw any thing accurate from the account they have given of it, we refer the reader to the Incas Garcilaſſo's hiſtory.

We ſhall not take any notice here of the great veneration they paid to the rainbow; their ſuperſtitious opinion concerning comets; the predictions which they drew from dreams, nor of the opinion they had that the ſun at his ſetting uſed to plunge himſelf in the ocean, where it loſt its light and heat, both which it recover'd after having paſs'd under the earth, which they placed on the ſurface of the waters; and that it afterwards roſe in the morning thro' the gates of the eaſt. The antient poets, who were very indifferent geographers, argued much after the ſame manner. Hence we may judge of the nature of the human mind, when uninform'd of certain things; and whether people of all countries are not diſpoſed to receive the ſame impreſſions of ſuperſtition.

We will conclude this article of their religion with the notion they had of eclipſes. Whenever the ſun was eclips'd, they imagin'd he was angry with them, and look'd on the diſorder, which, ſaid they, appear'd in his countenance, as a manifeſt proof of it. When the moon was eclips'd, they fancied it was ſick; and when total, that it would infallibly die; that then it would fall from the ſky; that all would be deſtroy'd, and the world be at an end. In order to prevent theſe misfortunes, they, the moment the eclipſe began, [b] made a prodigious noiſe with horns, trumpets, and drums. They tied dogs to trees, and whip'd 'em unmercifully in order to make 'em bark ſo very loud, that the moon, whom they thought was now fallen in a ſwoon thro' the violence of pain, and who lov'd thoſe creatures, becauſe of the ſignal ſervices they had formerly done her, was forced to awake at their cries.

[a] Coreal; Purchas.

[b] The antient Greeks and Romans uſed alſo to make a great buſtle in order to recover the moon, whom they imagin'd was fallen in a ſwoon. They beat on concave veſſels of copper, preſented torches to it, &c.

Their

Their Prieſts, Diſcipline, Nuns, &c.

NONE but the Incas's, who were of the royal family, were admitted to be prieſts of the ſun; but thoſe who were Incas's by a ſpecial grant, i. e. had been raiſed to that honour for their merit, were allow'd to officiate in the inferior ſervices of religious worſhip.

We have already mention'd the ſacrifices which the prieſts made to the ſun, to which we will now add, that they did not always ſacrifice in the ſame place, but frequently in the court of the temple of the ſun; but that the ſacrifices of the chief feaſt of the ſun were perform'd in the great ſquare at Cuſco: the prieſts were oblig'd to enter the temple of the ſun bare-footed and bare-legg'd.

" [a] They always choſe one of the king's uncles or brothers for the ſovereign pontiff, " in default of which they were oblig'd to elect a legitimate relation of his. The " prieſts had no habit peculiar to their order, but in all thoſe provinces where the ſun " had a great number of temples, none but the natives, and ſuch as were related to the " chief man of each province, were allow'd to exerciſe that religious employment; the " chief prieſt, who was ſomething like a biſhop among us, was obliged to be an Incas. " And in order that they might conform themſelves to their metropolitan in their ſacri- " fices and ceremonies, their Incas's were always elected as ſuperiors in times of peace " and war; but they did not remove the natives, to prevent their having any " room to ſay they were deſpis'd, or treated in an arbitrary manner. The chief " prieſt told the people the things he had conſulted the ſun about, and what the " latter had commanded him to declare to them, according to the doctrine of their " religion. In a word, he declar'd thoſe things to them which he had diſcover'd by " auguries, ſacrifices, and ſuch like ſuperſtitions as prevail'd among 'em. They give " their prieſts a name which ſignifies to gueſs or divine.

" There were ſeveral apartments in the houſe of the ſun, appropriated to the prieſts " and domeſtics, who were all, as we before obſerv'd, Incas's by ſpecial grant: for no " Indian, tho' of ever ſo great quality, was allow'd to enter into it, unleſs he were an " Incas; neither were the ladies ſuffer'd to go into it, nor even the king's wives or " daughters. The prieſts adminiſtred in the temple in their turns weekly, which " they conſulted by the quarters of the moon, during which they abſtain'd from all " commerce with their wives, and continued in the temple day and night." All the time that the prieſts and miniſters of the religion of the Incas's were performing their reſpective functions in the temples, in which they adminiſtred weekly, as was before obſerv'd, they were maintain'd out of the revenues of the ſun. This was the name they gave to the produce of certain lands which they gave to that planet as his demeſns or inheritance, which [b] generally included about a third part of the lands of each province.

Theſe people had alſo nuns among them, who devoted a perpetual virginity to the ſun. They were ſo very ſcrupulous upon this head, that they always made choice of girls under eight years of age, to prevent their being impoſed upon. They were particularly cautious with regard to theſe virgins of the religious houſe at Cuſco, they being deſign'd for the ſun's wives; for which reaſon none were admitted into that convent but the daughters of the Incas's of the blood-royal, which was not mix'd with that of ſtrangers. The moſt antient among theſe was choſen as [c] abbeſs; theſe had the direction of

of the younger; taught 'em all kind of works, inſtructed 'em in divine ſervice, and had an eye to their infirmities: their confinement was ſo cloſe, that they never had an opportunity of ſeeing either men or women; nor had they either turning-box or parlour in their convent. We are aſſur'd that theſe injunctions were obſerv'd with the utmoſt exactneſs, and that the law by which thoſe who broke the vow they had made to the ſun their husband was puniſh'd, was inexpreſſibly rigorous. Garcilaſſo ſays as follows on that head. [a] "If among ſo great a number of religious, any one of them ſhould "happen to violate her chaſtity, there was a law, by which it was enacted, that the "nun ſo offending, ſhould be buried alive, and her gallant hang'd. But becauſe the "putting to death of one man only, was thought vaſtly diſproportionate to ſo great "a crime as that of violating a maiden devoted to the ſun their god, and the father of "their kings; it was moreover enacted by the ſame law, that not only the perſon of"fending ſhould be puniſh'd, but alſo his wife, his children, his ſervants, his relations, "and all the inhabitants where he reſided, not excepting the babes who ſuck'd at "the breaſt. For this purpoſe, they razed the city and pav'd it with ſtone, by which "means every part of it remain'd deſart, curs'd, and excommunicated, as a teſtimony "of that city's having given birth to ſo deteſtable a wretch: they likewiſe endeavour'd "to hinder any one from treading upon that ground, and even beaſts, if poſſible. This "law, however, was never put in execution, becauſe no one ever happen'd to be guilty "of this crime in that country.

"They had convents like to thoſe of Cuſco in all the chief provinces of the em"pire: in theſe they admitted [b] maidens of all ranks or degrees, whether of the royal "blood and legitimate, or baſtards and of foreign extraction. They ſometimes admit"ted into 'em, which however was a very great favour, the daughters of ſuch lords as "had vaſſals under 'em, not excepting thoſe of the meaneſt citizens, provided they "were beautiful; for upon that condition they were educated, in order to their be"coming one day the daughters of the ſun, or the Incas's miſtreſſes; and were ſuper"intended with as much care as the women dedicated to that planet. Theſe, like "the reſt, had young women to wait upon 'em, and were maintain'd at the king's "expence, in quality of his wives. Moreover they, as well as the virgins of the ſun, "generally ſpent their time in ſpinning, and in making robes or gowns for the Incas's, "who always diſtributed part of 'em among his relations and the Curacas, as likewiſe "among the moſt renowned generals, and all ſuch as he was deſirous of diſtinguiſhing "by his favour; which was look'd upon as both juſt and ſeemly, ſince thoſe habits "were wrought by his own, and not by the ſun's wives, and were made for himſelf "and not for his father.

"The above-mention'd women had alſo their Mamacunas like thoſe of Cuſco, but with "this difference, that theſe were always legitimate children, of the royal family, and "were oblig'd to ſpend their lives in thoſe convents, to all which conditions the wives "of the ſun were oblig'd to ſubmit; whereas in the other convents of the empire, they "receiv'd maidens of all ranks and conditions, provided they were beautiful and vir"gins of unſully'd chaſtity; they being devoted to the Incas, to whom they were "deliver'd up at firſt asking; and theſe were allow'd to keep 'em as their miſtreſſes, "in caſe they happen'd to be agreeable in their eyes. Theſe convents were in reality "ſo many ſeraglios, like thoſe of the eaſt. Such as attempted to violate the honour "of the Incas's wives, were puniſh'd with as much ſeverity as thoſe who debauch'd "the virgins devoted to the ſun. The law had enacted in this manner, becauſe the "crime was equally enormous.

"Such young women as had been once pitch'd upon for the king's miſtreſſes, and "had had any commerce with him, were not allow'd to return home without his "leave, but attended in the palace in quality of ladies of the bed-chamber to the queen,

[a] Book IV. Chap. 3. [b] Ibidem.

" queen, till ſuch time as they were permitted to return back into their own countries,
" where they receiv'd the utmoſt civilities, and were waited upon with a religious reſpect, " becauſe the people of their country thought it a great honour to have one of the " Incas's wives. As for ſuch nuns as were not choſen by the king for his miſtreſſes,
" they remain'd in the convent, till they grew in years; and after the king's death,
" his miſtreſſes had the title of Mamacuna beſtow'd upon them by his ſucceſſor, be-
" cauſe they were appointed governants of his miſtreſſes, whom they us'd to inſtruct,
" as a mother-in-law would teach her ſtep-daughters." We ſhould not have related theſe ſeveral particulars, which ſeem fitter for an epiſode in romance, than to embelliſh the religion of a people, had not the Peruvians conſider'd every circumſtance which relates to their ſovereigns, as ſo many religious ceremonies.

There were ſeveral other ladies of the blood-royal, who led a retir'd life in their own houſes, and made a private vow of chaſtity without entring into any convent. " If
" at any time they went abroad, 'twas only to viſit their neareſt ſhe-relations, when " they were either indiſpos'd, in labour, about cutting off the hair of their eldeſt children, " or about giving them a name. Theſe women were ſo conſpicuous for their chaſtity
" and the ſtrictneſs of their lives, that they were honour'd with the peculiar title of " Oello's, a name which was ſacred in their idolatrous religion. Theſe ladies were oblig'd
" to be ſincerely chaſte, and not diſguiſe it with a falſe varniſh; for if ever the leaſt
" trick or artifice was diſcover'd in their conduct, they were either burnt alive or thrown " into the lions den. A widow never ſtirr'd out of her houſe during the firſt year of " her widowhood, and ſeldom married again if ſhe had no children, and if ſhe had " any, ſhe ſpent her life in perpetual continence, and never enter'd a ſecond time into
" the married ſtate. This virtue gain'd them ſo univerſal an eſteem, that ſeveral very " conſiderable privileges were made in their favour; and there were many laws and " ſtatutes, by whic hit was expreſſly enacted, that the widows lands ſhould be plough'd
" ſooner than thoſe of the Curacas's, or even of the Incas."

Before we conclude this article, it will be proper to take ſome notice of their confeſſions and the penance that follow'd after it. Perſuaded from reaſon and the convictions of conſcience, that the ſins of mankind do neceſſarily draw down evils and the avenging arm of heaven, they imagin'd themſelves bound to expiate their crimes by ſacrifices and penances. [a] There were confeſſors eſtabliſh'd in all parts of the empire, who always impos'd a chaſtiſement proportionable to the greatneſs of the ſin. There were alſo certain women who had a ſhare in this religious function. In the province of Collaſuio they employ'd charms for the diſcovery of ſins, and ſometimes diſcover'd 'em by inſpecting the intrails of victims. He who conceal'd his faults was beat with ſtones. They confeſs'd themſelves on all thoſe occaſions where the divine aſſiſtance is immediately neceſſary; but the great and ſolemn confeſſion was made whenever the Incas was ſick. The Incas confeſs'd himſelf to the ſun only, after which he waſh'd himſelf in a running-ſtream, addreſſing it in theſe words: Receive the ſins which I have confeſs'd to the ſun, and carry 'em into the ſea. Their penances conſiſted in faſtings, oblations, withdrawing into the moſt deſart part of the mountains, ſcourgings, &c.

Their Marriages, and the Education of their Children.

WE ſhall begin this article with the marriage of ſuch as were either nearly or diſtantly related to the Incas's, of which [b] Garcilaſſo gives the following account. " The king caus'd to aſſemble annually, or every two year, at a certain time,
" all the marriageable young men and maidens of his family, that were in Cuſco.

" The ſtated age was eighteen or twenty for the maidens, and twenty-four for the " men; for they were never allow'd to marry younger, becauſe, ſaid they, 'twas fitting
" the parties ſhould be of an age requiſite for the well-governing their families; and " affirm'd that 'twas mere folly to diſpoſe of them ſooner in marriage.

" When the marriage was agreed upon, the Incas ſet himſelf in the midſt of 'em,
" they all ſtanding one by the other: he then call'd 'em by their names, after which
" taking 'em by the hand, he made them promiſe a mutual faith, which being done,
" he gave them into the hands of their parents. Then the new-married couple went " to the houſe of the bridegroom's father, and the wedding was ſolemniz'd for " three, four days, or more, according as the neareſt relations judg'd proper. The " young women who were married in this manner, were afterwards call'd the lawful
" wives, or the wives given by the hand of the Incas; a title which was beſtow'd
" purely to do 'em the greater honour. When the Incas had thus married his rela" tions, the next day the miniſters appointed for that purpoſe married the reſt of the " young men, ſons to the inhabitants of Cuſco, in the ſame order; according to the " diviſion of the ſeveral diſtricts, call'd higher and lower Cuſco.

" The relations furniſh'd the moveables or utenſils of the houſe, every one bringing " ſomething; and this they perform'd very punctually among themſelves, and never " made any ſacrifices or other ceremonies at their weddings.

" The governors and Curacas were, by their employments, oblig'd to marry the " young men and maidens of their provinces in the ſame manner. They were bound " to aſſiſt in perſon at thoſe weddings, or ſolemnize them themſelves, in quality of " lords and fathers of their country.
